ACROSS: 1 Boston massacre; 9 Enlists; 11 Detracts; 12 Swoops; 14 and 23 Digital computer; 15 and 10 Spear-carrier; 17 Eight; 19 Newness; 21 Braise; 25 Laid out; 26 Iterate; 27 Prime ministers. DOWN: 1 Breadline; 2 Saluted; 3 Onslaught; 4 Misstating; 5 Sock; 6 Arrow; 7 Rhizome; 8 Arms; 13 Slow-motion; 15 Sleepless; 16 Riderless; 18 Glacier; 20 Situate; 21 Ball; 22 Storm; 24 Stem.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open
Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation, its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.
$2 postpd., 200 pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — M St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

FOREIGN PAPERBACKS and Discount Books. Free lists. P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, California 94577.

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

15c LITTLE BLUE BOOKS. 1,900 titles. Catalog 10c, refundable. Larson's Books, Box 5554-N, Arlington, Va. 22205.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

FOR SALE

15TH CENTURY MONASTERY — ITALY. 60 rooms — 7 acres farmland. Magnificent vista off Hilltown Vicinity New Florence-Siena Autostrada. Box 592, c/o The Nation.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

FALL SEMESTER In the Classroom

THE NATION

"Wherever I go, I continue to introduce The Nation to my classes in International Relations as a journal whose informative articles are accompanied by sane, constructive editorials, pungently and effectively expressed."

—D. F. Fleming, California State College, Los Angeles

"Student boredom is one of the great barriers to learning. Where a course can be enlivened by social controversy and by knowledge passionately felt and applied to the critical problems of our time, the interest of the students comes alive. That is why in over 15 years of teaching in Midwestern and Eastern colleges I have often turned to The Nation for a classroom subscription to supplement the factual, but passionless, American government textbook."

—Marc Karson, Kingsborough Community College, Brooklyn

"I find The Nation an invaluable classroom aid for the teaching of American problems because of its objectivity, readability and low cost per student."

—Darrell Hawes, Bend (Ore.) High School

For the convenience of teachers, who want to use The Nation in the classroom, we offer a special classroom rate.

65c per month per student in bundle orders of ten or more delivered to the same address. Desk copy is supplied free to the teacher. Simply fill out the coupon for immediate service.

THE NATION, Education Department
333 6th Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

Please send me .... copies per month for .... months. (Minimum order ten copies per month.)

☐ Check enclosed ☐ Bill me

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

10-3-66

THE NEW ALBEE HAROLD CLURMAN

THE NATION

OCTOBER 10, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
FEB 2 1967
LIBRARY

THE AMBIVALENT SCHOLARS

MARX & SHAME
Socialism Today

HARVEY SWADOS

WEDGE OF DISSENT The Democratic Rebels in Congress ROBERT G. SHERRILL

FREEWAYS ABOVE
NATHAN SILVER

SMOG BELOW
M. G. WURTELE

Sherman Paul on William Carlos Williams

LETTERS

pomp and benefits

Benson, Minn.
Dear Sirs: Having just lost a DFL primary race here in Minnesota (15,000 votes as against 40,000 for the incumbent) as an anti-Vietnamese war Congressional candidate, I am forced regretfully to agree with the editorial, "The Painless War" [The Nation, Sept. 19].

If Democratic Party liberals are the chief purveyors of the "war is good for prosperity" gambit, they are simply adhering to the pattern of politics which began with Teddy Roosevelt who linked "bomb-bast" and imperialism in foreign affairs with sterile reform rhetoric on the domestic scene. Indeed, ours is "The Century of Teddy Roosevelt," not that of the common man.

Theodore Roosevelt and Hubert Humphrey were cut from the same cloth, excepting that Teddy learned to ride a horse during his Dakota episode. An analogy also holds between Roosevelt and Bismarck, the Iron Chancellor who unified Germany under industrial autocracy while pioneering in the field of old-age insurance under prodding from the Socialists. But there is the disquieting knowledge that Bismarck's pomp and imperialism, coupled with fringe benefits for the populace, finally produced the rule of Adolf Hitler. James M. Youngdale sitting it out

Franklin Park, Ill.
Dear Sirs: Albert Parry in "Russia's Other Peace Movement" [The Nation, Aug. 22] seems not to understand just what is a peace movement.

A peace movement shows concern for the injustices created by war and works to end these injustices and end the war. The Russian students and others he refers to are not doing this, they are not doing anything. . . . Parry confuses this lack of concern, because it does not follow the Soviet Government line, with peace.

If they did follow the government line, they would then be working for peace—even if possibly for the wrong reason—because the U.S. position is so wrong. But to take no stand . . . is to permit injustice to continue and thus to work against peace. Jerry DeMuth

Twain's prayer

Rice, Minn.
Dear Sirs: Whatever became of the "Pray for Peace" U.S. Postal Stamp cancellation program? Can it be that Johnson and his postmaster general, or whoever, became discouraged with the results the scheme was getting? If so, perhaps they could get new inspiration from the following war prayer dictated by Mark Twain:

> O Lord our Father, our young patriots, idols of our hearts, go forth to battle—be Thou near them! With them—in spirit—we also go forth from the sweet peace of our beloved firesides to smite the foe. O Lord our God, help us to tear their soldiers to bloody shreds with our shells; help us to cover their smiling fields with the pale forms of their patriot dead; help us to drown the thunder of the guns with the shrieks of their wounded, writhing in pain; help us to lay waste their humble homes with a hurricane of fire; help us to turn them out roofless with their little children to wander unfriended the wastes of their desolated land in rags and hunger and thirst. . . . We ask it, in the spirit of love, of Him who is the Source of Love, and who is the ever-faithful refuge and friend of all that are sore beset and seek His aid with humble and contrite hearts. Amen. Stewart Graves

EDITORIALS

If He Wants Peace . . .

A nod from President Johnson is all that would be required for United Nations Secretary-General U Thant to board a plane for Southeast Asia, to lead the war in Vietnam to the conference table. There is a great deal of evidence that he could achieve a peace that would protect both the honor and the legitimate interests of the United States.

Thant's three-point peace plan, combined with the longer vision of the future of Vietnam contained in documents arising out of the meeting last month in Phnom Penh between French President Charles de Gaulle and Prince Norodom Sihanouk, provide the clear framework for a peace settlement. Thant offers the road to negotiations; de Gaulle and Sihanouk suggested its objective: a neutral Indo-Chinese peninsula, in which there is even the possibility of a separate South Vietnam, if its people so prefer.

As an alternative to peace, the chief American delegate at the United Nations, Arthur J. Goldberg, last month opened a new "peace offensive." His speech to the General Assembly presented a burlesque of the Thant plan and, to the surprise of no one, was rejected immediately. Washington had decreed that there should be no boat rocking—at least until after the November elections. Meanwhile, President Johnson continues this "peace offensive" with his projected trip to Manila, pretending to see peace where none is to be found. After the elections, is there hope that the Administration will be willing to explore the clear UN road to "peace with honor"? Lyndon B. Johnson's record in office is not encouraging.

In the early autumn of 1964 Thant, on his own initiative, inquired of Hanoi through the Russians if Ho Chi Minh, with whom Thant has had good relations over the years, would be willing to authorize a meeting between his representatives and those of President Johnson to discuss the modalities of a peace conference. Hanoi accepted the offer almost immediately. Washington stalled for five months, then rejected it, the rejection being punctuated by the beginning of systematic bombing of North Vietnam.

Despite this disheartening experience, in July, 1965, Thant again asked Hanoi whether peace talks might still begin, if the United States would stop bombing. Hanoi said yes, but Washington rejected the offer.

Dismayed, but not yet utterly discouraged, Thant considered how an atmosphere might be established in which negotiations would be possible, even at this late date. After consultations that surely included new soundings in Hanoi, he devised his three-point peace plan. The first point was a cessation of bombing North Vietnam; not another pause, but an end. The second point was a de-escalation of the fighting in the south, including a halt in the build-up of forces on both sides—a silencing of the guns so far as possible, defensive actions where an end to the fighting could not be achieved. Finally, Thant proposed that the United States talk peace directly with the National Liberation Front in South Vietnam, as the French, despite misgivings, finally negotiated with the NLF in Algeria.

Thant's three-point peace plan so far has been met by silence in Washington, but Goldberg—after a losing battle inside the State Department—managed to construct a mock-up of his own. In effect, he told the General Assembly that if the North Vietnamese would agree to stop sending reinforcements to fight in the south, the United States would stop bombing North Vietnam. It is difficult to imagine a better bargain for the United States: bombing North Vietnam was undertaken to stop "infiltration" to the south, and has failed to do that. If accepted, Goldberg's "offer" would have accomplished what bombing has failed to do, and with no cost in planes and airmen lost.

With the ability of "the other side" to resist crippled by a halt in reinforcements, and the United States undertaking no similar commitment, Goldberg then proposed that a phased withdrawal of North Vietnamese troops, and American troops, might be arranged. Talking to the Vietcong—or the National Liberation Front—would not be an "insurmountable obstacle," he added, quoting President Johnson. Of course, the Goldberg plan was not accepted.

By contrast to this never-never land, Thant's three-point peace plan could become an active program within a matter of days, if the United States gave the word that Washington was willing to explore this obvious avenue to peace. Ambassador Abdul Rahman Pazhwak of Afghanistan, President of the twenty-first General Assembly, is also a leader of the nonaligned nations here. A group of such nations quickly could frame a resolution to authorize Thant to implement his peace plan. Thant, a Burmese, has facilities for negotiating possessed by no one else in the world.

Since he announced his intention to retire after his present term expires November 3—or at the end of this Assembly, December 20, at the latest—Thant has been the object of international assurances of confidence never given anyone before. Paul Martin, the Minister for External Affairs of Canada, already has suggested that this hymn of praise (led by Goldberg, incidentally) might be converted into a practical power for peace. No one who knows Thant doubts that at whatever personal sacrifice, he would accept another term in office if he really believed he could be instrumental in achieving peace in Vietnam.

Goldberg has grasped the essentials of United Nations usefulness: he stands ready and eager to transmit the word to Thant, Pazhwak and the United Nations in general that the Americans are, at long last, ready to pursue peace in Vietnam with a seriousness unencumbered by a childlike faith that a punch in the nose will solve vexing problems. What is required is the consent of President Johnson.

DONALD GRANT, U. N. Correspondent
St. Louis Post-Dispatch

Welcome Aboard

Washington correspondents write prolifically, but they do not necessarily enlighten the reader. On the contrary, it sometimes seems that their mission is to keep the President in good humor rather than help the public to understand. Anthony Howard is among the exceptions, but since he reports the Washington scene for The Observer of London, Britishers are likely to be better informed than Americans about some behind-the-scenes maneuvers on the political front.

Howard has discerned, for example, the meaning of the

JUN 13
JUN 2

IN THIS ISSUE

October 10, 1966

EDITORIALS

338

ARTICLES

341 Wedge of Dissent:
The Democratic Rebels in Congress Robert G. Sherrill

346 Letter from Germany:
A Sword Too Heavy? C. Amery

347 The Ambivalent Scholars
Marx and Shame: Socialism Today Harvey Swados

351 The Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights II:
Justice for the Accused Leo Pfeffer

354 Million-Dollar Trinket Ralph Lee Smith

BOOKS & THE ARTS

356 Seeing Williams with Fresh Eyes Sherman Paul

357 The Model A Spirit Nathan Silver

358 White Pass Ski Patrol (poem) John Logan

359 Where the Air Is Unclear M. G. Wurtele

360 The Mafia Establishment Gabriel Gersh

360 Lunch Hour Idyll (poem) Saul Touster

361 Theatre Harold Clurman

364 Records Benjamin Boretz

364 Asylum (poem) Daniel Hoffman

366 Films Robert Hatch

367 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July [illegible] August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign [illegible] Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice [illegible] required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address [illegible] well [illegible] the new.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 11

recent meeting in New York of Kenneth Galbraith, Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., and Richard Goodwin, all former members of the Kennedy administration and, in the case of Schlesinger and Goodwin, one-time aides of President Johnson as well. Goodwin did not depart until the beginning of this year, and Mr. Johnson may feel that his new role is especially treacherous. If so, Mr. Johnson should consider the difference between a man writing speeches for the President and a man writing them for himself.

That is not a precise description of Mr. Goodwin's present role; it may be broader. As Mr. Howard sees it, Goodwin and the other two are working together on the Vietnamese dilemma, and their views are generally in line with those of Sen. Robert Kennedy. This agreement is not accidental. The "Kennedy Group"—a kind of shadow cabinet—is in the process of launching a project aimed to put pressure on the President through a "No Wider War" committee, probably soon after the elections. Such a maneuver is not to be taken lightly, either by the participants or by Mr. Johnson. The former are going out on a political limb, since the tendency of the citizens is to support the President more or less blindly in any foreign adventure. But the adventure in this case is so ill-advised that critics of the President's policy may be able to make things hot for him, once they find common ground.

Robert Kennedy succeeded in detaching himself from the Administration's policy with his statement of last February suggesting "a share of power and responsibility" for the Vietcong in negotiations. This was a considerable departure from the Johnson idea that the Vietcong might be allowed to participate with the Hanoi delegation. Neither the Kennedy nor the Johnson concept of the Vietcong role is at all clear, but it is hardly possible to conduct politics without a measure of obfuscation. Kennedy did detach himself from Johnson, and now he is joined by three influential Democrats in a sort of united front. Its policy is one Howard calls "the lowest common denominator among all the critics," namely, resistance to any further acts of American escalation.

How far Kennedy will go remains to be seen. He has been careful to avoid the appearance of a break with the President. Yet no one imagines that there is cordial feeling between the two, or that Kennedy would not like to find a crucial issue on which to differ. He has the issue, but does not wish to confront the President prematurely. There seems to be no doubt, however, that a so-far-and-no-farther position is the one most likely to succeed.

The LBJ Backlash

Lester G. Maddox's victory in the Georgia primary run-off was more "shocking" than "surprising." The vote in the Goldwater precincts of De Kalb County is a clear indication that the young "Pepsi Generation" suburbanites backed Maddox on the assumption that their current idol, the Republican Howard Callaway, could more easily defeat Maddox than Arnall in November. The fact that a moderate Democrat beat a segregationist Democrat in the run-off for lieutenant governor — for which office the Republicans have no nominee — is further evidence of the extent and effect of the switch-over Republican strategy.

Arnall ran an old-fashioned campaign, stayed largely in Atlanta, and did little active campaigning between the primary and the run-off. He was also provoked into stressing the fact that he is a "national Democrat," which in Georgia today is anything but a popular position. The state Democratic machine was indifferent to Arnall, who has never gotten along well with Senator Talmadge. Only one of the other Democrats in the primary (six in all) endorsed Arnall. The recent disturbances in Atlanta were a minor factor; the segregationist vote had "jelled" long before these outbreaks. The vote in the run-off was heavier than in the primary, and the Negro vote in Atlanta was particularly heavy.

How, then, do things stand now? The Atlanta Constitution suggests that the Republicans may have outsmarted themselves, that Maddox just might defeat Callaway. One reason for this notion is that the "Mad Democrats" — those who not merely have their backs up on the racial issue but who are furious with LBJ for a variety of reasons — now have a candidate who will elicit their unqualified allegiance. If Arnall had been nominated, many of them might have voted for Callaway. On balance, though, it would seem that Callaway will win the governorship. In this sorry turn of events, how should the Negroes and the moderate whites of Georgia now vote? If they refrain from voting, will Maddox or Callaway be the beneficiary? Or does it matter? More important is the effect that this disaster will have throughout the Deep South, where Georgia has been regarded as the state most likely to slough off the shabby past. Perhaps it is just as well that Lillian Smith, a Georgian who tried hard to break the old pattern of racial bigotry and hate, died when she did.

Myth of Natural Aggression

As our diet of violence grows, the country falls back more and more on the "comforting" theory that a growing army of homicidal nuts is loose upon the land. It does not necessarily follow. The young man who fired from the Texas bell tower was suffering from a brain tumor, but that is no reason for assuming that whoever murdered Valerie Percy in Winnetka, Ill., was deranged. And what of those children on New York's Lower East Side who soaked the clothes of sleeping "bums" and set them afire? The mother of one of them told the press that "everybody talks about the bums and we should get rid of them."

Frederic Wertham has been derided for his campaigns against comic books and TV thrillers, but he persists. When, in the wake of the Percy killing C.B.S. canceled its showing of Psycho because its tale of a psychopath who murders women might be thought in "bad taste," Wertham observed sardonically: "I'm not certain it is necessary to show on film how much 'fun' it is to kill a girl."

The point he has to make is a simple one. There is no evidence that aggressive violence is a basic animal instinct; indeed, current opinion among animal behaviorists (see On Aggression by Konrad Lorenz; see also "The Anatomy of Violence" by J. B. Scott, The Nation, June 21, 1965) is that the "instinct" does not exist in animals lower than man. Man has no other instincts that are peculiar to his species, and the logic follows that aggressive violence is an acquired characteristic. It can be acquired only from society—a society which for centuries has proclaimed smugly that you can't change human nature.

If stabbing and shooting and burning become the commonplaces of our popular entertainment (and the active agents of our foreign policy), a proportion of the public—it seems to be a growing proportion—will see them as normal acts of gratification, and will behave accordingly. If cars are sold on the basis of their jack-rabbit acceleration, their buyers will attempt to beat one another at the crossroads. Is such behavior insane? Dr. Wertham would not so certify. A society gets the sanity it deserves.

The Taste of Inflation

Inflation is no academic matter to a retired couple in their seventies — nor, for that matter, to many a family with employed members. "I can taste inflation," said one elderly housewife who once could afford sirloins and now eats 45c-a-pound chuck roast full of gristle. The rise in food prices may not be as bad for the younger people, but it is bad enough. According to National Observer, a 28-year-old housewife in Phoenix, Ariz., dismayed by the steady climb in her food expenditures, placed a four-line ad in a local paper on August 18, asking housewives who wanted to fight this erosion of the family budget to get in touch with her. At last reports, 5,000 Phoenix housewives have joined up. The incident reflects the national concern over rising prices, especially for foodstuffs and particularly the indispensable items — eggs, dairy products, bread.

The latest Bureau of Labor Statistics index tells the story: 0.4 per cent increase in cost of living over the month before. July showed the same increase: 0.4 per cent over June. It adds up to a substantial 3.5 per cent increase in the cost of living since August, 1965, mainly in food. And most economists agree that the index is a dated one which tends to minimize the actual rise.

Two sets of interrelated factors are basically responsible. One is the disappearance of surpluses and the fact that distributors are taking full advantage of short supply and burgeoning demand. The temptation to gouge is one which few businessmen at this level can resist. The other set of inflationary pressures comes from excessive costs on the distribution side. In two reports in The Nation (February 21 and September 19) Jennifer Cross tells what lies behind the cost-of-living increase. Fancy packaging, often carried to absurd lengths, adds to the cost of foods, particularly in supermarkets; it is one means whereby the processors can take a little extra from the customer. Advertising has the same effect: food manufacturers spend about $2.2 billion annually to tout their products. Savings stamps add another $680 million to the national food bill. The absence of supermarkets in poverty areas jacks up prices a further 2.8 per cent for consumers who can least afford to pay. So it goes.

Underlying the whole maladjustment is lack of planning. And where planning seems to exist, it is mostly simulated. It was good politics to pour $2 billion a year into farm price supports and the like, to help the farmers and, above all, to garner votes. But whatever has happened to the ever-normal-granary principle? If the surpluses were in storage now, they could be released to force prices down. The increased demand was foreseeable, but the government did nothing. Similarly, the failure to deal with excessive packaging and advertising costs is another proof of subservience to business and unwillingness to interfere with "free enterprise," which as often as not is monopoly in disguise.

A generalized anti-inflation program, relying on such measures as higher taxes and higher interest rates, is not capable of holding down food costs. Nor are a few thousand housewives here and there likely to force down costs by baking their own bread and boycotting selected products. They are on the right track when they agitate — the government never pays much attention to those who suffer in silence—but in the long run only an increase in supply will avail.

WEDGE OF DISSENT

The Democratic Rebels in Congress

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Washington

Congress, which Sen. Joseph Clark calls the sapless branch, is not quite dead. The rebels of the Left are weak, but they are more unified and determined than is generally believed. One influence that helps weld them together is their awareness that the counterbalance of dissent is more than ever needed in Lyndon Johnson's Washington.

For years Texas liberals have contended that Johnson displays the classic attitude of one who, if he were in a position to indulge the dark side of his nature, would be something of a jefe. A number of politicians around here are beginning to agree, and not all of them are liberals; some are on the Stennis subcommittee and some are on the mostly conservative Democratic Policy Committee.

Those who worry about Johnson's power no longer refer to his control over Congress, because in fact he has lost much there; they worry because Congress has already given him too many arbitrary powers and, in his own ways, he manages to get more.

Sen. Wayne Morse, in many respects one of Johnson's willing allies in Congress but at the same time a cranky constitutionalist, believes it would be hard to find "another time in the history of the Republic when the danger is as great as it is at the present hour in the development of a government by executive supremacy and secrecy." One of the East Coast's more urbane Senators, who fears Johnson enough to ask anonymity, called the President "as power mad as Macbeth. He is in the sear and yellow leaf of life, like Macbeth, when he will believe only those who flatter him. There are plenty calling him an s.o.b. behind his back." Sen. Vance Hartke of Indiana, of all Senators perhaps the most skeptical of Johnson's intentions, said it "is high time that the division of responsibility within the government be reasserted."

The House also has somber voices. Rep. Robert W. Kastenmeier of Wisconsin looks around the present scene and observes that "since McCarthy's day the liberals have lost more than they have gained. The public mind has been conditioned against their causes," both domestically and internationally. Rep. Don Edwards, president of the Americans for Democratic Action, sees a "turn to the right" since Johnson has been in the White House, possibly because "there isn't a single adviser around Johnson of the kind we'd like to have." Senator Clark, although he claims "I haven't given up hope that the guy will stop short of total disaster," has become so discouraged by the sound of goose-stepping in the White House that he now talks of retiring from the Senate after 1968. "There's nobody left but Arthur Goldberg," says Clark, one of the Senate's most unyielding advocates of disarmament, "who believes in arms control, détente with Russia, a foreign policy of conference rather than conflict. The White House has increasingly come under the guidance of individuals who are skeptical about moves for cooperation and peace." A national columnist reports (and after talking with a couple dozen dissenters in both Houses during the past fortnight I can say it certainly sounds authentic) that in a caucus of the Senate out group, one of those present said fervently: "We must stop this madman."

Such is their unhappiness that when in reality they mean only to sign a resolution begging for de-escalation, they sound as if they were plotting a palace coup.

Some of this unhappiness will shortly be translated into action in the House. There, a flying wedge of dissenters is organizing to go into action as soon as the next Congress convenes. A formal organization is something they haven't tried since the late 1950s, when it fell apart at the polls. Three of the chief dissenters — at that time the big play was for a softer line on China — were defeated in their next election, and that threw a scare into those who survived. But now some of the survivors, strengthened by new Congressmen, are ready to try again. The core group will probably be John Conyers of Michigan; Kastenmeier, a ringleader in the Liberal Project, out of which came the much discussed "Liberal Papers"; Ben Rosenthal of New York; William Fitts Ryan, who helped start the challenge of the Mississippi delegation in 1964, a focal point for a number of the group throughout 1965; Don Edwards of San Jose and the ADA; Phillip Burton of San Francisco, a regional vice chairman of the Democratic Study Group; George Brown, Jr., the only man in the House to vote against the defense budget and a predictable opponent, even if he stands alone, of any program to aid what he calls "those fatheads in the State Department"; Augustus Hawkins and Edward Roybal, both of Los Angeles. Brown is a loner, but he and Hawkins and Roybal are buddies and if one of them goes along with plans for the formal group, probably all three will. Tentatively counted among the dissenters are Donald M. Fraser of Minnesota, chairman of the Democratic Study Group's foreign study committee, and John Dow of New York, who need only survive the next election, they say, to begin showing the toughness of a George Brown. Some are also including Henry Gonzalez of Texas, who rides with the President too much to be a stable liberal but who, when he fights, is a very good fighter indeed. And — though this may come as a shock to the purists beyond Washington's borders — Adam Clayton Powell, the wild hare from Harlem. Powell will be invited in for two reasons: if he weren't, he would probably cut the group's program to pieces; and Powell has more secret admirers among Congressional liberals than the public might suppose.

That's the group that you are likely to see coming over the ramparts in January. Conyers, Kastenmeier, Rosenthal, Ryan, Edwards and Burton are considered "solid" by the inner strategists; the others are probables.

And what could this mean? On the really tough domestic bills, twenty votes or less are often the difference between victory and defeat. Thirteen names are listed above, and before the next Congress the roster may total twenty. That's swing power, dickering power, in a tighter Congress; it would put the dissenters in a position, as Burton expressed it, "to study the priorities."

The group could have an even greater impact on the House through the Democratic Study Group, which at present is pretty much an arm of the Establishment but at the same time is disorganized enough to be swung by a well-rehearsed and dedicated junta of the kind these thirteen dissenters could make of themselves. The misnamed "liberal" establishment in Washington has a real stake in the DSG and fears a splinter group of the sort that is in the making.

On the Senate side, unity is achieved through the overlapping of persistent ideological persuasions, not through any outstanding leadership. Among Senate dissenters William Fulbright, Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, would be the natural choice as leader (although he is a Tory in domestic affairs), and one of the younger dissenters insists that Fulbright shows signs of becoming one—"We're closer to Bill, and he's closer to us than ever before."

Actually, as everyone in both Houses knows full well and often says, Fulbright is no leader; he's a loner. The last time I was in his office he was pushing around on his desk a letter from Barbara Tuchman, in which she suggested that the dissenters should consciously set themselves up as the loyal opposition. Fulbright allowed as how it wasn't a bad idea . . . but then again it wasn't a good idea. He had all sorts of excuses for not organizing along that line. "It's a little embarrassing for members of the same party to criticize the President." It's a shame, said Fulbright, that Dirksen and Hickenlooper are in Johnson's pocket. Bob Taft was different. "He said it was the duty of the opposition to oppose—at least for clarification."

Fulbright seemed to recognize that blaming the lack of opposition on the Republicans didn't answer Mrs. Tuchman's proposal, so he went on prodding at her letter and giving other excuses: The dissenters don't have enough seniority. They aren't close to the seat of power. He is top man in seniority among them, and he doesn't rate very high. Etc.

Consequently the leadership of the group has been passed around. Depending on the resolution under consideration, Hartke has sometimes been in front, or Frank Church of Idaho, or (with increasing popularity among the dissenters these days) George McGovern of South Dakota. And sometimes, from sheer ebullient noise, the leadership seems to be firmly in the hands of Wayne Morse who, with Ernest Gruening, that grand old rumpled ex-Nation executive, holds top seniority in Vietnamese dissent. Robert Kennedy has notably not tried to lead.

Although the dispute with Johnson usually centers — at least in the headlines — on Vietnam, the unhappiness ranges much wider than that. In general these are the beliefs that hold the dissenters together:

With the death of President Kennedy died the bright promise of a foreign policy tolerant of differences in other nations, aware of U.S. shortcomings, modest in its reaching for world-wide influence, and courageous in its willingness to admit error.

The dissenters argue that it is Johnson the interventionist who is the new isolationist. "Forty years ago," said Gruening, "the isolationist thought of the United States as a power unto itself. Today the interventionist operates by the same concept, by-passing the United Nations and plunging deeper into other countries' affairs against the wishes of the world."

The dissenters believe that in Southeast Asia and in Europe the United States is acting out the role of an international bully — what Fulbright calls the "traditional policy of a great and militarily powerful nation." We've got the power and we feel that we have to use it. "Like ancient Rome," says Gruening, "our legions are everywhere." Clark asserts that "despite the claims of Secretary of State Rusk to the contrary, there is hardly an area in the great arc sweeping southward from Norway and north again to Japan where we have not become the policeman of the free world."

The United States has lost elasticity in its foreign policy, not just in Vietnam but throughout the world. Given a choice between a wobbly civilian government and a sturdy military one, we usually champion the latter. "When the chips are down in Latin America," says Morse, "too often the United States walks out on freedom." We are acting stuffy, forgetting the origin of our own nation. "We are not, as we like to claim in Fourth of July speeches, the most truly revolutionary nation on earth," said Fulbright. "We are, on the contrary, much closer to being the most *un*revolutionary nation on earth."

WELL HUBIE, Y'ALL TELL MR. FULBRIGHT AH GOT ME A FOREIGN POLICY— TWO OF 'EM.

Macpherson, Toronto Star

Old Dulles-isms are still in style, including brinkmanship, and the Dulles division of good guys and bad guys as laid out ten to fifteen years ago. In response to Johnson's fears of Chinese aggression the dissenters point out that with the exception of a brief border quarrel with India (and that was over a patch that some historians in this country say was clearly China's) China has made no aggressive move in a decade. Strategists for the State Department talk in sly terms of "containing communism" in Vietnam when they really mean containing a China inhabited by 700 million insidious Fu Manchus. Actually there has been no indication that China is trying to break through into North Vietnam, or that Premier Ho Chi Minh, who once spent eighteen months in a Chinese prison and reputedly is no great lover of his giant neighbor, would fail to resist any such attempt. Meanwhile, we — almost alone among the major nations of the world — speak of a U.S.-pensioned Formosa as if it were all China. In the words of Gruening, "To say that a little group of Chinese driven out of China is China is like saying that a group of Confederate soldiers retreating to the Isle of Pines off Cuba is the United States."

In Europe, we face new situations with the same old "rigidity, stubbornness and standpatism," says Church, and when we try to arm and pacify our allies simultaneously we wind up writing treaties with a "ball point corkscrew." (Despite such outspoken dissatisfaction with our foreign policy, or perhaps because of it, Church was the President's excellent choice as a member of the UN delegation.)

While the State Department sometimes acknowledges a softening on Russia's part, it continues to treat NATO as if it were still a military defense organization needed to beat back Russian aggression. Europe is tired of being divided, tired of being forced to choose sides in the old Russia-U.S. game of bluff. "I can't get too enthusiastic about the Administration's near panic over de Gaulle's pull-out. I think there is no real threat from Russia," says McGovern. "NATO is obsolete," says Gruening. "De Gaulle is rendering us a great service in putting us out. European nations don't want us there." Representative Brown believes "the only threat of military trouble comes from the presence of U.S. troops."

In short, our foreign policy is that of a militarist nation. Our outlook, like our economy, is based on arms. Clark, willing to help Johnson get the money for his domestic program, would like to see the Senate, "in a brief moment of sanity," slash military aid. "It's goddamn nonsense the way they [Congress] throw money away," says Fulbright. "Defense — everybody is for it. Space — you can get half a dozen votes against it, that's all. When you try to trim the defense and space budgets, dissent is an academic exercise." While Congress is much to blame, Johnson must take the leader's share, says McGovern: "The rising level of defense, the supersonic plane — he'll talk about them, glamorize them, throw the full weight of the White House behind them," but when it comes to seeking the billions of dollars needed for rebuilding the cities, for pollution and mass-transportation problems, the Administration gives either silent or grudging support.

To the priorities of American spending the dissenters give their most bitter opposition. Ryan sees this bitterness as the best glue for holding together an urban bloc in the House. Clark recently squeezed from Senator Stennis the admission that the Pentagon will have more than $100 billion, nearly as much as the entire federal budget, to play with this year, counting unexpended funds from previous budgets. The military budget has climbed to World War II levels—although there isn't a Tojo or a Hitler in sight.

"We haven't mounted an appropriate and well-documented attack on military appropriations as yet," says Edwards. "But it's coming. You can expect a real, organized attack in January, February and March. There'll be testimony before committees, speeches on the floor, amendments to the military budget."

McGovern points out that, while quietly cutting down on wheat shipments, the United States increases its military aid outlay. "We pretend to be the conscience of the world, but we hardly have the image of a peacemaker. I was told, after visiting a number of countries in the Middle East, that the real pride and joy of our effort to utilize arms aid to bolster an anti-Communist nation was Iraq. I had scarcely left Iraq when its army — which we had equipped, supposedly to defend freedom — turned on the government, cut off the head of its young king, and dragged his body through the streets of Baghdad. They assassinated the premier and brought down the whole government, using American arms to carry out the task." Hartke suggested sarcastically that it is all right for us to give tanks to Jordan, though it had declared its intention to invade Israel, since "we also supplied the airplanes for Israel, with which they could knock out the tanks."

What else can one expect from a misalliance of war and peace? asks Kastenmeier. "I debated very long about special foreign aid appropriations to Vietnam. I voted for it and I should have voted against it. It's window dressing. How many 500-pound bombs can foreign aid offset? Foreign aid, so long as there is a war, is hypocrisy." But if there has to be foreign aid, let it be distributed through a third party. "The United States has spent $850 billion for defense since World War II," says Fulbright. "I believe it would be a great thing if we could take one-tenth of the amount now spent for military purposes and give it to the International Bank or the UN Development Fund and have it used to help build up the societies and economies of the underdeveloped world." All the dissenters feel that any distribution of funds should be done through a third party. Unilateral distribution such as we now carry on can only lead, says Clark, to dollar diplomacy. Fulbright and Brown, referring to a Nation article [by John McDermott, July 25], warned of "welfare imperialism."

Looking back, the dissenters feel that Congress was sucked into giving Johnson carte-blanche powers in Southeast Asia. Was the Tonkin Gulf incident — after which the President was given a free hand—perhaps magnified all out of proportion, just so Congress would get excited enough to pass the resolution? A growing number of Congressmen begin to think so. And the incident at Pleiku, when some enemy troops walked right through the Vietnamese troops and bombed a U.S. dormitory, was that not a convenient excuse for beginning to bomb North Vietnam? "Of course it was a ploy," says Gruening. "A gimmick," says Morse.

Evidence continues to emerge, some of it from unlikely sources, that Johnson has been itching for a long time to become a global strong man. It did not escape the dissenters' notice when columnist William S. White, whose writings are generally assumed to originate in the White House, said that Johnson for five years has been nurturing in his heart the desire to impose his doctrine on Asia.

Wherever the dissenters' fears take them, they always come back to the tether fear that Johnson wants more power than is good for the country. And they are not made to feel any better on this point when the President's most intimate aid, Bill Moyers, proclaims: "In a world in which power is our lot, the Presidency stands across the path of those who mistakenly assert that democracy must fail because it can neither decide promptly nor act vigorously. That office is occupied now by a man with a talent for power. If he fails, we all fail. If he succeeds, we all succeed."

To the dissenters this is a new and fearful concept of the Presidency: that the destiny of the nation should depend upon the destiny of one man.

After so much complaining, what are the results? From a distance they may not appear much, but in some ways the dissenters have already achieved a great deal. For one thing, they are forcing Johnson's hidden nature to the surface. Not long ago Senator Clark made a speech in San Francisco in which he said that it would probably be a good thing if the Democrats lost seventy-five seats in the House, because it would reduce Johnson's power. No sooner had Clark stepped into the Senate chamber again than Vice President Humphrey pushed him into a cloakroom and demanded to know why he had said such a thing. "Because I believe it," Clark replied. Said Humphrey, "I know, Joe, but you're driving the President crazy."

Any opposition, however weak, has always triggered a Johnsonian tantrum. But the public should know about this by the 1968 elections, and the dissenters are doing a service by bringing it out. They are also revealing the side of Johnson that has been known, but often submerged, since his 1949 character assassination of Federal Power Commissioner Leland Olds as an anti-capitalism suspect. There's a little bit of that going on today, with the Administration operating through favored newspapers and columnists. The kindest thing that Johnson's old friend William S. White calls the dissenters is "lefties." Fulbright believes that the unfriendly attitude of The Washington Post toward the group in opposition can be traced partly to Johnson's appointment of a Post executive as ambassador to Switzerland. Fulbright points out that when the Post's diplomatic correspondent, Murray Marder, writes a piece critical of the Administration, "it winds up in the Progressive magazine, not in the Post." Gruening says that when he and Morse made their first major speeches against the Tonkin Gulf resolution, "not a line appeared in either The New York Times or The Washington Post." Johnson's influence in all this is probably exaggerated, but it is nevertheless true that the dissenters have not had a good press. Clark contends that when the dissenters take the Senate floor to make a full exposition of their opposition, "the press deserts us in droves."

Johnson is also suspected of planting stories to hold the dissenters up to ridicule. Well established in Washington folklore is the tale that Church was upbraided by Johnson for making certain assertions about Vietnam in a speech. Church replied: "But I was only agreeing with Walter Lippmann." Johnson rumbled, "Awright, the next time you want a dam in Idaho, go to Walter Lippmann for it." Church denies that any such conversation took place and charges the White House with planting the story "as a warning to us as to what could happen. It was done to make us afraid."

Another very widely circulated story is that Johnson told Hartke: "You were just a two-bit mayor of a two-bit town, and I made you Senator." Hartke denies Johnson ever said such a thing. (He also denies that Johnson had anything to do with his victory in 1958.)

Another negative reaction from the Administration was the shifting of Russell Long off the Foreign Affairs Committee, and his replacement by Dale McGee. McGee denies that Johnson had anything to do with the shift, but McGee has certainly proved to be the voice of Johnson in a most rambunctious way. McGee claims to have "the highest regard for the group" in general, but he says the dissent of "three or four" (and, although he won't specify, it's easy to guess whom he means) is "cheap, not genuine, and showing no depth of understanding or intellectual honesty. They read letters from home and take a position. That's not the way a politician does business in 1966. What does liking or not liking to see the pine caskets coming home to Ohio [home of dissenter Stephen Young] or Alaska [home of Gruening] got to do with what you have to do around the world?" Furthermore, he feels that "this isn't the real Fulbright you are hearing on foreign aid." The bogus one, he says, is the creation of a personal, not an ideological split with Johnson.

Most of their fellow Senators speak kindly of the dissenters, and some credit them with influence. Sen. William Proxmire of Wisconsin, who made quite a reputation for himself as a dissenter in his early years but who has now begun to feel his way toward the fringe of the Establishment, sees them "gaining in stature" because "a surprising number of their demands, including the representation of the Vietcong at the conference table, have been adopted by the President." (Actually the United States has sounded both ways on that point.)

Paul Douglas, one of the great dissenters in the Senate on some issues but not on undeclared war, believes the rebels "had some triggering effect on the President's continually saying that he desires to negotiate. I think the attitude of the dissenters also had some triggering effect on the Policy Committee," which recently joined in asking for reduced U.S. military representation in Europe.

Bureaucrats and professionals athletic enough to make the social rounds report no Washington landslide against the group, although one dissenter claims Johnson has tried to get the embassies to scratch them. Norman Sherman, assistant to Vice President Humphrey, says he has "never heard a harsh remark about Mansfield, Fulbright or Morse." Washington society leans heavily to the liberal side, so if there are any complaints to be heard they should be loudest from that direction. They are: Joseph Rauh, prominent attorney and an old hand at steering the Americans for Democratic Action, has infiltrated many a Washington cocktail party recently and he swears that "the people I talk to are way ahead of the dissenters. They think Bobby [Kennedy] should take a much stronger position, and they hope that after the elections he will. The liberal community is farther out on the de-escalation program than Church, McGovern, Fulbright or any of them. That doesn't mean a unilateral pull-out. That's New Left talk, and the New Left represents nothing."

The dissenters do not seem to feel this support. "Good God, I feel isolated and discouraged," says Fulbright, no doubt speaking for the whole group on this point. Already one of the key dissenters is talking in terms of not getting out of Vietnam "until there is a change of administration," and another speaks wistfully of some potential candidate "who will offer to go to Vietnam, like Ike went to Korea. That would do it. He would win." It is an awfully long shot.

On the day that Hanoi and Haiphong were bombed for the first time, half a dozen dissenting Senators were sitting around trying to figure out a way to dissuade President Johnson from escalating the war again. Then they got the news. "Well," muttered Fulbright, "what do we do now?" After a gloomy silence, someone else suggested: "How about petitioning him not to bomb Peking? — that should give us a thirty-day head start."

It was a good summation of the dissenters' position: not defeated, but well aware that they are operating just one leap ahead of a fast-moving extremist.

LETTER FROM GERMANY

A Sword Too Heavy?

C. AMERY

Mr. Amery is a German novelist and journalist who has done postgraduate work in American universities.

Munich

Now that most of the facts are out (the minutes of the parliamentary defense committee were, as expected, leaked to the press) a layman can draw some conclusions of his own on the recent crisis between the West German army and the ministry of defense. The surface events are relatively easy to state. Three generals handed in their resignations for two distinct reasons. Their complaints made a prima-facie case against the minister of defense, Kai Uwe von Hassel, and his right-hand man, Assistant Secretary Gumbel. Large sections of public opinion, including the notorious Springer press, tore into von Hassel for his shameful neglect of the soldiers' legitimate grievances; liberal opinion abroad, reacting to this attack, tended to back the West German Government's decision to stand by von Hassel. This support was interpreted as a victory of political control over military arrogance, of old democratic tenets over the shadow of Prussia.

But neither the Springer approach nor the liberal reaction was up to date in its evaluations. The little crisis was strictly a postwar phenomenon, concerning the army of today and the West German establishment of today — not Wilhelm's second Reich, nor the unlucky Weimar Republic. The two factors that caused the generals to act were growing uneasiness about a series of fatal Starfighter accidents in the Luftwaffe and protracted enmity between Inspector General Trettner and the assistant secretary. In the Strauss era, the Starfighter was decided to be the ideal plane for the newly emerged Luftwaffe. It is hotly debated today that this was or was not a political decision — a superfluous argument, since the whole West German rearmament was a political decision. The Starfighter was to be the preparatory step to a West German nuclear striking force; there can be no doubt about that. All the modifications on the U.S.-Canadian pursuit plane (modifications which make it today a $1 million death trap for German pilots) are meaningless if they are not meant to make the plane capable of nuclear pinpoint bombing. In other words: the whole Starfighter program was, from the beginning, a concrete expression of the political aspirations of the Adenauer-Dulles era. It was and is frightfully expensive, it was and is tactically dubious, and it was and is the toy of a nation that aspires once again to military prestige.

But — and here the dissatisfaction of the generals comes in — it was imposed upon a military establishment incapable of supporting it. The Luftwaffe has a justified grudge there. It lacks technical manpower and it lacks an efficient and speedy "system management" of the sort installed at the Pentagon by McNamara. These men are by no means future junta Putschers; they are first-rate technicians clamoring for the tools they need and for a place in society, and in public opinion, corresponding to their objective skill — and, one may add, their expensiveness. If they are stars, and the German defense concept meant them to be stars, they should rate star pay and star treatment. They draw comparisons with their United States and Canadian fellow pilots and they feel themselves frustrated and disparaged by a clique of civilian bureaucrats.

This bureaucracy — which also caused the resignation of Inspector General Trettner — is the West German establishment's idea of political control over the armed forces; it is intended as the brake to prevent a relapse into the dangerous precedents of the past. In addition to the frightful costs of rearming from scratch a standing conscript army of 450,000 men, the German political establishment must (a) recruit the necessary number of highly skilled or highly trainable men in a society dedicated to capitalist goals (a situation very different from that of pre-1914 or pre-1945); (b) fight the ghosts of the past — particularly in questions of personnel; and, therefore (c) balance the demands of a democratic concept of military leadership against those of military efficiency and esprit de corps.

All recent crises and scandals involving the army have arisen from those strains and stresses. In Nagold, where recruits collapsed physically and psychologically under paratroop training, it was a question of modern principles against old-fashioned discipline (which, by the way, is tougher in the U.S. Marines than in the German army). In the case of General Panitzky, it was technical efficiency versus an old-fashioned bureaucracy; and in the case of the inspector general, it was these things plus the question of what place the armed forces have in an industrial society. Trettner was by-passed in a momentous decision: to let the powerful Public Services trade union organize professional soldiers. Before a high court of the land, the union argued successfully that professional soldiers have as much right to present their material demands as do their blue- or white-collar counterparts. Von Hassel, therefore, backed down from a stand previously taken and gave the unions their chance in the barracks. The decision was forced upon him, but he did not want to thrash it out with the highest-ranking soldier in the country.

The crisis is at an end — for the time being — but it would be naive to assume that the air is really cleared. The strains and stresses remain. They are the direct result of political decisions taken from 1947 to 1955, decisions which disregarded the heavy mortgage of recent German history and which were tailored to fit a cold-war alliance. They demanded economic and psychological sacrifices far exceeding the scant resources of the nation that today presents a glittering façade of power to the world. One might say that Germany forged a sword of considerable size and strength, but that it lacks the Siegfried to wield it properly.

THE AMBIVALENT SCHOLARS

Marx and Shame: Socialism Today

HARVEY SWADOS

Mr. Swados is on the faculty of Sarah Lawrence College. He is the editor of The American Writer and the Great Depression recently published by Bobbs-Merrill.

New York City

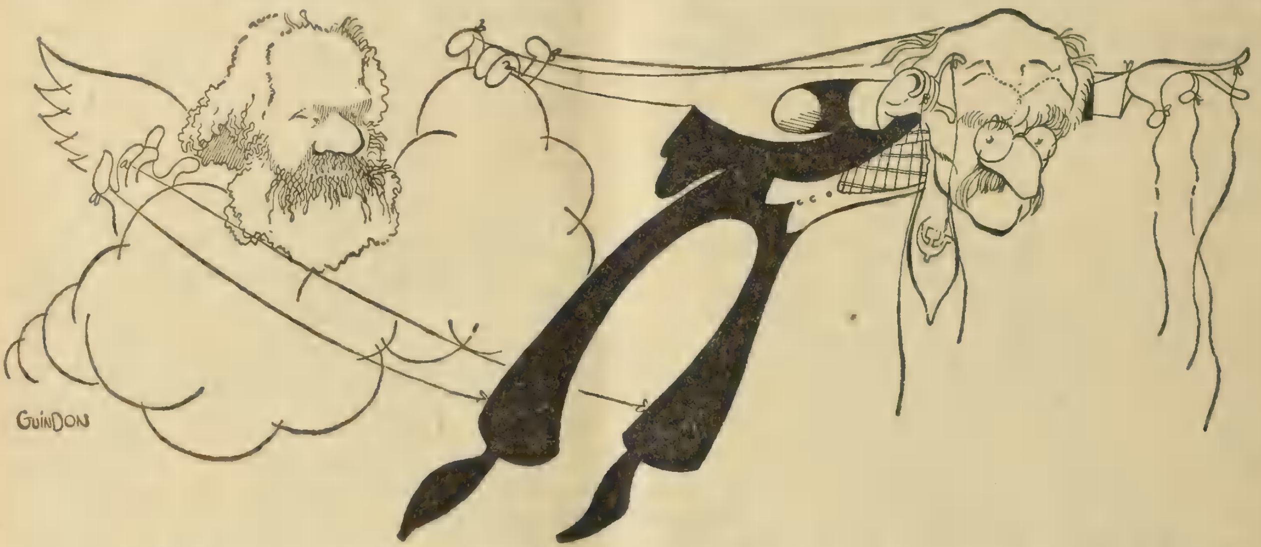
Since I had not attended the first annual Socialist Scholars Conference held at Columbia University in 1965, I did not know what to expect from the second, held at the Commodore Hotel in 1966. Apparently neither did the management of the hotel, which was so taken aback by what developed that future meetings will apparently revert to the more serene and cloistered atmosphere of the campus.

For one thing, the hotel was mobbed. Nine hundred arrivals had been pre-registered, but they were joined by so many hundreds more that it was all but impossible to reach the desk. Three hundred of the newcomers were accepted, to sit in an anteroom and hear the opening session through a loud-speaker; the rest were turned away. For another thing, while all of those who milled about may have been Socialists of some sort, they hardly resembled the scholars simultaneously gathering at other conferences in neighboring hotels to listen to technical papers and exchange information about teaching positions. These for the most part were terribly young, in their very early twenties, and a good many were teen-agers; their clothing, hair styling and whiskers were often of the sort that drives square school administrators into uncompromisingly conformist attitudes.

They had come, the first evening, to hear an address by the star of the conference, Isaac Deutscher, who disappointed neither them nor the graybeards his name had attracted. (Socialists in their thirties and even their forties were noticeably scarce — a generation seems to have disappeared — except for those represented on the steering committee.) Deutscher delivered an old-fashioned revivalist camp-meeting kind of speech, "On Socialist Man," with something in it for nearly every member of the Socialist family. There was a brief attack on Keynesianism ("pseudo-social control over the socialized productive process"). There was a somewhat lengthier attack on what he called "pessimist existentialism," which argues sub specie aeternitatis from a teleological premise ("We Marxists see no metaphysical sense in our existence—and no absurdity either. . . . We are concerned with man's condition in society which is his own creation"). And there was an extended attack on Freudianism—an indication, perhaps, that Deutscher regards it as the most potent, viable and mettlesome alternative to Marxist theory ("Freud and his disciples failed to make allowances for the refraction and transmutation of instinctual drives through social devices. . . . Freud, with his mistaken conception of property, begs the question. . . . Should one take it for granted that Socialist man will be subject to the Oedipus complex as we are?"). There was, finally, a sharp reminder that while we speak "colloquially" of Eastern Europe as being composed of Socialist countries, we are entitled to do so only in contrasting them with capitalist society. The typical man of the Soviet Union presents an even more striking contrast to the traditional concept of Socialist man, and indeed the Stalinist and post-Stalinist "Socialist man" of Eastern Europe and the Orient is a parody of the original Marxian vision: "I see the main causes of this not in the rulers' ill will—although there has never been any lack of this—but in objective circumstances."

Greeted with a standing ovation, Deutscher stood before the throng hardly as a new Socialist man—as he himself would have been the first to concede—but rather as almost the last of a breed effectively extinguished by Stalin and Hitler. The old revolutionist, the incarnation of scholarly integrity and Socialist fervor, complete with mid-European accent, bald Leninist dome and white Trotskyist goatee, seemed like a character from a novel of the thirties, remarkably reincarnated. He might have been counterbalanced, physically and intellectually, by Herbert Marcuse, but this rival elderly Marxist had to be represented by a letter of greeting to the conference which included a restatement of his estimation of contemporary problems.

Marcuse stressed that the Marxist idea of socialism, because it is not radical or utopian enough, no longer suffices to characterize possibility; that the conference should refrain from premature identification with anti-Socialist "Socialist" groups; that it should articulate and respond to the anti-ideological suspicions of the youth, and their refusal to accept either "the affluent society" or "socialism." The announcement that Marcuse was detained at a Hegel symposium in Prague was greeted with laughter which was somewhat mysterious to those not among the elect. What was funny—that Hegel had come to Prague, or that Marcuse had come to Prague?



In any case, it fell to Shane Mage (Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute) to provide not only a counterfoil to Deutscher but a foretaste of confusions yet to come. Arguing that Deutscher's Marxism was no longer adequate either as explanation of the present or guide to the future in an automated, workless society, Mr. Mage urged more immediate efforts to create the Socialist man through such means as the use of consciousness-expanding drugs like LSD. Mr. Mage's advocacy of what he seemed at this point to be spelling out as the Logical Socialist Drug was hardly acceptable even to the youngest generation present (although one engaging girl graduate student confessed to me next day, "if that was new-style Marxism, then I'm a Marxist!"), for it had already heard his message elsewhere and was eager for a more political and less chemical analysis of the human predicament. And Mr. Deutscher was quick to point out that the current craze for narcotics, hallucinogens and mystical recipes had its counterpart in the extreme experiments of young 19th-century Russian intellectuals who were beating their heads against the wall in a wildly obscurantist and seemingly reactionary czarist social order.

Nevertheless, the younger man had managed to bring out a contradiction which was to become increasingly apparent in the weekend of papers and discussions that followed. For if it was easy for the old revolutionist to demonstrate that the individual flight from reality is a poor prescription for decisively altering the course of modern society, it had been equally easy for the young rebel to observe that, for all its humanity and systematic rigor, Deutscher's Marxism simply did not seem sufficient or even relevant for those committed to combating from within the most powerful imperialist order in world history.

Deutscher had concluded his address with an appeal to "carry the Socialist idea back into the working class." Although that call was greeted with enthusiasm, it was to be almost the last time that the working class was so much as referred to in the panels that followed. When, at the business meeting on the final afternoon, a member of the Ford UAW local from Detroit arose to request that more attention be given at future conferences to labor problems, it was as though a shade had briefly materialized; he was politely received, but it was apparent that the conferees' minds (and hearts) were elsewhere.

Where does a Socialist's heart go these days, if not to the workers of his own country? Well, to the Negroes, to the native poor and to the peasants of distant lands. Running pervasively through almost all of the nine weekend panels was the theme of search for a new constituency; and if Marx's invidious characterization of both the lumpenproletariat and the peasantry was all but unanimously rejected, it was obviously not so much for "scientific" as for emotional reasons.

It was significant that Prof. Gordon Lewis (University of Puerto Rico), commenting at the panel on Components of Contemporary Revolutionary Movements as an English Socialist watching American reaction to U.S. behavior in Latin America, Africa and Southeast Asia, quoted Marx to the effect that shame is a revolutionary sentiment. For if anything united the disparate individuals at the Socialist Scholars Conference, it was not scholarship or socialism but shame on the part of those who had been sharing willy-nilly in the bounty of the affluent society. And while Professor Lewis specifically rejected the darkly menacing anti-

West, anti-white myth of the late Franz Fanon in favor of Socialist humanism, Fanon's name continued to reverberate through the Hotel Commodore's meeting rooms. One suspected that this came not so much from the power of the Fanon myth, and its insistence on the therapeutic value of violence for rebellious blacks, as from its LeRoi Jonesian ability to evoke shame and pain in the bosoms of middle-class masochists, all too aware that in the autumn of 1966 no more than a dozen blacks had joined the 2,000-odd registrants gathered together to discuss socialism.

It was significant, too, that while many hundreds of young people at this panel were listening intently to Irving Markovitz (Queens College) discussing Africa and to Franz Schurmann and James Petras (University of California) analyzing developments in Asia and Latin America, only perhaps half as many conferees, most of them twice as old, chose to hear Victor Perlo, Allen Solganick (University of Maryland) and Alexander Erlich (Columbia) on Economic Changes in the Soviet Union. The concerns of the young were different from those of the old, many of whom showed more concern than did the newer generation for the protection of people from the state under "socialism."

On Saturday afternoon, with a choice of not two but three panels, the conferees were fairly well divided between a symposium on Poverty and Powerlessness (taking off from a presentation on organizing the poor by Richard A. Cloward and Frances Piven of Columbia) and one on Baran and Sweezy's Monopoly Capital. If it was surprising that so many should have been attracted to the latter—which was, after all, fairly recondite and required some grasp of economics—it was even more surprising that the third panel, on Realism in Literature, attracted only a relative handful. It was not political enough, some people said. There was a time when the Left could fill Carnegie Hall for discussions on literature and society, but that time is not now—which is perhaps just as well, given the fact that the critical arguments on this tedious afternoon seldom mentioned a particular book but buzzed about among those generalities dear to academics and literary Stalinists.

The liveliest moment on Saturday was a rabble-rousing harangue by James Haughton (Harlem Unemployment Center) at the Poverty and Powerlessness panel. It was Mr. Haughton's unscholarly Socialist thesis that the difference between the poor and the rest of us, of which the other speakers made so much, is merely one of degree, that a depression is coming which will fling professionals and proletarians into the ranks of the poor, and that all will organize together thereafter to build the barricades of the revolution. Mr. Haughton's presentation was not only respectfully but joyously received—it was as if his hearers, ranging from youthful students to august professors, but nearly all assuredly both white and middle class, were responding to the apocalyptic vision that the road to socialism would be paved with their own pulverization.

This peculiar ambivalence (cross-eyed view might be a more accurate, if less fashionable description) did not escape the attention of the dinner speaker, Conor Cruise O'Brien (New York University). His address was marked more by wit and charm than by substance or originality, but he did observe that neither he nor those whom he was addressing had given up their cushy academic jobs for a dedicated life of propagandizing among the poor—a course suggested by a speaker at the Conference a year ago. He did not pursue the contradiction beyond stating his belief that Stalinist academics already had sufficient to do within the areas of their own competence.

It was only on the last day that this blurriness, this mixture of role playing and gamesmanship, was thrown into sharp relief for one hilarious moment. Once again there was a choice between two panels, and once again the younger people—meaning the vast majority—crowded into the session on the Political Ideology of American Corporate Liberalism (fetching title), and left the other, on the Crisis of the Comintern (fascism and the popular front), principally to the old politicals. Despite the appeal by Isaac Deutscher at this latter panel for an effort to relate the problems of the twenties and thirties to America of the sixties, the presentations seemed to one who was in and out of the room essentially recapitulations of orthodox Stalinist and Trotskyist interpretations of the Comintern's zigzags. They were more dignified than they had been of yore (after all, more than a quarter of a century and 40 million dead separate us from the events argued over), but they hardly proceeded to the relevance for which Deutscher was pleading.

For the majority of the conferees, the assault on the American value system was what was happening. The panel on Corporate Liberalism began tamely enough with a paper on the ideology of labor leaders by Ronald Radosh (Queensborough Community College), remarkable mainly in its attempt to demonstrate, by tortuous logic chopping, that the likes of Matthew Woll had been flaming radicals by comparison with those fascistic collaborators, Sidney Hillman and Philip Murray. It was an argument disposed of with merciful brevity by Gabriel Kolko (University of Pennsylvania).

Then Martin J. Sklar (Rochester University) rose to present a paper entitled "The Corporate-Liberal Ascendancy and the Socialist Acquiescence: An inquiry into Strange Times," and for a few brief moments the light of truth shone on the assemblage. What is strange about our times, Mr. Sklar asserted, is the transmogrifications that have taken place among those who regard themselves as intellectuals, thinkers, apostles of change. The image that confronts us in our separate mirrors is confusing, contradictory and comical. Stalinist has become Trotskyite, Trotskyite has become Stalinist, Marxist has become Existentialist—and as Mr. Sklar went on with his relentless catalogue, the hall rocked with laughter. It was the laughter of recognition and relief, and it had a cleansing force, washing away cant, posturing and boredom.

What was more, it highlighted the contrast not only between genuine political conversions and accommodations accomplished in the guise of high principle but also between sober scholarship and intoxicated activism. For several days the conferees had been traipsing from ballroom to ballroom, browsing en route in the Socialist bazaar that had been set up by competing publishers, parties, splinters and sects on tables lining the corridor. They had hardly paused to consider the relationship—if any—between their papers, some lively and provocative, others as tiresomely scholastic as those of any other scholarly meeting, and the propaganda papers earnestly hawked by Communists, Trotskyists, Maoists, Spartacists, Johnsonites, Third Campers, et al. Nor had they considered whether they were really emancipated laborers in "the intellectual workshops of our country," as Louis Menashe (Brooklyn Polytechnic Institute) had assured them in his opening remarks that they were; or whether they were instead helots in "institutions of intellectual servitude," producing "a dispassionate and studied dullness, a façade of scholarly activity concealing an internal emptiness and cynicism, a dusty-dry search for permissible truth which pleases none but the administrator and the ambitious," as they were characterized in a flier from the Free University of New York. Perhaps they were both? If so, how seriously could they take themselves?

Unfortunately, Mr. Sklar could not sustain his mordant inquiry; he changed his tone, calling yet once more for prompt action, this time on behalf of the immediate constitution of a Socialist party (to be built, apparently, by just those feckless spirits whom, to their delight, he had been excoriating). Mr. Sklar's proposal matched in grandiosity the title of his paper, but while it provoked the expected enthusiasm, particularly from the young, its contribution to Socialist scholarship was open to question.

That task was undertaken with considerable intellectual vigor on the final afternoon by Harry Magdoff (New School for Social Research) in a substantial paper on "The Economics of Contemporary U.S. Imperialism." With the aid of a series of charts, Mr. Magdoff riddled the conventional wisdom which teaches that the relatively small dollar amount of U.S. foreign trade is in itself proof of this country's nonimperialist bent. Describing his paper modestly as "a progress report on a research project," Mr. Magdoff suggested six areas for further research by young scholars: the role of exports in general; the role of monopoly in the underdeveloped countries themselves; the role of existing price structures and trade channels in the underdeveloped countries; the method of operation of the U.S. foreign-aid program, now organized so as to control the economic growth of the underdeveloped countries; the role of the dollar as international monetary unit; and the question of the relation of regional blocs to future superstate arrangements of U.S. imperialism.

While these serious questions were being raised in most stimulating fashion, down the hall Eugene Genovese (Rutgers University) was reading a paper on the legacy of Negro slavery. To the noticeable confusion of those who knew of Mr. Genovese not only as a highly reputable scholar in this area but as one who in the past had engaged Herbert Aptheker from the Left (defending Maoism and attacking Aptheker for Khrushchevism), Mr. Aptheker now attacked Mr. Genovese's paper from the Left, as giving insufficient attention to the rebellious spirit of Negro slaves and thus serving by inference to legitimize myths of black passivity.

It was in the Sunday afternoon business meeting of the conference, open to all participants, that some of the most interesting questions were raised. The substantial contingent of SDSers (Students for a Democratic Society) expressed—for the most part informally—dissatisfaction with the level of many of the papers presented; if their proposed Radical Education Project, one of the most intellectually ambitious student undertakings in a generation, is stimulated to greater accomplishment by the second annual conference (the proceedings of which are to be published in Studies on the Left and Science and Society), this in itself will have justified the labors of its organizers and sponsors.

On the other hand, the question of broadening participation in future conferences brought out the fact that not merely bureaucratic confusion but personal pique and factional/doctrinal differences had prevented Socialists of considerable stature from being invited to participate this year. When a professor from the State University of New York (Stony Brook) recommended that the Social Democrats, right-wing Socialists, or whatever, who support Dissent magazine, edited by Irving Howe (Hunter College), be invited, he was greeted with silence and some laughter. But surely even the SDSers who laughed at the suggestion would be bound in all honesty to concede that Howe's presence would have added immeasurably to the panel on Realism in Literature; that the remarks of Michael Harrington would have added immeasurably to the panel on Poverty and Powerlessness; that Bayard Rustin's presence would have added immeasurably to the panel on The Legacy of Negro Slavery; that the essay of Tom Kahn (League for Industrial Democracy) on the New Left in the July issue of Commentary was far more worthy of serious discussion and criticism than many of the papers presented at the conference. What is more, the left-wing Socialists grouped roughly around New Politics magazine were also notable by their absence; and it seemed universally agreed that Hal Draper of its editorial board, mentor of the Berkeley revolt, and Chairman of the Independent Socialist Committee, could also have contributed to the conference.

This entire question was aggravated by the suggestion of another professor (from a university which shall be nameless) that future conferences be broadened to include spokesmen from Eastern Europe. Expressing with surpassing unctuousness his admiration for Isaac Deutscher's address, he went on to observe (with something less than accuracy) that Mr. Deutscher had asserted that there was nothing to be learned from the Socialist countries. It was his own feeling that academics from these countries could not only defend Socialist achievements but explain them to American critics.

Mr. Deutscher promptly rose to characterize the statement as a distortion of his position. Of course there must be discussions between Eastern and Western scholars and Socialists, but they must be conducted on a basis not of servility but of intellectual equality and freedom to criticize. Then, in a voice trembling with anger, he stated that he had it on unimpeachable authority that one of the conferees has publicly stated: "It's too bad that a Socialist conference had to be opened with an address presenting the viewpoint of the John Birch Society."

"This kind of slander," Deutscher cried out, "I hoped had died with Stalin. It is absolutely impermissible in a Socialist gathering!"

While this was greeted with a standing ovation, the fact remained that there had been moments during the weekend when the conference presented here and there the spooky aspect of a gathering of ghosts, posthumously rehabilitated in order that they might mutter the wretched canards so indignantly exposed by Isaac Deutscher. There can be no question (there should be none even in the minds of those who for political reasons did not attend the conference) that old-time contributors to Communist publications like Victor Perlo and Herbert Aptheker do have something to contribute. But surely it is questionable whether much can be accomplished on behalf of an ideal by kowtowing to those whose contributions to socialism have consisted primarily in character assassination.

We have reached a point in the world of art in which anyone—whether he be dedicated to chance in preference to conscious selectivity, or even to destructiveness as against creativity—is considered as an artist when he so defines himself; and the critical question becomes not whether he is an artist but whether he is a good or a bad one. Perhaps it would be useful if this attitude could take root in the political world, starting with an association like the Socialist Scholars Conference, which has, according to its own statement, "a broad Socialist perspective . . . in which no one's ideological credentials will be scrutinized." Its organizers, working hard with the most limited of resources, produced an occasion which demonstrated yet again the persistent attractiveness and intellectual magnetism of the Socialist idea. If they—and the Socialists whom they did not invite and who chose to stay away when they could have come—will accept the idea that any man who says he is a Socialist is one, they will not only be in a better position to evaluate the depth of his commitment and the quality of his accomplishment; they will progress yet further in their altogether commendable aim of demonstrating by precept to a new generation what is both new and of lasting value about the Socialist idea.

[For a report on the first annual conference, see "What Is A Socialist?" by James O'Connor; The Nation, October 4, 1965.]

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS II

JUSTICE FOR THE ACCUSED

LEO PFEFFER

Mr. Pfeffer, special counsel to the American Jewish Congress and chairman of the Department of Political Science at Long Island University, is the author most recently of The Honorable Court: A History of the United States Supreme Court (Beacon).

The Supreme Court can lag somewhat behind the national consensus — for most of its life it has done just that — but it cannot lag too far behind. The last time it did so, in the mid-thirties when it refused to recognize either the Great Depression or the 20th century, it courted self-destruction. It can also be somewhat ahead of the national consensus; for the past quarter of a century it has been that. But it cannot, without inviting disaster, forge too far or too fast ahead, as it has recognized and manifested in its cautious response to pleas for protection of political dissent in times of crisis and passion [see Leo Pfeffer: "Freedom of Expression," issue of October 3].

At the present time the Court's major tug of war with the national consensus is on the safeguarding of the procedural rights of persons accused of crime. It is here that the Court appears to have gone furthest in straining the limits of the people's tolerance, and has had the most difficulty in justifying its decisions to the general public.

There are a number of reasons for this. In the first place, our frontier background produced a tradition, much romanticized in motion pictures and television, of vigilantism and summary justice. Second, more than in most other cultures, we tend to divide people (and nations) into good guys and bad guys and to identify with the former. Cops and robbers, in one form or another, is still the game most Americans of every age play; in no other country is the head of the secret police perhaps the most revered of citizens. It is therefore quite natural for us to be antagonistic to legalistic technicalities which we cannot understand but which seem always to provide devices whereby sharp and unethical lawyers can free hardened criminals and frustrate the well-earned victory of the law-enforcement officers.

In the third place, it is in the area of criminal justice that the tension of federalism, the division of power between the national and state governments, is most acute. Under our constitutional system, primary responsibility for the apprehension and prosecution of criminals rests with the states and they are likely to resent interference from Washington. Their pleas for a laissez-faire policy do not go unheeded even within the Supreme Court. Almost to the day of his death, Frankfurter, who did not hesitate in declaring invalid state laws financing transportation to parochial schools, or providing released-time religious instruction for public school children, protested the Court's interference with the right of the states to fashion their criminal procedures as they deemed appropriate. Frankfurter was so influential on the bench that not until his retirement could the Court take on, really seriously and consistently, its mission of bringing state criminal procedures within the orbit of the Bill of Rights.

In view of these and similar factors, it would seem surprising that the rights of criminal defendants should be spelled out in such careful detail in the Bill of Rights; indeed, most of it is devoted to that subject. The obvious explanation is that the Bill of Rights was conceived originally only as a restraint on the national government; but this is hardly an adequate explanation since the states imposed the same restraints on their own courts and prosecutors. The real explanation lies in the fact that procedural safeguards evolved in a context not of mercenary or personal crimes but of religious and political offenses.

Procedural rights such as the privilege against self-incrimination, the right to be informed of the crime an accused is charged with, assistance of counsel and trial in public, came out of the religious trials in England, most dramatically those of the 17th-century radical Puritan, "Freeborn John" Lilburne. This history was fresh in the minds of the people when the Bill of Rights was written. Preachers of religious heresy were often jailed as late as the outbreak of the Revolutionary War; blasphemy was punished well into the 19th century, and even today remains a criminal offense on the statute books of many states. It was therefore natural to consider these procedural rights as weapons in the continuing struggle against the established church — particularly since Madison, the draftsman of the Bill of Rights, was, with Jefferson, the leader of that ultimately successful struggle.

It was natural, too, to consider the other procedural safeguards as defensive weapons against political tyranny. One of the principal grievances of the American colonists in the cold war between themselves and the British king was the issuance by his judges of general writs of assistance, and this complaint found its way into the Fourth Amendment's ban on unreasonable searches and seizures, and its requirement of specific warrants based upon probable cause. Among the offenses charged against George III in the Declaration of Independence were the deprivation of trial by jury and the transporting of defendants to distant places for trial, and these are reflected in the Bill of Rights. Although today we no longer have religious trials, insistence upon procedural safeguards, as the Jencks case illustrates, has been and still is an extremely effective instrument in the hands of the Supreme Court for the protection of political dissenters, and one used by it considerably more freely than the outright protection of the right to dissent. Nevertheless, most cases involving procedural safeguards today arise and are decided in a nonpolitical context, and since most nonpolitical crimes are offenses against state laws, it is in state criminal court cases that most issues in the administration of justice under the Bill of Rights have been decided by the Supreme Court.

For more than a century, the Court had considered the Bill of Rights irrelevant to these cases. One of Marshall's last decisions was a determination that the Bill of Rights adopted in 1791 did not and was not intended to apply to the states. The Fourteenth Amendment, adopted in 1868, did incorporate verbatim and impose upon the states one provision of the Bill of Rights, the ban on deprivation of life, liberty or property without due process of law; but for more than half a century the Court paid no more than lip service to the provision except when it was asserted for the protection of property rights against state social welfare legislation. In the Haymarket anarchists' case, the Court held that the due process clause did not permit it to supervise state criminal trials or disturb the state court's finding that the anarchists had been fairly tried and justly convicted, even though Governor Altgeld found that they had been railroaded to conviction by a judge who conducted the trial with malicious ferocity. In the Leo Frank case in 1915, the Court held that it was unable to do anything about what was clearly a judicial lynching of a New York Jew in a Georgia mill town that reeked with anti-Semitism and hatred of "foreigners" from New York.

The turning point came in 1923 in a particularly egregious case. A group of Negro sharecroppers met in a church in Phillips County in eastern Arkansas to discuss the employment of counsel to protect their rights against their white landlords. The white citizens of the community got word of the meeting and descended upon the church. Gunfire broke out and a white man was killed. A posse of white men, formed to hunt down the Negroes and avenge the white man's death, caught many Negroes, tortured them and killed them. Finally, saner heads prevailed; when five captured Negroes were about to be lynched, a "Committee of Seven," representing the more responsible white citizenry, prevailed upon the mob to disperse by solemnly promising them that the Negroes would be hanged after trial. To assure this outcome, the committee called Negro witnesses and had them whipped and tortured until they promised to testify as directed. The courtroom was filled with angry whites; hundreds more milled about outside, shouting threats at anyone who interfered with the desired result. The trial of all five Negroes took about forty-five minutes; five minutes later the jury came back with a verdict of first degree murder against all defendants.

This was too much for the Supreme Court. Holding that a mob-dominated trial did not constitute due process of law, it reversed the conviction — over the dissent of McReynolds, perhaps the most reactionary Justice ever to sit on the Supreme Court bench, who asserted that the "fact that petitioners are poor and ignorant and black naturally arouses sympathy; but that does not release us from enforcing principles." Nine years later, the Court intervened and set aside convictions in a series of almost equally shocking cases involving the Scottsboro boys.

Since then the Court has shown little hesitation in stepping in to prevent gross miscarriages of justice or flagrant violations of a criminal defendant's rights. Its difficulties have been in cases where the violation is subtle or borderline. Conceptually, the major difficulty revolves about the question of whether and to what extent the Fourteenth Amendment makes the Bill of Rights applicable against the states. The chief antagonists have been Black (joined by Douglas) and Frankfurter, the latter vigorously asserting that the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment imposes upon the states no more obligation than to refrain from conduct which shocks the conscience of the Court and the community, or violates fundamental concepts of ordered liberty.

The difference is illustrated by two California cases, one decided in 1947, the other in 1952. In the later case, the Court held that forcing a suspect to disgorge narcotic capsules that he had swallowed as he was being arrested, and using them in evidence upon his trial, violated the Fourteenth Amendment, according to Frankfurter because it shocked the conscience of the Court, according to Black because it constituted compulsory self-incrimination, which is expressly forbidden by the Fifth Amendment. The earlier case involved the constitutionality of a state statute which permitted the prosecutor and judge to comment on a defendant's failure to take the stand in his own defense and the jury to draw unfavorable inferences from that fact. The Supreme Court had long held that such comment and inference were impermissible in federal criminal trials since they penalized and thus abridged the privilege against self-incrimination under the Fifth Amendment. Asserting that the Fifth Amendment was incorporated into the Fourteenth and should therefore be applied the same way in state and federal courts, Black and Douglas voted to set aside the conviction. Frankfurter, with whom the majority of the Court agreed, did not find the state's conduct particularly shocking or violative of fundamental concepts of ordered liberty, and therefore voted to uphold it.

Technically, the contest has been won by Frankfurter. The Supreme Court has never maintained that all of the Bill of Rights has been incorporated into the Fourteenth Amendment and is equally applicable to state and federal governments. The barrier is probably the Seventh Amendment, which requires trial by jury in all suits at law where the amount in controversy exceeds $20; the Court cannot see itself requiring jury trials in the thousands of cases tried in small claims courts or before justices of the peace all over the country. But in practice, the victory has gone to Black. In a series of cases, through a process which has been called selective incorporation, the Court has read into the Fourteenth Amendment almost everything in the Bill of Rights. (The 1947 California decision was overruled in 1964, and today the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination is as potent and extensive in the state as it is in the federal courts.) Indeed, in the 1965 birth-control case, the Court read into the Fourteenth Amendment even the Ninth Amendment's provision that the enumeration of certain rights in the Constitution shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

In recent years, and particularly since Frankfurter's retirement, the Court has been engaged in a steadfast campaign to broaden the scope of the constitutional protection available to persons accused of crime. Its treatment of right to counsel best illustrates this. In one of the Scottsboro cases, it held that the state's failure to provide counsel to the indigent defendants constituted a denial of due process. Ten years later, in a decision joined in by Frankfurter but strongly opposed by Black and Douglas, the Court retreated and held that the obligation to provide counsel applied only in capital cases.

Soon thereafter the Court began to retrace its steps. It held that even in a noncapital case, the state must provide counsel for an indigent defendant who, by reason of youth, mental subnormality or similar disability, could not adequately conduct his own defense, but was not required to provide counsel for mature adults, particularly those who, by reasons of prior encounters with the law, knew their way around the courts. Then, in 1963, the Court blew Gideon's trumpet and held that irrespective of the character of the defendant and the nature of the crime with which he was charged, the state had to provide him with counsel if he could not afford to hire his own. [See "The Banner of Gideon" by Robert G. Sherrill, The Nation, April 13, 1964.] The latest, but not necessarily last step was taken this June when the Court held that the obligation to provide counsel arises as soon as the police begin to question a person they consider to be a prime suspect.

In a real sense, the Court's concern with the procedural rights of criminal defendants is an aspect of its quest for equality, manifested most clearly in its decisions on racial discrimination and electoral malapportionment. McReynolds was correct in asserting that the fact that an accused person is poor does not change the principles applicable to his case, but it does require a careful scrutiny of those principles to assure him his full measure of constitutional protection. If the defendant is a member of a high socioeconomic class it may be assumed that he had the resources to assure this for himself; if he is on the bottom of the economic ladder, the government must assure it for him.

Of course, this new stance of the Supreme Court has aroused considerable controversy and particularly vocal opposition from prosecutors. But their complaint is hardly new. When Sir Walter Raleigh was tried for treason in 1603, he claimed that he was entitled to acquittal unless two eyewitnesses testified against him. To this, one of the judges replied: "Many horse stealers may escape if they not be condemned without witnesses." Both before then and since, every assertion by an accused of the benefits of procedural safeguards not established by ancient precedent — from the assertion of the right not to be tortured into confessing, to an accused dope peddler's objection to the use against him of evidence procured by wire tapping or electronic eavesdropping — has been met with the same objection; that, if it is granted, many guilty persons will escape. The Supreme Court has made the deliberate judgment that the integrity of the individual and equality of justice in a democratic society are more important than the punishment of every culprit. In this respect, it is undoubtedly well ahead of the national consensus, and is quite possibly risking its future on the gamble that the people will catch up.

MILLION-DOLLAR TRINKET

RALPH LEE SMITH

Mr. Smith is the author of several books, among them The Bargain Hucksters and The Tarnished Badge (both Crowell).

When America is fighting wars, Disabled American Veterans is perhaps the organization in its field that can count on the greatest public sympathy. With the nation involved in the Vietnamese conflict, there is little doubt that DAV's well-known annual "Ident-O-Tag" solicitation — the individualized miniature automobile license tags for key rings that DAV sends out to 40 million motorists a year with a request for a contribution — will get a favorable response in a very large number of American homes. Also working for DAV is the fact that it is one of the seven leading veterans' groups that are chartered directly by Congress, and whose activities therefore enjoy Congressional sanction.

This spring the New York State legislature considered a bill that would require all charity mailings to reveal two figures — how much the charity raised from public contributions the preceding year, and how much it spent for its stated charitable purpose. Representatives of many charities descended on Albany to oppose the bill in public hearings — including Disabled American Veterans. And, in fact, DAV might well be unhappy to make such a revelation. It spends most of the money received in its Ident-O-Tag solicitation for fund raising, and the national organization spends no money at all in direct financial assistance to disabled veterans.

The Ident-O-Tag solicitation was the brain child of a man named Abraham L. Koolish. Back in 1941 he set up a private, profit-making firm called Ident-O-Tag Company. Koolish had previously promoted such items as punch boards and tableware. His activities had been the subject of three Federal Trade Commission orders, and he had been fined $4,500 for violating one of them. Now, however, he had found a really lucrative field — charity.

Koolish entered into a contract with Disabled American Veterans for distributing Ident-O-Tags, charging DAV $62.50 for every thousand mailed. By 1943, the mailings were already totaling 8 million, which means that the Koolish firm was getting $500,000. In 1945, Koolish sold Ident-O-Tag Company to DAV for $1,336,500, a sum that seems very large in view of the facts that the buyer was a charity and that Ident-O-Tag, an extremely simple trinket, is nonpatentable. The agreement also specified that Koolish be retained as a consultant at $1,000 per month, an arrangement that continued until 1952.

Koolish moved on to various other philanthropic green pastures. Among others, he was involved in the solicitation for a group called the National Association of Veterans Employment Councils, which raised $2.1 million in a twenty-one month period in the 1950s, spent $1.9 million for fund raising, then passed quietly out of existence. But Koolish's fattest deal — and the one that finally did him in — was his relationship to the Sister Elizabeth Kenny Foundation. From 1952 to 1959, with Koolish and his firms doing the fund raising, the foundation raised $30 million, of which $16,260,000 was spent for fund raising, office administration, promotion and "informational services." In 1960, the scandal erupted, and Koolish and several officers of the foundation were indicted. In 1963, Koolish was convicted of giving kickbacks to various foundation officials in exchange for receiving the fund-raising contracts without competitive bidding. He was sentenced to ten years in jail and a fine of $17,000, and was assessed $16,000 court costs.

Meanwhile, DAV demonstrated that it had learned well the fund-raising techniques passed on by Koolish. After it purchased the company, letters accompanying DAV solicitations read: "No professional promoters or outside interests benefit from your donation and no royalties are paid anyone." The letters neglected to note that DAV, since acquiring Ident-O-Tag, did an effective job of spending the receipts without outside help. In 1962, DAV raised $3,532,845 from Ident-O-Tag mailings, while spending $2,988,606 on the promotion — a fund-raising cost of 84.6 per cent. In 1963, DAV raised $3,386,962 from the mailings, while spending $2,974,123 — a fund-raising cost of 87.8 per cent.

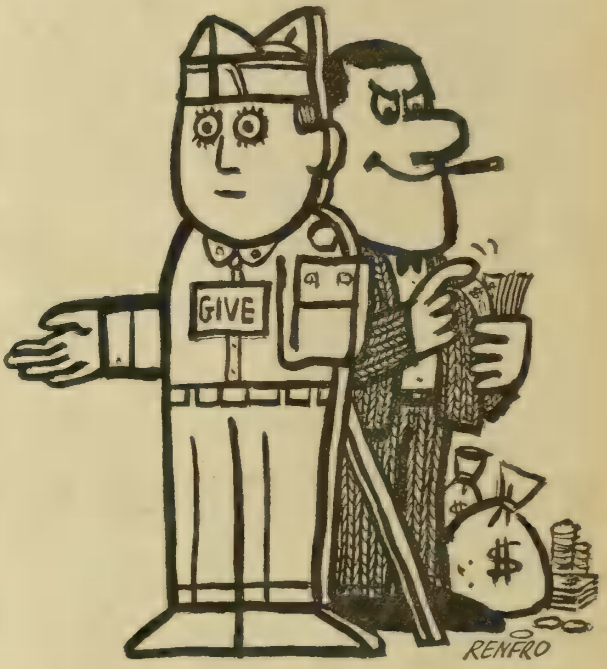
In 1953, a joint committee of the New York State legislature under Sen. Bernard Tompkins conducted a pioneering study of charity problems in the post-World War II era. The committee's 1954 report, discussing in detail the activities of a number of charities, noted that DAV made a practice of using names without authority, even that of the President of the United States. One mailing bore photos of President Eisenhower, General Gray, the Administrator of Veterans Affairs, and General Omar Bradley, along with statements by each that seemingly endorsed the fund-raising drive. All three repudiated the use of their names.

The committee also noted that DAV actually gives no direct financial or welfare aid to disabled veterans. "The D.A.V. has conducted fund-raising campaigns for many years on the strength of the well-inculcated though erroneous belief that the organization gives direct aid to those of our nation's citizens who are the most deserving of our gratitude and help, our disabled veterans," says the report. DAV's principal service to veterans — then and now — consists in maintaining "service officers" who help veterans file claims with the Veterans Administration. About sixty other groups are also certified by the V.A. to perform this service. State agencies in a number of states will also help, or the veteran can file the claim himself, with no help at all or with the help of a V.A. staff member.

In 1958, the House Veterans Affairs Committee made a study of fund-raising activities of veterans groups, and produced further data about DAV. The committee stated that DAV bought a twin-engine passenger airplane for use by its executives, paying $105,655.43 for the plane and another $49,488.57 for a hangar. The plane was piloted by Mel Corbly, an assistant national adjutant of DAV, who was the son of DAV national adjutant Vivian D. Corbly.

Also, said the committee: "The DAV has a policy of giving Christmas gifts and other gifts to its officers, employees, and friends. . . . From December 1950 through May 1957, a list of selected items compiled by the Committee totaled $50,375.72. . . . Items referred to above were all purchased from a Cincinnati firm, Raybill, Inc. From November 20, 1950, until July 21, 1955, Vivian D. Corbly was Vice President of Raybill and owned 25 of its 150 shares of stock. This company not only supplied merchandise to DAV National Headquarters but sold quite a bit to the Departments. In soliciting business from the various Departments liberal use was made of Mr. Corbly's name and the fact that he was an officer of both DAV and Raybill."

When these revelations were made Corbly resigned under fire, with DAV voting to pay him his $18,000 a year salary for two more years to assure him full pension benefits. A new national adjutant has taken the reins, but there have been recent indications that DAV has gotten itself into new trouble. In December, 1964, a federal grand jury in Illinois indicted four men for mail fraud and conspiracy, charging that they had bilked DAV of more than $2 million while under contract to the organization to solicit contributions of property and materials.



Illinois Attorney General William G. Clark said that one of the arrested men, Harold Sager, had been posing as "Colonel Harold S. McClintock." The "colonel," said Clark, had received $750,000 in "rightful salary" from DAV, and had increased it by transactions in which DAV did not receive its proper share of property and goods contributed. Clark's complaint cited the instance of the Borden Company, which, in response to Sager's solicitation, had donated two soybean processing plants, real estate, buildings and machinery to DAV. The property, said Clark, had brought in $851,000, of which DAV received only $250,000 and had thus "lost $601,000 on this transaction alone."

None of this prevents DAV from flooding the nation with its annual Ident-O-Tag mailings and with other solicitations involving such unordered merchandise as personalized mailing stickers—nor has it so far prevented the public from responding. It is perhaps high time for the House Veterans Affairs Committee to ask seriously whether an operation of this kind should be conducted under the august mantle of a Congressional charter.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Seeing Williams with Fresh Eyes

THE WILLIAM CARLOS WILLIAMS READER. Edited with an Introduction by M. L. Rosenthal. New Directions. 448 pp. $7.50.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul is professor of English at the University of Illinois. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

Any new work on William Carlos Williams must meet the challenge of the critical temper represented by the recent remarks of a reviewer in the Times Literary Supplement who wonders if it is "impossible for this poet to be flatteringly presented," and of Marius Bewley's view that "Williams is the dullest poet of any importance America has produced in this century." Mr. Rosenthal, a student of modern poetry, is aware of the challenge — his introductory essay is entitled "More Than Meets the Eye" — but he has not used the occasion to do for Williams what Malcolm Cowley did so admirably and opportunely for Faulkner in his Viking Portable. What Mr. Rosenthal has selected for the Reader has intrinsic merit. One questions his selections primarily on the basis of what he has made of them, on the grounds that anthologizing is criticism and must not only stimulate our interest in the author but make us — as F. O. Matthiessen, an eminent anthologizer, said — "see him with fresh eyes. . . ."

This is especially crucial in the case of Williams who, when not neglected, has been superficially criticized (relegated) because he stands outside (and against) the reigning critical and poetical endeavor of our time — that "poetic officialdom," which is, according to James Dickey in The Suspect in Poetry, "based largely on the principles which the New Criticism has espoused. . . ." (To say that Williams is dull may also impugn the sensibility produced by a pervasive kind of modernism.) We need to find in an attentive and thorough concern with Williams' writing another language of criticism with which to treat him. Good work on him has been done in articles, theses and books, such as recent studies by Linda Wagner of his prosodic development, and by J. Hillis Miller of the "spaces" of the poet's world. Still, the critical necessity is a hard, close reading of the entire body of Williams' work, and in its behalf the reprinting, in good editions, of The Great American Novel, Spring and All, A Voyage to Pagany, A Novelette and Other Prose, and the extensive fugitive materials.

Williams has been prejudged in much the same way as Hart Crane who, it was said, could not possibly write a successful long poem because he wasn't learned and disciplined enough. Yet Crane admirably schooled himself as a poet (his Letters record this education) and he wrote the best long poem of his generation of poets. In the case of both poets, R. P. Blackmur, whose early critical views unfortunately did so much to establish the opinions of others, was at fault. Now Mr. Rosenthal, after properly correcting Blackmur's limited understanding of Williams, advances views of his own which seem inadmissible to me — views which show, like the dispersed character of his introductory essay, how difficult it is to place Williams, as he tries to do, within the reigning school.

He says, for example, that Williams accepted "the assumptions of the religion of art by which the symbolists and their successors have lived." This gives him an acceptable lineage, but it is not true: art for him was not religiously but socially redemptive ("to repair, to rescue, to complete"), and he abhorred its visionary uses (this was part of his quarrel with Crane). The world of art, of created objects, was for Williams a formal achievement, another world made of the materials of this world, a world alongside or along with the world of nature, not a "transcendent" one. His views of art have more in common with Dewey's in Art as Experience than with the symbolists, for he wishes to interact with the world, not flee it. Rosenthal speaks of "the transforming and saving power of the aesthetic imagination," but Williams himself does not quite put it in this way and seldom uses "aesthetic"; the imagination is enough for him and he celebrates it: a complex agency of contact with and being in the world, a power enabling the artist to "Invent, Create, Achieve," an injunction of Henry James he cites. Rosenthal also tries to bring Williams closer to Eliot, in spite of all the evidence that Williams, as he once told a correspondent, would contest Eliot to his last breath:

. . . there is as much to say and more for the one side and that not the darker which John Donne for instance among many men
presents to us.

Williams says this in the coda of "Asphodel, That Greeny Flower," where, with magnificent assurance, he works motifs of The Waste Land into his own affirmation of light.

Though the Reader displays Williams' work in drama, fiction, poetry, history, autobiography and criticism, Rosenthal does not grasp this advantage to present the poet in his role as a man of letters. The book's introduction tells very little about the writer's artistic development (Williams' lifelong search for "measure" is hardly noticed); or about his life (he is the least impersonal writer, feeding his art at the deepest roots); or his milieu (his full participation, for example, in the literary awakening at the time of World War I: his part in Others magazine and the editing of Contact; his association with poets and painters; his involvement in the little theatre — all of which contributed to his style and aspiration as a literary man).

The selection of poems in the Reader is good, though for purposes of introduction (and restoration of reputation) I would have chosen more poems from the latter half of Williams' career, such poems of the forties as "The Pink Church," "The Clouds," "Burning the Christmas Greens," and of the last years, any number from The Desert Music and Journey to Love, books of the highest order, rivaling the achievement of any poet of our time. The selections from Kora in Hell (1920), Williams' exercises in free association, are especially in need of editorial help.

These "Improvisations" — more carefully chosen — would have served to introduce many of Williams' poetic motifs and aesthetic ideas. They are not the kind of thing Williams did later in The Great American Novel (1923), and to group the "novel" under that rubric is confusing. The Great American Novel belongs with Spring and All (1923) and In the American Grain (1925), for it is an aesthetic demonstration like the former and an attempt to find a form for the concerns of the latter. The two chapters from A Voyage to Pagany (1928), Williams' fictional resolution of his commitment to America, are not primary examples. Still, it would interest readers to know that the fictional Jack Murry was actually Robert McAlmon and that the supper at the Trianon was with Joyce and other notables, and was reported again by Williams in The Autobiography and by McAlmon in Being Geniuses Together. The chapters from White Mule and In the Money are well chosen; so are the short stories, none of which, however, bears out Rosenthal's assertion that Williams' method "approaches that of Anderson and Hemingway."

Some of Williams' early stories do have the oral quality and the pastoral nostalgia of Anderson, but Williams found nothing in Hemingway, whose dialogue he considered artificial. A scene from A Dream of Love, Williams' most significant play, represents his work as a dramatist, but again the domestic crisis between a doctor and his wife needs explanation, supporting elucidation from a variety of autobiographical sources. The chapters from The Autobiography deal with Williams' long friendship with Ezra Pound, his early experience as an intern, and the close relationship between medicine and poetry.

They are set apart within a separate section which, it seems, requires some explanation of Williams' autobiographical intent (how many major poets or artists of Williams' generation have put themselves to this test?). The final section covers "other prose": samples from Spring and All, some chapters from In the American Grain, Williams' appropriation of American history, and several critical essays, none, incidentally, of the outright programmatic kind. No letters are included — at least, Williams' long letter to Kay Boyle on the literary situation of his generation in 1932 and his letter to Richard Eberhart on "measure" should have been.

For the price of the Reader one can have in New Directions paperback editions a small library of complete Williams' texts. Williams is an available writer. And as he tells the reader in "The Pink Locust," where he questions the right of other poets to deny him his place:

I'm persistent as the pink locust, once admitted to the garden,
you will not easily get rid of it.

The Model A Spirit

FREEWAYS. By Lawrence Halprin. Reinhold Publishing Corp. 160 pp. Illustrated. $12.50.

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect who has taught at Columbia University and the Urban Design school of the Architectural Association, London. He is now on the faculty of the Cambridge University School of Architecture. His book on urban conservation, Lost New York, will be published by Houghton Mifflin this winter.

Books by architects, planners and landscape architects have traditionally been along one of two different lines. If the designer is well known, an expensive portfolio of his work can be produced. Books of this kind have ranged from the various personal Architettura Civiles of the 17th century to the seven-volume Zurich edition of the complete projects of Le Corbusier, a modern paradigm (the only way one can now know most of Corbu's work, in fact). The other kind of book is the how-to-do-it, or what-I-have-learned or (intellectually less honest) what-I-believe book — usually a pastiche of the scholarship and theories of others, but at its best, as in Vitruvius or in Humphry Repton's 19th century treatises on landscape gardening, both an advertisement for the author and a powerful force for popular enlightenment. The architects Philip Johnson and Edward Stone have recently won enough fame to claim books of their own in the first category. Other current books, for example by Theo Crosby, an English architect (City Sense), Victor Gruen, a planner (The Heart of Our Cities), and Lawrence Halprin (Cities and the book under review), are products of designer-authors whose prosperous practices don't yet command such public attention.

Mr. Halprin is a successful San Francisco landscape architect who lately has had much consulting work in town planning and the design of freeways (he says he "backed into" it). This book, with brief text and many pictures, appears to have been produced by several members of his busy office. Instead of showing some of Halprin's accomplishments on Ghirardelli Square or the Bay Area Transit system — he has won some prizes for his work, and it deserves a close look — we find instead a pabulum of second-hand ideas on road building; borrowed ideas which are fortunately (as I will point out in a moment) thoroughly unconvincing. His book — just to get the intention clear and over with — is a prime example of Formula Two, self-promotion through how-to-do-it.

The book starts by claiming that cars are vehicles beloved in popular fancy, and motor travel makes for trips full of high excitement. Freeways are "symbolic of the intense dedication of our age to motion . . . away you go — fast. Planing over the land at tree-top level — the roofs of houses below you — almost like flying." The roofs of houses below you? Halprin says that pushing elevated highways through cities provides the greatest excitement. "In cities the great overhead concrete structures with their haunches tied to the ground and the vast flowing cantilevers rippling above the local streets stand like enormous sculptures marching through the architectonic caverns." Under these beautiful structures, the local residents, gulping with astonishment, play in parks on land that is "kept open for use" by raising the roads.

There is no mistaking the overwhelming impact of the freeways, particularly in cities. "In Los Angeles you never seem to say where you are going; you explain how to get there. First you take

Have you any idea what's happening on the other side of the Wall?

NBC foreign correspondent Welles Hangen draws a graphic, totally new picture of the momentous changes going on in East Germany — its policies and prospects, its chairmen and charwomen, its economics and home life — and the startling growth of its separate national identity, comparing it in detail to the "other" Germany.

The Muted Revolution
EAST GERMANY'S CHALLENGE TO RUSSIA AND THE WEST
by WELLES HANGEN
21 photographs
$5.85 • now at better bookstores
ALFRED • A • KNOPF

WHITE PASS SKI PATROL

His high boned, young face is so brown from the winter's sun, the few brief lines in each green eye's edge as of a leaf that is not yet gone from the limb—as of a nut which is gold or brown.

For he has become very strong living on the slopes.
His belly and thighs are newly lean from the thin skis.
Tough torso of the man, blue wooled.
Thin waist. White, tasseled cap of the child.

Beneath the fury of those great, dark panes of glass, that seem to take a man out of grace, his gentle eyes wait.
(We feel their melancholy gaze which is neither innocent nor wise.)

Like those knights of the winter snows—with a healing pack (sign of the cross on breast and back)— serene, snow-lonely, he patrols the beautiful peaks and the pale wastes that slide like a beast.

Sometimes still blind from his patrol, you'll see him pull down from the dangerous Cascades his heavy sledge of pain, its odd, black booted, canvas laced shape alive or dead, without a face.

Colors blooming in the sun he carroms down his own path, speeds (bending knees), dances side to side, balancing.
Under-skis glow golden in the snow spume around his Christiana.

And as he lifts away from us, skis dangle like the outstretched limbs of a frog in spring.
He swings gently in the air, vulnerable, so much the "poor, bare, forked" human animal.

And now he slowly rises up over trees and snow.
He begins to grow more thin, and then vanishes in air!
as, high in the lithe boughs of pines the silver dross flakes silently down.

There are the shadow tracks he left down the long, white hill beside the lift. Wait! Look up! a trail in the bright sky!
Breathing a wake of snow ribbons, something has just gone over the mountain!

JOHN LOGAN

the Santa Ana Freeway, after 10 miles you change over to the Santa Monica Freeway which you stay on for 15 miles, and then turn onto the Anaheim Freeway. Then you are there." Oh yes, Halprin warns about preserving important buildings and old landmarks in existing cities. "Open spaces should be considered inviolate." And local precincts should be spared because they frequently are inhabited by "ethnic groups" whose neighborhoods have many virtues, even though these groups "have no great ability to bring pressure on City Hall." But after all, these are only things that need to be weighed in the balance on considering "community impact." The important question — one to which most of the book is devoted — is, should the freeways be at grade, depressed, elevated, stacked, tunneled, or on embankments? Halprin's most resolute belief is that soaring road interchanges embody motion experiences that can be aesthetically meaningful to the tired commuter. The highway can even be "a great adventure in choreography," a thought he admits to be inspired by "my wife, the avant-garde dancer, Ann Halprin." Indeed, we see her on pages 20 and 21, in an eighteen-frame dance sequence among the columns of an elevated freeway. Ah California!

Let me admit that Freeways is firmly grounded, albeit in the clouds of an American dream. When the Model A Ford appeared, many people believed it to be the great liberator which would democratize and civilize the country. With a car just outside the front door and the open road beyond, no barriers of distance mattered. No one had to be an uncomfortable stranger when motor cabins were springing up everywhere. This dream of a nation on wheels, free and happy, lasted through the depression and the war. The fact that it wasn't soon to come true didn't change things. Some of the Model A spirit's important manifestations were the New York Parkways and Robert Moses and the 1939 World's Fair. At the fair's General Motors pavilion, Norman Bel Geddes showed the city of the future where the buildings were actually shaped by urban highways. As things turned out, Moses of the Parkways and the World's Fair of 1939 proved poor prophets for New York. It was California that bought the dream of the Model A spirit. It seems to me not an irrelevant fact that most of those who escaped the depression in the East and the dust storms in the Midwest, came to California by car.

The Model A dream is nevertheless not conceptually dated everywhere. Los Angeles, with its built-up area of 50 by 80 miles, has sprawled as its new postwar freeways have spread. To say that that city has no central density misses the point: it has become a new kind of city, based on very long communication routes. In such low-density settlement the disturbance freeways can make in the urban fabric is largely irrelevant. Unlike the ruinous Boston Central Artery and San Francisco Embarcadero which smashed through densely compact cities (and the proposed Lower Manhattan Expressway, which threatened to do the same), the freeways in Los Angeles have created no giant rifts and psychological barriers. As the planned 4-mile grid is completed, the cuts, elevations and embankments of the new roads are actually shaping and enclosing the city for the first time.

However, if there are no doctrinaire objections to Mr. Halprin's book, there are still serious practical ones. It is absurd for a landscape architect-planner to consider one form of transportation alone (even though our government planners habitually do), and a bit dangerous to discuss it in these sentimental terms. Even if he were to confine himself to a discussion of the art of movement in motor vehicles, the concept of Freeways as his subject is obtuse. Mass communication systems are dendritic forms, like rivers with tributaries or trees with branches. The problems of automotive travel are largely unrelated to freeways, the fat, rich trunks of the dendritic systems (although Mr. Halprin's practice may be solely concerned with them). The issue is what happens out in the branches — whether a man can park by the door he seeks, and whether it's worth building a city with the area to give every possible destination and route that much unobstructed space. Among many similarly misleading accounts — whether deliberately so or not — Halprin describes the advantages of slim elevated highways without pointing out that in an urban situation the frequent access and exit ramps are what determine their size.

Freeways is mainly a vulgarization of The View from the Road, a book on zoom aesthetics published two and a half years ago, written by Donald Appleyard, Kevin Lynch and John Myer of the Harvard-M.I.T. Joint Center for Urban Studies. It is out of place to review that book here, but I am glad that Mr. Halprin's echo of it, probably destined for a larger audience, hasn't got its scholarly background and cold calculation. I mistrust discussions of art — even highway art — when it's more than likely that life is getting in the way. These books (and in particular the Appleyard-Lynch-Myer one, which would be a completely convincing account of motion studies if it were sculpture they were talking about) seem to be typically American in their piecemeal approach to planning. Having designated roads as our major national goal, and having spent practically the entire postwar generation building the highway masterpieces we once dreamed about, some of our more thoughtful professionals are now concerned with making the trip more meaningful and exciting in the next generation of highways. And should we be building more of them at all? This sort of question is asked only by practitioners in the British Buchanan Report, Traffic in Towns. Back in America we presumably will soon be soaring over highways designed from space-motion and "Motation" studies, while citizens frozen up tight in towns below stare incomprehensibly at our vast dark undersides.

Where the Air Is Unclear

POISONS IN THE AIR. By Fred Warshofsky and Edward Edelson. Pocket Books. 160 pp. $1 paper.

M. G. WURTELE

Mr. Wurtele is professor of meteorology at the University of California (Los Angeles) and the author of articles in various journals of the geophysical sciences.

It seems strange that contemporary man requires propaganda to persuade him to support political measures assuring the purity of the air he breathes and the water he drinks, or protecting the sensual pleasures afforded by his immediate environment. Yet his indifference to these immediate concerns is a fact of our social life; such propaganda is necessary. Poisons in the Air is a work by journalists with this aim, and as such it is a well-researched and effective book, to be recommended as a broad, up-to-date survey of the present situation in air pollution and its regulation throughout the United States.

If anyone doubts the urgency of air-pollution controls, ignoring relatively minor warnings such as that of Donora, Pa., he may consider the horrific example of the London smog of December, 1952, to which are attributable more than 4,000 deaths. The known disasters of this sort are accurately, even conservatively, reported here, together with some statistics which imply frightening forecasts for many communities which have as yet experienced from air pollution only discomfort to human life and depredation of vulnerable properties.

The problem of air pollution is a difficult one, both scientifically and socially. From the former point of view, it is to be emphasized that different communities are threatened by different pollutants, and that in many cases the threat exists without the community's even having taken the necessary technical measures to identify the major pollutants.

Certain of the common toxic substances, such as the oxides of sulphur, are primarily products of industry, released into the atmosphere in great quantities from relatively few and concentrated sources. Many urban regions of the United States are now wrestling with the problem of control of this vaporous industrial sewage, but difficult as it may seem, this goal is in the end politically attainable, as we know from examples such as that of Los Angeles. [See "Smog Today and Smog Tomorrow" by Morris Neiburger, The Nation, December 6, 1965.] The research, public education and legislation accomplished by this community during the past twenty years constitute a remarkable social achievement.

Yet Los Angeles still has a most serious pollution problem, attributed to the

Before you vote, be sure to read
DIRTY POLITICS
by BRUCE L. FELKNOR

AN authoritative, disturbing survey of political chicanery in America by the former executive director of the Committee for Fair Campaign Practices. "It can be read with profit by all who run for office and all who vote." — JOHN CHANCELLOR, Director, Voice of America. "The proposals contained in the last chapter are deserving of the most serious consideration at all levels of government and by concerned citizens everywhere." — GEORGE ROMNEY, Governor of Michigan. Illustrated. $5.95

And don't miss
WE GIVE TO CONQUER

By ASHER BRYNES. A former consultant to Paul Hoffman of the ECA charges that the U.S. foreign aid program is a threat to world peace. $4.50

At all bookstores
W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
New York, N.Y. 10003

emissions of the internal-combustion engines of 3 million automobiles. (The chief poisons of these little factories are hydrocarbons, nitrogen dioxide and carbon monoxide; but the chemistry of this smog is extremely complex.) And this type of pollution is becoming a threat to every urban area, whatever its climate. Here we run into the social fact of the absence in the automobile industry of any vigorous program of research and development. As this review is written, a federal grand jury is investigating this industry for "conspiracy to obstruct and delay development of smog devices on motor vehicles." Whatever the outcome of this investigation, whatever "device" may or may not be developed, we seem to be stuck for a good many years with no economic alternative to today's internal-combustion engine and its toxic effluents.

One aspect of pollution control which might have received greater mention in this book is the wishful tendency to recommend manipulation of the environment rather than control of the source. This has been particularly evident in Los Angeles, where tunnels bored through mountains, and fleets of helicopters or giant fires to aid convection, have been suggested. Such schemes can be shown to be uneconomic and undesirable. The meteorologist, like the chemist and engineer, is most effectively employed as a planner; and since there is every sign that our megalopolises will continue their explosive growth, the book's emphasis on urban planning is most appropriate and welcome.

The Mafia Establishment

THE MAFIA AND POLITICS. By Michele Pantaleone. Introduction by Carlo Levi. Preface to the English edition by Denis Mack Smith. Coward-McCann. 255 pp. $5.50.

GABRIEL GERSH

Mr. Gersh teaches at Long Island University and specializes in Mediterranean affairs. He has written for The New York Times, Saturday Review, The Progressive and other publications.

Michele Pantaleone is a young Socialist journalist from western Sicily, the stronghold of the Mafia, and a native of Villalba, which was also the home town of Calogero Vizzini, "Don Calo," head of the Mafia from the end of the war until his death (in bed, and highly respected) in 1954. He is more than an authority on the Mafia. Apart from Danilo Dolci, whose name has become a byword for social reform in Sicily, Mr. Pantaleone is probably the Mafia's most dogged and persistent enemy in Sicily. With great courage and at the risk of his life, he has exposed the activities of the Mafia, condemned its political influence and denounced its crimes, its violence, betrayals and complex intrigues.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 10-10-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ______

The Mafia, with its spuriously romantic veneer, is a subject perfectly matched to his talents. The works of Gavin Maxwell and Norman Lewis have brilliantly given us the feel and tone of brutalized Sicily. Mr. Pantaleone's book, a collection of articles and essays on various aspects of the history and activities of the Mafia, adds to this a frightening, well-documented account of how the Mafia entrenched itself in Sicily, how it works, and how it has been allowed to work.

To understand the environment, both spiritual and material, which could encourage the development of an institution like the Mafia is difficult for a northern European or an American with his sense of order and his instinctive application of principles of social organization.

In its origins the Mafia was a form of self-help, providing rough justice against the misrule of the Bourbons and security for property owners against brigands and robbers at a time when the state was unable to do so. Its primitive code of vengeance, silence and obedience flourished in Sicily, a backward island that often seems to be only a nominal extension of Europe. Originally the Mafia had a Robin Hood aura, but soon it developed into an immense protective racket by corrupting all levels of society, by extorting money from the poor and by terrorizing and murdering those who refused to submit to its authority.

The most exciting and convincing part of Pantaleone's narrative is that which deals with the rehabilitation of the Mafia by the Allies at the end of World War II. Pantaleone produces evidence of the part played by the naive Americans — wittingly or unwittingly — in restoring the Mafia to power. In these chapters the protagonist is Don Calo, who manipulated the Allied command at will — the triumph of medieval man over modern.

It was Don Calo who in 1943 prepared for the Allies a list of names suitable for office of mayor in western Sicilian towns. He pointed out that many of them had only recently emerged from Fascist jails and the Allies did not investigate his claim that his nominees had suffered for their political ideals, rather than for their crimes ranging from robbery to murder.

At the height of his power, according to a journalist quoted by Pantaleone, Don Calo, "by making a simple telephone call, could get in touch with the Cardinal Archbishop, the Prefect, a General in command of an Army Corps, the President of the Region, a Mayor or a Deputy whenever he chose." Unfortunately, it has been under parliamentary government that this kind of influence has been successful. Mussolini, fearing the Mafia as a rival to his Fascist party, tried to crush it, though many Mafiosi received positions in the Fascist hierarchy.

The author gives a fascinating but frightening account of the way in which the Mafia reasserted its influence and power upon the return of democracy, particularly at all levels of the Christian Democrat Party. Pantaleone also deals, in horrifying detail, with the career of Salvatore Giuliano, the Sicilian bandit

LUNCH HOUR IDYLL

Budding iris in April — in the shadow of Trinity Church where Wall Street begins among stones and grass and historic prisoners of grass.
Sandwiched between the hours the church clock races from graveyard to river, the iris takes its tear-shape time.
After a long winter the office girls sun themselves — their coats open, their eyes closed.

SAUL TOUSTER

who was ruthlessly used, then as ruthlessly betrayed, by the Mafia. Here one sees how far and deep the corruption extends. What could be expected from the Christian Democrat government in Rome, when it had so plainly negotiated with the bandits? Or the Christian Democrats in Sicily, who had gladly used the Mafia to enforce their ends? Or the police and carabinieri, cynically engaged in a phantom campaign, whose end was not to capture Giuliano but to keep him at large as long as he was useful?

The book provides a vivid account of how the "old" Mafia of the feudal estates has been overrun by the "new" Mafia of the industrial towns since the war. The old Mafia was mainly rurally based, though with extensive ramifications among the professional classes and in the church (two of Don Calo's uncles were bishops), unobtrusive in its activities and respectful of each other's spheres of influence. The new Mafia of the towns is dominated by gangs returned from America, deals in narcotics, has international contacts, is flashy in appearance and brutal in style.

The struggle for supremacy has been so bloody that the various Mafias have tried to cooperate in an effort to settle disputes amicably rather than shoot it out in the streets of Palermo. A Mafia tribunal has been formed to adjudicate disputes among the gangs. However, the new Mafia is assured of victory and it is a victory which is hardly threatened by the prospect of a final elimination of Sicilian feudalism and underdevelopment — indeed the new Mafia is the product of a boom environment.

Public indignation and the courage of a few Italian journalists and social reformers like the author and Danilo Dolci have led to the creation of a parliamentary commission to investigate the Mafia's doings, and a number of Mafiosi have been either arrested or deported to other parts of Italy. Does this mean that the end of the Mafia's influence and activity is in sight? It is well over three years since Parliament set up the commission, yet when Dolci denounced a former minister to the commission, it was he, not the minister, who found himself on trial.

To destroy the Mafia altogether will be a difficult task because of its grip on a people whose spirit has been crushed and whose conscience has been anesthetized in a prolonged climate of fear, illiteracy and suspicion of the outside world. In the continuing attempt, Pantaleone's book, a first-rate story of adventure and intrigue set in its proper historical and social context, is also a work of courageous activism.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

If someone should tell you that Edward Albee's A Delicate Balance is a brilliant play (which it is), ask: "What is its theme?" If another declares that it is very well written (also true), insist on knowing exactly how. And if its staging is praised, try to discover in what regard.

One might discuss the play's accomplishment in the context of its craftsmanship: a slight plot suffices to sustain a long evening and to maintain suspense. In Who's Afraid of Virginia Woolf? this was achieved through the sparkling venom of the dialogue. The new play proceeds through a continuous enrichment of its theme. Its style crystallizes its meaning.

The play dramatizes discomfort. Its world is not absurd and it is not cruel; it is without comfort. Here one's soul finds no resting place, no spiritual security. The distress that plagues it is all the more acute for being encased in a glittering shell. This private world which is Albee's, to a greater degree than most of us know or care to admit, is largely ours as well.

The most important names...The most significant ideas... are coming to you from the new

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

Just Published:

Harry Braverman
THE FUTURE OF RUSSIA
UL-201 $1.95
An analysis of what is happening in Russia today: economically, politically, socially. "Hard-headed, bold and brilliant." The Washington Post —Stephen S. Rosenfeld

Justus Buchler
NATURE AND JUDGMENT
UL-207 $2.65
A general philosophy of experience, that provides new insight into human behavior. Judgment, Query, Experience and Meaning are the titles of each chapter.

Louis de Broglie
PHYSICS AND MICROPHYSICS
UL-206 $2.25
Nobel prize winner Louis de Broglie discusses the basic ideas of modern physics.

Ilya Ehrenburg
MEMOIRS 1921-1941
UL-203 $2.95
An account of international, literary and political life in the twenties and thirties by Russia's leading writer. "A carefully polished mirror of those flawed times." Andrew Field—Book Week

Joseph Gies
BRIDGES AND MEN
UL-205 $2.95
An historic survey of bridges and the men who built them from the first cavemen to 20th century engineers.

Conor Cruise O'Brien
TO KATANGA AND BACK:
A UN Case History
UL-196 $2.45
A personal memoir of the author's experience as UN representative in Africa. "... this book is a remarkable contribution to historical literature." The New Statesman

John Bardach DOWNSTREAM:
A Natural History of the River
UL-197 $2.95
The life-story of any river, and the plant and animal life it supports. "This is a book to read from cover to cover, to browse in, to use as a reference, to learn from." Christian Science Monitor —Marian Sorenson

Howard Moss
THE MAGIC LANTERN OF MARCEL PROUST
UL-200 $1.95
A brilliant critical study of Remembrance of Things Past which explores the novel's theme and complex imagery.

M. L. Rosenthal
A PRIMER OF EZRA POUND
UL-199 $1.45
A concise, factual, well-documented guide to the poetry of Ezra Pound.

A. L. Rowse
CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE:
HIS LIFE AND TIME
UL-198 $2.65
A vivid biography of Marlowe by one of the world's foremost historians of the Elizabethan Age.

Henry Green
BACK
UL-204 $2.25
A story about a man's return from war "to find everything the same—and at the same time different."

Maurice Valency
THE FLOWER AND THE CASTLE:
An Introduction to Modern Drama
UL-202 $2.95
A provocative introduction to modern drama, with particular attention to Henrik Ibsen and August Strindberg.

Recently Published:

Hermann Broch, with an introduction by Hannah Arendt.
THE DEATH OF VIRGIL
UL-184 $2.95
"Perhaps the best novel by a European since Thomas Mann's The Magic Mountain." The New Yorker

D. W. Brogan
THE PRICE OF REVOLUTION
UL-195 $1.95
A history of major political upheavals ranging from the American Revolution to the present day.

Stanley Edgar Hyman
THE TANGLED BANK:
Darwin, Marx, Frazer and Freud as Imaginative Writers
UL-193 $2.45
A study of the four most significant thinkers of the past century and of the ideas that shaped our time.

James Joll
THE ANARCHISTS
UL-191 $2.45
A richly documented history of anarchism from its origins in philosophy after the French Revolution to its failure in action in the Spanish Civil War. "The best survey of the subject." Times (London) Literary Supplement

Junichiro Tanizaki
THE MAKIOKA SISTERS
UL-190 $2.45
"The most important Japanese novel published in the years following the war." The Saturday Review

Franco Venturi
ROOTS OF REVOLUTION
UL-192 $3.45
"Not only intellectual history in the grand manner. It is as exciting as an oversized panoramic Russian novel." Bertram D. Wolfe, New York Times Book Review

GROSSET & DUNLAP, INC.
51 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK, N.Y. 10010

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

Report on
THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY 1966 by the authors of Danger on the Right
Benjamin R. Epstein
and Arnold Forster

A Vintage Book V-358 $1.45

THE BIRCHERS:

- Who they are
- What they want
- How they work
- The real extent of their power and influence today

"This is pamphleteering in the classic sense. The authors who have collaborated on previous books, including Report on the Ku Klux Klan, are never shrill. The Report is a revealing tour through the theory and practice of the philosophy of Robert Welch and the influential forces behind him."

—William Hogan in the San Francisco Chronicle

For your FREE copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY, fill out the coupon below, and start receiving THE NATION, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No..........
10-10-66

What produces this "plague"? We love and cannot bear one another. We need our fellow men desperately, yet cannot reconcile ourselves to their otherness. We yearn for closeness, yet a dismal distance separates us.

This is seldom apparent to us because we are not savages or hoodlums: we generally treat one another with courtesy. In A Delicate Balance we are, in contrast to The Zoo Story, among sophisticated circumstances. There is an unnatural elegance about the environment. The talk is colloquial enough to be thoroughly American and elaborate enough to approximate the speech of an 18th-century drawing-room play. This is deliberate. Albee wishes us to be at home and yet to remove us to a more abstract sphere. His people are familiar and somehow strangers. They are personae — masks. Ordinary words and phrases are transformed into a special language which we never hear spoken except on a stage. It removes us from the mundane; while it is peculiarly attractive it also disturbs and makes for a slight but persistent uneasiness. It hides its hurt and hate. It is not realism but perhaps high comedy. A jazzy decorum, usually euphonious, is the mark of an extreme tension.

The characters are well-to-do, though we never know how they earn their living. (The absence of a specific background passes unnoticed because the time of the play's action is compressed into thirty hours of a weekend.) A country club is mentioned; we are presumably in the sleek suburbia.

Middle-aged Agnes is the family's fulcrum: she keeps its balance by the force of propriety. Her husband, Tobias, is evasive, taciturn, suppressed: he is rarely allowed to finish a sentence. He is reasonable and invariably correct. Everything painful or messy, all emotional anarchy is firmly checked by Agnes.

Claire, Agnes' sister, is the dissonant but ineffectual voice of dissent. A resolute alcoholic, or more accurately, she asserts, a drunk, she understands everything but is incapable of decided action. She is a rebellious "outsider," herself in need of protection. She cannot even declare her desire for her brother-in-law.

Agnes and Tobias have had a son, who died. She wanted another child, but the shock of the boy's death has filled Tobias with terror at the idea of bringing new life into the world. As a result, his sex appetite is arrested. There is a daughter, Julia, who has been thrice married and divorced. On her return home we learn that she has left her husband.

Into this household where good manners barely clamp the lid on hysteria, come Harry and Edna, members of the country club. They have come to stay permanently. They have no other explanation for their intrusion except that they are frightened. Their fear is all the more scary for being without defined cause. They proclaim their right to take refuge in their best friends' home. Julia, who seeks solace in the bosom of her family — a cold bosom since there can be little warmth where so much is repressed — resents these friends who have pre-empted her room. She demands that her parents order Harry and Edna out.

The decision falls to Tobias because, as Agnes points out, by his very passivity Tobias has actually ruled the hearth. In the crucial confrontation of the play Tobias, through an anguished confession, finally takes a stand, the kind of moral decision that most of us seldom make. Though he has never really felt "one" with Harry, never really loved him and wishes he had never been troubled by Harry's sudden dependence on him, he pleads with Harry to stay. For they are friends and what does friendship mean unless it goes to the limit of giving all one has to give?

This scene might have been a trite bid for sympathy, in accordance with the Broadway stage code which demands that you must root for someone in every play. But the situation is saved from sentimentality when we hear Harry's admission that he would not have allowed Tobias to live with him if the case were reversed. Harry and Edna leave. Neither man is a good or a bad person. They are just folk. What Albee means to convey through them and the others is the almost insuperable difficulty of loving one's neighbor, and the absolute necessity of behaving with love despite that difficulty.

It would be beside the point at this juncture to compare Albee's play with those of foreign authors who treat adjacent themes. One must first of all recognize the American accent in Albee, his individuality. Nor will it profit us to resist him at present because his vision is not yet broad enough to give his subject greater scope. The play has social relevance, though in this vein insufficient social extension or precise dramatization. Like so many of his generation Albee is as yet too self-absorbed for the broader exertion. His present success lies in the very deft objectivation of his inner state. Our reservations should not mar our appreciation. The play is a further step in the author's progress: it is superior to the more sensational Virginia Woolf.

The production is technically proficient. In most cases I am content to indicate as much and let it go at that because I am thoroughly aware how ungrateful an undertaking it is in our disorganized theatre to do full justice to a subtle play.

Able and sympathetic actors have been cast in all the parts, but several of them have been miscast. As performance, Hume Cronyn's is the best. He understands Tobias, he is relaxed and true; he has feeling. But since the play deals in types — notice that none of the characters is given a family name — something more is involved than the actor's personal merit.

Alan Schneider, the director, has realized that the play requires a certain reserve or coolness of statement. For this reason he has avoided insisting on seething emotion. Still, his method does not convey the play's quality. Tobias should not be rendered as a "little man" (I am not speaking of height) but as an outwardly imposing figure, a very "senator" of a man, a pillar of our business community in whom the springs of sensibility have begun to dry through disuse. The welling up of his being in the play's crisis would then become more stirring and, what is more important, exemplary. The "little man" of the play is Harry who as cast looks more like a Tobias.

Edna too should have a humbler look instead of the bearing of command Carmen Matthews assumes by her very presence. Thus when Edna claims her and her husband's right as friends she should not appear self-righteous but pathetically lost. Jessica Tandy, as handsome as a Gainsborough portrait, hews close to the director's "line" for Agnes, but this can only become dramatically moving through her almost heroic effort to control the surrounding as well as the inner havoc — the very thing which makes her suspect, in hope more than in dread, that she might some day go mad. This note is absent from Miss Tandy's playing. Her daughter Julia should give the impression of having been the pride of her "Vassar" class, a woman efficiently bright and smartly sexy whose clamorous outbreak should strike us as something entirely unpredictable. Marian Seldes looks as though she had always been as sensitive as a violin string. Rosemary Murphy is effective as the bibulous sister, but through the directorial unbalance she has been edged toward a complacent comedic comment. There is not sufficient torment beneath her sallies.

William Ritman's setting is just what the author has asked for but does not create the style or mood the play demands: a wan space in which amid the status-stamped appointments loneliness creeps under the door and pervades the proceedings like a fog. Such a setting need not appear obviously anti-realistic. Robert Edmond Jones, for example, knew how — through the disposition of properties, lights and colors — to make a setting speak a dramatic message without obstructing the audience's recognition of practical topography.

These critical remarks should not mitigate my readers' obligation to see the play at the Martin Beck. A Delicate Balance deserves our close attention. There will be very few new American plays this season to warrant the same.

All quibbles aside, the evening of poetry and folk music by American Negroes under the title A Hand Is on the Gate at the Longacre Theatre should also be attended during its limited run. Poems and songs are given by a splendidly attractive company: Leon Bibb, Roscoe Lee Browne, Gloria Foster, Moses Gunn, Ellen Holly, James Earl Jones, Josephine Premice, Cicely Tyson.

WORLD'S BEST?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)

☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Name
Address
City State Zip

are you your own boss ?

If you are, there's a new law allowing you to set up a fund for your retirement... and obtain substantial tax benefits, too. Our specialists will be happy to explain the benefits to you, and customize a retirement plan to suit your needs. Just write or call.

Matt Jaffe ASSOCIATES, LTD.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

BACH: St. John Passion. Kurt Equiluz, Max van Egmond, Jacques Villisch, Bert van t'Hoff, Siegfried Schneeweis, vocal soloists; Wiener Sängknaben, Chorus Viennensia, Concentus Musicus, Wien; Hans Gillesberger, cond. Telefunken SKH 19.

The events through which the St. John Passion unfolds are notably monodimensional and direct among Bach's large-scale works, with a one-to-one relationship between the effective time-scale and dramatic functionality of each section of text, and the texture and phraseology of its musical projection that is almost perfunctory in comparison with the inexhaustible subtlety and depth of ramification and development within and among sections that characterizes the later St. Matthew Passion. In this respect, the St. John is closer to the Magnificat, the Ascension Oratorio and some of the middle-period cantatas than to the other Passion. The most evident quality shared by these works is their presentation of first-rate initial ideas that are often conventionally developed or rigidly sustained, with the result that one senses either a truncation (especially in the Magnificat) or an over-extension (especially in the Ascension Oratorio). Accordingly, they require in performance an especially sharp delineation of the characteristic profile and texture of each event; otherwise the undifferentiated continuity is simply fatal to the sustained perception of a work as long as the St. John Passion.

It is necessary to raise such considerations to explain why a performance as conscientious, delicately played and sung, and precise as the one on the present recording must yet be regarded as an ultimately unsatisfactory representation of the work. The principal problem appears to be Hans Gillesberger's overdiscreetness in articulating dynamic accents and inflections, and the oversimilarity he imposes on the sonority, tempo and texture of the sections. But the distinction prevalent in other aspects of the performance, enhanced by the lovely, sonorous framework produced by using the "original" Bach-era instruments, makes it difficult to dismiss this album without regret.

BERNSTEIN: Chichester Psalms. Facsimile. Camerata Singers, New York Philharmonic; Leonard Bernstein, cond. Columbia ML 6192/MS 6792.

COPLAND: Dance Symphony. MORTON GOULD: Spirituals for Orchestra. Chicago Symphony Orchestra; Morton Gould, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2850.

Leonard Bernstein's Chichester Psalms are mostly innocent, inoffensive little choral pastiches that have none of either the ambitions or the problems—and hence none of the interest either—of his earlier Kaddisch. Their superimposition (especially in the final Psalm) of a "Broadway" manner onto a traditional choral context recalls Kurt Weill; but even Bernstein's finale is unable to match the sheer Broadway vulgarism of Weill's own Kaddisch, since it lacks the ultimate daring of Weill in invoking real "blue" chords to articulate liturgically climactic moments.

Aaron Copland's Dance Symphony is interesting mainly as an index of the influences on his formative years; in particular, the signature of Prokofiev's Scythian Suite throughout the work reveals, rather surprisingly, how importantly Prokofiev's work must have impinged on Copland's experience during this period. Otherwise, there is little in the Symphony that one would recognize as a typical Copland sonority or event, aside from a certain spareness of statement and sections where the virtual absence of events over long spans creates, in context, a special sense of "suspended" continuity.

Morton Gould is the arch-professional in the domain of sonically clever arrangers' music; the Spirituals are as "modern," "jazzy," "rhythmic," as could be

ASYLUM

After the tour was over, we drove home
Past probing steeples of the radar screen
For Greater Philadelphia. The screams
Of jets bounced back from high walls of the sky;
Beyond the Industrial Highway, orange gloom
Hung over rows of intricate towers moored
In the river by the Navy Yard.
Upstream, the bleak spires of our city loomed,
But on that island we had come from Sycamores arched across the water.
Peacocks, elegant in saunter, leaned
Cockaded heads in a rage toward us—they'd scream,
Scream us away. In the rhododendron
With mâchicoulis of Sears Roebuck picket fencing,
Purple battlements behind a vermilion drawbridge
Menaced the implausible Poconos.
Ten yards away, above the falls,
The good ship thwarts the current. Steady oars
Sweep long ripples as the gig
Glides nowhere on matched fours.
Imperial Marines lean back to pull
In everlasting fealty to their Admiral
The Emperor, who paces on the parapet.
Astern, a waterwheel is turning—what intricacies
Of crankshaft rig it to the dummy oarsmen!
—A classic therapy, they amusedly explain—
This is his life.
He's harmless in his kingdom.

DANIEL HOFFMAN

What hope is there for the young Negro?

THE YOUNG NEGRO IN AMERICA: 1960-1980 by SAMUEL D. PROCTOR, former Special Assistant to Sargent Shriver asks: What's ahead in his education? In jobs, politics, social equality? How much should he rely on white friends? What must he do now for himself? $3.95

ASSOCIATION PRESS, N.Y. 10007

COMMENTARY, WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?

SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00

COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name....................
Address..................
Zip......................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

Say No to Johnson's War with dollars & ballots

The November elections pose a test of confidence in Lyndon Johnson. Every vote cast for an opponent of the war in Viet Nam is a vote against the belligerent foreign policy of the Johnson administration and the deceptions with which it has undermined democratic institutions.

In Congressional districts around the country, a grass roots movement for peace is challenging the destructive consensus of the cold war; in many of these, electoral victory can now transform dissent into real political power.

Almost alone in Washington, a handful of Senators and Congressmen has been seeking to put the issues of this war before the people. They must be joined by others on all levels of government and throughout the country. This will not happen unless Americans care deeply enough to support "new politics" candidates against the "old politics" of military intervention abroad and racial and economic injustice at home.

The National Conference for New Politics is assisting issues-oriented liberals, peace and civil rights activists and anti-poverty organizations who are striving to win elections. It is a co-operative effort to provide financial, research and human resources to those candidacies and constituencies speaking clearly for peace and a full scale assault on the root causes of poverty. It is now abundantly clear that the cost of the war has doomed hopes of any meaningful attack on our slums and ghettos. We can no longer be satisfied with politicians who whisper sentiments for peace in private that they fear to utter in public.

In recent months the conference has contributed large sums of money and services to candidates in Alabama and Mississippi, New York and California and elsewhere across the nation. Particularly disheartening, however, were those close contests in which a few thousand dollars might have meant the difference between defeat and victory.

This time we want to make sure that pliant supporters of Lyndon Johnson's war do not go to Congress because the "new politics" of peace is short of funds. Moreover, we are convinced that growing numbers of Americans see the need to continue the efforts of political organization and education beyond the November elections, if our country is to turn back to the ways of peace and fulfill the long delayed promise of equality for all its citizens.

This is our opportunity to transform dissent into real political power. Send a contribution today to help elect public officials of conscience and courage who will not be manipulated into silence.

Please! Make your check payable to NCNP and mail it now.

> "I happen to hold to the point of view that it isn't going to be too long before the American people repudiate our war in Southeast Asia."
>
> Senator Wayne Morse
> Senate Foreign Relations Committee Hearing
> February 17, 1966

National Conference for New Politics

Julian Bond   Simon Casady
National Co-Chairmen

The Rev. William Sloane Coffin, Jr.
Chaplain, Yale University

Benjamin Spock, M.D.
Pediatrician

Members NCNP National Board

National Conference for New Politics N
250 West 57th Street, New York 10019

I enclose $________for the '66 campaigns of peace and civil rights candidates.

I pledge $________.

I wish to assist NCN's fund raising efforts. ☐

I wish to volunteer for campaign work. ☐

Name________________________________

Address______________________________

City______________State________Zip Code________ desired of a consummately sophisticated popularizer. The real craft and know-how of this kind of music invariably makes the pseudo-popularizers-cum-profundity of the Blitzstein - Harris - Schuman - Menotti kind seem clumsy and amateurish by comparison. Gould's capacities extend to his conducting as well; what he achieves with this most capable of orchestras is stunningly brilliant in rhythm and sound.

BEETHOVEN: String Quartets Op. 74 and 95. The Weller Quartet. London CM 9431/CS 6431.

BRAHMS: String Quartets Op. 51, Nos. 1 and 2. The Weller Quartet. London CM 9432/CS 6432.

HAYDN: String Quartets Op. 33, Nos. 1-6. The Weller Quartet. London CMA 7214/CSA 2214.

The playing of the Weller Quartet, despite the youth of its members, is an almost totally faithful representation of the Viennese chamber-music performance tradition, with a few "modernizing" variances. Thus, regardless of the music being performed, the same maximally glucous sonority is maintained, with unbroken, sliding connectivity in all pitch successions, and an articulative approach that mainly involves maximal lingering and distension at every possible structural juncture, however subsidiary. This is accompanied by a consistent application, judiciously varied, of a large repertory of dynamic swells that substitute an imperceptible note initiation rising to a mid-point accent and slow decay for any sense of individual attack or phrasing. The "modern" aspects of the Weller Quartet's performances consist primarily of somewhat brisker tempos than are characteristic of older groups (apparently they are able to pack their full range of expressive inflection on each note into less time) and somewhat less exaggerated elongation at articulation points. As ever, the competence of any given performance depends entirely on the degree to which the invariant approach happens to correspond to the inherent qualities of the particular piece involved; of these recordings, only the Brahms Quartets survive by virtue of the clarity they impose on a texturally dense, articulatively continuous surface. And it probably ought to be noted that the Weller Quartet appears completely competent mechanically and musically, to realize its chosen instrumental and interpretive objectives.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

As fast as possible, the pictures that were successfully showcased last month at the New York Film Festival are being brought into the first-run houses. The impulse to cash in on the publicity is natural enough (indeed, that seems to be largely what the festival is all about), but some of the films may find the Lincoln Center tiara a rather abashing embellishment in their commercial runs.

For example, The Shameless Old Lady, adapted and directed by René Allio from a story by Bertolt Brecht. It is almost impossible to talk about this movie without seeming to patronize it — it is so sweet, so prettily done (and so lacking the satiric impudence we associate with Brecht). It is a work to be dropped in on, and any more formal approach is too much for it.

The method of the film is to exploit the resources of the French actress, Sylvie, in the title role. She is indeed splendid, but she is also so evidently meant to be seen as splendid that the picture keeps falling off into a demonstration of acting rather than getting on with the acting itself. Any fellow actor might profit from observing Sylvie prepare and eat a simple widow's supper, and any fellow actor might despair of ever catching the trick whereby Sylvie indicates that a gleam has come into her eye. But the public profits more when acting of this caliber is sublimated into a performance.

The fault is not in Sylvie but in the "salesmanship" with which the camera shows her off, and in the fact that, lacking material of any great substance to work with, she falls back, as good craftsmen do, on technique. For the story is fluff. An old woman of Marseilles, having spent her life drudging for a large and largely unappreciative family, emerges in widowhood as a bombazine butterfly and sips nectar for her final eighteen months. She is helped in this by the neighborhood trollop and a flamboyant anarchist cobbler who adopt her and her life's capital. Her family, whose own jarring lives are shown in flashes, watch in bourgeois outrage as she is made use of with a tender gaiety they never offered. And that is it — a thoroughly sentimental little tour de force for a rainy afternoon. I have read that old people may be expected to enjoy the film; I should think they would find it unbearable.

The supporting cast is visually strong — a group of vital men and women — but they all seem a little exaggerated, as though they were running hard to keep pace with Sylvie, who can outdistance any of them with contemptuous ease.

Masculine Feminine was one of two Jean-Luc Godard films screened at Lincoln Center (the other, Belmondo in Pierre le Fou which has not yet opened commercially). It is good in its detail, rather frustrating overall. No one yet has found how to make a substantial creative work out of one of the current dominant "social" themes: the alleged entropy of contemporary youth. Since by definition these boys and girls do nothing from conviction or in any consistent pattern, it is possible to show them in vignettes, but bafflingly difficult to set them in a dramatic frame that an outsider can understand and retain. It is said that the "scene" is subject enough, and that may be true for the section of the audience that is watching its own autobiography; for the others, these reports on youth adrift may seem no more than the extended preparation for a scene that never gets under way. (In fact, Godard attributes his narrative to Guy de Maupassant, but considering that a narrative is precisely what fails to unroll, the credit seems only bizarre.)

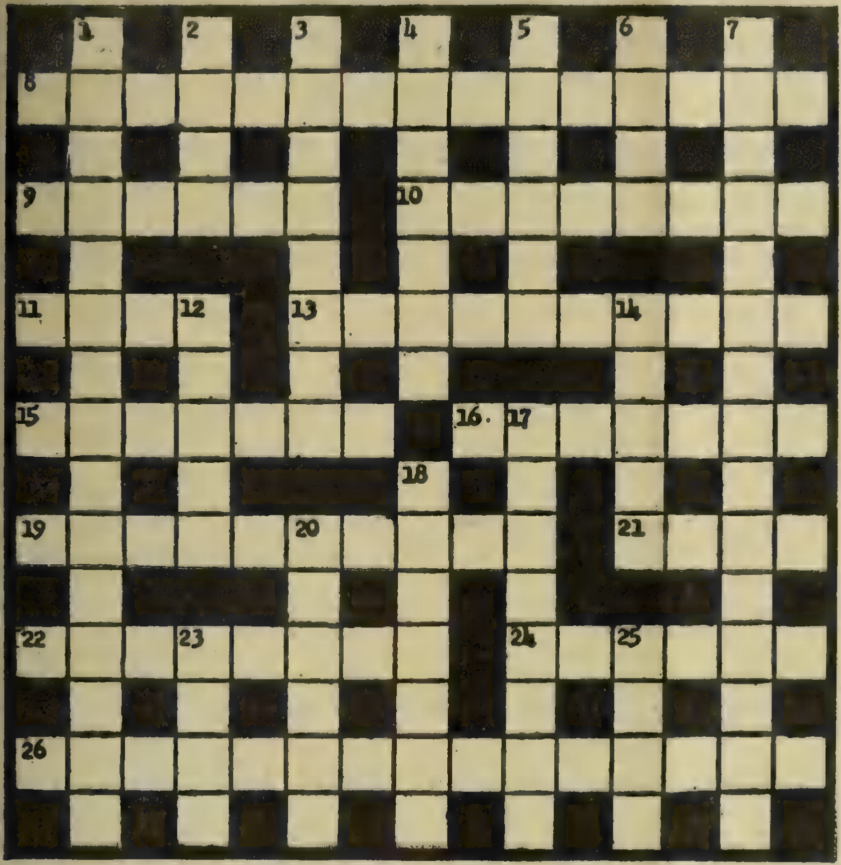
Godard attempts to give some current to the eddying of his young people by interpolating episodes of unpredictable, anonymous violence; these seem to punctuate the random motion and at the same time suggest that needing to hold themselves anesthetized from just such shocks is what has produced this unfocused generation. True, they declare themselves opposed to the war in Vietnam, but one gets the feeling that for these French boys and girls one attraction of the stand is that their views are so irrelevant to what takes place as to reinforce their general position of estrangement.

Beyond that, Masculine Feminine is in its detail a warm and ingratiating picture because Godard is so clearly fond of his wan hipsters. He has noticed, and makes affectionate use of, their folk customs: the moments of wild, symbolic revolt that spring without warning out of lethargy; the laughless wit based on self-mockery; the wide-eyed sexual frankness; the habit of submitting one another to searching personal interrogations in lieu of conversation. He finds a darling innocence in these underage hedonists that gives his picture a glow, if not exactly a point.

Or at least he finds it in the boys. His girls, by contrast, seem cold, self-watchful and narrowly competent. It may be that Godard has more sympathy for boys; or perhaps he feels that if girls would only make the traditional home-and-babies demand of the boys, this generation would get itself on the road at last. If so, it is very French bourgeois of him.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1170

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

8 Couldn't be trusted with a certain weekly magazine, by reputation! (15)
9 Point to the timekeeper for a sample! (6)
10 Sort of bored after the fighting for play clothes! (8)
11 Aims for quits! (4)
13 Sort of rune believed to be not bought back. (10)
15 A movement of the barrier around the platform. (7)
16 Those who might not let you read fliers, in a sense. (7)
19 Reckoning funny fellows show which way the game went? (10)
21 And this divided, etc., should be before long. (4)
22 Trophy committee supervisors in the cabinet? (8)
24 When the monarch loses his head, he might be disturbed by such quarters. (6)
26 Go formal? (5, 2, 8)

DOWN:

1 Artistic descriptions the traveling salesman might be used to? (7, 8)
2 Charge made by one in a race? (4)
3 Where washers might be properly seated. (8)
4 He also might make a charge in the race, but not like 2. (7)
5 Slept soundly, obviously. (6)
6 Start agitation in prison? (4)
7 A flip remark of the loser, possibly. (6, 2, 7)
12 Sounds like what one shouldn't do in flight. (5)
14 Birds in the wilderness. (5)
17 Do they promise to cover your losses in England? (8)
18 Future explanation might enable one to do so. (7)
20 A corny combination, but it might draw well. (6)
23 Might it tie up the stock? (4)
25 Is this a bad sign in almost the last state? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1169

ACROSS: 1 Blarney stone; 9 and 20 As slick as a whistle; 10 Iris; 11 Detailed; 12 Greece; 13 Inter; 15 Potbelly; 16 Agitates; 19 Newer; 21 Sonata; 22 Retailer; 24 Utes; 25 Interstate; 26 Pamphleteers. DOWN: 2 Listening posts; 3 Reliant; 4 Excel; 5 Stand up; 6 Orangutan; 7 Epicene; 8 Circular letter; 14 Ritualism; 17 Tears up; 18 Scratch; 23 Terse.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open
Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation. Its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.
[redacted] postpd., [redacted] pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

SEX OFFENDERS: An Analysis of Types/Gebhard. Send $12.50 to: J. Marie Brower, 7800 Essington, Philadelphia, Pa. 19153.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London. $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002

WORLD DEMOCRACY. By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 262 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor's "Self-Designation" is only half of the story. Bin Dir Woor cites the Bible and thousands of visions of Christ, angels, and the holy dead, to prove that World Democracy is a divine world ideal. He calls on total humanity to work and pray, both before and after death, for a World Democracy.

Jack Ruby Accuses LBJ: New evidence on the Dallas assassination: "Pardon My Grief" by Pen Jones. $3.01. Midlothian Mirror, Midlothian, Texas.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

NEW religion for Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Atheists. Free details. L. J. Casselman, 1301 H Street, Sacramento, Calif. 95814.

PUBLISHER'S EDITOR — Analyzes manuscripts; revises fiction, non-fiction. French-English. Box 594, c/o The Nation.

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

WHO SAYS ALL RECORD CLUBS ARE ALIKE?

NOW COMPARE THE "BIG 4" RECORD CLUBS

Record Club of America gives you All Labels... at 33[illegible] savings [illegible] and often up to 75%... AND DOESN'T FORCE YOU TO BUY EVEN A SINGLE RECORD

	CLUB A (As Advertised in [illegible] January 1966)	CLUB B (As Advertised in McCALL'S February 1966)	[illegible] C (As Advertised in PARADE January 16, 1966)	RECORD CLUB OF AMERICA
CAN YOU CHOOSE FROM ALL LABELS INCLUDING LATEST RELEASES?	NO	NO	NO	YES! Choose any LP, on any label! Mono and Stereo! No exceptions! Over 300 different manufacturers including CAPITOL, COLUMBIA, RCA VICTOR, ANGEL, VOX, VERVE, DECCA, LONDON, etc. Even latest releases are available at once — no waiting.
MUST YOU BUY A "MINIMUM" NUMBER OF RECORDS? HOW MANY?	6	8	2	NONE! No obligations! No yearly "quota"! Take as many, [illegible] few, or no records at all if you so decide!
CAN YOU BUY ANY RECORD YOU WANT AT A DISCOUNT?	NO	NO	NO	ALWAYS! Your discounts are never less than 33⅓% — and are often as high as 75% — on every record you buy! No exceptions!
DO YOU EVER RECEIVE UNORDERED RECORDS?	YES	YES	YES	NEVER! There are no cards which you must return. Only the records you want are sent — and only when you ask us to send them!
HOW LONG MUST YOU WAIT FOR SELECTIONS TO ARRIVE?	5 to 6 WEEKS	5 to 6 WEEKS	5 to 6 WEEKS	NO LONG WAITS! YOUR ORDER PROCESSED SAME DAY RECEIVED!

If Record Club of America is that good — where's the catch?

There is no catch! Here is truly one Record Club with no restrictions

- ★ Choose any LP ... on any label! No exceptions ... Mono and Stereo — including latest releases!
- ★ No "quotas" to buy! Take 0 records — or 100!
- ★ SAVE — never less than 33⅓% off list ... often up to 75%!
- ★ All orders processed same day received — no long waits!
- ★ Every record brand new, first quality, factory fresh — and guaranteed fully returnable!

TYPICAL "DOUBLE DISCOUNT" SALE

Sugg. List Price $3.79 and $3.98 — BEST SELLERS... ONLY $1.89 & $1.98

Tijuana Brass	Ferrante [illegible] Teicher	The Supremes
Al Hirt	Peter, Paul [illegible] Mary	Henry Mancini
Bill Cosby	Sonny [illegible] Cher	The Righteous Bros.

Sugg. List Price $4.79 and $4.98 — BEST SELLERS... ONLY $2.39 [illegible] $2.49

Frank Sinatra	Getz-Gilberto	Ramsey Lewis
Arthur Fiedler	Birgit Nilsson	Segovia

Sugg. List Price $4.98 — Everest & Vox Classical Albums — ...ONLY $1.77

... plus more than ½ off on famous labels: Audio Fidelity, Command, Westminster, Roulette, Mercury, Angel, MGM, Verve, Deutsche Grammophon and others ...

FREE! 300-page Schwann Catalog to pick your albums from when you join Record Club of America

GIANT CATALOG lists all records of all manufacturers. Over 300 labels with discounts from 33⅓% to 75% — Over 30,000 albums — CLASSICAL, instrumental and vocal—POPULAR, vocal and instrumental — JAZZ — FOLK — SOUNDTRACKS, Broadway and Hollywood—SPOKEN WORD—ROCK-n' ROLL—COMEDY—RHYTHM [illegible] BLUES—COUNTRY [illegible] WESTERN—DANCING—LISTENING ...

[illegible] LAST! A RECORD CLUB [illegible] NO "OBLIGATIONS"—ONLY BENEFITS!

This is the way YOU want it — a record club with no strings attached! Ordinary record clubs make you choose from just a few labels — usually their own labels! They make you buy 5, 6, or more records [illegible] year (at full price!) to fulfill your "obligation". And, if you forget to return their monthly card — they send you a record you don't want, and a bill for $5.00 or $6.00!

But Record Club of America Ends All That!

Now you can choose any LP ... on any label. Take as many, or [illegible] few, or no records at all if you so decide. And you get discounts of at least 33⅓% — and often up to 75% — on every album! That means you buy all $3.79 and $3.98 LP's at $2.39; $4.79 and $4.98 LP's at $2.99; and $5.79 and $5.98 LP's at just $3.69, plus a small charge for postage and handling. To join, mail coupon with check or money order for $5. This entitles you to LIFETIME MEMBERSHIP in Record Club of America —and you never pay another club fee!

Look What You Get Immediately by Return Mail

(1) LIFETIME MEMBERSHIP CARD, which guarantees you LP albums at dealer cost ... guarantees you discounts of at least 33⅓% — and as high [illegible] 75% — on every record you buy!

(2) FREE 300-page Schwann Catalog to pick your records from. The Schwann Catalog is [illegible] independent publication listing all LP's available. Over 300 different labels, over 30,000 albums.

(3) DISC®, the Club's FREE magazine which [illegible]ularly supplements Schwann's listings and keeps you informed of extra money saving "double-discount" specials.

Your order is PROCESSED SAME DAY we get it! No long waits. No monthly cards to return, so you are never shipped unordered records. Every record GUARANTEED brand new, first quality, factory fresh! You must be completely satisfied — or every record fully returnable!

Money Back Guarantee

If you aren't convinced our discounts are as big [illegible] we say (check us to the penny on this!) ... that our range of selections is the biggest anywhere (over 30,000 albums every month!) ... or even if you've simply changed your mind—return all items within 10 days and your membership fee will be refunded promptly and in full!

Over 600,000 music lovers—plus leading schools, libraries and other budget-wise institutions—now save money this sensible way through the only record club with no strings attached! Join now and save. Mail coupon to: Record Club of America, 1285 East Princess Street, York, Pa. 17405.

Your membership entitles you to buy or offer gift memberships to friends, relatives, neighbors for only $2.50 each with full privileges. You can even split the total: Your membership and one gift membership divided equally brings the cost down to $3.75 each. The more gift members you get—the more you save! See coupon for your big savings.

RECORD CLUB OF AMERICA
1285 East Princess Street, X 857-C
York, Pennsylvania 17405

Yes! Send FREE Schwann Catalog, DISC®, and LIFETIME MEMBERSHIP CARD. Enclosed is $5, which entitles me to buy any LP in the Schwann Catalog or DISC® at discounts of at least 33⅓% and [illegible] high as 75%, plus [illegible] small postage and handling charge. I may take as many or as few, or no records at all. No yearly "quota". I may, for any reason, return items within 10 days for full refund of membership fee!

☐ Yes! Add ______ GIFT MEMBERSHIPS at $2.50 each to my request. Send to names and addresses on attached sheet.

I enclose $__________ covering my $5 lifetime membership and any gift memberships at $2.50 each.

Print Name____________________

Address____________________

City__________State__________Zip______

Over 600,000 enthusiastic members including schools, libraries and other institutions.

ALL ORDERS PROCESSED SAME DAY RECEIVED. ALBUMS COME TO YOU FACTORY FRESH. YOUR SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR ALL ALBUMS FULLY RETURNABLE.

OCT 17

CONSUMERS OF THE RIVER WENDELL BERRY

THE NATION

OCTOBER 17, 1966 35 cents

WARMING UP FOR NOV. 8

ILLINOIS: A Boy Wonder Grows Up
PETER M. DEUEL

CALIFORNIA: Barbecues & Other Trivia
GLADWIN HILL

NEW YORK: The Donkey Beats Himself
JAMES DESMOND

LITERATURE OF THE HOLOCAUST

THE NOVELS OF ELIE WIESEL / LAURENCE GOLDSTEIN

THE FIXER by Bernard Malamud / DONALD FANGER

IN MY FATHER'S COURT by I. B. Singer / JULES CHAMETZKY

THE INVESTIGATION by Peter Weiss / HAROLD CLURMAN

BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY

LETTERS

coincidence

Chamblee, Ga.
DEAR SIRS: The article "The Campus Scare Campaign" by William Wingfield [The Nation, Sept. 12] contains a very serious factual error. I refer to Mr. Wingfield's reference to Young Americans for Freedom as "a Birch Society affiliate." . . . If Mr. Wingfield were as fond of research as he is of throwing mud, he would find that YAF has absolutely nothing to do with the John Birch Society. Charles Flynn

Covina, Calif.
DEAR SIRS: The California subcommittee on Un-American Activities specifically identifies the Young Americans for Freedom as a Birch front. Members of the YAF advisory board include John Rousselot, the Birch Society national public relations director; Dean Clarence Manion, member of the Birch Society National Council, and Edgar Hiestand, former Birch Congressman from California.

At one time, one of the top YAF officials in California was Robert Gaston, who calls himself a "Rousselot-Republican." In my home town, the Young Americans for Freedom hold their meetings in the Birch Society's local bookstore. I personally know several Birchers who also admit membership in the Young Americans for Freedom.

For a group that claims it has no connection with the John Birch Society, the Young Americans for Freedom seems to have more than its share of Birch leaders. William Wingfield no ban

Kalamazoo, Mich.
DEAR SIRS: Mr. Wingfield discusses Loeffler's boast that students at Western Michigan defied their "leftist professors" by reading None Dare Call It Treason. . . . No teacher on Western's campus told students they could not read the book. None of my colleagues are naive enough to believe they can control what a student reads on his own, nor do they wish to. Only fear-peddler Loeffler who embraces totalitarian methods would impute them to others. . . .

Lynwood H. Bartley, Broadcasting Dept.
Western Reserve University

thorn of the Tribune

Brooklyn, N. Y.
DEAR SIRS: The anti-labor image painted by James G. Smart in "Death of the Herald Tribune" [The Nation, Sept. 26] will leave most liberal non-Tribune readers with the impression that its demise is small loss. The opposite, of course, is the truth. . . . The Trib, whatever one may have thought of its editorial page, served an extremely important function: it kept The New York Times honest in its news columns. Anyone following news from Vietnam, for example, was immediately struck by the change in coverage by the Times when dispatches to the Trib no longer threatened news beats, and the Trib's small Washington bureau was constantly able to come up with items that kept the larger Times bureau on its toes. In city news the last couple of years was a period of crusading reporting which heavily contributed to Lindsay's election as mayor.

During this period when everyone attempts to manage the news and the Times is probably the single most important source of the news, it was particularly important to the reading public that the Trib's thorn be in the Time's saddle.

(Continued on page 388)

EDITORIALS

Mr. Johnson's Problem

One of the staples of political commentary these days is that the President of the United States, by all odds the most powerful of world leaders, is not trusted, either by his own people or by foreigners. The most crucial aspect of this distrust is in relation to Vietnam. The President is represented as being seriously interested in a negotiated settlement, and unable to understand why there is so much skepticism about his position. It is not much of a puzzle.

Any President, any ruler, must be something of a manipulator, something of a conniver, in order to do his job. Friend and foe alike expect as much. Mr. Johnson's trouble is that he has carried intrigue too far, so that the gap between his words and his actions has widened beyond acceptable limits. The glaring example, of course, is Johnson the candidate, a moderate vis-à-vis Vietnam in contrast to the firebrand Goldwater, and Johnson elected, acting as the voters had assumed Goldwater would act—or worse. After that, why should any reasonably critical person accept the President's protestations at face value?

Skepticism is the more justified because the President has continued on a course of pretense and deception and seems to be incapable of handling the burdens of his office in any other fashion. Consider the stage setting for the upcoming Manila session. Ambassador Goldberg launches still another peace offensive at the UN, differing only in microscopic detail from previous manifestos. President Marcos of the Philippines comes to Washington, is given a big reception and a big loan, and takes his turn at the UN. No sooner is Marcos out of the country than Mr. Johnson "accepts" an invitation to fly to Manila in the cause of peace. The Asian participants in this confabulation will all be client states of this country, dependent on us for arms and money. So constituted, it must look in Hanoi more like a war conference than a peace conference, and Mr. Johnson must look no more trustworthy than in the past. The stage management is so clumsy that Americans, except for the most sheeplike, can hardly be taken in either.

The original date for this gathering of the anti-Communist alliance was October 18. Could this timing have anything to do with domestic politics? What with Mr. Johnson's popularity slipping, it could indeed. It would put him precisely where he wants to be between the end of the World Series, when Americans will again have time for problems of state, and the November 8 election. The trip would dominate the news while Mr. Johnson and entourage are en route, while they are in Manila, and when they are back in Washington for the report to the Congress, press conferences, and the speculations of the commentators as to what is behind it all. The political implications of the trip as originally projected were in fact so palpable that the President felt compelled, as criticism mounted, to expand the itinerary so as to give the appearance of a broader purpose. But note that the schedule has been delayed slightly, so that live television coverage via satellite can be set up. There is altogether too much showmanship involved to allow much hope that a serious attempt at a settlement is really in prospect.

No doubt the President would like to secure a settlement—on his own terms. His role as an impresario reveals the carrot-and-stick strategy which has marked his previous promotions. Goldberg offers the carrot at the UN. Even while he pleads for peace, Secretary McNamara announces a hike in the purchase of combat aircraft. The President goes to Manila, ostensibly in the cause of peace. McNamara goes on a military mission to Saigon. If all these answers fail, what comes next? The President may boggle at the use of nuclear devices, but the least he will be able to settle for is a tougher war. It will be deferred until after November 8; when it comes, trust in Mr. Johnson will drop still another notch.

Party Politics and Race

The myopic schemers who mastermind the Republican Party sense that they can build an issue around "riots and disorders" by calling for "firmness" (in Birchite nomenclature, "support your local police") and by hinting that "subversion" is responsible for disturbances involving Negroes. Stated bluntly, they are tempted to make race the primary issue. Since they are not willing to take a stand for peace, race better suits their purposes than Vietnam.

To call this cynical is to engage in understatement. It is cynical, sinister and contemptible; it seeks to profit from the streak of racism buried deep in the American psyche—by no means universal, but far from negligible in political potential. Despite this bias, it was possible earlier to rally major support for civil rights in areas outside the South. The Negro vote was pivotal in many big cities in populous states, and liberals, religious groups and fair-minded Americans generally were demanding civil rights action. What made such action relatively easy was that the thrust of civil rights legislation was directed against the South. For Negroes in the North, voting, serving on juries and political equality in general were pretty much taken for granted. Supporting the extension of such rights to Southern Negroes involved no sacrifice for Northern whites.

In 1964, the "white backlash" began to be talked about. The expression originated in the North and reflected Northern irritation at discovering that the Negro aspired not only to political but to economic equality. Until the movement reached this stage, the Northern white community could enjoy race supremacy and feel virtuous at the same time. But when moderate Negro leaders failed to get for the slums the expected benefits, and slum dwellers began to call attention to themselves in the only way that seemed to them still open, a large section of the white community resorted to the standard defense of dominant groups intent on maintaining their dominance. They did not blame themselves, they blamed the victims; the misery of the slums was the slums' own fault.

Thus Time (October 7) expresses its sorrow that the "Negro revolution" is devouring its children. "During a summer of insensate riots and black-power demagoguery," Time editorializes, "the Negro's legitimate struggle for full citizenship sadly lost momentum, while white reaction against Negro excesses continued to mount." This rising white reaction, caught at the flood, is what some GOP leaders see as the party's opportunity. If they seize it and succeed, the

IN THIS ISSUE

October 17, 1966

EDITORIALS

370

ARTICLES

Warming Up for November 8

374 Illinois: A Boy Wonder Grows Up
Peter M. Deuel

377 California: Barbecues and Other Trivia
Gladwin Hill

379 New York: The Donkey Beats Himself
James Desmond

381 Boatmen's Paradox:
Consumers of the River
Wendell Berry

385 The Supreme Court and the Bill of Rights III:
Discovery of Equality
Leo Pfeffer

BOOKS & THE ARTS

389 The Fixer in Another Country
Donald Fanger

390 Survivor's Heritage
Laurence Goldstein

392 In the Shtetl of Bilgoray
Jules Chametzky

393 The Cool of Jakov Lind
Irving Halperin

394 Blood in the Recipe
Curt Leviant

394 Occupant (poem)
David Cornel DeJong

395 Theatre
Harold Clurman

397 Society Column (poem)
William Stafford

398 Night in the Forest (poem)
Galway Kinnell

399 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 12

ultimate cost may appall even them, but their vision does not extend beyond the next election.

The deadly stalemate which could ensue, with violence far exceeding anything experienced heretofore, is already in view. In proportion as the white reflex mounted, the South began to take heart from the fact that the struggle had shifted to the North, and the North was exhibiting Dixie attitudes, with only minor concealments. The Northern backlash has fomented a renewed reaction in the South, of which Lester Maddox, the ax-handle aspirant for the governorship of Georgia, is one symbol, Wallace in Alabama another, Johnson in Arkansas a third, and others sprouting all over. With not more than 3 per cent of the South's Negro children attending integrated schools, the segregationists are making a stand against further integration, even at the token level. The degree to which they have been emboldened is shown by Rep. Mendel Rivers' McCarthyite manhandling of U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe.

Two courageous voices have been heard amid this racist tumult. One was that of Rep. Charles Weltner, who repudiated Maddox at the cost of his own Congressional seat. The other was raised by Governor Nelson Rockefeller of New York, who scornfully dissociated himself from statements by Republican national leaders, including former President Eisenhower, to the effect that the Administration had condoned and encouraged street violence. Responsibility, Mr. Rockefeller said, rested with the mayors of the cities where violence erupted.

If the white blacklash presents an intra-party problem for liberal Republicans, Weltner's dramatic action is almost certain to raise complications for President Johnson. The counsel of caution would be to remain above the battle, but if the Republicans ally themselves with racism, can the President stay aloof while valiant Democrats of less prominence sacrifice their careers to their principles?

How Much for a Life?

It depends, of course, on whose life you are talking about. Until recently, in accordance with a 1929 treaty negotiated by some ninety nations in Warsaw, a passenger killed in the crash of an international airliner was worth $8,290—no more, no less. In 1965, after much pulling and hauling, the International Air Transport Association expressed willingness to raise the indemnity to $50,000 per dead passenger. If, on the other hand, the passenger happened to be a well-heeled businessman on a New York-San Francisco flight, the heirs were more fortunate; a jury might go as high as $500,000 in its evaluation of this extinguished life.

But these are all Caucasian lives, and among them American lives have the greatest cash value. For Asian lives, the American Government has another standard. When a Vietnamese civilian is killed by misdirected U.S. air attacks—a not unusual occurrence—the surviving family (if any) is awarded $34. This is quite in line with other calculations of the South Vietnamese government, the U.S. Defense Department and other U.S. agencies. Refugees from our air attacks who seek survival in camps in areas free of the Vietcong are granted an allowance of 9c a day. The United States is a rich country, but frugal withal—except in killing, where no expense is spared and no cost is too great.

The bargain-basement valuation of Asian life may have some connection with General Eisenhower's counsel that we should not rule out the use of nuclear weapons in Vietnam. Next to biological warfare, which has not yet been perfected, atomic warfare is the least expensive means of wiping out a hostile population. We would not even have to pay the $34 indemnity.

'New Politics' in California

From West Virginia to California groups are beginning to organize with an eye to independent political action. The Nation is in thorough sympathy with the impulse behind this widespread and growing demand for a "new politics," given an impetus by the surprising number of "peace candidates." Indeed, we voiced the demand long before the National Conference for a New Politics was organized ("Time for a New Politics" by Carey McWilliams; The Nation, May 26, 1962). Maddox vs. Callaway in Georgia, and Tower vs. Carr in Texas, are not choices but cruel echoes.

Today it is all too clear that the malfunctioning of the two-party system is creating a dangerous national mood of bitterness, frustration, anger and deep concern. Not surprisingly, the demand for independent action is strongest in California where party structures are notoriously weak and where "peace candidates" have fared better than elsewhere. At the moment, the state has the largest potential constituency for a "new politics."

But merely to give vent to the existing frustration is not necessarily the best way to set a "new politics" in motion.

Consider, for example, the recent State-wide Conference on Power and Politics in Los Angeles. (See page 377 of this issue.) The impressive turn-out — 2,089 delegates — clearly reflects the existing annoyance with the sad state of our politics and our parties. By an estimated margin of 60 to 40 (there were no roll-call votes), the delegates voted to boycott both Reagan and Brown. Since the prime purpose of the conference seemed to be to proclaim a hex on Brown, the effect of the action was to divide the potential constituency for a "new politics."

Across town, another group, "State of the Future Conference for Californians," met for the purpose of endorsing Governor Brown. Speakers included: The Right Reverend James A. Pike, Sen. Edward Kennedy, Harry S. Ashmore, Dr. S. I. Hayakawa and Wallace Stegner. But the appearance of the rival group was merely one of several indications of the divisive effect of the decision to boycott Brown.

At the "new politics" conference, five liberal California Congressmen — Philip Burton, Augustus F. Hawkins, Edward R. Roybal, Don Edwards and George Brown — released a statement endorsing the Governor. The delegates could hardly criticize the voting record of these men, some of whom might be defeated if Reagan were to sweep the state. The AFL-CIO is, of course, supporting Governor Brown, but so is the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union and so is Cesar Chavez's Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee. A few Negroes and Mexican-Americans attended the "new politics" conference, but they could hardly be regarded as spokesmen for their respective groups. Even the liberal intellectuals identified with the Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions were divided; some attended one conference, some the other.

The reason for the division is clear enough. Reagan vs. Brown is not a Hobson's choice like Maddox vs. Callaway or Tower vs. Carr. "We have been critical of the Governor," to quote from the statement of the Agricultural Workers Organizing Committee, "in the past and no doubt will differ with him again in the future. But we would be less than grateful, as farm workers, if we did not now urge his re-election." The lesser-evil argument is tedious and has been grossly abused, but the margin of choice between Brown and Reagan is significant and the outcome can have important national implications. More to the point is the question of the tactical wisdom of raising an issue, late in the campaign, which was certain to divide those who, on almost any reckoning, would necessarily make up the constituency of a "new politics." The boycott will probably not injure Governor Brown's chances — it may improve them — and in the end many of the delegates who shouted approval of it may vote for him. But the question remains: was this the best way or the best time to launch so serious an undertaking as the projection of a "new politics"?

Hidden Ingredient

When the United States Information Agency thinks that a book published in this country should be read by peoples abroad, it will subsidize a foreign edition—paying for the translation and in some cases buying enough copies for free distribution in influential circles to make the venture attractive to the publisher. The job of USIA—an unenviable one these days—is to put America's best foot forward, and supporting books which are thought to further that aim is in principle a legitimate part of the work.

But sometimes USIA cannot find a book that expresses the view it wants aired on a subject it thinks important. Then it becomes more active; it finds a writer, supervises his work (how closely it supervises is a skittish subject with agency personnel) and puts him in touch with a publisher. The foreign edition appears in due course, but often the publisher will also bring out an edition for domestic sale. In such cases, American readers are asked to buy a book which they have, in effect, already paid for through taxes. More important, they are asked to read a work that was commissioned as U.S. propaganda, but the government's hand in the matter is not evident anywhere in the volume.

Until recently, when the House Appropriations Subcommittee became upset by the policy, USIA kept secret the list of books in which it had an interest. Now the titles have been released and in the future cautious readers can presumably ferret out the subsidized books. But that is carrying caveat emptor rather far; in simple honesty, books that are midwived by USIA should have the fact recorded on their title pages. However, that is an aspect of packaging, and packaging, as Congress well knows, is not the most ethical of pursuits. It is more than probable that we shall need a law obliging Praeger (the most active publishing colleague of USIA) and the other participating firms to carry a suitable notice when works they distribute at home are feedbacks from the government's overseas public relations.

The Red Paint Incident

The following advertisement appeared recently in the Denver daily press:

"First Unitarian's vandalism insurance policy was canceled last fall by the company which held our insurance. This despite an eight-year record of more than $4,000 paid in premiums and only $1,200 in claims filed for all purposes, not just vandalism. Not a bad profit for any insurance company, you might think. But the company didn't think so.

"What provoked the cancellation was featured on the front pages of the local papers as 'The Red Paint Incident.' Distressed church officials were pictured pointing to the church building walls where vandals had thrown oil-penetrating 'bombs' the night before. We'd rented our facilities—as we have to other 'controversial' community groups —to a group which was pleading the 'Stop the War' cause. Someone apparently didn't like that.

"But we'd rent again for the same cause or to the opposing side. For we believe that truth will not be vanquished as long as reason is left to combat error.

"First Unitarian Church, Richard Henry, Minister."

The Right to Abortion

In the Saturday Evening Post's "Speaking Out" department someone does occasionally speak out—witness Dr. William B. Ober in the October 8 issue on "We Should Legalize Abortion." Dr. Ober asks, "By what right does state or church claim a jurisdiction superior to that of the woman involved in pregnancy? I believe that every woman should be able to have an unwanted pregnancy aborted at her own request, subject only to the consent of her husband and the advice of her physician." Even wider liberalization is advocated by Alice S. Rossi, a research sociologist at the University of Chicago, writing on "Abortion Laws and Their Victims" in the September/October issue of Trans-action. Dr. Rossi's position is that "any woman, whether married or not, should be able to secure a safe abortion, upon her own request, at a reasonable fee, in a licensed hospital by a licensed and competent physician."

Such views are prevalent among the educated and sexually permissive, but will the general public support abortion reform? Approval must be unequivocal or state legislators (each state being sovereign in this field) will consider the issue too hot to handle. But actually it is hot on only one side. The National Opinion Research Center of the University of Chicago scanned a representative sample of nearly 1,500 adult Americans in December, 1965, and found that 71 per cent favored legal abortion where the woman's own health is endangered, 56 per cent where she is pregnant as a result of rape, and 55 per cent where there is a strong chance of serious defect in the baby. But the percentages were abruptly reversed for the mother of a low-income family that could not afford more children or when the woman did not want to marry the man by whom she had conceived, or if, being married, she simply did not want any more children. The maximum favorable response in these categories was 21 per cent.

Judging by this survey, Americans are willing to sacrifice the fetus for the sake of the mother's health or to spare her anguish for which she is in no way responsible, but they do not hold with the abortion-on-demand principle approached in the Japanese Eugenic Protection Law of 1948. Where the conventions are involved, they still favor punitive motherhood: an unmarried prospective mother, for instance, must embark on a high-risk marriage, or go through the pregnancy and put the child up for adoption, or bear and rear an illegitimate child. The majority will neither tolerate abortion as a last-resort birth-control measure nor recognize the absolute right of a woman to decide whether or not she wishes to bear a child.

Estimates of the number of illegal abortions performed annually range from 250,000 to more than 1 million. To make a beginning in cutting down this national disgrace, it would seem best to seek early changes in the abortion laws in conformity with the present state of public opinion, and to allow time for America to catch up with Japan before attempting wider liberalization.

WARMING UP FOR NOVEMBER 8

ILLINOIS

A Boy Wonder Grows Up

PETER M. DEUEL

Mr. Deuel, a reporter for the Chicago Daily News, has been covering city and state politics since 1957.

Chicago

Paul H. Douglas, the senior United States Senator from Illinois, is having thrust upon him an honor that he's doing his best to avoid. It is the right to ride the coattails of President Lyndon B. Johnson, a mode of transportation which most political office seekers admit is hazardous this season. The sponsor of this privilege is Charles H. Percy, the one-time boy wonder of Illinois and national politics who is making an impressive stab at taking from Douglas the Senate seat he has held for eighteen years.

Percy no longer qualifies as a boy wonder; he was 47 on September 27, and two tragedies — one personal and the other professional — have aged him. The more terrible of these was the murder of his 21-year-old daughter, Valerie, on September 18. Those who know this millionaire industrialist well say his enormous reserve of inner strength will enable him to recover from this senseless tragedy and drive on with renewed purpose in the campaign.

The professional tragedy, of less savage importance but nonetheless a part of the new Percy, was the 1964 gubernatorial campaign in which he learned a valuable political lesson: organization is what wins campaigns, not being "right." Percy, like so many other promising Republicans that year, was the victim of another set of coattails, Barry Goldwater's. He lost his race for the governorship by a little more than 170,000 votes, while President Johnson was literally burying Goldwater.

His daughter's death caused him to halt his campaign temporarily (Douglas did likewise), but until the Percy family went into seclusion to try to find strength from their Christian Science beliefs to carry on, Percy had been doing right all the things that he had done wrong before. And Douglas was feeling the pinch of it. He began to attack Percy for his stands on Vietnam and inflation, a tactic the one-time economics professor would normally shun.

But the one issue on which the candidates can find little to disagree, except in method, is civil rights and it is there that Percy is most likely to pick up votes. Chicago has been the Northern focal point for the equal rights drive of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King and his Southern Christian Leadership Conference. Dr. King has moved his headquarters to Chicago, determined to bring Mayor Richard J. Daley to his knees.

Strangely, Percy has made a complete about-face in his stand on the most volatile of the civil rights issues — open housing. Two years ago, when it was not a key political issue, Percy opposed state-wide open occupancy. This year, when the white backlash has reached immense proportions in Chicago, Percy favors it.

Douglas, long a friend of the civil rights movement, must count heavily on the Chicago Negro vote, and the polls show Percy cutting into that usually Democratic bloc. At the same time, although he is considerably more liberal than most of the backlashers would like, Percy seems to be the beneficiary of their bitterness: he is running a good 5 per cent ahead of his last campaign in areas where the reaction to the summer's demonstrations has been strongest.

Recently, the race has been further complicated by the entry, as a write-in candidate, of Robert Subonjian, Mayor of Waukegan. During a two-day riot last August in that northern Illinois city's Negro district, Subonjian referred to the rioters as "scum" and "winos." While his candidacy carries little hope of victory, politicians view him as a magnet for the white backlash vote, most of which seems to be falling to Percy.

Percy has never stopped running for office, any office, since his defeat, and he's broken the rules of politics by trying to carry out some of his campaign pledges even though he lost. Accordingly, he has been popping into and out of the public eye for nearly eighteen months. One of his major projects has been a literacy program that provides illiterates with the equivalent of a sixth-grade reading and writing ability in eight weeks. Percy saw illiteracy as a major cause of the rising number of unemployables and enlisted the aid of a friend, insurance tycoon W. Clement Stone, to finance it. In one year, more than 500 men and women completed the course. Another of his interests has been the New Illinois Committee, a privately supported war-on-poverty organization that engaged in neighborhood organization, slum-improvement projects, employment programs and similar ventures.

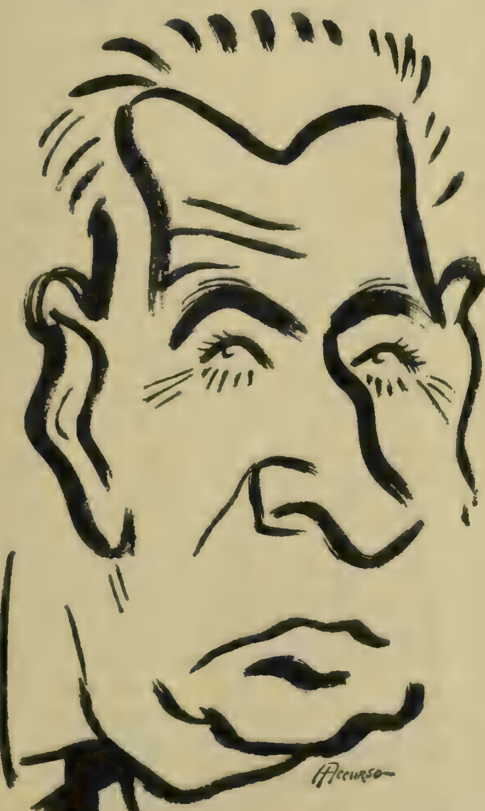
In the course of all this work, Percy matured. He retains much of his boyish good looks, but he has found a new toughness and an ease with people, and he's a lot less naive. Although people still call him Chuck, he shows a lot less of the "gee, whiz" reaction that reduced his stature in 1964. His advisers, most of whom were amateurs and showed it, are closer to being professionals now. They also learned from the bruises of that year.

All of this is telling on Douglas, and reporters covering the 74-year-old Senator's campaign detect a snappishness that reflects his concern. Recently, while stumping the northwest corner of the state. Douglas discovered that a new aide had neglected to put out an advance text of his speech.

"Dammit, man, don't you realize we're in a war?" he yelled at the aide. And a war it is. Percy has hit upon the issues which he thinks will end Douglas' public career: Vietnam and inflation, wrapped in the baleful shadow of Lyndon Johnson.

Not content with criticizing Douglas, Percy has countered with proposals of his own. One such idea, the All-Asian Peace Conference on Vietnam, has won wide attention, even from the President, and Douglas finds himself nearly alone in his opposition to letting Asians meet by themselves on the Vietnamese problems.

The two campaigns provide an interesting contrast. Douglas, although he does not command the grandiose oratory of his Illinois colleague, Everett McKinley Dirksen, still cuts a fine figure on the podium. He has stuck to set speeches as his electioneering mainstay. Percy, who talked too much and listened not enough in 1964, now does little set speaking and a lot of handshaking. The results have been amazing. Those accustomed to seeing him stride aloofly through a crowd after leaving a platform can now watch him munch on picnic fare while surrounded by admirers, or join a folk dance or sign autographs.



Drawings by Accurso

Paul H. Douglas

Percy is also trying to make something of his age advantage, but is having only limited success because Douglas shows remarkable vigor. When Percy recently went swimming in a chilly Lake Michigan, Douglas' press aides put out a release reminding voters that their Senator takes a daily one-hour swim for exercise. When Percy did a little chain dance at an Assyrian picnic and got his picture taken kicking his heels, Douglas the next day was photographed kicking a football off a tee to open a political rally. Though silver-haired, Douglas hasn't grayed much around the intellect. He is still a master campaigner and can talk about John Stuart Mill with a downstate farmer and a university professor and pull off both conversations.

Although Percy is not belittling Douglas, he does make it seem as though he were a little sorry for him. "I like to pretend I'm a Chicago precinct captain," Percy told a visitor recently. "Why should I go for Paul Douglas? What's Douglas ever done for me? Besides, why remind the voters about Vietnam and the cost of living by bringing up a Lyndon Johnson man when I can stick to the local candidates. Look at the fix I'm in." That fix is Douglas' reputation for political independence, which he has had to forgo this time around in favor of closer links with Mayor Daley's organization.

Paul Douglas has been the Democrats' best vote getter in history. In 1948, a professor from the University of Chicago and former Chicago alderman, he was put up with another prominent Illinoisan, Adlai Stevenson, as Democratic reform candidates for Senator and Governor. The man who engineered this coup — both candidates won sweeping victories — was Jacob Arvey, the Illinois National Democratic committeeman and Chicago powerhouse. Arvey has since become little more than a figurehead because Daley runs things his own way.

There are those who predict that Percy will one day be a national candidate and, knowing the determination of the one-time camera company president, few will take bets against it. But he has to make it past the Senate race first, and he finds it hard to rid himself entirely of that "gee, whiz" image brought on last time by the romantic bewilderment that overpowered his whole campaign team at the thought of big-league politics.

Percy is a millionaire now, but there were many days during the depression when his parents had no money. His father was a bank official who felt a moral responsibility to help repay losses his bank incurred when it failed, even though he had no legal responsibility.

Percy worked his way through the University of Chicago and held a number of jobs including one campus-based business that grossed $150,000 a year. He also worked part-time for Bell & Howell, and became a friend of its president. After college he joined the camera firm and became its president at the age of 29, one of the youngest corporate heads in the United States. In fifteen years, he took the firm from a moderate-income operation to a gigantic business with international operations. During all this time he was active in Republican circles and helped with both fund raising and platform writing on a national level. He became good friends with then President Dwight D. Eisenhower, a closeness that lasts to this day.

Percy served in the Navy during World War II. Douglas, although 50 at the time, managed to wangle an enlistment in the Marine Corps, and after pulling more strings saw action in the Pacific. During one of his encounters, he was wounded and lost the use of his left arm.

The tempo of Douglas' junket through northwestern Illinois took a strong upswing when his attractive wife joined the team. She is an extremely effective speaker with the women's groups and accompanies her husband whenever she can. Percy's campaign has a lot more hooray to it. He frequently travels with the Perquettes, a group of handsome teen-age girls who wear red, white and blue uniforms and pass out campaign literature. And he can be sure that his advance men will turn out a crowd. Even a labor rally in downstate Sparta, which should have been more a Douglas venture, got him 5,000 welcomers and a warm response. Despite loud-speaker advance announcements, one street-corner appearance by Douglas netted him six people in a Negro neighborhood of Moline, a thriving industrial city on the Illinois-Iowa border.

Douglas is stuck with a campaign theme — "you never had it so good"—that does little to stir up the voters. People, he says, are bringing home fatter pay checks. The economy is booming. Opportunities have never been greater.

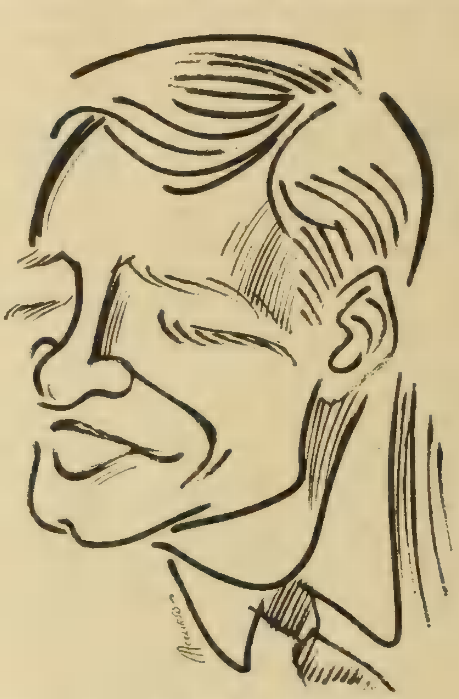
To this Percy counters: "People don't care how big their pay check is. They want to know what they can bring home with it and it's less these days. Everybody has sort of a gut feeling that things aren't going right. They want to take it out on President Johnson, and since they can't they'll settle for Paul Douglas. And President Johnson is making it easy because he's trying to prove to people he's a good campaign aid whether the candidates want his help or not."

The first samples taken by the pollsters seem to show that Percy's analysis of the campaign so far is right. He is apparently running well ahead of his 1964 pace, especially in Chicago, and Douglas is dropping behind previous marks. The polls, as usual, do not yet reflect the power of the Cook County Democratic Committee, which will send its precinct captains out about ten days before election for a blitz. No political organization, or to use Percy's term, machine, works better than Daley's when things get tough.

Another imponderable in this race is the effect of Valerie's death. The polls have shown little sympathy, but many Democratic politicians expect an appreciable reaction on November 8.

These experts also point out that Percy has done the work necessary within his own party to solidify a state Republican organization that was shattered over the Goldwater issue. In 1964, Percy set up his own state-wide organization through a citizens' group. The regular Republican organization, a Goldwater captive, was at best lukewarm to Percy, and he in turn straddled the Goldwater fence, satisfying neither side in that battle. This year, Percy is relying on State Central Committeeman Victor Smith to operate the downstate campaign and is managing only Cook County himself.

Percy's campaign manager, Thomas Houser, a suburban political leader, says the campaign is short of funds. Douglas, on the other hand, is said to have a fat bank roll because of union support. Percy cannot himself spend more than $25,000 on his own campaign and will probably spend less because he intends only to match the largest contributor, and it is a fact of political life that big donors fight shy of Senatorial campaigns. Governors can pay back through political favors a lot faster than can Senators.



Charles H. Percy

Paul Douglas is a tough man in a fight, and he has going for him something that is impossible to measure on the political dope sheet: his reputation for honesty. One suburban shopper expressed it when she said: "Chuck Percy is all right but Paul Douglas is the most honest politician in the state. It seems a shame to have to turn out a man of his caliber to elect Percy."

And some of the big guns in Douglas' arsenal have yet to take the stage. What effect will the appearance of Senators Robert and Edward Kennedy have on the campaign in a state where passion for the Kennedys runs high? The late John F. Kennedy felt that Daley elected him President by squeaking him through in Illinois. Can Daley do it again for Paul Douglas?

Republicans doubt that Daley can turn the trick this time. And the chorus of GOP hacks who cautioned Percy not to take on Illinois' most powerful vote getter has stopped its moaning and is beginning to jockey for position. They smell an upset in the making and want a piece of it. But considering Percy's abhorrence of party hacks, the piece they stand to get will be contemptuously small.

CALIFORNIA

Barbecues and Other Trivia

GLADWIN HILL

Mr. Hill is head of The New York Times Los Angeles news bureau.

Los Angeles

If candor reigned in politics, Californians of both parties might well be driving around with bumper strips reading: "The Only Ism For Me Is Negativism." As the campaign for governor plods into its final weeks, the axiom that people vote against things rather than for them is getting a notable workout.

The trouble is that Californians, by and large, are prosperous beyond precedent. The basic indices — production, employment, wages — are at record levels; migration into the state continues almost unslackened, infusing plasma into the economy. The politician's traditional shadow play of a Promised Land becomes an exercise in lily gilding, and there's nowhere for people or politicians to turn, except to carping.

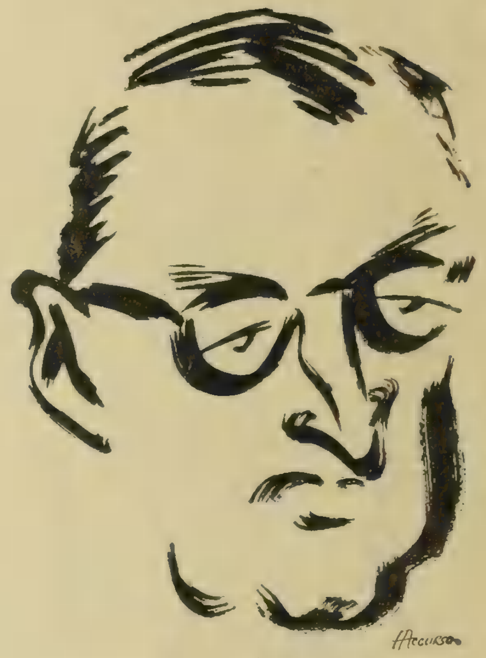
Ronald Reagan has been busy trying to prove statistically that California has more of everything bad, from "crime" (does that mean overtime parking or homicides?) to Dutch elm disease. Governor Brown, having had to present his "Promised Land" spectacular in 1958, and again in 1962, finds that this year's edition plays to cold audiences. So he has taken to knocking his Republican opponent on every available count from the actor's Birchite friends to his often inaccurate Hollywood-and-Vine notions of what, where and how things operate in California.

California's 7 million voters have done little to animate this barren scene. Their most acute concern, according to all professional soundings, is "high taxes" — a complaint that has lacked novelty since the Boston Tea Party. The rival candidates dutifully deplore the high taxes, but when they are asked — and they are repeatedly asked — how they would reduce them, all that comes out is double talk. When a state's overhead has reached $4.6 billion a year, it is obvious that sizable economies can be made only by abolishing basic services, and no candidate dares propose that. The one state activity that the public feels it could dispense with, surveys consistently show, is the nebulous category called "welfare," which consumes more than $1 billion a year. But to voters, "welfare" connotes an undeserving relief recipient, while in the state budget it includes such fixtures as prisons, hospitals and mental health clinics. The result is more rhetorical shadowboxing.

The exercise in futility is conducted at an exhausting pace. One recent day found Mr. Reagan flying 400 miles from his Los Angeles home to successive rallies on a Vallejo street corner, at the Yountville Veterans' Home and at the Krug winery in St. Helena — topped off by a barbecue at Yuba City. Simultaneously, Governor Brown was visiting the John F. Kennedy Grammar School at Daly City, addressing a Democratic businessmen's luncheon club at San Mateo, attending a Mexican-American reception at San Jose, and finally starring at a "Re-Elect Governor Brown" banquet at Palo Alto.

The Brown organization is much more massive, professional and smooth working than the Reagan team, hastily assembled from such varied sources as the Goldwater, Rockefeller, Nixon and Murphy campaigns. One day recently the Reagan headquarters was bottling up as top secret the advance text of a Reagan speech, hours after Brown scouts had procured a copy and were cranking out assorted rejoinders.

The present administration finds itself hoist with its own good works. Brown's private-opinion polls show that thousands of voters, who four or eight years ago were marginal blue-collar workers and wedded to the Democratic cause, now have "arrived"; they own homes, boats and maybe even white collars. Suddenly they're conservatives, deploring taxes and concerned lest a Negro move in down the street.



Edmund G. Brown

The Brown forces started the campaign committed to the Rumford fair-housing act, which they had campaigned for in 1963. Reagan at first advocated repeal. Recent surveys have shown a division of 33 per cent for, 43 per cent against the act; and meanwhile both sides have altered their positions. Reagan now favors "revision"; Brown wants a commission to study "possible revision."

This is a good example of how California's historically "bipartisan" electorate, unpolarized because of singularly weak party structures, vitiates issues. Each party must seek votes from the other side. Consequently, any question that threatens to separate sheep from goats, or Republicans from Democrats, is frantically neutralized by contending candidates to avert any such alarming delineation.

Instead, the voters get such nonpartisan popcorn as Reagan's arm-waving assertions of what "I as governor" would do about the University of California. Neither he nor any governor is going to do anything about the university, beyond appointing an occasional regent, unless the state constitution is amended. Constitutionally the university is a corporation as autonomous as General Motors, and beholden only to the legislature for operating money.

Ronald Reagan

Such air kicking has presumably contributed to Reagan's decline in the ratings from an 18 per cent edge after the June primaries to approximately even standing with Governor Brown in September. Reagan has been projecting himself fairly mellifluously in set appearances crafted by his handlers; but the old ham urge to top the script with adlibs keeps tripping him. To date, remarks he has ventured about various phases of state government have evoked formal, official contradictions on matters of fact from the State Resources Agency, the state health and welfare administrator, the state Savings and Loan Commissioner and the University of California administration. But for all that, he's a fresh face. Brown has been prominent on the California horizon so long that when he speaks it's an event hardly less novel than the sunrise.

The negative quality of the campaign is emphasized by the remarkable number of notables on both sides who for one reason or another prefer to stay in the shadows. Pierre Salinger, a symbol of Democratic Party cleavage in 1964, has modestly confined himself to raising money. The Kennedy-oriented Tom Braden, the Oceanside publisher, and Lloyd Hand, Mr. Johnson's recent expert on protocol, who in May were equating California's salvation with their abortive efforts to displace Lieutenant Governor Glenn Anderson, have since been invisible. The powerful Assembly Speaker Jesse Unruh, whose "old pro" faction was defeated by a liberalish rank-and-file junta when it ran Mrs. Carmen Warschaw for Democratic state chairman, has given little public indication of whether he favors Brown or Reagan. Mrs. Warschaw and her coterie have been spurning reconciliation overtures from Governor Brown, who supported her, but not, she complained, vigorously enough. National Committeeman Eugene Wyman has avoided the limelight because of long-time hostilities with the Unruh-Warschaw axis and with Mayor Samuel Yorty, whose 900,000 anti-Brown primary votes the Democrats are wooing anxiously. Yorty himself, with his eye on support for a 1968 Senate race against Sen. Thomas Kuchel, is affecting such sedulous neutrality that he will view the November 8 election from the vantage point of Tokyo. The California Democratic Council, the state-wide federation of local Democratic clubs that claims to be the main voice of the party rank and file, has been kept in the background so that its liberal leanings would provide a minimal target for Reaganites trying to depict it as the left-wing counterpart of the Birch Society.

On the Republican side, Senator Kuchel, the California GOP's top-ranking figure, is viewing Reagan's race in studied silence on the Potomac. Former Governor Goodwin Knight has remained as elusive as he was in 1962 when his bête-noire, Richard Nixon, was running. Former Sen. William F. Knowland, Brown's 1958 rival, has been similarly silent. Only San Francisco's George Christopher, the forlorn "moderate" entry whom Reagan defeated in June, has spoken out, in recent days. In effect, he spoke on Brown's behalf by needling Reagan as to whether he would support Senator Kuchel in 1968. Reagan's chilly response has been that it would be improper for him to indicate a preference in advance of the 1968 primary.

Constant jibes about his refusal to repudiate the Birch Society finally impelled Reagan to declare the subject — as Richard Nixon in 1960 declared the mysterious Howard Hughes loan — out of bounds, but this has scarcely stopped the Democrats from harping on it. Governor Brown recently sent a tongue-in-cheek telegram of welcome to Nixon, who was on a speaking trip to California, noting that in 1962 Nixon repudiated the Birch Society, and imploring him to prevail on Reagan to do the same.

Columns of space and hours of air time have been spent in vacuous debate on whether the two rivals were wittingly or unwittingly parties to racially restrictive covenants (inoperative for some years) on their dwellings. This disputation was eclipsed in due course by a furor over the propriety of State Republican Chairman Gaylord Parkinson's enjoying a $30,000 well-wishers' subsidy fund, similar to the Nixon $18,000 fund of 1952.

"Brown only talks about me; he won't discuss the issues," Reagan complained on a recent telecast — ignoring the fact that in Democratic eyes Reagan himself is the main issue: his right-wing past and his questionable qualifications for the state's top executive office. Indeed, the burden of Reagan's offensive is to attack Brown's competence. To which the plump, bespectacled Governor's essential response is to gulp incredulously and point to the state of California, still in place and growing.

The candidates have steered clear of Vietnam, since strong pro-Administration sentiment in California makes any criticism a possible vote loser. However, anti-Viet militants had their say over the October 1 weekend, when the New Left staged a two-day conference at Los Angeles attended by several thousand—many of them expense-paid representatives of underprivileged sectors of the state. Prime movers of the conference were the national New Politics co-chairmen, Julian Bond and Simon Casady; the Ramparts magazine hierarchy, and a covey of staff members of Santa Barbara's Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions (which itself had no connection with the assemblage).

The keynote of the conference was: "Don't vote for either Brown or Reagan: both represent outworn, reactionary political mechanisms. Let's look ahead to constructive, humanitarian, opportunistic radicalism, unformalized as a third party—yet." This view, well publicized in advance, occasioned a schism among intellectuals. Harry Ashmore and Episcopal Bishop James A. Pike of the Center staff, among others, threw their weight with a concurrent, rival conference on "The State of the Future" promoted by Brown people to neutralize the New Left manifestation. It drew a comparable attendance across town for a one-day meeting, salted with such luminaries as the Governor himself and touring Senator Ted Kennedy.

Bishop Pike took time out from the pro-Brown gathering to try to dissuade the New Left meeting from its boycott idea. His sentiments persuaded several hundred of the New Left participants to walk out; they were for the most part white-collar liberals and Marxists attuned to explicit political action.

Among the New Left activists were five of the "peace" candidates rejected in last June's Democratic primary. On the Congressional front, indications are that California's solidly gerrymandered districts will produce no more than the change of an odd seat or two in the present 24 to 14 Democratic-Republican line-up.

Amid a cacaphony of trivia, electoral sentiment in California has moved into the familiar, cryptic, head-in-the-shell, penultimate phase when no one is sure what the voters may finally do. Neither candidate has yet conspicuously preempted the "nice-guy" role — the defensive, put-upon exponent of stability, holding at bay a disruptive rock thrower — that is often decisive in California contests.

NEW YORK

The Donkey Beats Himself

JAMES DESMOND

Mr. Desmond, a political writer for the New York Daily News, is the author of Nelson Rockefeller (Macmillan).

Albany

The New York gubernatorial campaign in these critical October weeks is running true to form — all is confusion. The Democrats, who put up the colorless Queens County District Attorney, Frank D. O'Connor, at their convention last month are dismayed, dispirited and, as of this writing at least, broke. The Republicans, gradually moving toward some sort of togetherness because of Nelson A. Rockefeller's rebound from the low his popularity hit last year, are still bedeviled by factionalism and the conflicting national ambitions of Rockefeller, Sen. Jacob K. Javits and Mayor John V. Lindsay of New York City. And the Liberal Party, which was euchred by Alex Rose and David Dubinsky, its elder statesmen, into nominating the somewhat shopworn Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., is so fragmented that it may well lose the third line on the election machines — a line it has profitably exploited for patronage, by trading with both major parties, for more than twenty years.

Only the Conservatives are showing anything like unity. Still feeling the momentum of the substantial vote polled by William F. Buckley, Jr., in last year's New York City mayoralty election, they are bidding to dislodge the Liberals from third place among the state parties with a platform somewhat to the right of Barry Goldwater and an evident, but unexpressed, solicitation of the "white backlash" vote. Whether Paul Adams, the obscure upstate college dean who heads the Conservative ticket, will be able to draw votes as did the puckish Buckley last year is a big question. Buckley, incidentally, couldn't be the nominee, a role he probably would have relished, because he moved back to New York from Connecticut only last year and there is a five-year residency requirement for governor.

The Democrats are in the deepest trouble and, as usual, their troubles are all out in public. Neither Robert Kennedy nor Robert Wagner approved the nomination of O'Connor, and while they are now co-chairmen of his campaign, their fervor at this point can best be described as tepid. The fact that Kennedy pushed his own candidate, Eugene Nickerson, the Nassau County executive, until the cause proved hopeless — and even then refused a kind word for the nominee until after the September 7-8 convention — still rankles in the O'Connor camp. And Wagner made no friends at the convention by quietly putting out word that he was available if anybody was interested. Moreover, neither Kennedy nor Wagner did anything to prevent the so-called convention "uprising" that snatched the nomination for lieutenant governor from the preferred Orin Lehman, with his famous name and ready access to campaign money in the board rooms of New York City finance, and gave it to Howard Samuels, the upstate industrialist who was O'Connor's only remaining opponent when the convention opened. Additionally, Wagner waited three full weeks after the convention before coming out for O'Connor, and when he did so his phrases suggested duty more than pleasure.

The upstate people are still to be mollified. Within a week after he accepted second place, Samuels publicly criticized O'Connor in an airport interview. And Frank Sedita, of Buffalo, who confidently expected to be named for lieutenant governor after the important Erie County delegation switched to O'Connor, felt he was jobbed, although he grabbed at the chance to run for attorney general.

In fact, the only one on the Democratic ticket who was not embroiled was the state's strongest Democratic vote getter, Comptroller Arthur Levitt. Considered unbeatable for his office, Levitt was routinely nominated for a fourth term, but he was never seriously considered for the top spot.

All this was in September, when Democratic hopes were soaring on the notoriously erratic summer polls that showed any Democrat could beat Rockefeller. (Why experienced politicians give credence to such polls must always remain a puzzle.) Now in October everything is changed. Rockefeller has been gaining since mid-August and now must be rated even money, or better, to win a third term.

Nelson A. Rockefeller

Not that the Republicans are without their troubles. Although there was no sign of dissension at their dull convention, also held September 7-8, neither was there any enthusiasm until the final session when Rockefeller's magnetism lifted the delegates to their feet with his acceptance speech. The scene recalled 1958, when a disgruntled Republican convention dutifully nominated Rockefeller and caught fire only when he was first presented on the platform.

But the Republican troubles, as always, are more subtle and far less publicized than the Democratic squabbles. First, there is the hard core of upstaters, conservatives all, who tried last winter to get Senator Javits to run against Rockefeller for the nomination and fired him up to the point where he made a state tour to count delegates before realizing that his cause was dead. This bloc would never go Democratic, and few are likely to stray as far right as the Conservative Party. But going fishing on Election Day is an old GOP tradition north of the city line, and it worries the Rockefeller campaign managers. This worry is ameliorated somewhat by reports that GOP legislative candidates, who ran the other way when asked to pose with Rockefeller last year for the special legislative election, now clamor to be at his side when he reaches their home grounds.

More complex is the matter of personal ambitions. Few around him doubt that Rockefeller, despite statements to the contrary, will be right back in the 1968 Presidential picture if he wins a third term. The disclaimers, in fact, are accepted as political necessities in a state election year and not to be taken seriously. A defeat would of course make the whole question academic.

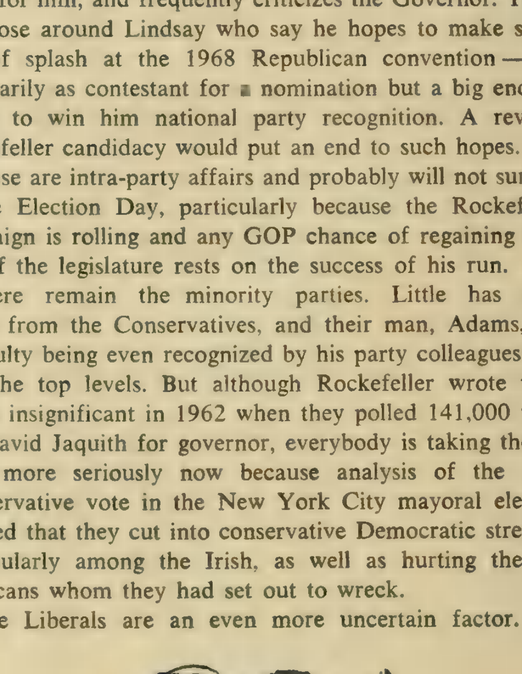
But Rockefeller on the national scene in 1968 would all but doom Senator Javits' very apparent hope of winning second place on the ticket. With Rockefeller in control of the delegation and personally involved, Javits would have no leverage for seeking the nomination for Vice President. This has created a delicate situation. Javits is chairman of the Rockefeller campaign with very little to do about running it, but when he speaks out on policy he often puts his foot in the Governor's mouth — as, for example, his pronouncement that Rockefeller would campaign for the New York City Civilian Police Review Board, a statement that came out on the very day that Rockefeller was declaring he considered the matter a local question.

Then there is the young man in a hurry, Mayor Lindsay. He has given lip service to Rockefeller, but refuses to campaign for him, and frequently criticizes the Governor. There are those around Lindsay who say he hopes to make some sort of splash at the 1968 Republican convention — not necessarily as contestant for a nomination but a big enough splash to win him national party recognition. A revived Rockefeller candidacy would put an end to such hopes.

These are intra-party affairs and probably will not surface before Election Day, particularly because the Rockefeller campaign is rolling and any GOP chance of regaining control of the legislature rests on the success of his run.

There remain the minority parties. Little has been heard from the Conservatives, and their man, Adams, has difficulty being even recognized by his party colleagues outside the top levels. But although Rockefeller wrote them off as insignificant in 1962 when they polled 141,000 votes for David Jaquith for governor, everybody is taking them a little more seriously now because analysis of the 1964 Conservative vote in the New York City mayoral election showed that they cut into conservative Democratic strength, particularly among the Irish, as well as hurting the Republicans whom they had set out to wreck.

The Liberals are an even more uncertain factor. The



Frank D. O'Connor

International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, long the moneybag for Liberal candidates, isn't going to put up money for Junior Roosevelt, which greatly diminishes their influence. And Roosevelt, who introduced the bossism issue into the campaign when he was contesting O'Connor for the Democratic nomination, has failed to start any fires.

The labor situation is highly unusual. Unions representing about 600,000 workers have already pledged themselves to Rockefeller; this represents nearly 30 per cent of labor's claimed membership in the state. Perhaps as many are neutral, and many others have simply avoided disclosing their political plans. The numbers are unimportant. What counts is that labor, which since the days of FDR has (with a few notable exceptions) been wedded to the Democratic Party and which customarily opened its treasuries and furnished the doorbell ringers, won't be on the firing line this time. The blow could be fatal to Democratic hopes.

On balance, therefore, the situation sums up this way: The Republicans, well heeled, with a veteran staff running the campaign, and steadily picking up adherents in the labor unions, look like the winners of the gubernatorial race — barring a wholesale desertion to the Conservative banner.

The Democrats, starved for finances, because big labor unions — most notably the state AFL-CIO — are denying them funds by staying neutral or switching to Rockefeller, are in deep trouble with the road ahead all uphill.

BOATMEN'S PARADOX

CONSUMERS OF THE RIVER

WENDELL BERRY

Mr. Berry is a poet now living in Kentucky. His latest book is The Broken Ground (Harcourt, Brace & World).

We were awakened shortly after sunrise one Sunday morning by a woman's voice imitating a top sergeant over a public-address system. The amplifier was turned up to such volume that the sound seemed to come from all directions. The air was full of it. It could have been heard a mile away. Such a noise blasting into our sleep might have been alarming if it had not been so easy to guess the source: on the night before two cabin cruisers had tied up 100 yards or so downriver from our house, and this was their method of waking up. That morning it had to be our method too.

The P.A. system continued at full volume for maybe two hours: first the woman's strident sergeant imitation, waking up her fellow boatmen, and then radio music. Finally I went down to where the boats were tied and asked that the speaker be turned down, and was told by one of the boatmen: "We didn't know anybody lived around here."

There is no need to repeat all that was said, but the boatman made one other remark that surprised me. When I insisted that he had no right to create such a disturbance, he said: "We're on the river, you know."

I came home shortly after dark one night to see the light of a campfire on the shore of the river below the house, and when I stopped my car I could hear rock'n'roll coming up from a radio. Several men, their boats moored at the shore, were sitting around the fire, drinking and talking, their conversation enclosed in music there as it would have been in a bar. I told them they were welcome, and asked only that they carry off their bottles and other garbage.

One of the men replied: "Why, we're boatmen."

His tone implied that my request was so unnecessary as to be insulting—that boatmen were not only respectful of the river but, as a group, especially respectful of it.

The next morning when I went back the boats were gone, and the rocks were strewn with bottles and with plastic and paper trash. The place had hardly been used, much less respected — it had been perched upon, befouled, ignored.

Our house stands on a slope overlooking the Kentucky River a few miles from its entrance into the Ohio at Carrollton. It has been a long time since this was a "natural river." A system of navigation locks and dams was built in the last century, and the land of the bottoms has been as intensively farmed as any in Kentucky. Yet, for those who know where and how to look, the valley still has a rich natural life. In the summers we see wood ducks and muskrats raising their young along the banks. The great blue heron fishes here. In the woods on the bluffs and around the sloughs there are still enough big trees for pileated woodpeckers to make a living. At night we often hear the awesome family talk of barred owls, or the barking of a fox. Occasionally we see deer. And beavers have begun to appear again on the banks of the river and its bigger tributaries where they were exterminated long before anybody now living can remember.

Here and there on the wooded slopes of the valley are tall open groves of a solemn beauty that keep, as if in a profound interior withheld from the ceaseless drone of engines, a fragment of the great quietness that two centuries ago lay upon the whole valley. The delicate flowers and mosses and ferns and the colorful mushrooms of the woods grow there. The voice of those places is that of the wood thrush, whose notes, without replacing the quiet, flow into it from some hidden perch—and into the hearing of whoever may be there, to attach itself like a clarifying emblem on the memory. In rainy times the streams step noisily and brilliantly down the rocky notches. If one can respond to the quiet of those places with quiet, and with enough attention, the woods will reveal its lives: squirrels and chipmunks leading the eyes into unsuspected places among the treetops and among roots and rocks and fallen logs on the ground; vireos and warblers singing and feeding in the dense foliage; water thrushes searching the edges of rocky pools.

Knowing this valley, once one has started to know it, is clearly no casual matter. Like all country places, it is both complex and reticent. It cannot be understood by passing through. It does not, like Old Faithful, gush up its inwards on schedule so as not to delay the hurrying traveler. Its wonders are commonplace and shy. Knowing them is an endless labor and, if one can willingly expend the labor, an endless pleasure.

I am not sure how one would judge a valley or compare it to any other. I guess that this one must be as attractive as most. To me, because I have been its inhabitant and intimate, it is the most attractive of all. I know that among all the other lives it holds and promises there is the possibility of rich hours and days and lives for people.

I have known this valley all my life. From the first it has been a source of pleasure to me, an object of interest and curiosity, an attraction. Every day I am here I learn more about it, and the more I learn the more clearly I see that my knowledge of it is one of its fragments.

The one part of its history that I have known from the beginning is the pleasure-boat era. Since the end of World War II motorboats have increased from rarity to such prevalence that on summer holidays and weekends the traffic is comparable to that on a highway. There are days when the river will not grow quiet from the wake of one boat before it is disturbed again by the passing of another, and these boats frequently travel in groups of a dozen or two.

The episodes that begin these notes are not typical of the behavior of vacationers on this river. But I think that they are symptomatic, and that they clarify some of the meanings of the boating phenomenon, and I am disturbed by what I think those meanings are.

The generalization that the activities of the boatmen tend to support is that, in relation to the natural world, the pleasure of Americans can be destructive in the same way that their work has already proved to be. It is not, certainly, a conscious destructiveness. But in that very unconsciousness it becomes an aspect of one of our worst national failings: our refusal to admit the need to be conscious. Or to put it more meaningfully: our refusal to admit that unconsciousness, in our time, is almost inevitably destructive.

The destructiveness of the boatmen is of a peculiarly modern kind. It is essentially the same as the destructiveness of certain industries, and it has the same causes: the use of powerful machines, and the discarding of more or less imperishable refuse. The destructiveness of the boatmen differs from that of industry mainly in the sad paradox that the boatmen destroy what they supposedly want to keep. They do not intend to exploit or damage anything. They have come to enjoy the river—and their enjoyment of it damages it. They do not use it as a fisherman uses it, leaving it as it was; they use it as clothing is used, leaving it always a little worse for the wear. They are the consumers of the river.

The aspect of this destructiveness that has attracted most attention, and has finally become the object of a state law, is the dumping of trash into the water. Of all the boating offenses this is certainly the most noticeable, and in many ways it is the most disgusting. An amount of trash that would be a relatively minor eyesore on a highway will deface the river for miles, carried and dispersed on the currents. One Fourth of July, while we ate a picnic on the river bank, we watched a procession of bottles and cans and wadded papers from a lunch being served on a boat a few hundred yards up the shore. That sort of thing can give the open country a feeling of almost urban crowdedness. Much of the refuse that gets into the river is, of course, thrown in from the shores, and washed out of dumps by high water. But there is some that is just as certainly attributable to the boatmen. I have seen, for instance, whole table settings of paper and plastic dishes floating along together.

There is another concern which — because it has apparently received no attention, and because I am not a scientist — I can express only as a question: What effect is the turbulence of all this traffic having on the banks of the river? Of a wide river with gently sloping low banks this question would probably not need to be asked. But the Kentucky is narrow as navigable rivers go, its banks are high and extremely steep, and they are often composed largely of sand. Along such banks there will naturally be a continuous wearing by the current, but I think there is reason to suspect that this natural erosion is now being hastened by the wake of the boats. The waves particularly of the larger boats strike with great force, leaving the water muddy, and the wetted banks more vulnerable to the wake of the next boat. Some of the wearing in the banks seems clearly to have been caused by the lateral action of the waves rather than the longitudinal flowing of the current. And there is some crumbling to be seen along the banks in times of low water, when there is no current but a heavy traffic of boats. Officials in Frankfort have told me that no consideration is being given to this problem. In view of the likelihood that the number of pleasure boats will increase steadily for a long time, it seems to me that some consideration should be given to it.

This worry is hardly a part of the boatman's experience. Speeding along, he has before him a tranquil river scene, peaceful and enticing as if pictured in a tourist brochure. When the shores begin to churn and the water to cloud with mud from the violence of his passing, he is not there.

But not only are the holiday boatmen often careless of the river — they monopolize it. There is no such thing, apparently, as a slow pleasure boat. Even the large, awkwardly shaped houseboats are customarily equipped with powerful engines that send them along at cruiser speeds. When these boats take to the river in weekend numbers the pleasure of motorboating becomes the only possible pleasure. The use of a rowboat is possible, but hardly pleasant; canoeing can even be dangerous. Fishing, from a boat tossing and beating in the turbulence a cabin cruiser can stir up in a narrow stream, is simply impossible. Out on the river in a canoe or rowboat, it would be dangerous to act on the assumption that any approaching motorboat will do the common courtesy of slowing down. It is rare that one will do it. And even courtesy is curiously thwarted by the fact that the violence of the wake of some boats increases as they slow down.

From the confluence of its headwater streams at Beattyville to its mouth at Carrollton, the Kentucky River is 255 miles long. On a summer holiday this much river could accommodate many hundreds of canoes and rowboats and fishermen and swimmers, who could share it quietly and in some isolation from one another — the quiet and the isolation being, I assume, the reasons one would go to a river instead of an amusement park. But a hundred or less of these fast motorboats, evenly distributed over the length of so narrow a river, will produce the effect of crowdedness, fill it with noise, and substantially reduce the pleasure and the safety of everybody else.

But suppose that the river is used not by a hundred of these boats but by several hundred, as it is on summer weekends and holidays. Suppose that some of these boats are broadcasting music or talk over amplifiers, as some do. Suppose some of them carry on their decks men and boys pot shooting with rifles, as they frequently do. It will be seen then, I think, what a disproportionate share of the good of the river is taken by them. It is not that the boatmen want to take so much. It is maybe more troubling to reflect that they take it automatically, thoughtlessly, simply because they go fast and make so much commotion.

There is another destructiveness involved in this sport that is less easy to understand, but which once explained may help to explain the rest. The use of these fast and powerful boats is not only destructive of the river and of the pleasure of other people; there is a sense, it seems to me, in which it is destructive of the pleasure of the boatmen themselves.

I know that if one of these men were asked to justify his sport he would certainly say that there is pleasure in the ownership and use of a fine boat, and that there is a pleasure in speed. I would agree. Some of those boats are indeed beautifully made; I understand the satisfaction there would be in the maintenance and use of one. And I also am a creature of the time and know the pleasure of going fast.

But then another question is suggested: If the handling and speed of the boat are the pleasures sought, then why should these people not be content to go round and round or up and down on a 10-mile course near their dock? Why should boatmen from Cincinnati and Louisville, who have the wide Ohio to maneuver on, come to a comparatively remote stream like the Kentucky that is narrower, crookeder and more difficult?

The only answer I can think of involves another pathetic paradox. They come in search of peace and quiet, solitude, some restorative contact with the natural world. Which is a little like going in search of a forest with a logging crew. Once they get it, they no longer have it. They come to seek the stillness of a natural place, and their way of seeking assures the failure of their search. They seek relief from restlessness and anxiety in these expensive, fast, superhorsepowered boats, which are embodiments of restlessness and anxiety. They go toward their desire with such violence of haste that they can never arrive. They go to the country to rest, only to reproduce there the noise, haste, confusion — and, surely, the frustration — of city traffic.

The boatman's pursuit of pleasure is determined and limited not by his and his family's need but by the size and speed of his boat, and so he takes far more than he needs. It may be that he actually gets less pleasure because of taking so much. And the excess of his pleasure, useless to him, is useless to everybody else. Because he takes too much, he creates the possibility that others will have too little. The boatman, then, has become what more and more seems the ideal man of our society: a super-consumer — which is to say, a waster, a ruiner, a benefit to "the economy," a burden to the world.

The mentality that could support delusions so damaging to itself is strange to the world, alien to creation. It is like a dog that, chasing its own tail, catches it and bites it off. It is both a kind of madness and a kind of unconsciousness, so impenetrable by reason that I could not articulate the questions it raises, much less find answers, until I began to reflect on the two statements of the boatman quoted in the first of these notes.

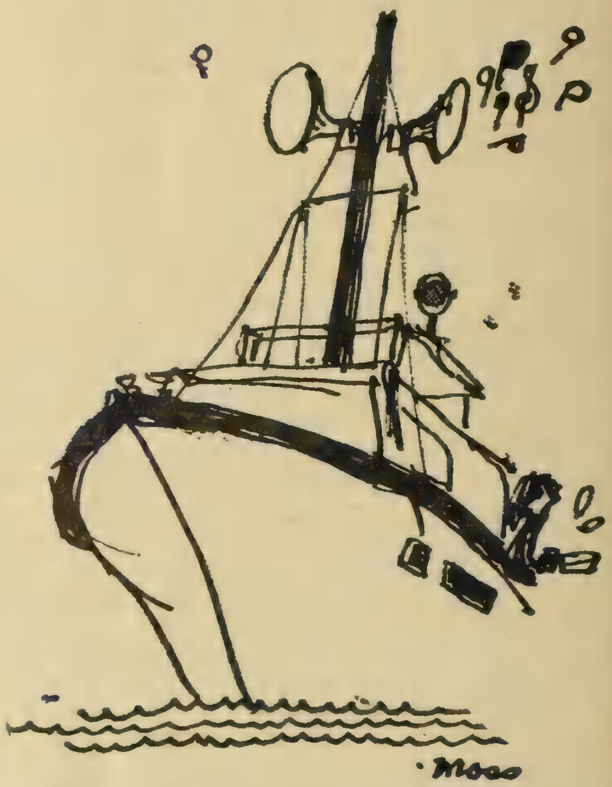
We didn't know anybody lived around here. They had come, one must suppose, in answer to the summons, still much alive in America, that brought some men to the frontier: the attraction of a wild uninhabited place. And the high wooded banks of this river had permitted an illusion that would have been dissipated by a glance at a road map, or even a moment's thought. All of Kentucky is inhabited now. The settlements have grown here for nearly 200 years. The wild country is gone, along with the Indians and the buffalo and the wolves and the elk and the passenger pigeons and the parakeets and nearly all the old forests and much of the fertility of the land. Kentucky is inhabited all right, and for the most part the inhabitants have treated it as if it were uninhabited, or soon would be.

We're on the river, you know. He meant, of course, that he was in a public place, not my place, and so I had no right to complain. But I think he meant more than that. A wild, uninhabited place, such as he wanted to believe he had come to, is by the definition of our frontier experience a free place. One has no bosses there, one is free of responsibility and can do purely according to pleasure. How illusory that is is proved by the fact that the country is inhabited and that some of the inhabitants objected to anyone's behaving as if it were not. How illusory it is, and how dangerous, is proved by American history: those pioneer forebears of ours, so attractively free of responsibility, not only settled the country but used up the fertility and wealth and beauty of it at a rate that made their lives a disgrace to them and a burden to us. It is invariably damaging when men with neighbors act on the presumption that they are alone. And we are seeing with greater clarity and greater sorrow every day that the most solitary have had neighbors, and that the loneliest have had heirs.

What has troubled me most and longest is that these people, having come within reach of the decent harmless restorative pleasures that I know to be possible here, are oblivious to them, as remote from them as if they were looking at panoramic shots of the valley on a movie screen.

Propelled at 20 or 30 miles an hour by a roaring engine, one can experience the country only as "scenery" — a painted landscape without life or sound. "Scenery," as we speak the word, involves an oversimplification and falsification of nature. It is landscape with all the vital details excerpted. It is the notion that permits the indulgence of our wish to prettify nature — to pretend that nature is represented by butterflies but not mosquitoes, sunrises and sunsets but not hot noons, moonlight but not darkness, life but not death. But to know the mountain, as John Marin said, it is necessary to know what is on the mountain's back. One must go close and be still. And that cannot be done with a motor, or with a motorized intelligence. At 20 or 30 miles an hour the countryside can be no more than the pretty package a vacation comes in — to be used like other packages, disposed of as soon as the contents is used up. It is hardly to be kept in mind after it has been used, which means that it is likely to be used carelessly, or even contemptuously.

At night the roar of the engine is replaced by the radio. The watch fires of ancient travelers in the wilderness have their counterparts in the loudly playing radios of these modern voyagers. But it is no longer death that must be guarded against. It is life. What surrounds them now during their night stops is no longer the threat of attack by some enemy or large animal; it is nothing more than the life of the world as it is still serenely and persistently voiced in natural places at night in the sounds of the air and the water and the night creatures, each sound spaced, singled out, surrounded by a silence infinitely greater than it is, reaching to the stars.



It is maybe most of all that silence that they are so intent to guard themselves against. And there is indeed a potential of terror in it. It raises, still, all the old answerless questions of origins and ends. It asks a man what is the use and the worth of his life. It asks him who he thinks he is, and what he thinks he's doing, and where he thinks he's going. In it the world and its places and aspects are apt to become present to him, the lives of water and trees and stars surround his life and press their obscure demands. The experience of that silence must be basic to any religious feeling. Once it is attended to, admitted into the head, one must bear a greater burden of consciousness and knowledge — one must change one's life. If one has nothing in oneself with which to respond it would be unbearable. If the silence within the man should be touched by the impenetrable silence that ultimately surrounds him, what might happen to the thin partition of flesh and possessions? How might they have to be looked on then?

In the face of that silence — enmeshed as he most likely is in the demands of a life in which the prevalent motive is to take all you can get, and the ultimate check is everybody else's determination to do the same — no wonder he turns on the radio. No wonder he opposes the river by strewing on it his garbage and his noise. No wonder he goes as fast as he can. Pursued into the wilderness by questions he is afraid even to ask, no wonder he finds his comfort — to his bewilderment, surely — in what he thought he wanted to be free of: crowdedness and commotion and hurry and mess. He came to a natural place to be free of responsibility, only to receive from it the intimation that he cannot be free, that his life is surrounded by more demands and considerations than he can bear to admit.

Man cannot be independent of nature. In one way or another he must live in relation to it, and there are only two alternatives: the way of the frontiersman, whose response to nature was to dominate it, to assert his presence in it by destroying it; or the way of Thoreau, who went to the natural places to become quiet in them, to learn from them, to be restored by them. To know these places, because to know them is to need them and respect them and be humble before them, is to preserve them. To fail to know them, because ignorance can only be greedy of them, is to destroy them.

Nature has never permitted freedom from responsibility. The world is a most wakeful and exacting account keeper. Abusive and greedy lives are as certainly recorded on the face of the earth as they are said to be in the Book of Doomsday.

But that, the vacationing boatman seems often to conclude, is the world's fault, and to hell with it—and he dumps his breakfast plastic over the side.

The concern I have expressed here is justified less by the damage I have seen done than by the damage I believe certainly will be done if our minds do not change. For boating and the other mechanized pleasures, like everything else in our country now, are on the increase, both in the number of participants and in the power of the equipment. In all that I have said there is an apprehension of the question: If we continue our attempt to enjoy the world, as well as live and work in it, with our need for space increased by many horsepower, and our population getting always bigger, where are we going to find the room? Such a question is not addressed to the possibility of control by law but to the consciences of persons. I do not believe that the abuse of the world can be stopped by law.

What I hope—and it is not an easy hope—is that people will begin to come into the countryside with a clearer awareness of why they come, of what they need from it and of what they owe it. I assume—and it is not an easy assumption—that the world must live in men's minds if men are to continue to live in the world.

THE SUPREME COURT AND THE BILL OF RIGHTS III

DISCOVERY OF EQUALITY

LEO PFEFFER

Mr. Pfeffer, special counsel to the American Jewish Congress and chairman of the Department of Political Science at Long Island University, is the author most recently of This Honorable Court: A History of the United States Supreme Court (Beacon).

Our Declaration of Independence asserts that all men are created equal and, according to Lincoln, it was to this proposition that our nation was dedicated. Nevertheless, except in one place, neither the Constitution nor the Bill of Rights mentions the word equal or equality, and in that instance it was for the purpose of effecting inequality of persons (by barring amendments depriving states of their equal representation in the Senate). The constitutional fathers were, of course, not oblivious to the institution of slavery. But they sought to protect rather than destroy it and did this by forbidding interference with the importation of slaves for twenty years (after which nature could be relied upon to provide an adequate supply) and by commanding the return of fugitive slaves. Yet they were not insensitive to what Gunnar Myrdal was later to call an American dilemma—the contradiction of actual practice to the preachment in the Declaration of Independence—as is made evident by their careful avoidance of the word slaves or slavery, and their employment instead of such euphemisms as "other persons" or "persons held to service or labor."

The first encounters the Supreme Court had with slavery occurred during Marshall's administration, but these were only preliminary skirmishes; the major encounter culminated in the most catastrophic decision ever handed down by the Supreme Court. Whether or not the Civil War was in any event inevitable, and as to this historians differ sharply, the Dred Scott decision made it so. It was considered by the American people to mean that under the Constitution, as interpreted by the Court, the peculiar institution was also a permanent one, changeable only by constitutional amendment (which the South's veto power made impossible) or armed force. (Ironically, this was the first decision in which the Supreme Court applied the Bill of Rights; a slave, Taney stated in his opinion, was property of which the owner could not be deprived without violating the Fifth Amendment.)

The end of the Civil War brought with it the Reconstruction Congress, that body of remarkable men who occupied the Capitol in the decade beginning in 1866. As Lincoln is the most unjustifiably sanctified figure in American history, the members of the Reconstruction Congress have been the most unjustly maligned. Notwithstanding the D. W. Griffith interpretation of history, the Reconstruction Congress was the noblest and certainly the most effective Congress in American history—if, for nothing else, for its adoption of the Fourteenth Amendment which is today the basis of perhaps 90 per cent of the appeals to the Supreme Court for the protection of personal rights and liberties.

The Fourteenth Amendment was, of course, not the only constructive product of the Reconstruction Congress; anti-Klan laws enacted by it are still the only even partly effective means of bringing some measure of justice to racists who murder Negroes and civil rights workers. But it was the amendment which put the word equal into the Bill of Rights and was conceived as the medium for assuring the Negro a full place in a free society.

Unfortunately, the nobility of purpose which motivated the Reconstruction Congress was short-lived and the conscience of Congress became dormant for more than four score years; from 1875 to 1957, not a single civil rights measure, even of the most modest kind, was enacted by Congress. The immediate and apparent cause for this extended hibernation was the Hayes-Tilden gentlemen's agreement of 1876 under which the Southern Democrats traded the Presidency for a free hand in their efforts to restore the South as far as possible to its ante-bellum patterns.

But the real cause was much deeper. Neither Hayes nor Congress could have brought reconstruction to its abortive end had not the American people themselves tired of the egalitarian drive which made reconstruction possible. From 1876 to 1929, Americans' all-consuming urge was to get as rich as possible in as short a time as possible. The pursuit of happiness meant the pursuit of the dollar, not of justice or equality for the Negro. After 1883, when the Supreme Court struck down the last civil rights measure of the Reconstruction Congress, a number of Northern states did enact measures forbidding racial discrimination in places of public accommodation, but these soon became dead letters. The lack of Northern concern for Negro equality is perhaps best shown by the fact that the defendant which gave its name to the 1954 decision that outlawed racial segregation in public schools was the Board of Education of Topeka, Kan.

In such a milieu it would have been unrealistic to expect the members of the Supreme Court to steer a course widely divergent from that of the general consensus, even if they had been inclined to do so, which, with the exception of the first Harlan, they were not. Like everyone else, the Court's primary concern was the protection and expansion of capitalism, and as its main instrument for this purpose it used the very Fourteenth Amendment that had been fashioned by the Reconstruction Congress to achieve equality for the Negro.

By the time the first major civil rights cases came to the Supreme Court, reconstruction was dead, and the Court made no effort to revive it for some sixty years. In a few cases, the Court did pay minor obeisance to the ghost. In one case, it forbade the deliberate exclusion of Negroes from juries. In another, it outlawed the "grandfather clause" whose purpose it was to close the polls to illiterate Negroes while keeping them open for illiterate whites. In a third, it struck down a city ordinance which forbade Negroes to occupy houses in blocks the majority of whose residents were white. (It did this by upholding not the Negro's personal right to live where he wanted to but the owner's property right to sell his land for the highest price he could get.)

These, and most other similar efforts proved of negligible practical value, and in all instances the Court sanctioned the devices that made them so. In respect to the first, it allowed the use of voter-registration lists and other standards which effectively excluded Negroes from juries. For the second, it upheld the outright exclusion of literate as well as illiterate Negroes from primaries, the only elections in the one-party South having anything but ceremonial significance. As for the third, it upheld the validity and enforceability of gentlemen's agreements or racial restrictive covenants which were quite effective in keeping Negroes out of white neighborhoods.

The two principal instruments used by the Court to frustrate the hopes and intent of the Reconstruction Congress were the concepts of state action and separate-but-equal. Judicial decisions are not made by legal concepts but by the will of judges, operating within the limits imposed by the national tolerance and, to a considerably lesser extent, the precedents of prior judicial decisions. Had the Court not invented state action and separate-but-equal, it would assuredly have found or fashioned other concepts to achieve the same ends. But these two principles proved particularly efficacious in keeping the Negro in his place; the first is still viable and constitutes the most formidable barrier to a judicial attack upon de facto segregation.

The state action concept was first expressed in 1883 when the Court threw out an indictment framed under a key provision of one of the anti-Klan acts. The defendants were twenty members of a lynch mob who had seized four Negro prisoners held by a state deputy sheriff and beat them severely, killing one. The Court held the provision unconstitutional because the Fourteenth Amendment only forbids a state to deprive a person of life or liberty without due process of law and the lynch mob were private individuals unconnected with a state.

The coup de grâce came later in the same year. A number of individuals were indicted under the Civil Rights Law of 1875 for denying hotel and theatre accommodations to Negroes, and a railroad was sued for rejecting a Negro woman passenger. (The hotel and theatre were in San Francisco and New York; only the railroad was in a Southern state, Tennessee.) The Court held the law unconstitutional because the amendment forbids only states from denying persons the equal protection of the laws, and the hotel, theatre and railroad owners were private citizens. (Later, the Court held political parties to be private associations, like social clubs, and could therefore find no state action in their white primaries. Nor could it find state action in the enforcement of restrictive covenants not to sell houses to Negroes.)

The separate-but-equal principle was announced in 1896, when the Court upheld a Louisiana law requiring all railroads to provide separate coaches for white and colored passengers and making it a criminal offense for a person of one race to sit in a coach reserved for members of the other race. So long as the facilities were equal, the Court said, it did not violate the Fourteenth Amendment that they be separate. The Court's tolerance in applying separate-but-equal is illustrated by a decision wherein it upheld the action of a local school board which, finding that maintenance of separate high schools for whites and Negroes imposed a severe burden on the taxpayers, decided temporarily to suspend the colored high school—although of course it did not permit the colored children to attend the white school. Since, the Court said, the evidence did not conclusively establish that the school board has acted out of hostility to the colored race, or out of a belief that in any event a primary school education is all that Negro children should have, it would not intervene.

Thus the situation stood at the time of the revolution of 1937 which transformed the Court from the nation's principal defender of property rights to its chief protector of personal liberties. It was in the area of equality for Negroes that the Court first entered into its new role and most consistently and effectively executed it. The Great Depression of the early thirties and the anti-Nazi ideological conflict at the end of the decade gave the American people a new perspective on the relative values of property and human rights, and the Court recognized and responded to this before Congress and the President did. Moreover, in taking up where the Reconstruction Congress left off in 1876, it filled a void left by the default of both the legislative and Executive branches of government. It was not until 1964 that Congress enacted a substantial Civil Rights Law, but by that time the Court had for more than a quarter of a century been engaged in seeking to achieve equality for the Negro.

It started modestly in 1938, when it held that the separate-but-equal requirement was not fulfilled by providing a law school for white students at the University of Missouri and sending Negro student to a more northern state which maintained an integrated law school at its university, even if Missouri offered to pay the travel, living and tuition expenses for its Negro would-be lawyers. Six years later, the Court began to search more imaginatively for state action in discriminatory conduct. Overruling its prior decision, it held that a political party is not a private association and its white primaries are forbidden by the Fourteenth Amendment.

Thereafter, the decisions came with increasing frequency, and almost never did a challenge to racial discrimination or segregation receive anything but an affirmative response from the Court. Again overruling a prior decision (during this period judicial precedents fell thick and fast), the Court found state action in judicial enforcement of racial restrictive covenants and told realtors and home owners that they would thereafter have to rely on a gentleman's word for the enforcement of a gentlemen's agreement. Then it held that a state could not postpone according a professional education to a Negro applicant until an all-Negro school would be completed; to assure constitutional equality it either had to admit the Negro to the all-white school or close that school until the Negro school was ready. Shortly thereafter, it held that in any event separate-but-equal did not apply to professional or postgraduate institutions such as law schools.

The climax came in 1954 when the Court overruled a sixty-year-old precedent and held that separate-but-equal could no longer be applied to elementary and secondary education, and in a series of subsequent decisions held that it was equally inapplicable to all facilities or services furnished by government, directly or indirectly. Although exhibiting considerable patience in the rate of desegregation in Southern schools, it withstood Governor Faubus' attempted defiance at Little Rock and made it clear that its patience was not endless, with the result that there is today at least token integration in the public schools of every state in the Union, even Mississippi and Alabama. It refused to allow evasions of its decisions by municipal leasing of facilities to private individuals, and stretched traditional legal concepts almost to the breaking point in according constitutional protection to sit-ins and other peaceful civil rights demonstrations. After Congress had timorously adopted a constitutional amendment forbidding poll taxes in federal elections, the Court, without benefit of amendment or statute, outlawed poll taxes in state and municipal elections as well.

In one area, that of de facto segregation, it has refused to intervene. While it has rejected challenges to legislative and administrative efforts aimed at such segregation, it has until now refused to extend the concept of state action to impose an affirmative obligation upon the states to eliminate it. It is not that the conceptual barrier is insurmountable; a Court which has interpreted freedom of speech to encompass non-speech, and freedom of religion to encompass atheism, would not have too much difficulty in interpreting action to encompass inaction—indeed the Court has in effect done that in the malapportionment cases.

More likely, the Court has concluded, at least implicitly, that there are certain limits to what it can do and that some problems are simply not amenable to judicial solution. The Negro community too appears to be coming to the same conclusion. Increasingly it is expressing dissatisfaction and impatience with what has been accomplished by litigation, and is asserting greater reliance on self-help, popularly what is unfortunately called black power.

Yet even here the Court has made what time will show to be an invaluable contribution. Its anti-malapportionment decisions have begun to shift the focus of political power from the countryside to the cities, and the Negroes are becoming increasingly an urban people. The Catholics and Jews were able to rise on the socio-economic ladder in no small measure because they are city dwellers and are able effectively to exercise their political power as well-organized interest groups. It is only a question of time before the Negroes will be able to do the same. When this happens, the Court will have accomplished the task that it has assumed for itself, the achievement of true equality by the Negro in fulfillment of the purpose and intent of the Reconstruction Congress and the Americans who gave their lives in the Civil War.

IN CONCLUSION

The Bill of Rights has been part of the American Constitution now for 175 years. It took almost a century and a half for the Supreme Court to recognize its existence, but when it did get around to doing this it quickly made itself the nation's chief guardian of that great document. In one respect—the protection of the right to dissent during periods of political crisis—its performance has been less than could be hoped for, though perhaps not much less than could be realistically expected. In the other areas of American liberties—freedom of nonpolitical expression, justice to persons accused of crimes, and the achievement of equality for the Negro and other racial minorities, it has in the last quarter century discharged faithfully and effectively the responsibilities imposed upon it by the generation that adopted the Bill of Rights.

LETTERS (continued from page 370)

But Professor Smart did not choose to relate today's tragedy to the Trib's contemporary role; instead he . . . left the impression that Jock Whitney was forced to pay up for past anti-union sins, certainly the most mythical of Marxist Sunday school lessons. . . .

The complicated truth is that we have all lost, and it serves no useful purpose to create illusions that the bad guys finally got what was coming to them.

Robert B. Dennis

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: The passing of the Herald Tribune deserved better at the hands of The Nation than the slapdash analysis by Prof. James G. Smart. . . .

The paper was bold, progressive, interesting and newsworthy. It molded minds that could disagree with ideas in a magazine like The Nation, and yet defend the right to express those ideas. . . .

To assert that an alleged ancient "alienation from the causes of humanity" helped to bring down this giant of journalism is really to raise questions about the qualifications of the author.

Theodore R. Kupferman, Congressman,
17th Cong. District, Manhattan logic of feeling

Brooklyn, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: The wit of Robert Elegant's article on China ["The Enormous Revival Meeting," The Nation, Oct. 3] is a pleasure, and is in itself a powerful argument, reminding us how valuable are some of the things which the Communists set themselves to destroy. Perhaps it is the only serious argument in the article. Mr. Elegant finds it absurd, even hilariously illogical, that the Chinese should undertake to withstand a U. S. attack which they are convinced will occur. He finds it quite clear that they will depend on fanaticism, as it is quite clear that they must. And here one comes to the limitations of the clever journalist; Mr. Elegant should not concern himself so exclusively with what is logical, since he means by that word what people should feel. Surely he must pay some attention, at least, to what it is that people in fact do feel. The fact is unquestionably going to be of some importance. George Oppen

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Fixer in Another Country

THE FIXER. By Bernard Malamud. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 335 pp. $5.75.

DONALD FANGER

The author of Dostoevsky and Romantic Realism (Harvard University Press), Mr. Fanger teaches Slavic and comparative literature at Stanford University.

All of Bernard Malamud's considerable strengths as a writer are in this new novel. His hero, as before, is what used to be called a "little" man, modest, long-suffering, intelligent, good-hearted, poor; aspiring, innocently and against the odds, to a new life; resourceful in dealing with what fate brings him — which is usually more trouble. Malamud's characters are almost random pieces of larger communal destinies, made triumphantly concrete through a language that captures a sensibility, a complex of attitudes toward life and the self and the world. If he writes about "unimportant" people, his eye is always on the important things. In this he is like the 19th-century Russians. And The Fixer is set in Russia: for the first time, the Malamud hero is shown in direct confrontation with history.

He has not, of course, willed it ("I don't want people pitying me or wondering what I did to be so cursed. I did nothing. It was a gift. I'm innocent," he says of his life — before the catastrophe). Thirty-year-old Yakov Bok, handyman, freethinker, Jew — destitute, abandoned by his young wife — leaves the shtetl for Kiev early in 1911. The shtetl, he says, is a prison; it's time to try elsewhere. Into the dangerous world he leaps.

After a period of living from hand to mouth, bad luck brings him a good job. He has saved a drunken anti-Semite from freezing to death on the street, accepts work from him, assumes a Russian alias, and lives outside the area permitted to ordinary Jews. Made supervisor of the Russian's brickyard, he begins to save money against possible emigration to America. Preparing to flee when the murder of a Russian boy threatens to become the pretext for a pogrom, Yakov is arrested, and exchanges his metaphorical prison for a real one.

The greater part of the novel is an account of his sufferings in prison, over an incredible thirty-month period, while a set of corrupt and reactionary officials concoct an indictment of ritual murder against all the Jews of Russia, whose representative the unlucky Bok turns out to be — "the accidental choice for the sacrifice."

The story of Yakov Bok is based on the notorious case of Mendel Beiliss, of which several substantial accounts exist in English, including Beiliss' own, published in New York in 1926. What is of interest here is not what Malamud has taken from the historical record, but what he has changed, and why.

He has, in the first place, given a focus to a complex political situation by limiting his narrative to Bok's point of view (brilliantly rendered). A cause célèbre is thus seen from the inside; nothing is reported but what Bok does, sees, thinks and feels. This means, among other things, that where Beiliss actually received considerable support, both inside and outside Russia, Malamud's Bok gets (or learns of) very little. Beiliss' long and dramatic trial ended in acquittal for him (he subsequently emigrated, first to Palestine, then to America), but Malamud's novel stops with Bok in a carriage on the way to the courthouse, the outcome left forever in doubt. Not his trial but his trials are the main thing: "He had learned, it wasn't easy; the experience was his; it was worse than that, it was he. He was the experience. It also meant that now he was somebody else than he had been, who would have thought it?"

The emphasis on lessons learned through suffering suggests Dostoevsky, and perhaps Tolstoy as well. But Malamud's novel is resolutely anti-Dostoevskian. What special value can suffering have for a man who has known it, in one form or another, all his life? "Suffering I can gladly live without," Yakov thinks, "I hate the taste of it." Dostoevsky saw suffering as the price of final happiness in Christian brotherhood, but Yakov Bok can see it only as the price of Jewish endurance, the price of hope, something to be gotten through. "You suffer for us all," his lawyer tells him, "I would be honored to be in your place." But Bok knows better: "It's without honor. . . . It's a dirty suffering." As for the Tolstoyan counsel to be patient, since the truth must eventually come out, Bok can only sigh: "And till then, what of my wasted youth?"

The change his suffering brings about boils down, as he puts it, to this: that he fears less and hates more — which is to say that he has perceived the need for the politics he had shunned, for active struggle against a government that destroyed a Jew's freedom "by reducing his worth." Where the characters of the later Dostoevsky and Tolstoy come to accept their individual guilt, Malamud's hero comes to accept instead his human responsibility: to create morality. Levin, in A New Life, records his belief that "the main source of conscious morality [is] love of life, anybody's life. Morality [is] a way of giving value to other lives through assuring human rights." This is why there are so many hauntings in Malamud's works: they are moral tests. "Am I responsible for you then, Susskind?" an American in one of the Roman stories asks the nervy stranger who has invaded his life. "Who else?" Susskind replies. "You know what responsibility means? . . . Then you are responsible."

In embroiling his fixer with politics so directly, Malamud has broadened his previous theme (the struggle of character and circumstance, the gradual perception that the two are inseparable) and put a whole society to the test. There are two "fixers" in the book: the Czar, who has condoned this attempt to "fix" Bok, and Bok himself, the humble repairman. Both are representative figures.

But the main success of the novel lies in the creation of Bok, free of any false pathos or any false grandeur. In his intelligent simplicity, his sanity, his humor, he is — if the expression is allowable — a kind of Jewish Everyman. Consider his musings on sex, as he waits for the daughter of his anti-Semitic benefactor, in her bedroom:

> Should I stay or should I go? . . . On the one hand it's been a long season without rain. A man is not a man for nothing. What do the Hasidim say? "Hide not from thine own flesh." On the other hand what does this mean to me? At my age it's nothing new. It means nothing.

Or on love, as he recalls his proposal to his wife:

> "Why don't you talk?" I said. "Say yes or no." "Why don't you say love?" she said. "Who talks about love in the shtetl?" I asked her. "What are we, millionaires?" I didn't say so, but it's a word that makes me > nervous. What does a man like me know about love? "If you don't love me I can't marry you," she answered me. But by then the father had his nose in my ear. "She's a doll, a marvelous girl, you can't go wrong. . . ." So I said love and she said yes.

Bok is admirable; the book is admirable — a chilling and engrossing experience. If it inspires any reservations only the extent of its success entitles us to speak of them.

In The Fixer, Malamud has demonstratively staked a claim in the territory of the great "classical" novelists, abandoned Chekhovian themes for those of Dostoevsky and Tolstoy (not to mention Kafka). How is innocence to cope with monstrous and ramified accusations? What is the meaning of suffering? Does God exist, and (to put it crudely) what difference does the answer make? Though Malamud's material is historical rather than contemporary, there is still the possibility of saying a new word, simply by virtue of his non-Christian attitude to these questions.

Here, however, art seems to demand more than life. The drama of Yakov Bok, for all its impressiveness, is straightforward and uncomplicated. "One thing I've learned," he reflects on the last page, "there's no such thing as an unpolitical man, especially a Jew" — but the lesson seems out of proportion to the suffering that has produced it. We are startled not by dramatic revelation but by its absence. The character has changed too little — because there has been too little to change. With justice the only issue in the novel, with no character shifting his moral position in the course of the book, with the story itself that rare case — a struggle in which right and wrong are absolute — the chances for spiritual drama are pretty rigidly bounded.

Sinned against but not sinning, miserable but without cause for remorse, denying God without guilt or ill effect, whole, healthy, decent — Yakov Bok is the hero of a memorable story that is pitiful and terrible, yet deliberately anti-tragic.

Survivor's Heritage

LAURENCE GOLDSTEIN

Mr. Goldstein is on the staff of A.B.C. Television News and is a book critic and film writer.

The Novels of Elie Wiesel

NIGHT. Translated from the French by Stella Rodway (1960). Hill & Wang. 116 pp. $3.

DAWN. Translated from the French by Frances Frenaye (1961). Hill & Wang. 90 pp. $3.

THE ACCIDENT. Translated from the French by Anne Borchardt (1962). Hill & Wang. 120 pp. $3.

THE TOWN BEYOND THE WALL. Translated from the French by Stephen Becker (1964). Atheneum Publishers. 179 pp. $3.95.

THE GATES OF THE FOREST. Translated from the French by Frances Frenaye (1966). Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 226 pp. $4.95.

Elie Wiesel's first book Night etches with painful fury his childhood in the death camps of Auschwitz and Buchenwald. It is at once a document of the suffering of a people and a revelation of the growth of a child to manhood in a world suddenly emptied of all values except survival. Since the child is a mystic, a passionate Talmudic student devoted and trembling before his elusive God, his life harmonizes with that of his people, and his voice resonates with their expectation of deliverance. When that world is wrenched from him, he becomes both witness and victim, arbiter and accuser. He stands between his God and his suffering world; the shadow of his faith eclipsing each. Night is God's silence, and the Nazis merely faceless echoes of that silence. Survival becomes a terrible assertion of self, a sigh howling against the dying of the world. To live in the death camp one must choose to live, and that choice is blasphemy in a malignant universe. Finally, man is left with his broken body and dreams to salvage his place among the legends. He must rediscover himself by testing his limited expectations. Although he has not lost his God, he must create out of the pain and numbness a new experience that will keep his God from vanishing among the unforgettable faces of the thousands whose bodies he saw turn into "wreaths of smoke beneath a silent blue sky."

This is where the novels of Wiesel begin. His total work records the fitful journey of man across the ravaged landscape of the postwar world. Wiesel's language must mitigate the terrible reality it describes or each sentence would become an uncontrollable accusation. Feeling must be alienated from sensation, thought severed from belief, if the author's voice is to master the unbearable world it confronts.

Torn from the confines of the shtetl, the Jew is set loose in that world as victim-accuser, a suffering Everyman compulsively engaging God to remind Him of his existence. Since the fact of his life is a triumph over the indifference of the world, his destiny is dramatically self-contained. He is both the living repository of his people's legends and the sole interpreter of their meaning. His actions are so bound by their historic implications that they become ritual at the moment of commission. But while his movement in the world is choreographed by its symbolic necessity, his imagination is free to dart among the dreams and memories, desires and fears that assert his uniqueness.

In Dawn, the second of Wiesel's books, the hero called Elisha has moved from the death camp to Palestine. His imagination has been awakened by a dedicated Zionist who appears to him as a messenger out of the Hasidic legends bridging heaven and earth to make him understand his fate. No longer will he be humiliated, persecuted and pitied — the captive of an indifferent world. But Palestine is a great prison and he is placed in its innermost cell. A Jewish underground fighter has been captured by the British and sentenced to death; and in reprisal a British officer is to die at the moment the Jew's life is taken. Elisha is made the instrument of this ritual bloodletting. He is assigned to kill the British officer. Fate has come full circle and Elisha is still a victim. He is both executioner and the innocent man he must kill. Human experience has been polarized, and he is forced to play his role in the minute space that separates the extremes.

As in all of Wiesel's novels, the physical world is reduced to its most suggestive essentials. In Dawn the hero is confined to a room above the basement where he must perform his act. Outside, the night is the faces of the dead he has known. The sum of their lifeblood is the inheritance of the survivor, and his act consecrates their death and gives it meaning.

It is in The Accident that the defects in Wiesel's art are most apparent. The narrator has moved to New York as a correspondent for an Israeli newspaper. Here he is nameless and his suffering is abstracted from the world in which he lives. He feels himself to be just a messenger of the dead among the living. Within the first few pages of the novel he is struck by a cab and taken to a hospital where a team of surgeons saves his life. Against his will his body heals and he is forced to live with the terrors of his past. From the confinement of his hospital bed his memory reaches out and seizes upon the dead, crippled and tortured souls he has known. He clings to his grandmother, dead in the gas chambers, wearing her black shawl "that seems to hold the nights and days of the universe." She is the enveloping past informing his life with the substance of death. Even his relationship with the woman who loves him becomes subject to the icy expectations of the dead. The only true contact he maintains with the living becomes a parody of the brutalized past. The act of love must be deliberately turned into a ritual of suffering, passion wedded to death, before it can be consummated.

With no dramatic support but the narrator's tormented memories, the chamber of horrors begins to take on the cast of a wax museum. Episodes and fragments are inserted that obviously shock but do not grow from the consciousness of a man reworking and defining their meaning with the fevered determination of the earlier novels. They remain, even within the context of his life, isolated events. There is a long passage about a girl who was made a prostitute by the Nazis at the age of 12. The story is harrowing, but it has no meaning beyond its telling. Without a defined dramatic structure and a narrative sensibility that interprets, deciphers and explores within that structure, the story becomes anthologized and fixed within its own terms. The narrator's feelings, which bridge each story, move to the edge of hysteria, while his intelligence reduces emotions to aphorisms. This is the great danger in Wiesel's art. His search among the charred bodies of his past is so compulsive and impassioned that it risks becoming too private a document. The suffering he relives is so elemental that it must cohere as myth to move his readers beyond pity.

In The Town Beyond the Wall, Wiesel's finest novel, the journey of the hero is the progress of the human soul, from guilt and alienation, to test the limits of compassion and understanding. It is an attempt to seize the last human ember from the ashes of the crematorium and fan it into a flame held up to the silent lips of God Himself.

As in all Wiesel novels, the hero is confined to a prison whose walls give structure to the universe. But imprisonment is no longer entombment. It is the cavern in which old legends echo and seek release as new truths. Michael, who has survived the concentration camps with the memory of the world as an indifferent witness to his suffering, returns to the Hungarian town of his childhood to find The Other; the bland, banal, bored face in the window who watched as the Jews perished, whose passionless eyes watched and wanted only peace and quiet. The village is under Soviet occupation and the journey is a dangerous one. He is smuggled into the town by a close friend, and he searches the remotely familiar streets remembering his youthful love of a God whose glory was to become a shadow in the empty eyes of a spectator. When Michael finds The Other, his festering accusations evoke neither pity nor remorse; and The Other betrays him to the police, finally demanding Michael's hatred. Michael responds with the cruelty of forgiveness.

Michael's encounter with The Other is threaded among the strands of his consciousness while he is being tortured. The police want him to betray his friend Pedro who has brought him into the country; and he is stood before a wall so his legs will turn numb and he will scream out the name of his friend. The torture is called the prayer because Jews pray standing. Michael endures by savagely pursuing to the edge of madness the God who has abandoned him.

His agony is a metaphor for the quest which drives him to understand the depth of his friendship with Pedro. Through that friendship he discovers new possibilities in addressing God. His love for Pedro softens his accusations as his imagination reaches out to his friend in a dialogue that embraces the God he had condemned. Finally, Michael triumphs over his torture and preserves the integrity of his friendship by refusing to pronounce his friend's name. He is placed in a cell with a young boy who is barely sane. He fights desperately for the boy's sanity, entreating him to cling to humanity: to realize that evil is human, weakness is human — but indifference is not. In struggling for the boy Michael saves himself. He has found new truth in the legend in which the roles of God and man are reversed and the universe is charged with the ancient dialogue filled, most of all, with infinite yearning. Michael tells the boy: "Ask me who I am and I'll answer, 'I'm Pedro.' And that will be proof that man survives, that he passes himself along. Later, in another prison, someone will ask your name and you'll say, 'I'm Michael.' And then you will know the taste of the most genuine of victories."

The extent of that victory is tested in Wiesel's most recent novel, The Gates of the Forest. It begins with the hero's gift of his Jewish name Gavriel, which means Man of God, to a stranger as an offering of friendship. Gavriel then as-

FARRAR STRAUS GIROUX

Bernard Malamud

THE FIXER. "A novel of startling importance."—ELIZABETH HARDWICK, Vogue. "One of the year's richest novels, a literary event in any season." — ELIOT FREMONT-SMITH, N.Y. Times. A Literary Guild selection. 275,000 copies in print. $5.75

Walker Percy

THE LAST GENTLEMAN. "Altogether richer and more intriguing than his first novel, The Moviegoer, which won him the National Book Award in 1962." — JOYCE CAROL OATES, The Nation. "A distinguished work of art." — N.Y. Times Book Review. 3rd printing. $5.95

Colette

EARTHLY PARADISE: Colette's Autobiography, drawn from the writings of her lifetime by ROBERT PHELPS. "Here at last is the reader's great Colette book." — JANET FLANNER, Life. 3rd printing. $6.95

Alberto Moravia

THE LIE. "A bold, intricate, astonishing new novel . . . Sex, boredom, meaninglessness, the genuine and false, are the elements which compose it." — RICHARD GILMAN, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review. 3rd printing. $5.95

Isaac Bashevis Singer

IN MY FATHER'S COURT. "In this heartwarming account, the luminous novelist and fabulist returns in memory to the sources of his art . . . The dramas enacted in his boyhood home seem like scenes straight out of his mature fiction." — Newsweek. 5th printing. $5.50

Wilfrid Sheed

OFFICE POLITICS. A devastating, comic novel about the underlings on the staff of a small magazine. "In the style of early Waugh and Powell: funny, sad, implacably intelligent."—DWIGHT MACDONALD $4.95

Now at your bookstore
FARRAR, STRAUS & GIROUX

sumes the Christian name of Gregor. Together they inhabit a cave hidden from the Nazis until the stranger, "Gavriel," allows himself to be captured to save his friend. Gregor escapes and finds refuge in the house of an old family servant. Because she passes him off as the mute son of her lost sister, the villagers confide in him without fear of betrayal. But Gregor is cast in a play as Judas, and in that role he finally speaks out demanding the village to chant after him that "Judas is innocent and we humbly implore his forgiveness." The villagers rise up against him to tear out his tongue and protect their secrets from one another. He is saved only by the authority of the mayor who brings him to Jewish partisans hiding in the woods. He soon persuades the underground to try to rescue Gavriel, but they fail and their leader, who is a childhood friend of Gregor, perishes as a result of the attempt. Gregor falls in love with his dead friend's mistress; after the war, they marry and settle in a ghetto section of Brooklyn. He becomes involved with the Hasidim, the most devout of the Jews, to understand the meaning of his guilt and God's. Finally, after a hallucinatory encounter with Gavriel, he reclaims his name and begins his painful journey back to the community of men.

Wiesel's novel unfolds in a series of stories that move its hero through trials on which nothing less than salvation itself depends. Naked and vulnerable before his God and man's hellish world, severed even from his name, he must re-create himself in the formless void and darkness that is God's silence. Again the roles of man and God are reversed: the past becomes present, objects loose the shape of the words that hold them, and identity flows and merges with that of all mankind. Madness, the total dislocation of sensibility, is the only hope of brutalized man and the final promise of redemption.

As a mute, Gregor absorbs the words and the darkest passions of men. To them he represents the fragile edge of consciousness "where words and images float freely, unconnected to the shore." When he finally speaks out as Judas in mockery of the self-righteous Christianity that has perverted the Jew's relationship with God, he forces men to enact the cruel parody of their religious rite by offering his blood to expiate their crimes.

When Gregor himself betrays a friend and causes his death, the betrayal is accidental, but he accepts the responsibility. To live is to betray the dead; to survive is to cast one's lot with the executioner. His love for his dead friend's mistress is the final obscenity. In that love, which is man's only triumph, must reside the inevitable assumption of guilt. But it is only at the end of the war, in the heart of a Hasidic community in Brooklyn, when his love has been eroded by the guilt, that Gregor demands the return of his name. Tearing at the foundations of the temple that has harbored him, twisting his faith in judging the faith of others, Gregor reclaims his name. "I am what I choose to be; I am in my choice, in my will to choose." With that final assertion he has wrested his identity back from God. The act and the image are one; the self realized in its possibilities.

The art of Elie Wiesel is shaped by necessity to assert in myth the substance of man's perishable triumphs. The novels are written with a possessive reverence for language that treats the word as Law and the story as a complex melody celebrating and redeeming the ferocity of man's will to survive. They are driven by an ardor that gives form to the terrible passions that play beneath the surface of civilization. Wiesel has extracted the drama rooted in legend and bent it to the shape of man's search for identity. Masterfully, passionately, desperately, he has dredged from the horror of the holocaust a vision of man as moving as his suffering and as powerful as his survival. ■

In the Shtetl of Bilgoray

IN MY FATHER'S COURT. By Isaac Bashevis Singer. Farrar, Straus and Giroux. 307 pp. $5.50.

JULES CHAMETZKY

Mr. Chametzky is associate professor of English at the University of Massachusetts and editor of The Massachusetts Review. He will be on leave during 1966-67 to teach at the University of Zagreb in Yugoslavia.

In My Father's Court (Beth Din in the Yiddish original) brings together as a memoir a series of sketches I. B. Singer wrote for the Jewish Daily Forward about his childhood years. His father, a Hasidic rabbi, held court in Warsaw just before and during the First World War. For anyone interested in the mind and art of Singer — as who is not these days? — the book is indispensable.

The "memoir" aspect of the work is rendered brilliantly and with masterly economy. There are wonderful vignettes of this lost world of Warsaw Jewry — coal dealers and wagon drivers, bakers, thieves, minor Hasidic schnorrers, shmegeggis and saints. The last third of the book comprises a more or less connected narrative (the earlier portion is largely episodic) — from the shot at Sarajevo and the reactions to that by Singer's family and community, through the hunger of the war years in Warsaw, toward the return, with his mother, to the old family village of Bilgoray. This return was of immense importance to Singer: in the shtetl of Bilgoray he encountered the past. It was a place in which "time seemed to flow backwards," and the writer-to-be found "in this world of old Jewishness a spiritual treasure trove." In this end, we know, was a beginning — for without that experience, much of The Slave, The Magician of Lublin, Satan in Goray and many of Singer's shorter pieces would not have been possible.

But even more fundamental than the theme of "a return" that informs the last section of the book, is the dialectic of growth within the young boy. On the one hand there is the example of the father, scholarly and serene, although "just a few feet away from him, abominations were being committed"; on the other, the influence of his brother Israel Joshua, "boy philosopher," young Socialist, budding artist and journalist — the encounter between the old unworldly pieties and the Enlightenment. Through this confrontation, the boy learns to distrust the things of this world — a world in itself tref (not kosher) — but also to marvel at and immerse himself in its wonders.

Aside from this engrossing aspect of the book — the record of a most gifted man's spiritual and emotional growth — we are privileged to see into the workshop of an artist: that rich store of impression, incident, remembered scene and snatch of dialogue to which the novelist will later give fictional point in more extended narrative. But as a writer and Jew, Singer must have felt keenly the difficulty and poignance of rendering much of the material in this book. In his introduction, Singer calls In My Father's Court a literary experiment of sorts — an attempt, he says, "to combine two styles — that of memoirs and that of belles-lettres." In saying this, Singer may be betraying some uneasiness or uncertainty about his material and its treatment. If one is an honest writer and a good man, what is one to make of that lost world? If it were "only" an honest memoir (and not an act of filial piety), there would be the danger of advertising for one's self — did all that exist, and perish, for the writer's development only? How outrageous. And if only belletristic?

The superficiality would speak for itself. What then to do with that rich and complicated world of East European Jewry — benighted and exalted, mean and glorious, criminally backward, yet wrapped in millennia of culture — so actively present, alive, there at one time, now irrevocably, brutally liquidated? To memorialize is one possible response.

Singer presents some sketches that may be justified simply on those grounds: so and so lived, did such and such — and no moral or point is or can be drawn. It is an act of naming, a recording. "May these memoirs serve as a monument," he concludes one tale, "to him and his like, who lived in sanctity and died as martyrs." If some of the sketches seem inconclusive, perhaps that is the point — any more artistic shaping would be sacrilegious. Though Singer ends only two of his forty-nine sketches by noting that such Jews as he writes about were killed by the Germans, that knowledge of course always exists beneath his and our consciousness. Such knowledge must not be lost — yet it can be, as other Yiddish writers have found, a paralyzing awareness. How to reclaim the indispensable past — this past — without false sentimentality, without frozen and conventional responses, and without dishonor to the dead? That, I think, is the true nature of the "literary" experiment Singer assays in this memoir. The last word in the book is "love," and it is with love, dignity and restraint that Singer walks his difficult tightrope and achieves the miracle of art.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA:
The Last Pioneer Country
by Thomas Molnar, author of Africa: A Political Travelogue
160 pp. plus 16 pp. photos
$4.00
A concise report, based on direct observation of the economic and social conditions, politics and geography of South West Africa, together with notes on the history, legal status, and future prospects of this territory.
FLEET PUBLISHING CORP.
230 Park Ave., New York 10017

WORLD'S BEST?
TRY IT AND SEE
☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)
COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

$2.95 each
SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION
- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.
Satisfaction guaranteed
Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25
ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

The Cool of Jakov Lind

LANDSCAPE IN CONCRETE. By Jakov Lind. Translated from the German by Ralph Manheim. Grove Press. 190 pp. $4.50.

IRVING HALPERIN

Mr. Halperin is a professor of English at San Francisco State College. He has recently returned from two years in Germany and Israel, researching the literature of the holocaust, for a book in progress. His articles and fiction have appeared in many publications.

Although Jakov Lind has written only two books; Soul of Wood, a collection of short stories published two years ago, and his current novel, Landscape in Concrete, he has already acquired a considerable reputation. Within the critical view which holds that the sufferings and horrors of World War II should not — and perhaps cannot — be rendered by direct emotional involvement, but rather obliquely, dryly and, above all, coolly, Lind has been widely praised for his style, fantasy and lunatic humor.

Certainly these qualities are conspicuous throughout Landscape in Concrete. The protagonist, Gauthier Bachmann, a Wehrmacht sergeant in the last days of the Second World War, goes on a macabre odyssey in search of his regiment from which he was separated on the Russian front. Army doctors have discharged Bachmann after finding him mentally unfit, but this ruling does not deter him from wanting to rejoin his regiment and to fight for the honor and glory of the fatherland. The novel charts a series of adventures which befall Bachmann along the route of his search. In France, he is tricked into shooting a homosexual Wehrmacht cook who deserted his unit. In Narvik, Norway, on orders from a vindictive quisling, he shoots four members of a prominent local family. Returning to Germany, he is declared sane by another board of army doctors. As the story closes, Bachmann is still determined to find his regiment.

Nazi Germany was indeed a place of organized madness, which men like Wohlbrecht in Soul of Wood and Bachmann in Landscape in Concrete epitomize. Lind's wit is lethal in pointing up the compulsions of Germans for order, duty, solid burgher comfort, hygienic cleanliness, fate and "universal cosmic unity." But if the characters and their situation are true to the demented world of the Third Reich, the trouble is that the reader never gets beyond the frozen atmosphere of Lind's landscape: "As far as the eye could see a desert of ashes under a lead-gray sky. The stillness was palpable, as colorless and bare as the walls of a monk's cell. Nothing moved in the deathly silence, nothing crawled, rustled, or murmured." This same gelid condition is especially present in Lind's grotesques. They feel neither anger nor hate nor concern for one another. Mainly they keep cool. Bachmann describes how "without batting an eyelash" he killed four people: "No, I didn't lose control of myself, I wasn't upset, I kept cool. That's the main thing." All this is in keeping with Lind's intention to underscore the inhuman in Hitler's Germany. But the unrelieved, chilling lifelessness of the novel's characters ultimately repels the reader.

Certainly a sufficient detachment between the writer and his work is necessary to fiction, but there is an excess of distance in Landscape in Concrete. In a story concerned with the atrocities of Hitler's bloodletting, what is wanted is the kind of wounded outrage against totalitarian barbarism which characterizes Picasso's painting, "Guernica." Surely it is no disservice to art to approach work with the kind of anger and hate powerfully and directly rendered by other writers on this subject. A study of the differences involved is instructive. In The Last of the Just, Ernie Levy, having been assaulted and humiliated by Hitler Youth hooligans, in turn destroys scores of insects:

> The swallowtail landed on a violet. Ernie Levy enveloped the flower and the insect in his still moist handkerchief, and slipping a hand beneath it, he snatched at both things together, the butterfly and the violet, and then kneaded them between his already sticky palms. After the swallowtail came a dragonfly, a giant cricket, a beetle, a small butterfly with pearly-blue wings, other butterflies, other dragonflies, other grasshoppers. Ernie Levy ran through the meadow, arms spread wide, flapping his hands, gummy with vermin. . . .

Tadeusz Borowski's short story, "This Way for the Gas," also openly expresses anger and hate. A concentration camp prisoner is assigned to a special work detail to strip fellow prisoners of their food, valuable belongings and money, and turn the loot over to the Nazis. Despising himself for submitting to this assignment in order to save his own skin, he pathologically hates the victims he betrays:

> I am furious, furious, unreasonably furious at these people — that I must be here because of them. I don't feel any pity for them. I'm not sorry that they're going to the gas. Damn them all! I could throw myself at them with my fists.

By contrast, whatever hate for the murderous robots of Nazi Germany lies behind the writing of Landscape in Concrete, such emotion is insulated from the reader by the icily manipulated performance of grotesque caricatures. The novel becomes a sick-joke cartoon strip on a human disaster. In the end, Lind's novel does not bring us closer to the truth of the recent past. Moreover, coolness of presentation begets coolness of effect. The third and fourth lines of Lind's book may be read as a comment upon his method: "A landscape without faces is like air nobody breathes. A landscape in itself is nothing."

OCCUPANT

Take a look at a man who has been lived in too long, whose windows have stood open to flies, have been slammed shut
against sudden storms, whose floors have been polished for Lent or hidden beneath rugs braided from his coats, his chimney has indeed given warmth to starlings while brandishing plumes of possession.

He is now for lease but do not overlook that he has lasted for years even if age is not a title nor is his depreciation an excuse for your looking for a lien.

His price? Unquoted.
There is no broker.
Everything has been repaired, subtracted and qualified, guaranteed or marked for obsolescence so often that foreclosure is not an answer and his mortgages have served forgotten arts and beliefs, but you might bargain with mind averted.

DAVID CORNEL DeJONG

Blood in the Recipe

BLOOD ACCUSATION: The Strange History of the Beiliss Case. By Maurice Samuel. Alfred A. Knopf. 295 pp. $5.95.

CURT LEVIANT

Mr. Leviant is on the faculty of Hebraic Studies at Rutgers University. He is the editor and translator of the recently published Sholom Aleichem collection, Old Country Tales (Putnam).

The Beiliss case of 1911-12 involved an obscure Jewish workingman who was accused of killing a Christian boy in order to use his blood for matzoths. Engineered by the Russian Government, the trial sought to pin the blood accusation on the Jews, using Mendel Beiliss as a scapegoat. The regime's plan was that the hoped for pogrom would kill two birds with one stone: some Jews and the growing demand for liberalization in Russia. The conspirators were an unholy alliance of czar, judiciary, high officials, criminals, right-wing politicians, a student at Kiev University and the police. To round out this cross sampling of Russian society, there was also a monk, a bribed doctor and a professor emeritus. The list of characters is completed with a sentimental two-brothers touch: one, the reactionary, anti-Beiliss Minister of Interior; the other, the liberal member of Beiliss' defense team.

The trial was the grandstand culmination of a thousand-year-old myth that has serpentined through Europe and resisted all efforts at interment. Lest we be smug and think that the blood libel is safely quarantined there, it should be noted that it was flirted with briefly some thirty years ago in upstate New York. When a little girl was found to be missing, local Jews were accused of killing her and using her blood for Yom Kippur. (The upstaters obviously flunked their course in Medieval Bigotry: any moderately proficient accuser should have known that for the blood libel Passover was de rigueur.) Fortunately, the girl returned (she had been lost in the woods) just before the onset of the holy day, and the threatened violence against the Jewish community abated.

The Leo Frank case in Atlanta, Ga., was distressingly similar to the Beiliss case: an innocent Jew accused of killing a child, a social outcast who had actually committed the crime testifying for the prosecution, trumped-up evidence and false witnesses, a politically ambitious prosecutor, and grass-roots anti-Semitism exploited by rabble-rousing editors. Leo Frank was subsequently lynched; Beiliss lived out his life (he died in 1934 in the United States) a forgotten man.

Astoundingly, belief in the old canard is not dead. In recent years it has appeared as a vociferous accusation in the backwoods of the Soviet Union, and as a quiet question on an American college campus: Was it really true, asked a sophomore, that the Jews needed blood for baking their Passover matzoths?

There is a strong temptation to see the Beiliss trial as symptomatic of the whole corrupt and dying order of prerevolutionary Russia — the Powers of Darkness aligned against the Legion of Light. Maurice Samuel has shown that it was not a case of Russia united against Beiliss, the Jew. Most of the defense lawyers were Christians. Figures from the worlds of culture, science, religion and politics in Russia condemned the blood accusation. Russian peasants and workers called strikes of protest. Even a renowned anti-Semitic editor of a leading rightist Kiev paper denounced the accusation as claptrap and felt ashamed for Russian justice.

Beiliss, then, was alone neither in Russia nor abroad, where manifestos were signed by the intelligentsia of Europe and America. But the presence of peasants on the jury and the judge's prejudicial charge made no one sure of the verdict. In the end, the trial boomeranged on its producers. At home, despite a loaded jury, Beiliss was acquitted; abroad, via worldwide press coverage, Russia was censured.

The Jews won the battle but, as life under the Soviets was to prove, lost the war. Despite the fact that the czarist regime decreed restrictive legislation against the Jews, limited their freedom of movement and residence, condoned and, at times, supported pogroms, Jewish cultural, communal and religious life thrived. Not since the golden age of Spain had so much distinguished Jewish literary activity taken place at one time in one region. Under the Soviets, there was a curious reversal. The new regime outlawed anti-Semitism. Freedom of movement for Jews (within Russia, of course) was not hampered. But spiritually and culturally, their hands were tied behind their backs. And Stalinist purges — infinitely more selective — took the place of pogroms.

A superb critic, cultural biographer and translator, Maurice Samuel — one of America's distinguished stylists — is at his best in the interpretive, polemic and analytic roles this study requires. When his material gives him elbow room, he is devastating.

On Rasputin:

> Like Nicholas, this remarkable man is well remembered. He capers onto the stage like a satyr, unwashed, illiterate, insatiably lecherous, a roisterer in public places, a lover of wine and gypsy music, crafty, patriotic after his peculiar fashion, possessed of hypnotic powers and endowed with such physical stamina that his assassins had to shoot him several times after he had swallowed, unawares, enough potassium cyanide to kill a horse: a singular illustration of the adage that what you don't know won't hurt you.

On the shambles the Minister of Justice made of the Russian judiciary:

> In other branches of government [besides the courts] Russia had been going backward while Europe had been going forward. It was Shcheglovitov's determined aim to bring the judicial system into line with the other branches of the government.

Owing to its meticulousness and scope, Blood Accusation will no doubt be the definitive study of the Beiliss case. In addition to a résumé of the trial, the book presents the political background to the affair, character portraits of its high and low figures, and reaction to the trial in Russia and beyond. An added dimension, ironically, is given by juxtaposing comments on the trial with excerpts from the post-revolutionary commission that investigated Beiliss' investigators.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

Toward the close of The Investigation (at the Ambassador Theatre) the main "speaker" pronounces the most ideologically cogent words of the evening. Referring to the mass murders and brutalities that took place at Auschwitz, he says: "Since such a great number of us came into the camp and since the number of those who brought us there was also great, you would think what happened there would still be comprehensible today." In other words, you the torturers or the bystanders are very much like us the victims, and we the victims are as you are: therefore we should all understand one another and be understood.

But there's the rub: we don't fully understand. And for two reasons. When another witness for the prosecution tells of a 9-year-old boy in the camp who, on being complimented by one of the camp's personnel for being "smart," answers "yes, I know a lot, but I don't think I'm going to learn any more"; and then steps into the train which is to carry him to the gas chambers, bidding farewell to the authorities with "you will never be forgiven," we are moved—or, more exactly, I am moved.

I am moved because the incident is not only singular but "modest." The vastness and impersonality in the trial of twenty-one persons who participated in the destruction of 4 million prisoners at the German concentration camp of Auschwitz, as we read about it and more emphatically as it is enacted on the stage, tends to anesthetize our sensibilities and thus our comprehension.

I felt the horror of Nazism in 1933 when first I heard of the burning of the books. Certainly such an action is in no way comparable to the gasing of thousands of people. But the literary holocaust inspired me with a sense of the terrible iniquity of the Nazi spirit. When immediately after Hitler's advent to power the composer Roger Sessions, who had spent a winter in Germany in 1932, told me he knew the kind of thing the Nazis were capable of when he had read a letter Hitler had sent some of his cohorts praising them for having kicked a Communist to death somewhere in a provincial town, I strongly felt the imminence of doom that was to befall Germany and Europe. When much later I saw a photograph in P.M. (the liberal daily of the forties) of a storm trooper in a Berlin street amusing himself and a group of his companions by plucking out, one by one, the hairs from an old Jew's beard, I shivered with dread and compassion.

Such moments—so mild compared to the later humiliations and tortures suffered by millions—made a deeper impression on me than the prolonged accounts of scientifically organized savagery recorded in The Investigation, which is Peter Weiss's verbatim arrangement of the testimony presented at the trial held in Frankfurt from January, 1964, to August, 1965.

What I failed to understand before the war but have recently begun to understand is how it could be that so many presumably intelligent and informed people remained unperturbed by the threat which Hitler and his like represented. I remember a party given in London shortly before Munich at which I strongly voiced the need for a common front against the Nazis. A well-known English actress turned to me and said coolly, "You think that because Hitler is bent on destroying your people." I have since wondered what that lady was thinking soon after when the bombs fell on "her people"!

This trifling incident made painfully clear to me how obtuse and callous people can be, while a library of documents and statistics may induce little more than a state of inanition in us (or me). I am reminded of the character of the chaplain Stogumber in Shaw's Saint Joan. He will listen to no extenuating considerations on Joan's behalf: he incessantly demands that she be burned. But when he sees her burn he cries out in agony, indeed goes mad with guilt. We need some measure of personal contact to comprehend the reality of things outside the usual orbit of our experience. A work of art may

COMMENTARY,
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name.................
Address...............
Zip...................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to supply such contact; The Investigation is not art.
PAGEANT PRESS
[illegible] Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. N

Still it probably functions as a shattering event where it is presented to an audience which in one way or another has been intimately involved with its horizon: in Germany, Poland, Russia or France, in brief, with people who have been brought into close confrontation with it. On Broadway, though we should not categorically set its audience down as unfeeling, The Investigation may prove a "shocker" but not a truly meaningful occasion. It will not get under the audience's skin, it will not "teach them a lesson."

It is in the nature of most of us to retreat from the face of evil and avoid the sight or even the recollection of torment. (This, to a degree, may be a boon.) Art, I repeat, may provide the bridge between the tragic and terrible aspects of existence and our frightened consciousness, but The Investigation on our stage is now simply a fever chart—impersonal by its very elaboration.

Yet I cannot leave it at that. Since The Investigation is not in the accepted sense a "play," I must approach it in its own terms—beyond the theatre. The very day I saw it, a nice American, a person whom most of us would describe as "a man of good will," one furthermore who saw and was appalled by the concentration camps, was quoted as saying that he would not automatically preclude anything, including the use of nuclear weapons, to end the war in Vietnam. "When you appeal to force," he added, "to carry out the policies of America abroad, there is no court above you." Perhaps it hasn't occurred to the gentleman or to those who may agree with him that if nuclear war succeeded in wiping out the enemy in Vietnam it would at the same time eliminate most of our friends as well. No wonder there are folk who could not recognize the menace of the Nazi state of mind, or who now try to ignore what happened, or yet again fail to see in it the parallel with other times, places and people!

It is so very difficult for us to learn anything important from hearsay or history: we must first learn to see. There is wisdom in the French use of the word bête to mean both "beast" and "stupid." Our bestiality does not arise so much from vindictiveness or wickedness as from stupidity. It is a trait universally shared. It takes enormous effort on our part to turn the "beasts" we are into human beings.

A final word about Peter Weiss's text itself. Apart from the details of ferocious cruelty it presents, certain of its elements are unparticularized. When one of the Nazi hirelings speaks of how "they had to be rooted out," we do not know whom "they" refers to, except to the victims in general. There is no mention of pacifists, Socialists, Communists or Jews. It is a fact that the Auschwitz camp was chiefly an instrument in the "final solution" — the extermination of Jews as such. But Weiss has said he wished to de-emphasize this aspect of the situation, since the Jews, being people like all others, might in certain circumstances behave as murderously to others as their persecutors had done to them. Without arguing the speciousness of this reasoning, it must be plain that, so interpreted, The Investigation should strike an audience as more nihilistic than Marat/Sade.

The point here is not made for its own sake alone but for the light it sheds on a major defect in the proceedings: Weiss intended to make his documentary as factual as possible but it ends by seeming abstract. It is not the abstraction of art. On the contrary, it neutralizes the effect of the performance.

That is why I can say very little about the production. Many of the "faces" are well chosen. The text is well spoken. The style shifts from reportorial reading to one of suggested emotion and then again to straight "acting" or illustration. We are neither in a real courtroom of real people nor within an original and self-justifying stage form.

The great Russian director Meyerhold was severely brought to task when he chose to produce The Lady of the Camelias in Moscow in 1934. It was a decadent play, so went the complaint, and hardly literature. Meyerhold de-

---

STATEMENT OF OWNERSHIP, MANAGEMENT AND CIRCULATION (Act of October 23. 1962; Section 4369, Title 39, United States Code).

1. Date of filing: October 1, 1966.
2. Title of publication: THE NATION.
3. Frequency of issue: weekly except July and August when bi-weekly.
4. Location of known office of publication (Street, city, county, state, zip code): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
5. Location of the headquarters or general business offices of the publishers (Not printers): 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.
6. Names and addresses of publisher, editor, and managing editor:

Publisher (Name and address):
James J. Storrow, Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Editor (Name and address):
Carey McWilliams
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

Managing Editor (Name and address):
Robert L. Hatch, Jr.
333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

7. Owner (If owned by a corporation, its name and address must be stated and also immediately thereunder the names and addresses of stockholders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of stock. If not owned by a corporation, the names and addresses of the individual owners must be given. If owned by a partnership or other unincorporated firm, its name and address, as well as that of each individual must be given). Name: The Nation Associates, Inc. (no stockholders), 333 Sixth Ave., N. Y., N. Y. 10014: Carey McWilliams, Pres. and Treas., 333 Sixth Ave., N. Y., N. Y. 10014; James J. Storrow, Jr., Vice-Pres. and Sec., 333 Sixth Ave., N. Y., N. Y. 10014.

8. Known bondholders, mortgagees, and other security holders owning or holding 1 percent or more of total amount of bonds, mortgages or other securities (If there are none, so state): None.

9. Paragraphs 7 and 8 include, in cases where the stockholder or security holder appears upon the books of the company as trustee or in any other fiduciary relation, the name of the person or corporation for whom such trustee is acting, also the statements in the two paragraphs show the affiant's full knowledge and belief as to the circumstances and conditions under which stockholders and security holders who do not appear upon the books of the company as trustees, hold stock and securities in a capacity other than that of a bona fide owner. Names and addresses of individuals who are stockholders of a corporation which itself is a stockholder or holder of bonds, mortgages or other securities of the publishing corporation have been included in paragraphs 7 and 8 when the interests of such individuals are equivalent to 1 percent or more of the total amount of the stock or securities of the publishing corporation.

10. This item must be completed for all publications except those which do not carry advertising other than the publisher's own and which are named in Sections 132.231, 132.232, and 132.233, Postal Manual (Sections 4355a, 4355b, and 4356 of Title 39, United States Code)

A. Total no. copies printed (net press run): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 36.800; single issue nearest to filing date, 37,200.

B. Paid Circulation:

1. Sales through dealers and carriers, street vendors and counter sales: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 3,755; single issue nearest to filing date, 4,500.

2. Mail subscriptions: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 25.558; single issue nearest to filing date, 26.110.

C. Total Paid Circulation: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 29,313: single issue nearest to filing date, 30,610.

D. Free Distribution (including samples) by mail, carrier or other means: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 160; single issue nearest to filing date, 160.

E. Total Distribution (Sum of C and D): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 29,473; single issue nearest to filing date, 30,770.

F. Office use, left-over, unaccounted, spoiled after printing: Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 7,327; single issue nearest to filing date, 6.430.

G. Total (Sum of E & F—should equal net press run shown in A): Average no. copies each issue during preceding 12 months, 36,800; single issue nearest to filing date, 37,200.

I certify that the statements made by me above are correct and complete.

JAMES J. STORROW, JR., Publisher

SOCIETY COLUMN

At this party I picked the wrong name, and one of the disputed colors.
Two of the talking machines programmed for attack, attacked; and I began to accumulate a burden of subliminal illogic. In a corner one of the real people held my arm, weeping a drug I had never known.
The tray of aphrodisiacs and CIA miniature receivers in campaign buttons came by. Meanwhile, my voice and appearance had incensed a fine-looking couple, who followed and detested me, but for reasons I could do nothing about.
Near the buffet a woman leaned her head on my shoulder and left powder and scent, the kind that never goes away.
At the door someone's daughter offered me her hand, curtsied in her first high heels, and said, "Goodby. I am so old you will probably never see me again."

WILLIAM STAFFORD

fended himself by saying that though the play was old-fashioned in workmanship and writing, it still contained values in its indirect criticism of the old bourgeoisie.

Seeing the revival of George Kaufman and Edna Ferber's Dinner at Eight at the Alvin Theatre, I fancied that Tyrone Guthrie thought of this play of the early thirties as a sort of American restoration comedy, frivolous in manner, satiric in content: a kind of classic. Despite my abiding skepticism in the matter, his production almost persuades me that he may have been right.

The people invited to a swank dinner party are all shallow and innocent. They are a shallow lot, in the first place, because the play is; they are innocent because Guthrie has made them so. Oliver Jordan, the reluctant and ailing host, is the owner of a respected shipping line verging on bankruptcy; his wife Millicent is a featherbrained "society lady." (Was there really any "society" in America in those days? There is none now.) The Jordans hardly seem to have any blood kinship with their daughter. The guests of honor (who never show up) are an English lord and lady whom the Jordans barely know. Invited to the dinner too is Jordan's doctor, an indifferent rake who is having a casual affair with a floosie, formerly a night-club hat check girl, now married to a vulgar and crooked operator out of Montana, a man who in the course of the play cheats his host out of his business. The Jordan girl is having a do with a silent movie star on the skids; he commits suicide because, besides harsher humiliations, he hasn't enough money to pay for a taxi to take him to the party. Among those invited, there is also an actress past her prime (more "personality" than artist) now comfortably retired, though worried as she is no longer able to elicit favors in jewels or furs from ardent admirers. The chauffeur and butler in the Jordan kitchen fight with lethal utensils over the maid.

Not a nice group. Did the play offend anyone by its "realism" or nastiness when first produced in 1932? Not at all: no one believed any of it. It was entertainment. There were good parts (several of them memorably played), fashionable gowns, and a blazing blonde snuggled in a sumptuous bed.

Some such things might also be said of restoration comedy. It is vicious but artificial enough to pass as fun. What keeps it alive is the brilliance of its writing, its wicked wit. What probably made Guthrie believe in Dinner at Eight is its clever construction and box-office shrewdness. But beyond that I suspect he felt that the wealthy middle class is very much now as it was thirty-five years ago —not corrupt so much as silly. If the play were more literate, its people more than the sketchiest of stage effigies, he might have a point. To convince us that the play exists as a play Guthrie felt he could rely on his immense gifts as a director.

There are some delightful bits of business. For example, when the floosie is berated and very nearly beaten by her crude keeper, she consoles herself by cuddling a teddy bear. In fear of actual fisticuffs, Guthrie has the girl cower in her clothes closet among the silks and

IN SASKATCHEWAN...

- At a rapidly growing new campus of an established University.
- Where student sport is only "for fun" and there is no fraternity system.
- Where "town-gown" relations are mutually respectful and ethnic diversity resists the cultural "melting-pot."
- Where social innovations (e.g. Medicare) and a range of developmental stages (from the hunting-and-fishing economy of Northern Indians and Metis to the urban centers of the South) provide a natural laboratory for social research.
- Where all research is unclassified.
- Where a divisional academic organization permits a combination of interdisciplinary and traditional teaching and research.
- Where the sun shone 87 per cent of the days in 1965, and winters are tough and challenging, and the summers beautiful.

You are invited to apply for the following positions for 1967-68—

Anthropology—
1 position.

Economics—
2 positions. One in mathematical economics and one in econometrics. One may teach half time and work in Sample Survey Center. The other may teach half time in Economics and half time in School of Administration.

Geography—
2 positions in Human or, if you prefer, Cultural Geography.

History—
4 positions: 2 in Canadian, 1 in Modern English, 1 in American History.

Sociology—
4 positions, of which one may teach half time and work in Sample Survey Center, and another may teach half time in the Division and half time in Extension work.

Psychology—
6 positions, of which one may teach half time and work in Sample Survey Center, and another may teach half time and establish a programme in Student Counselling.

Communications—
1 position to work on new M.A. programme.

All positions filled according to qualifications

Salaries in current academic year—
Professor—$15,000 minimum
Associate Professor—$11,500 to $14,600
Assistant Professor—$8,200 to $11,100
Lecturer—$6,500 to $8,800
Instructor—$6,000 to $8,000

Reasonable allowances made for removal expenses.

Teaching duties:
Normal teaching load two classes for eight hours per week, September to April.

For further information, write to:

DALLAS W. SMYTHE, Chairman,
Division of the Social Sciences,
University of Saskatchewan Regina Campus, Regina, Canada

satins. When Mrs. Jordan is informed that the lobster aspic is not to be served at dinner (it was destroyed in the battle between the chauffeur and butler) she cries out in tones of Attic tragedy, "No aspic for dinner!" And the whole fracas of conflicting thematic chords at the curtain of the second act is hilarious. The final scene of the play too in which the hosts and all the guests hover in the drawing room before dinner is conducted like a Pavane, each couple adding another note of dignified dissonance to the grand exit to the feast which of course is a total bust.

NIGHT IN THE FOREST

1

A woman sleeps next to me on the earth. A strand of black hair flows out of her cocoon sleeping-bag, touching the earth hesitantly, as if thinking to take root.

2

A mountain-stream and the blood wind down their ancient labyrinths. And a few feet away charred stick-ends surround a heap of ashes, where burnt-out, vanished flames
absently waver, absently leap.

GALWAY KINNELL

Why despite these assets does the show work to a limited degree only? For two reasons: Guthrie shapes the scenes and external characterizations with skill and imagination, but does not cast the parts with a sufficiently sharp sense of type and does not help those he has cast with anything beyond their movements and byplay. Like most English directors he leaves the basic acting problems to the cast itself.

Many of the players, whatever their age, seem too young for their parts. This in a way is a social phenomenon. Americans of 40 in bygone days looked like people with forty years of life experience. Many of the present cast somehow strike one as kids. If the play were done by kids (at a regional or university theatre, let us say), the show might come closer to Guthrie's conception of it as a perhaps meaningful frolic. If the actors seemed more mature, if there were greater type verisimilitude in the casting, the play's satiric potential might be realized.

Guthrie is a man without malice, so the play has no sting; and for gay sport the actors are not free or extravagant enough. Most of them, working loyally and intelligently, are suspended between the two possibilities of satire or spoof.

Exception should be made for Blanche Yurka as the Jordan cook and for Daniel Keyes in a bit part as a justifiably irascible square. Pamela Tiffin is luscious and comes off well because her youth and softness (she is not the 29-year-old toughie of the script) give the role wistfulness (she curtsies every time she meets a guest at the dinner party), a quality which seems to correspond to Guthrie's sense of the play. If this is so, I conclude that he has not succeeded in finding a clearly marked style to serve his interpretation or his enthusiasm.

Off-Broadway organizations are beginning to get the idea: it is well worth while, it may even prove a pleasure, to see "old" American plays. Of course most of them will be "dated," but may that not be part of their charm? Why is a play which smacks of its period necessarily dull? A person who speaks of himself as "a man of the sixties" makes me think: "In that case in 1970 you will be ten years old." No wonder we have so much difficulty in growing up.

Now that the Wilder one-acters have attracted an audience numerous enough to warrant moving them to the Orpheum Theatre on Second Avenue, the City Center has initiated an American Playwrights Series with The Country Girl by Clifford Odets. The weakness of the series (but no reason for scorning it) is that the plays may be insufficiently rehearsed —although Stanislavsky once said: "If you haven't time enough to rehearse a play for as long as it should be rehearsed, two weeks will do."

The Country Girl is the thinnest of Odets' plays. (Is it too cynical to say that that is one cause for its having been more successful than several other of his better plays?) It is straightforward, clear and effective on a simple level. It is warmed by the subjective heat of Odets' desire to explain certain of his own personal flaws and to confess his need for the help of a patient and trusting woman, as well as for the aid of an artistically and humanly loyal companion in the theatre. It is above all a play which demands superb acting.

While Uta Hagen was excellent in the original (1951) production, Paul Kelly was not up to the central part. Michael Redgrave, on reliable report, played it magnificently in London where the play was a solid hit. Franchot Tone was scheduled to play the role at City Center and began rehearsing it when he fell ill. My guess is that he would have been very fine.

Joseph Anthony stepped in. He plays the failing old actor well but it is not "his" part. He makes sense but not pathos. What the part calls for is an aura of grandeur. As the actor's wife, Jennifer Jones comports herself nicely rather than impressively. Rip Torn as the director who works with fierce devotion to restore the actor's confidence and powers is most fittingly cast. I was glad to see the play again.

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

ACADEMIC VACANCIES
IN CANADIAN UNIVERSITIES AND COLLEGES
A list of teaching and administrative openings is published in November, February and April by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, 151 Slater, Ottawa 4, Canada.
Annual subscription: $2.00

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

10-17-66
THE NATION
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage [illegible] a year extra)
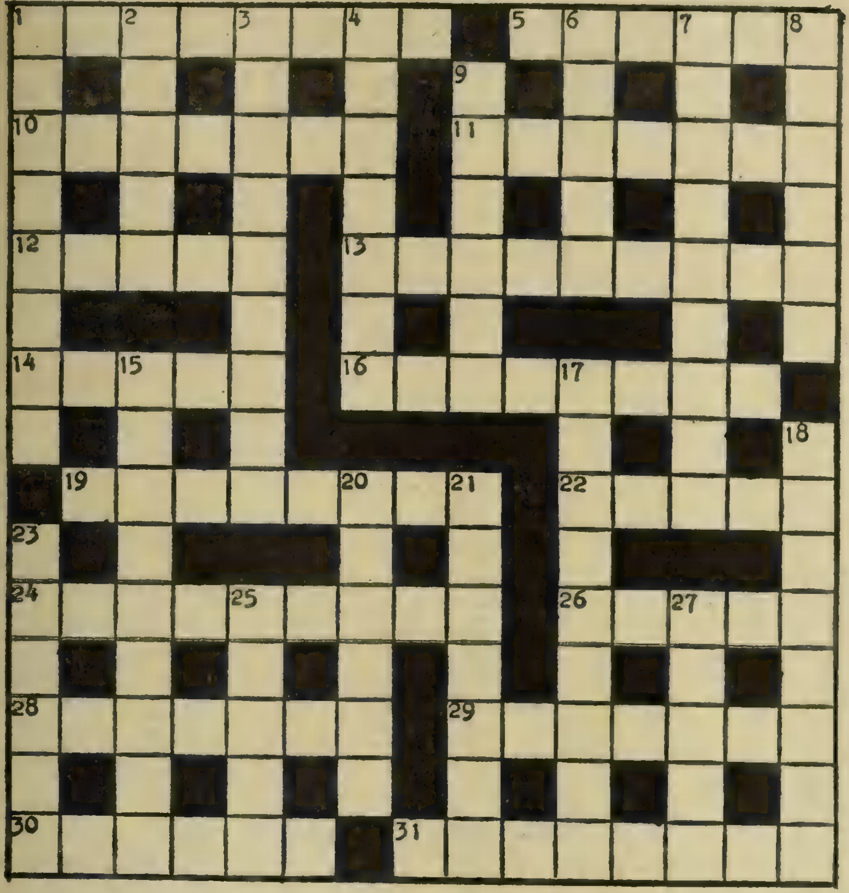
NAME ____
ADDRESS ____
CITY ____
STATE ____ ZIP NO. ____

Crossword Puzzle No. 1171

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 This soup's ads aren't very substantial, even when blown up. (8)
5 and 29 Play with what Pooh liked? (1, 5, 2, 5)
10 Dying, it seems, should be a stately condition. (7)
11 A hint to keep out a soldier? (7)
12 The color of the poet's last bloomers? (5)
13 This fared rather badly, as divers usually go. (4-5)
14 Don't let the sound of the timekeepers get under your skin! (5)
16 Did a real turn for the head of state at one time. (8)
19 The headgear's shade just about tops everything! (8)
22 Should this make a light beam? (5)
24 Sam Weller should have been! (9)
26 Count ill-favored, but up to now contained. (5)
28 The cheese is soft and the pudding is plain! (7)
29 See 5 across
30 Potentially deadly part of your tennis technique? (6)
31 Chief country where Kipling's fire sinks? (8)

DOWN:

1 If the lady is to change make-up, expect an appearance in society. (8)
2 Hamlet's man was like one in action. (5)
3 Fit with such things [illegible] might be objective, for example—but their habits might be yours. (9)
4 Water with the hose? Not when this! (3-4)
6 A possible title for all takers. (5)
7 Where one goes up and down and round and round. (9)
8 Turns inside out. (6)
9 Grace doesn't exemplify such a position. (6)
15 Part of a letter? (9)
17 Marched out into the open. (9)
18 Talked of peace, perhaps where the wild deer play. (8)
20 A paladin to exist in alternative surroundings. (6)
21 Certain items of value might be dependent on it. (7)
23 Jars of grain? (6)
25 A course followed? College men might go out for it. (5)
27 Friendly when proper, otherwise light and moving. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1170

ACROSS: 8 Procrastination; 9 Swatch; 10 Wardrobe; 11 Ends; 13 Unredeemed; 15 Dadaism; 16 Banners; 19 Scorecards; 21 Soon; 22 Cupboard; 24 Rancho; 26 Stand on ceremony. DOWN: 1 Drawing accounts; 2 Scot; 3 Bathtubs; 4 Steward; 5 Snored; 6 Stir; 7 Double or nothing; 12 Stair; 14 Ernes; 17 Assurers; 18 Predict; 20 Crayon; 23 Bond; 25 Nome.

PUBLICATIONS

THE MODERN UTOPIAN—news about social change agencies/intentional communities. Free Directory. Bi-monthly, $4.00 year, (Sample copy 75c). Tufts Box 44, Boston 53, Mass.

Read THE TORTURE OF MOTHERS by Truman Nelson. Send $1 to: GARRISON PRESS, 15 Olive Street, Newburyport, Mass.

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FOREIGN PAPERBACKS and Discount Books. Free lists. P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, California 94577.

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open
Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation, its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.
$2 postpd., 200 pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller [illegible] the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

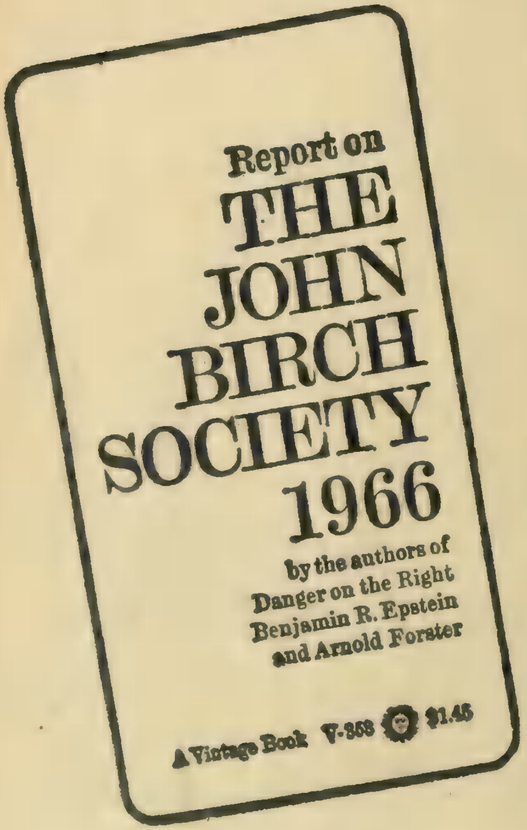
1,000 NAME & ADDRESS Gummed Labels $1.00. Order or ask for variety of free samples. Discount to fund raisers. Label Co., 90A Mill St., Newton, Mass. 02159.

NEW religion for Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Atheists. Free details. L. J. Casselman, 1301 H Street, Sacramento, Calif. 95814.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c [illegible] line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

FREE! With every new subscription to THE NATION



Report on
THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY 1966 by the authors of Danger on the Right
Benjamin R. Epstein
and Arnold Forster

A Vintage Book V-368 $1.45

THE BIRCHERS:

- Who they are
- What they want
- How they work
- The real extent of their power and influence today

"This is pamphleteering in the classic sense. The authors who have collaborated on previous books, including Report on the Ku Klux Klan, are never shrill. The Report is a revealing tour through the theory and practice of the philosophy of Robert Welch and the influential forces behind him."

—William Hogan in the San Francisco Chronicle

For your FREE copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY, fill out the coupon below, and start receiving THE NATION, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ____________________

ADDRESS ____________________

CITY ______________ STATE ______________ ZIP No. ______

10-17-66

CHRISTINA STEAD JOSE YGLESIAS

THE
NATION

OCTOBER 24, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.
OCT 22 1966

Fearsome Antagonist THE PRESS CORPS' CASE AGAINST JOHNSON

Charles Roberts

1-22-67 PLS-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

campus names

Stanford, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Frank J. Donner states that "A [House Committee on Un-American Activities] investigator had obtained from Stanford University lists of student members of certain registered campus organizations" ["HUAC: From Pillory to Farce," The Nation, Sept. 5].

This statement is somewhat misleading. In response to a HUAC subpoena and on advice of counsel, the university provided the committee with the names of officers of four student organizations. While an organization must provide evidence that at least five members of the university community are interested in its activities, the university neither requires nor maintains membership lists for any organization.

Bob Beyers, Director, News Service,
Stanford University

correction

Two most unfortunate printers' errors appeared in "Marx and Shame" by Harvey Swados (The Nation, Oct. 10). Where Mr. Swados characterized 19th-century Russia as a "seemingly hopelessly reactionary" social order, the word "hopelessly" was dropped; and where he cited Prof. Conor Cruise O'Brien as believing that "Socialist academics already had sufficient to do within the areas of their own competence," the word "Stalinist" was substituted for "Socialist."—The Editors.

Stalin at home and abroad

Bronxville, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: In his article "Why We Fear Peasants in Revolt" [The Nation Sept. 26] Barrington Moore, Jr., presents us with an interesting but questionable argument: (a) If we deny that "Stalinist socialism played any significant part in bringing on the cold war" (b) "from that it would follow that under Stalin the Soviet Union constituted a freer, more humane society than did the capitalist democracies, in the years after the Second World War and a long time previously." Such an argument puts "an enormous strain on the organs of credulity," he concludes.

But the strain for me is in accepting Professor Moore's logic. He is suggesting that anyone who saw Soviet policy in the early postwar years as a defensive reaction to our own aggressive cold-war mentality must also deny the existence of purges, labor camps and censorship and be an apologist for all features of Soviet society. But it does not at all "follow" that a nation's domestic and foreign policy bear a one-to-one relationship to each other. The same Stalin who crushed all real and imagined opposition within his country may well have conducted himself in a conciliatory and cautious spirit when facing the world after World War II.

How much longer do we take the internal crimes of Stalinism as prima-facie evidence of Soviet culpability in starting the cold war? . . . Michael Parenti

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: In the paragraph to which Professor Parenti refers, I was both summarizing and rejecting certain aspects of Marxism, having in mind its moral and political commitment to socialism. Perhaps I erred in giving the impression that the system has greater logical coherence than it does. The next paragraph gives my own views and explicitly rejects any one-to-one correspondence between foreign and domestic policies.

On more specific issues, it seems to me that Soviet caution after World War II probably reflected a lively

(Continued on page 419)

EDITORIALS

The Detente Rides Again

After many months of maintaining a rigid and even threatening countenance to mark its disapproval of the American role in Vietnam, the Soviet Union shows signs of warming up to a renewed dialogue with the United States. Its leaders and its press continue to denounce "American aggression," but recent concrete moves indicate that Moscow has decided to tread further the path of peaceful coexistence with Washington.

This change is no doubt linked, at least in part, to the continuing deterioration of Sino-Soviet relations. After the October 1 demonstrations in Peking and the expulsion of students from each other's country, the break between China and Russia seems beyond repair. The natural counterweight is closer relations with the West, and especially with the United States. There are many reasons to believe that all along the Soviet leadership would have liked to continue developing its ties with the United States in spite of the Vietnamese conflict but was prevented from doing so by the fear of providing fuel for Peking's propaganda successes with other Communist parties, especially in Asia, Africa and Latin America. In a remarkably short time the Chinese regime has lost considerable ground in its ideological struggle, and the excesses of the Red Guards have contributed to its isolation from the rest of the Communist world. Peking's inroads in the developing countries have been cut short, if not rolled back (as in Indonesia). Moscow has therefore regained a greater freedom of action.

The détente started moving again a few weeks ago with the announcement of a long-delayed American-Soviet agreement for a direct air link between the two countries. It developed further in talks between Soviet Minister Gromyko and Secretary Rusk, which have focused on two main topics: an international treaty to regulate activities in space and insure the demilitarization of the moon and other celestial bodies, and an agreement designed to halt the spread of nuclear weapons.

After a fairly auspicious beginning, negotiations on the space treaty had stalled when the Russians suddenly insisted on complete and obligatory reciprocity of rights to the use of tracking stations. This meant extending automatically to the Soviet Union the clause of "the most favored nation" in matters of space observation. After Ambassador Goldberg offered technical talks on this subject leading to the usual bilateral agreements, the Soviet delegation produced a revised version of its space treaty with considerably toned-down requests. Consultations are now proceeding smoothly enough, and the prospect of concluding and signing the treaty during the present session of the General Assembly is foreseen by both sides. This event would be hailed as a very important step in the détente, whereas only recently it seemed doubtful that the USSR would co-sign with the United States any meaningful agreement as long as the Vietnamese conflict continued.

The treaty on nonproliferation is much more complex and does not depend solely on the two superpowers. However, any progress has been prevented from the outset by basic disagreement between Washington and Moscow over limited nuclear sharing by West Germany. The fading of prospects for NATO's nuclear integration has eased the situation, and Andrei Gromyko has made unusually optimistic statements, which among other things concede the sincerity of the American desire to reach agreement.

JAN 25
~~MAY 18~~

He has expressed similar feelings toward the United States' junior partner, Britain, and has invited to Moscow Foreign Secretary George Brown, whose predecessor was snubbed when he tried to mediate in the Vietnamese War. True, Mr. Gromyko has again refused Mr. Brown's appeal for convening the Geneva Conference, but statements from Moscow, which had previously listed a whole series of conditions for initiating peace talks, are now selecting the cessation of bombings as the condition which would open the way for negotiations.

The Administration has always been eager to make concrete progress in its relationship with Moscow, but up to very recently it was rebuffed in direct proportion to the escalation of the Vietnamese operations. President Johnson's stepped-up campaign for an accommodation with Eastern Europe, on the eve of the Manila Conference and the November elections, seems to be well timed from the point of view of Soviet receptivity.

The crucial test—for Washington as well as for Moscow—will be whether the renewed dialogue can break the Vietnamese diplomatic deadlock and whether Moscow is willing and able to play broker with Hanoi.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

What About Priorities?

A recent two-day conference at Columbia University was devoted to a discussion of "The National Priorities Problem: Choices and Consequences." Called by the indefatigable Seymour Melman and a group of faculty associates, it gave rise to nine illuminating papers on such topics as "The Garrison Society," "The Economic Consequences of Vietnam," "The Decay of American Cities," "The World Poverty Gap," etc. The question of priorities is obviously crucial. The mystery is why some alert and ambitious politician—say Sen. Robert Kennedy—has not perceived its enormous political opportunity.

Using only minimum figures and relying largely on government reports and official data, Melman inventories $76 billion a year of appropriations needed for a variety of programs: housing, health, education, transportation, natural resources, water and power, elimination of stream and air pollution, waste disposal.

The sum is large, but the money exists; however, today it is not going into constructive projects. Military spending, space and the AEC account for about $79 billion a year, or three-fourths of the federal budget. Patently something has to give. Awesome our gross national product may be, but it is still expressed in twelve digits. Hence the priorities problem. It is clear that the President has quietly abandoned his own contention that the American economy could sustain a steadily widening war, provide all the conveniences and luxuries that the middle and upper classes regard as their due, and simultaneously launch The Great Society.

Not so long ago, Mr. Johnson was uplifting Appalachia

IN THIS ISSUE

October 24, 1966

EDITORIALS

402

ARTICLES

406 The Press Views LBJ:
Fearsome Antagonist
Charles Roberts

411 Mississippi: The New Plantations
Marvin Hoffman and John Mudd

415 Iran: Politics of Anti-Americanism
Majid Tehranian

418 To Die in Vietnam
William Eastlake

BOOKS & THE ARTS

420 Marking Off a Chunk of England
Jose Yglesias

421 In the Air of Several Worlds
Harold Clurman

422 Leaving Out the Letter "E"
Frank J. Donner

425 The Seal of Approval
Charles R. Larson

426 Where the Stakes Are Real
Charles L. Sanford

427 Theatre
Julius Novick

428 Records
Benjamin Boretz

429 Films
Robert Hatch

429 The Mailman and Das Ewig Weibliche (poem)
James Schevill

431 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 13

and getting credit for his humanitarianism. In the Charleston Gazette—such promises are not quickly forgotten in West Virginia—Harry Ernst reports from Washington that Governor Hulett C. Smith returned from a recent White House conference with orders to defer construction projects "in an effort to restrain the war-heated economy." The Governor, Ernst pointed out, "really doesn't have much of a choice because the President is in the process of trimming the federal aid which feeds most state construction projects." Among other projects that are being deferred in West Virginia is a $1 million expenditure to enable county school systems to take advantage of National Defense Education Funds, and $500,000 for vocational education. These cutbacks will hardly cool off the war-heated economy, but they indicate what is happening in various federal agencies and in those states where the politicians do not vociferously press their demands.

Aside from money considerations, priorities involve allocations of skilled manpower, which is always in short supply. It is impossible to tie up a major part of the country's most advanced scientists and engineers in military research and development without starving other fields of national interest. On this ground alone priorities should be an issue of national debate. The problem should be seen in the large so that people will understand what options exist. Our present politics are largely on the make-believe level, politicians vying with one another to make elections as meaningless as possible. An honest grappling with priorities would do much to restore reality to the hustings.

Our Bourbon Allies

In the October 9 New York Times Magazine, Neil Sheehan, under the autobiographical title "Not a Dove, But No Longer a Hawk," presents the most candid and shocking account of the Vietnamese War to date. Sheehan is qualified: he served as the Times correspondent in Vietnam for two years, beginning in April, 1962; then returned for another year in 1965. This second tour ended last August. Sheehan's dispatches were not notably expostulatory; another Times correspondent, David Halberstam, raised considerably more hell during his stay. But now that it is over for him, Sheehan has unburdened himself with redoubled force.

The gist of his revelations is that the United States intervened in a class war, a war in which the mandarin caste and its mercenaries were and are arrayed against the Communists, with the bulk of the rural population in the middle. Involuntarily—for he went to Vietnam as a supporter of the U.S. crusade and still sees no way out—Sheehan is a witness for the Vietcong and the North Vietnamese. He shows how in the first Indo-China war, the native aristocracy cooperated with the colonial French. "Now," he says, "the same Vietnamese, for identical reasons, cooperate with the United States." Among these coadjutors or, to use a less polite term, quislings, is the current premier, Nguyen Cao Ky, once a pilot for the French. Other members of the ruling junta were likewise officers or sergeants in the French forces. "They are the Vietnamese who have inherited the worst of two cultures—the pretentiousness of the native mandarins and the rigidity of the French colonial officers and administrators." Plus, he could have added, a massive dose of American hypocrisy.

All measures for reform, in land ownership for instance, "have been sabotaged because the regimes were and are composed of men who are members of, or who are allied with, mandarin families that held title to properties they have no intention of renouncing. While there are some patriotic and decent individuals among them, most of the men who run Saigon have, like the Bourbons, learned nothing and forgotten nothing. They seek to retain what privileges they have and to regain those they have lost. . . . The Communist Party is the one truly national organization that permeates both North and South Vietnam. . . . The Communists, despite their brutality and deceit, remain the only Vietnamese capable of rallying millions of their countrymen to sacrifice and hardship in the name of the nation and the only group not dependent on foreign bayonets."

A more corrupt regime probably has never battened on the lives and treasure of a great power in modern times. Sheehan says that American officials with long experience in Vietnam estimate that about 20 per cent of U.S. aid supplied for counterinsurgency projects in the countryside finds its way to the Vietcong, while another 30 to 40 per cent is diverted by government officials. "What gets down to the poor son of a bitch in the paddy field," one U.S. official told Sheehan, "is a trickle." Complaints from the U.S. Embassy led Ky to warn his fellow generals that "they were embezzling too much and should exercise some restraint. Their reply was that they had to think of their families." Ky then publicly executed a lone Chinese businessman.

The moral effects are what one would expect: "Bars and bordellos, thousands of young Vietnamese women degrading themselves as bar girls and prostitutes, gangs of hoodlums and beggars and children selling their older sisters and picking pockets have become ubiquitous features of urban life." In a parallel manifestation of "GI culture," the countryside is ravaged by American bombs and chemical defoliants. More than a million displaced peasants crowd the refugee camps, where the government leaves most of them to shift for themselves. Both the urban and rural societies of an ancient civilization are being destroyed.

Sheehan, now serving as the Times correspondent at the Pentagon, ends his account on a note of near despair. As he sees it, we have gone too far to retreat. We shall have to put up with our mandarin allies, continue to rely on our magnificent killing machine, and hope that its efficiency will be so high that "someday" it will bring us to a "favorable" settlement.

One can appreciate his dilemma, one can even feel a twinge of sympathy for him as he hangs suspended between hawks and doves; just the same it is a strange position for a man of his discernment and compassion.

Confrontation at Latrobe

During the first week of October, residents of the greater Pittsburgh area who dialed the local Birchite "Let Freedom Ring" number were told that "the international Communist conspiracy suffered a major defeat" from a right-wing razzle-dazzle aimed at forcing the cancellation of a college forum.

This event had caused reporters and television cameras on October 3-4 to converge on Latrobe, a community some 40 miles east of Pittsburgh, where the most unlikely antagonists turned out to be 120-year-old St. Vincent College, conducted by the Benedictine monks, and a noisy crowd of right-wing extremists.

The script was familiar: a student organization with the sanction of the administration and encouragement of the faculty, had scheduled a seminar on Marxism, and had further shocked conservative community opinion by inviting a real live Communist to lecture. The Birchite troops, of course, became his best advance men and focused attention on a seminar that would have otherwise gone unnoticed beyond the campus.

Three hours before Dr. Herbert Aptheker, the Communist historian, and his three fellow panelists were scheduled to begin "A Week's Study on Communism" in the college auditorium, some 200 pickets appeared at the campus entrance. The Benedictines, who along with student association leaders had been receiving numerous telephone threats, reported a call that a bomb was located in the building.

State police had been advised by the college months earlier that the seminar and its controversial participant might provoke demonstrations. Instead of undertaking to impose order, however, the cops urged cancellation of the forum "for public safety." They would even be happy to escort Dr. Aptheker off the campus.

At this point, the Benedictines departed from the script. Instead of knuckling under to the Birchites at the gates, they suspended classes for one day, so that all 800 students and an additional 300 seminarians might attend the seminar. A packed student union—with closed-circuit television bringing the proceedings to overflow audiences in two additional buildings—heard the Communist, a New Left defector (Philip Abbot Luce), a Hungarian general and a political scientist discuss Marxism and answer questions.

With the exception of the press, youthful state police in collegiate dress and obvious FBI types detailed to cover Aptheker, the program was limited to the academic community. The bomb intimidation moved St. Vincent President Maynard J. Brenan to say that only a "vociferous minority" had opposed the seminar, and to note that some were incensed because a Catholic college was playing host to a Communist.

"But why not a Catholic campus?" Father Brenan asked. "If anything, 'Catholic' implies open-mindedness, fairness, justice and charity above all. We must be open to dialogue, questioning, constant change." The students agreed. They denounced the pressure and observed that a Birch sound truck had rallied the pickets with emotional charges of "treason on campus while our boys are dying in Vietnam."

Father Brenan and the student leaders held a press conference three days after the truncated "Week's Study" took place. They told of the well-financed campaign to intimidate, the threats and the bomb scare. "Christian Crusaders" of Billy James Hargis were on campus in cars with Oklahoma plates, radio time was purchased, leaflets distributed.

But in the end the Birchers only dramatized the fact that it could be dangerous to conduct a lawful assembly on a college campus, that the police would rather cancel than protect such a meeting and that academic freedom has come of age in places that have not always espoused it.

'Traitors To Their Constituents'

In discussing whether the Constitution contained adequate safeguards against usurpation of power by the military, the 26th "Federalist Paper" found reassurance in the fact that Congress would be obliged, at least once in every two years, "to deliberate upon the propriety of keeping a military force on foot; to come to a new resolution on the point; and to clear their sense of the matter, by formal vote in the face of their constituents." The inference was that a member would become "a traitor to his constituents" if he were to give free rein to the military, and the aggrieved constituents would rise up and deal with the miscreant who had so abused his power.

Much of the thought of the founding fathers, so cogent in the context of the late 18th century, has this same air of quaint irrelevance today. In The Professional Soldier: a Social and Political Portrait (1960), Morris Janowitz quotes Lewis Dexter, who interviewed selected members of Congress, as saying that "no one with whom I talked ever maintained that Congress has any significant role in the formulation of military policies." Such is the effect of imposing, permanently it would seem, a huge military establishment on a country that for the major part of its existence had little use for large standing armies or naval forces.

A striking confirmation of the impotence of Congress in ruling the military establishment is to be found in the action of the House on an amendment to the military appropriations measure, at the session of October 11. The House voted 305 to 42 to give the President power to call up any unit of the ready reserve for a period not to exceed twenty-four months, without declaring a national emergency. The Senate passed the same measure by voice vote. Usually Congress has insisted on its right to approve mobilizations; President Kennedy obtained approval to call up the reserves at the time of the Berlin crisis. Now Congress has relinquished even this remnant of its power and responsibility to declare war, and until June 30, 1968, the President can call up individuals and units of the reserve without further ado.

The President has never requested authority to summon reservists to active duty without the normal prerequisite of a declaration of national emergency. Congress acted this time of its own volition in a matter where the Executive has traditionally taken the initiative. Apparently some members, Senator Russell, for example, feel so strongly that some reserve units should be called up that they insisted on thrusting this power on the President.

Regardless of what considerations may have prompted it, this is an extraordinary delegation of power to the President—to any President. Yet it has been done, and with little public notice or concern. It would seem that for the public, as well as Congress, a new era has dawned, in which the old safeguards are no longer treasured.

The author of the 26th "Federalist Paper," whose ashes have long since become "siftings on siftings in oblivion," was, of course, Alexander Hamilton—no negligible fighter himself when there was fighting to be done, and for these many decades admired beyond all the other founders by the well heeled and well born. Apparently he too has been cast away, and the ship sails on over uncharted waters.

THE PRESS VIEWS LBJ

FEARSOME ANTAGONIST

CHARLES ROBERTS

Mr. Roberts has been Newsweek's Washington correspondent for twelve years. His LBJ's Inner Circle was published by Delacorte.

Washington

In the historic East Room of the White House, its grandeur only slightly marred by the blinking red eyes and snaking cables of TV cameras, President Johnson laid down two big news stories for the Washington press corps on October 6. At one of his rare live-TV news conferences, he announced plans for his 25,000-mile, six-nation Asian-Pacific tour and named career diplomat Llewellyn Thompson as Ambassador to the Soviet Union.

In the question period that followed his announcements Mr. Johnson's answers were, for the most part, substantive and responsive to the questions asked. (He said firmly, for instance, that he had "no plans" to support segregationist Democratic gubernatorial candidates in the South.) Even more remarkable, his replies were delivered in good humor. He had no complaints about recent stories misrepresenting his position, nor did he cut off correspondents in mid-question or browbeat any who presumed to ask searching questions in sensitive areas.

It was the President's seventy-eighth press conference in less than thirty-five months — and one of his best performances. To "regular" White House reporters who have covered most of his conferences, at home and away, there was a simple explanation for the President's good behavior: he was on TV.

When it comes to meeting the reporters, the regulars learned long ago, there are two President Johnsons. In his office, where most conferences are held, without benefit of TV cameras, the President is a fearsome antagonist. The transcripts of these encounters, printed in only two or three newspapers, rarely show how severely the President deals with questions—or questioners—he doesn't like. The other Lyndon Johnson emerges when TV cameras are projecting him into the living rooms of Keokuk and Alhambra. (He has had just twenty live-TV conferences.) Then he is the very model of a modern President—courteous, smiling, sincere, uncomplaining, exuding information and brimming with bonhomie.

Washington newsmen can and do live with this schizophrenic situation, but the President's news conferences are only a small, though highly visible, part of his dealings with the press. His press relations, which go on for 365 days a year, are a more complicated—and a sadder—story. It is a story that needs telling not because there are some disgruntled reporters in Washington but because the press (including radio and TV) is still the primary means of communication between the President and the American people.

It is, in fact, his primary means of communication with the world. A President may be a formidable man in face-to-face encounters, as Lyndon Johnson is when he administers the "treatment" to a visiting head of state. He may fire off 100 letters a day and he may be tremendously effective on the telephone. Lyndon Johnson has made the phone an instrument of national policy. But what he has to say publicly—whether to officials of his own Administration, to President de Gaulle, to Premier Ky in Saigon, to an unruly left-wing faction on a Caribbean island, or to warring Watusi tribesmen in Africa—he must communicate through the press if he is really to be heard.

At the same time, in its reporting of what he says and does, the press has a unique opportunity and responsibility to hold the President accountable for the conduct of his office. If the press is, as its owners insist, a public trust, then it must examine his every act critically. And, in the Presidential press conference, it has the opportunity to raise questions on behalf of the public, to make him answerable to his vast constituency.

The Presidential press conference is still our nearest equivalent to—and in some ways an improvement on—the time-honored question period in the British House of Commons. This is an important relationship then, not just for newsmen or the President, but for the welfare of the country. It is, in fact, as Walter Lippmann has said, "a great matter of state."

The first thing to be said about Presidential press relations, in fairness to Mr. Johnson, is that friction between the Chief Executive and newsmen and news media did not originate with Mr. Johnson; it is as old as the Presidency itself. George Washington, who was generally scornful of "publick" printers, nevertheless resorted to the primitive device of playing favorites to get a good press. He handed the only copy of one of his most important speeches to a single Philadelphia newspaper. Other papers called him "treacherous," "mischievous," "inefficient" and "pusillanimous."

When he submitted the first draft of his Farewell Address to the first Presidential ghost writer, Alexander Hamilton, it contained a passage striking back at the press for its abuse of him. It was Hamilton, apparently, who struck out the passage, thus establishing a rule that some wise politicians still follow: Don't fight the press, or, in more earthy terms, don't get in a spraying contest with a skunk.

Washington's successor, John Adams, had a simpler idea for getting things printed just the way he wanted them to appear. He proposed the establishment of a paper that would speak for the President. Thomas Jefferson, the man who said he would prefer a nation without a government to a nation without newspapers, seemed to prefer a nation with just one newspaper while he was President. He designated a single journal, the National Intelligencer, as his mouthpiece. Not surprisingly, he was accused in other papers of being an atheist, keeping a mistress, trying to seduce a friend's wife and padding his expense accounts.

This led Jefferson to make a cynical proposal which I can almost hear Lyndon Johnson making today. Jefferson suggested, half seriously, that editors should divide their papers into sections labeled "Truths," "Probabilities," "Possibilities" and "Lies." The first section, he observed wryly, would be the smallest and the last the biggest.

Almost every President since has shared this acid feeling toward the press when things weren't going his way —when he was having trouble prosecuting a frustrating war (the Civil War, the Korean War or the Vietnamese War); when he was embarrassed by the misdeeds of his associates (the tribulations of Grant, Harding, Truman, Eisenhower and Lyndon Johnson come to mind); or when the press pried into his family affairs (here you can name any of the thirty-five men who have held the office).

The Presidents have struck back at their tormentors in various ways. Theodore Roosevelt, though he was the first President to provide working space for the press in the White House, shunned correspondents he disliked, while lavishing exclusive stories on "reliable" reporters.

Woodrow Wilson, who in 1913 conceived the Presidential press conference as we now know it—"to take the people of the country into his confidence"—lost confidence in his own invention and simply stopped seeing the reporters.

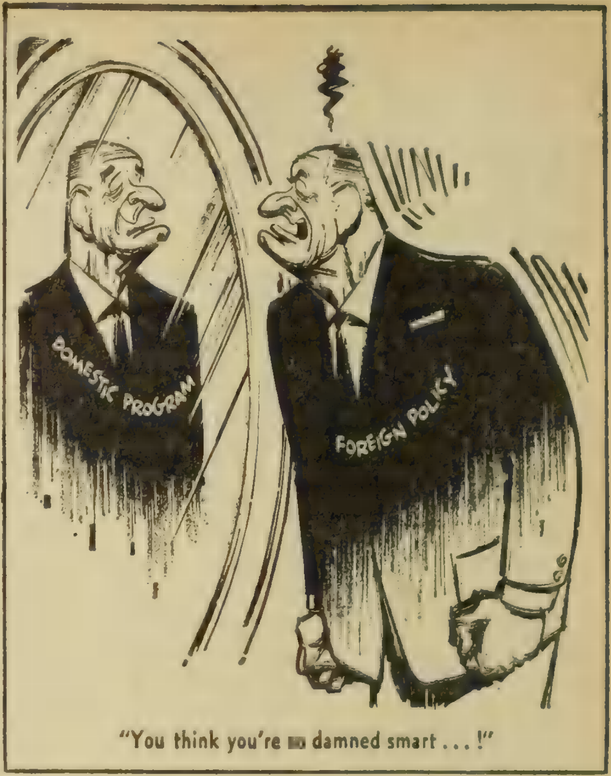
Franklin D. Roosevelt, though generally regarded as the most adept President at handling newsmen, once tried to stand a reporter in a corner with a dunce cap on his head and, on another occasion, awarded the German Iron Cross to a correspondent he thought had given comfort to the Nazis. Harry Truman, in a sulfurous letter, threatened to kick a Washington Post music critic where it would hurt the most for writing an unsympathetic review of his daughter's vocal efforts. Even President Eisenhower, whose bland manner evoked gentle handling by the press, once stalked angrily out of a news conference when pressed on the subject of McCarthyism in his administration.

John F. Kennedy, almost as thin-skinned as President Johnson, made light of his bad notices with the deft paraphrase that he was "reading more now but enjoying it less." But this did not alter the fact that he phoned reporters to complain about their stories, that he peevishly canceled his subscription to the New York Herald Tribune, and that on at least one occasion he phoned a publisher in an effort to have a reporter taken off an assignment. The New York Times left David Halberstam where he was—in Vietnam—and Halberstam won a Pulitzer Prize.

It is clear from history, then, that the relations between press and President never have run smooth—at least not for long. But never in the past decade of off-again-on-again Presidential press relations have those relations been off for as long as they have been under Mr. Johnson.

There is no way to measure press relations, but all evidence suggests that Mr. Johnson's are the worst since an aloof, embittered and inept Herbert Hoover pulled into a depression foxhole in 1931 and asked the press, in effect, to leave him alone. That was, by coincidence, the year that Lyndon Johnson first came to Washington, as an aide to a Texas Congressman. It is one of the ironies of the present situation that when he succeeded to the office Mr. Johnson had had more experience in dealing with the press (a period of thirty-two years) than had any President before him.

After he became President at Dallas, LBJ enjoyed a traditional press honeymoon of three or four months. During that abbreviated era of good feelings, newsmen swam naked with the President in the White House pool, attended Kaffeeklatsches in his office, and enjoyed beer barbecues at the LBJ Ranch. Though it was sometimes difficult to make notes on the President's "background" thoughts while clutching a barbecued rib in one hand and a paper cup of beer in the other, there was almost a spirit of camaraderie.



"You think you're so damned smart . . . !"

Conrad: Los Angeles Times

During those first four months, White House regulars —the handful of reporters who cover the President daily, at home or on the road—amused themselves by trying to guess when and where Mr. Johnson would hold his next press conference. He tried a dozen different formats, including one on a bale of hay at the ranch.

A curtain of ice first descended between press and President in March, 1964, after reporters wrote that Johnson had sped at 80 or 90 miles an hour down a Texas highway in his white Lincoln Continental with a Dixie Cup of Pearl beer close at hand. The President had entertained us at his ranch that day. There was precious little drinking—of beer or anything else. When the first stories appeared, he felt, with some justification, that his hospitality had been violated. But in the aftermath there seemed to be no soul-searching on the part of the President who, after all, had endangered the life of the leader of the Free World. There was just anger at the press for printing the story. He has never been quite as relaxed with reporters since.

The speeding story was followed by a difficult period in which Mr. Johnson was surprisingly uncommunicative —for a man so garrulous. George Reedy, his then press secretary (he has had three in less than three years), tried to fill the word gap with a torrent of circumlocution, but was largely uninformative. Some of Mr. Reedy's long-winded answers used to remind me of the boy who was asked to spell "banana." "I know how to spell it," he said, "but I don't know when to stop."

As expected, the President thawed out during the 1964 campaign when he felt the need of a good press. But the situation was exacerbated, rather than helped, by his landslide victory that November. At his first post-election press conference, in a memorable thirty-minute session at the LBJ Ranch, he took four gratuitous slaps at the weary instant historians who had followed him through the campaign. A couple of examples: He ridiculed us for "premature" speculation about his intentions in Vietnam. The "speculation" all came true, in spades, a few months later. He told us we had "misled" our readers about the possibility that a Texas politician, Marvin Watson, would join his staff. A few weeks later, Watson joined his staff.

Since then, despite the fact that no President has worked harder to cultivate a good press—he is attracted to the press as is a moth to the flame—Mr. Johnson's press relations have suffered a steady erosion. Now, despite some heroic salvage efforts by his third press secretary, Bill D. Moyers, there is deep distrust on both sides. And during the period since his election the Administration's "credibility gap" has widened by a country mile.

On his side, Mr. Johnson has many complaints—some of them well founded—against the press. He is wary of "self-styled intellectuals" in the Washington press corps (a phrase he used in a San Antonio speech). He is weary of those recurring stories comparing his "style" with that of President Kennedy—a weariness that I share. No two Presidents have the same style, and style is not substance, as some Kennedy-worshiping LBJ critics contend. He cannot bear stories probing or guessing at his motives or intentions—which is a highly hazardous pastime in the case of so complicated and unpredictable a man.

Never reconciled to the fact that conflict makes bigger news than orderly events, he sees his minor embarrassments and reverses (such as an unfavorable vote in a Congressional committee) magnified, while his hard-won and significant victories (such as the establishment of a democratic government in the Dominican Republic) are relegated to the back pages. In short, he feels that he doesn't get a fair shake from those newsmen who follow him around like friends, but obviously aren't.

How do the newsmen feel about him? First, it should be made clear that few, if any, of Johnson's Boswells are against him on partisan grounds. Many, perhaps most, are advocates of both the Great Society and the Vietnamese War. Nearly all stand in awe of the President's back-breaking work schedule and his tremendous legislative record. Most agree that he has been the most accessible of Presidents. Mr. Johnson has seen more reporters individually and held far more news conferences in his first three years in office than did either President Eisenhower or President Kennedy.

But there is much more to press relations than accessibility and holding news conferences. The working White House reporters' grievances against the President divide roughly into five categories.

¶ Impediments to good reporting, minor annoyances, crop up with such regularity that they seem to be planned—perhaps by a vindictive President.

¶ The President is hypersensitive to criticism, or even to stories which may provoke criticism.

¶ The President has a passion for secrecy.

¶ His press conferences are proving unsatisfactory as a means of extracting information from him.

¶ And most important, it has become the fact that the White House, yea, even the President, cannot always be believed.

These grievances add up to a serious indictment and they therefore require substantiation. First, the minor irritants. Every business has them, but at the White House, under LBJ, they seem to be systematically manufactured, as if someone in there were saying: "Lets make it hard for those so-and-sos to do their jobs." Early in this Administration, for example, "pool" reporters—representing the entire White House press—were removed from the President's airplane, thereby cutting the contact we had maintained with him (and his predecessors) between jet stops.

After that, press planes (booked by the White House but paid for by the correspondents) began flying so far behind the President that on some trips reporters covering the President never saw him. On a trip to Princeton, N. J., the press plane was diverted to an outlying airport, and reporters had to make their way to the scene of a Presidential speech by commandeering a garbage truck. There are enough such examples to make it certain that such confusion doesn't just happen. (In Eisenhower's day, under James Hagerty, the planes, trains and mimeograph machines ran on time.)

Next, the President's thin skin—the thinnest in American politics today. His hypersensitivity to criticism, despite thirty-five years in public life, could be forgiven if Mr. Johnson took his lumps in retrospect like, say, Harry Truman, author of the famous political dictum: "If you can't stand the heat, get out of the kitchen"; or Winston Churchill, who said he didn't resent criticism "even when, for the sake of emphasis, it parts for the time with reality." President Johnson takes no such philosophical attitude. On the contrary, he is outraged by almost any story that portrays him in a less than flattering light. And when thus incensed, he habitually turns on the press as a whipping boy.

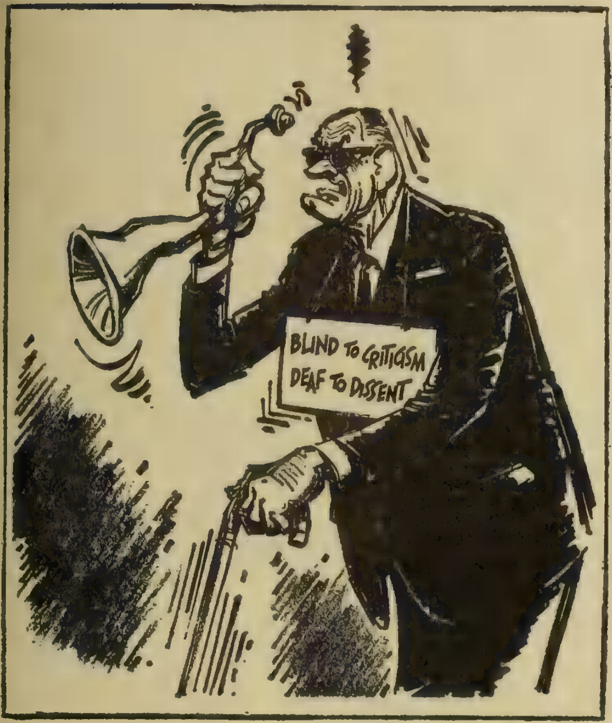
When he sent Secretary of State Rusk instead of Vice President Humphrey to Winston Churchill's funeral—and was criticized—he failed to acknowledge, except in a bitterly sarcastic jibe at the press, that he might have erred. It was the press that made an incident of it, he insisted.

When he angered a whole subcontinent by his abrupt and undiplomatic cancellation of invitations to Pakistan's President Ayub and India's Prime Minister Shastri, again it was those troublemaking reporters—not the President—who had stirred up a fuss.

Last spring, when the President intimated to a group of White House fellows that he might ask Congress for a tax increase soon if prices continued to rise, and the Associated Press duly reported his remarks, the President took an even more startling tack. He angrily blamed the conscientious A.P. White House correspondent for that day's $10 billion drop in prices on the New York Stock Exchange.

A phrase the President used in deploring the Ayub-Shastri stories gives some insight into his ideas about the functions of the press. When I asked at a news conference about the postponement of the visits, he glared and lamented that we had "speculated" about his reasons for telling the two Asian leaders, in effect, to unpack their bags. To Mr. Johnson "speculate," clearly, is a dirty word. And all stories ruminating on what he might do or why are branded "speculative," which is to say, evil.

Though for many years such stories, variously known as think pieces or thumbsuckers, have passed for public discussion of problems confronting the President, Mr. Johnson feels that they narrow his "options." Apparently the President thinks that the press should print the news, in tape-recorder fashion, just as he dictates it, without any unauthorized explanation, interpretation, background or speculation. If that day comes, it should be noted, there will be no need for White House correspondents—the Federal Register dutifully reports the President verbatim.



Conrad: Los Angeles Times

The President hates to be anticipated, and this relates to the third grievance—Mr. Johnson's love of secrecy. The timing of announcements is essential to both politics and statecraft. For years, we have heard a succession of White House press secretaries say: "When we have anything to announce we'll announce it." And most of us agree that a President should not "permit the priorities of the press to hustle the procedures of government."

But with Lyndon Johnson, secrecy is carried to such extremes that it sometimes seems to interfere with the orderly process of government, as well as with reasonable enterprise on the part of correspondents. The President, in fact, seems to have an Alice in Wonderland concept of the news. Like the Queen of Hearts, nothing is so until he says it's so. And if anyone in government says something is so before Mr. Johnson says it, he risks the fate of the Queen's courtiers.

Nothing angers him more than to have the name of a prospective Presidential appointee appear in the press before he makes the appointment. Last March he was furious when The Washington Post reported that he had decided to name Deputy Under Secretary of State U. Alexis Johnson as his ambassador to Japan.

After reading the report he barged into a news conference being conducted by Agriculture Secretary Orville Freeman to denounce it. He branded it "some kid's statement over at the State Department"—a phrase that was changed to "some*one's* statement" in the sanitized transcript of his remarks put out by the White House.

His obvious anger at being scooped by the Post made the future of Alex Johnson a forbidden subject at the State Department—until last month when Mr. Johnson, apparently having cooled down, made it official and named him our ambassador to Japan.

After many such instances, White House aides have adopted a policy of refusing to discuss even what kind of man the President might seek to fill any government job. I laughed, a year ago, when a member of the President's staff told me that if I printed the name of a likely candidate for a sub-Cabinet job, I would scuttle for all time that candidate's chances of getting the job. But then, last month, in a lecture to newsmen on the evils of speculation, the President virtually confirmed that that is his policy:

> When you see on the ticker that Oshkosh says that Bob Pierpoint may be named Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff [he said, looking at C.B.S. News Correspondent Robert Pierpoint] you don't necessarily give much credence to it, because the very fact that it is on there is the best indication that it is not likely to happen.

This is now known as "The Oshkosh Rule."

The fourth grievance is aimed at the quality of the President's press conferences. Mr. Johnson, as I have noted, holds enough of them. ("Enough of them" reminds me of Bill Moyers' reply when asked how long was the incision the surgeons made to remove the President's gall stones. His reply was "long enough.") As of the week of October 3, the President had faced the press seventy-eight times in less than thirty-five months—an average of better than two press conferences a month. But on qualitative, rather than quantitative analysis, LBJ's conferences fall below the standards set by his two immediate predecessors.

Unlike Eisenhower's and Kennedy's, which were scheduled and announced to correspondents in advance, Mr. Johnson's are known in advance only to LBJ. In most cases, White House correspondents are called into them with little or no advance warning. These "quickies" exclude journalists from other beats—the State Department, Justice, Treasury and the Pentagon—who might come to ask prepared, incisive, detailed questions in their areas. The regular White House correspondents, who must be specialists mainly on LBJ, rarely have time to prepare for a dialogue in which they, willy-nilly, speak for the voters.

The President is obviously aware of the advantage he carries into such a conference. In these impromptu meetings, a Presidential aide once boasted to me, the reporters "never lay a glove" on the champ. To make sure they don't, the President keeps reporters off balance by interrupting them, twitting them about the shortcomings of their profession, and bristling at those who probe into sensitive areas.

President Eisenhower, despite his tangled, five-star syntax, usually told us what he thought. Mr. Kennedy gave witty answers, but was basically an artful dodger. President Johnson, though he has a firmer grasp of issues than Eisenhower, and just as firm a purpose as JFK, is neither candid nor witty. Indeed, the President's purpose in his impromptu conferences seems to be to dominate and even intimidate the press rather than tell reporters what is on his mind.

Nothing the President does has engendered more hostility among newsmen than his constant deriding, belittling and berating of the press. If reporters could talk back to the President in his news conferences—which, by custom and in the interest of public safety, they can't—one of the first messages they would get to him would be: "Look, Mr. President, you run your business and let us run ours."

But the gravest of Johnson's errors in dealing with the press is not his continual criticism of it but his repeated efforts to try to fool the reporters, and hence the public. The fact that the President of the United States cannot always be believed is far more ominous for his and the country's future than his rudeness and lack of consideration toward journalists, his hypersensitivity or his passion for secrecy.

White House reporters who had not covered LBJ as a Senator got their first inkling of his deviousness, of his willingness to play a little fast and loose with the facts, less than a month after he took office. In his first press conference, asked about the federal budget he would send to Congress in January, 1964, the President pointed out that John F. Kennedy's last budget amounted to $98.8 billion, and he would have to add about $3.5 billion to that to cover "built-in" increases in the cost of government.

A few days later, at a backgrounder in Austin, Tex., reporters were led to believe, on highest authority, that the President couldn't possibly keep the budget under $100 billion. They wrote their budget stories accordingly.

When he submitted his first budget in January, 1964, about a month later, it totaled $97.7 billion—a breathtaking $3 billion to $4 billion under what the President and his aides had held out as an irreducible minimum. Voilà! Mr. Johnson looked like a fiscal Houdini—and the press, which had been used, looked ridiculous.

Later in 1964, the North Vietnamese government extended a peace feeler to the United States through UN Secretary-General U Thant. The Secretary-General was sufficiently impressed to get the Hanoi government to agree to meet an American representative in Rangoon.

We might never have heard of this offer if U Thant had not made a speech in February, 1965, charging that the American people were not getting all the facts about the war. When the White House was asked to comment, it denied U Thant's charge, saying there were then no "meaningful proposals" before the U.S. Government.

Not until last fall, after Adlai Stevenson's death, did the press—and the public—get the facts straight. Eric Sevareid, a distinguished alumnus of this school, then reported that Ambassador Stevenson had told him, before his death, of the Hanoi feeler.

How now? the State Department was asked. "Yes," State then recalled, there had been a proposal from Hanoi through U Thant, but it was "too nebulous" to be taken seriously.

The White House had an out, of sorts. It had said that it had no "meaningful" proposals before it. But in view of the President's oft-repeated call for "unconditional" talks, and his insistence that "our antennae are always out" for feelers, the Administration had not enhanced its reputation for veracity.

The next widening of the credibility gap, or the chasm of candor, came in February, 1965, when the President first ordered sustained aerial bombing north of the 17th Parallel in Vietnam. Correspondents were routed out of bed that morning of February 7 to hear that American planes had attacked an ammunition dump at Dong Hoi, just over the North Vietnamese border.

Did this mean the President was escalating the war? No, we were told, it was a "reprisal" raid, answering a Vietcong mortar attack on the American barracks at Pleiku the day before. It was not a change of strategy, the White House maintained, but only in "tactics." The Administration stuck to that position during the weeks and months of air attacks that followed. These facts are susceptible of only two interpretations: Either this is the longest reprisal raid in history and the war was never escalated, or the White House uttered an untruth.

Two months later, in April, 1965, President Johnson ordered 2,500 American paratroopers into the Dominican Republic. The sole purpose of his intervention in the Dominican revolution, he solemnly told us, was to protect the lives of some 2,000 Americans living in that country.

When, after 1,100 Americans had been evacuated and the President had escalated the U.S. troop commitment to 21,500 (about twenty times the number of Americans remaining to be protected) newsmen asked whether this was still just a life-saving mission. The answer was "yes."

Not until May 2 did the President acknowledge that he had intervened to prevent a Communist take-over in Santo Domingo. Then, the following month, in a burst of Texas hyperbole, he told a news conference that "some 1,500 innocent people were murdered and shot and their heads cut off"—a statement that has never been substantiated by any investigating agency.

The Dominican case is the more distressing because there was no apparent need for distortion. There is, in fact, good reason to believe that some readers and listeners who gagged on the story of the life-saving mission would have swallowed with alacrity a simple explanation that we were intervening to prevent another Castro in the Caribbean.

In the fall of 1965, when aluminum producers announced a price increase which the President regarded as inflationary, our credulity was again strained past the breaking point. The Administration promptly announced it would dump aluminum from government stockpiles on the market. This was an obvious (and incidentally, successful) move to force a price rollback. But when newsmen asked the obvious question, the White House told them there was "no connection whatsoever" between the two moves. LBJ, we were supposed to believe, had just decided to get rid of some old aluminum.

There are other examples of outright prevarications, half-truths, and misleading denials by this Administration. Few of them involved the national security, where most newsmen are willing to abide by Bill Moyers' prudent finding that "there is a season for everything, including silence."

The record is now so murky that Mr. Johnson is suffering what his own ambassador to the UN, Arthur Goldberg, called a "crisis of confidence" and what the Republicans are gleefully advertising as the "credibility gap." Now, when the President says there is no need for a tax increase, we wonder. Now, when he says we are willing to talk to anyone, anywhere, any time, about peace in Vietnam, the heads of other governments must ask: "Does he really mean it?" This despite the fact that no one loses more sleep over the precarious state of our economy or more wants an honorable peace in Vietnam than Lyndon Johnson.

Defenders of the President may say, with him, that the news media are sometimes wrong, too. They are sometimes wrong out of malice, sometimes from haste, and often for want of better information from the government. But the central fact in any discussion of comparative credibility is that the United States Government cannot afford to be misleading or untruthful. As we learned in the U-2 incident and at the Bay of Pigs, not only the President but the whole country suffers when our head of government is caught dissembling or lying. As James Reston has noted: "Even the most powerful government cannot be effective if it is not to be trusted, if thoughtful and disinterested men, including our friends and allies, are always scanning our official statements and actions for some unstated motive other than the one given."

The President's press relations, then, are important, not just for the newsmen or the President but for our national security. The Presidency is too important an office to be covered by a habitually disgruntled press. Skeptical reporters, yes, but not angry reporters. And the role of the press in covering the President is too important for the President continually to deride and derogate it.

What can be done?

The situation, as I see it (and as the French would describe it), is hopeless but not desperate. An easing of tensions could start with token concessions on both sides. If, say, the President would start announcing his weekend travel plans by Wednesday noon, the press would stop dropping cigarette ashes on his sculptured blue carpet. If the President would hold one pre-announced, live-TV news conference every fortnight instead of three unannounced quickies a week (and not consume most of them reading prepared announcements), then the reporters would ask more intelligent questions.

From these minor accommodations we could proceed to more substantive matters. If the President would recognize that the press is not working either for him or against him, but merely doing its job, then the press could rededicate itself to the difficult task of covering clearly and objectively a very complex man in an incredibly demanding job. (This would not rule out "speculation," but we could do with fewer stories on LBJ's "style" or lack of it.)

We then would still be a long way from a full détente. But for our part, we do not want fraternization—only full disclosure within the bounds of the national security. We do not want to be captivated by the President's charm any more than we want to be intimidated by his anger.

Solution of the most serious problem—the unbelievable White House—is admittedly most difficult, for here the initiative must come from the President. And this, I fear, may be like asking the leopard to change his spots.

However, I don't think we're going to have a healthy relationship between press and President—with mutual respect and lessened hostility—until Mr. Johnson is convinced that Presidents of the United States must tell the truth, and nothing but the whole, unvarnished truth. Helping him make that decision is surely a job for the one ordained Baptist minister on his staff, his press secretary, the Rev. Bill D. Moyers. In this undertaking, Mr. Moyers will have the full support of the White House press.

MISSISSIPPI

THE NEW PLANTATIONS

MARVIN HOFFMAN and JOHN MUDD

Mr. Hoffman is director of Leadership Training for the Child Development Group of Mississippi. Mr. Mudd is the Group's executive director.

The tragedy of the poverty program, as it emerges today in Mississippi, one of the states where the need for it cries out most loudly, is that just when it is becoming possible to visualize the social processes necessary for effective "community action," this understanding has been made irrelevant and unusable by the impending emasculation and dismemberment of the Office of Economic Opportunity. The creative potential of OEO's programs and the courage of its leaders have been consumed by the expanding influence of a conservatism alarmed by Vietnam and fearing inflation, the increasing alienation of the poor who remain unaffected by its promise, and the disillusion of liberals over projects controlled by precisely those institutions whose failures made the program necessary in the first place.

Since the goals of the program necessarily aroused the hostility of conservatives, its only hope for survival was to create a grass-roots political constituency among the poor themselves. But the poor were not mobilized, and the poverty program has fallen by default to the active support of the big-city mayors who find in it another supply of oil for their machines, with the frustrated liberals acquiescing because they are unable to create any positive alternative. Given this unradical sponsorship, the poverty program, if it is to exist at all, will focus on "safe" programs such as the Neighborhood Youth Corps and conventional Head Start projects which, like traditional welfare activities, hold out no possibility of creating basic changes in the society. Ironically, the anti-poverty program, though conceived in the spirit of social reform, has had less effect on transforming existing institutions than the traditionally less reform-conscious courts.

The Community Action Program (CAP) was to be the revolutionary core of the original anti-poverty act passed by Congress. The bill stipulated city, county, or multi-county boards to be composed of representatives from government, private civic agencies and the poor, which would administer and coordinate all the anti-poverty efforts in their area. Most significant, and most often betrayed, was the call for "maximum feasible participation of the poor."

In Mississippi, as elsewhere in the country, disappointment with CAP has been twofold. First, what was "feasible" turned out to be a tokenism which allowed for only minimal and peripheral involvement of the poor. Second, the jump from social impotence to a seat alongside the members of the power structure unavoidably aroused in the poor feelings of inadequacy and fear. An intermediate stage in which the poor could develop skills and confidence through experience of controlling an organization or a program was neither perceived nor provided for. The OEO favored throwing the unevenly armed forces together to effect instant "community" — with predictable one-sided results.

The creation of the kind of community action originally envisioned requires certain essential preconditions. First, in locales where individuals come from vastly different backgrounds (as in Mississippi and in virtually every American area of poverty) there must be a sufficient consensus, a perception among the diverse groups of common problems, a mutual self-interest in their solution, and psychological readiness to accept the full implications of cooperation. Further, the poor must have the kinds of information and skills which are necessary to participate effectively. And finally, innovative plans for eliminating the causes of poverty must be developed and supported. The consideration of only stop-gap palliatives for poverty creates the illusion of action but none of the substance.

When these three preconditions are present, the concept of community action through the mobilization of all residents and groups to fight poverty is sound. When they are not present, it is OEO's obligation to insure their development rather than to condone the establishment of structures which falsely assume them.

The disastrous effects of overlooking such unpreparedness for community action are painfully obvious in Mississippi, where not a single community has met the preconditions described above. It is self-evident to those who have first-hand experience of the state that there is no community in Mississippi. There are several communities split along economic, religious and, most blatantly, along racial lines. Although the long-range common interests of the two racial communities may be apparent to an outside observer, they are invisible from within the society.

The white community wants no part of a program in which Negroes participate as equal partners, now or in the future. No effort to deal with the root causes of poverty is likely, since the social policy of the white power structure has been to preserve a sufficient supply of cheap unskilled labor and, at the point where this population becomes superfluous, to encourage emigration. One moderate resident of Canton, Miss., requested an audience with the president of the Chamber of Commerce following the tear gassing of the Meredith marchers. He expressed his displeasure with the police tactics and argued that programs such as federally subsidized housing for the Negro community should be initiated. "Oh," replied the C. of C. man, incredulous at the naïveté of the suggestion, "but if we do that, then they won't leave."

The poverty bill projected umbrella community action agencies as a way to coordinate local efforts. However, the commendable desire to avoid wastefulness and inefficiency has in practice provided a device for blocking the creation of "dangerous" projects which threaten existing power relationships. In Mississippi, the establishment of Community Action Programs is clearly motivated by the desire to control all poverty funds flowing into the community. Most counties in the state began forming their CAP boards in earnest only after independent groups like the Child Development Group of Mississippi raised the specter of economic autonomy. The implications of independent institutional forces with a broad popular base were not lost on local and state political leaders.

SAGSOORIAN

The considerable power inherent in CAP to prevent, rather than encourage, efforts to change the position of the poor can be seen in the process by which board members are typically selected. CAP boards in Mississippi are undemocratic and unrepresentative, frequently controlled by the county Board of Supervisors. In many counties this has created a situation in which White Citizens' Council members, Klansmen and police officials notorious for their mistreatment of Negroes sit on committees whose stated goals are to undo the damage for which they are largely responsible. As Fannie Lou Hamer said recently before a state-wide meeting of 2,000 Negroes in Jackson: "The people on those boards are the same people who were shooting at us in '63 and '64 — and OEO says that's okay!" Alongside these habitual custodians of local power sit Negro members of the community who are hand picked for their willingness to be parrots for the white community, on whom they remain economically dependent. The CAP boards also enjoy the cooperation of the "Negro power structure," which sees the new programs as a spawning ground for a leadership that might jeopardize its traditional position. One could hardly conceive of a less promising team of anti-poverty fighters.

OEO has made some effort (particularly in areas where protest from the Negro community has been most vocal) to make the CAP boards less blatantly unrepresentative. The usual solution has been to expand the current board by the election of additional poor Negro members. The number of new seats is never sufficient to wrest control of the board from its founders, and the poor Negro community remains powerless, and the more galled by its lack of "objective" grounds for complaint. In addition to these legitimate, but ultimately futile forms of election, cruder manipulative tactics are widespread. In one Mississippi county, when the existing board was informed by OEO that additional elections were necessary, it approached three Negroes and instructed them to call community election meetings. Their selective invitations brought out an audience which overwhelmingly elected the three to the board.

In summary, the CAP board structure in Mississippi is in direct conflict with the aims of community action stated in the Economic Opportunity Act of 1964. The poor are again deprived of control of factors which most directly affect their own lives, and, as a result, lose the opportunity to acquire the competence which would allow them to sit as equals, able to represent effectively the claims of their group.

In fact, a traditional authoritarian pattern, which at best approaches humanitarian paternalism, is reinforced. The few immediate beneficiaries of the programs among the poor will receive a short-term boost to their incomes through their dole as "aides," but even these gains are contingent on the acceptance of whatever strings of dependency may be implicit. The danger of spawning such short-sighted poverty programs lies in the unwitting creation of a "low-level equilibrium trap" in which the human basis for continued growth is throttled rather than liberated.

What is needed, therefore, in Mississippi (and what is being deliberately rejected) is a training ground to provide poor people with new skills, confidence and competence, one in which they, as a group, can exercise control over programs which are more than hollow. The efforts of the Freedom Democratic Party and the Lowndes County movement have provided this kind of opportunity in politics—and to a certain extent, also, in economics, through the budding co-ops in Lowndes County and elsewhere. However, our primary concern here is with the "anti-poverty" bill and ways in which this intermediate stage of development can be provided for under it.

Since the direct control of CAP boards by the poor is unlikely, particularly in Mississippi, it is essential that government agencies become more receptive to the emergence of independent projects run by the poor.

A report of the House Committee on Education and Labor (No. 428, pp. 7-9) affirms that:

> The Congress has contemplated the existence of independent single-purpose agencies in the same community that [sic] a community-wide structure has been created. Such competitiveness and experimentation is appropriate in an area in which conclusive remedies have not yet been established.

This stated policy has hardly, if ever, been implemented, although it clearly would provide an ideal opportunity for groups that might otherwise be crushed under the heel of a Community Action Program which poor Negroes are unlikely to control in the present political environment.

Officials who fear that such projects constitute high risks must recognize that control by the poor does not necessarily imply the exclusion of competent professionals. When the help of specialists is needed, the poor have proved their ability to select it in their own best interests. An alliance of the poor and the professional on this basis holds out great promise for the fullest possible development of the human resources of the poor community. Such programs encourage democratization of the CAP structure from within by preparing the ground for an effective partnership between the currently divided groups in the community.

The Child Development Group of Mississippi is the only large poor-controlled and anti-poverty project in the state that has had the resources and the orientation to develop into an effective, creative force in the society. CDGM was organized in the spring of 1965 by professionals bent on regenerating an outmoded social order by working with the "untarnished" pre-school children, and representatives of the poor communities responsive to this new opportunity. With the encouragement of OEO, which had just begun to develop its nation-wide Head Start program, it grew far beyond its intended scope and found itself running a summer program for more than 6,000 children in eighty-odd communities.

At that early date, CAP boards had not yet been formed in the state and the Mississippi power structure suddenly found itself confronted with a force it did not control that enjoyed a government-paid budget of more than $500,000 a month. Support of the project was a daring political act by a young and pioneering OEO which has abruptly sunk into middle-aged conservatism, partially from the pressures exerted by Sen. John Stennis who made it pay dearly for this encroachment on his home territory. Three of the four-hour hearings the Subcommittee on Appropriations held in October, 1965, on the $1.5 billion anti-poverty appropriation were devoted to a $1.4 million grant to CDGM.

As a result, OEO was far less bold when the request to refund CDGM was submitted in November of 1965. The money was not granted until late February, 1966, and only then after receiving considerable external encouragement from liberal organizations led by the Citizens Crusade Against Poverty, a coalition of civil rights, religious and labor groups, supported by such strong voices as Martin Luther King and Walter Reuther. This new grant assigned $5.6 million to serve 9,000 children in 121 communities for six months. As it turned out, the demand for participation was so great that 12,000 children were enrolled. At that time, there was little legal basis for denying funds to CDGM, since the formation of umbrella agency CAP boards was still just getting under way.

The second grant officially terminated on August 31, 1966, although certain aspects of the program were allowed to live through October 15. On October 3, OEO formally announced that it was rejecting CDGM's proposal for an additional year of service to more than 13,000 children. The CDGM achievement is to be disposed of in two ways. In counties where CAP boards now exist, control of the Head Start Program is transferred to them, the changeover to be expedited by an eighteen-man OEO task force which has been in the state for several weeks.

The larger allotment, encompassing all nineteen CDGM counties where there is no CAP board, as well as forty-one other non-CAP counties in the state, will go to a secretly formed group, Mississippi Action for Progress, Inc. (MAP), which became known to CDGM only when news of its existence was leaked to a local newspaper. The formation of this board was initiated directly by Sargent Shriver, who in August approached Mississippi NAACP leader Aaron Henry and industrialist Owen Cooper and instructed them to round up members for the substitute board. Henry, in particular, was informed that CDGM was guilty of gross administrative mismanagement which would make it impossible for OEO to continue the program. Details of this charge have recently been published and show no problems which were not internally correctable. They were made known to CDGM only after their release to the press, on the day when the grant was officially refused. The decision was transparently political.

Henry collected his brother-in-law, a political lieutenant in his home town of Clarksdale, and two Negro businessmen, who, together with Henry, formed the Negro backbone of the Mississippi Democratic Conference, a now almost defunct coalition around which national Democratic headquarters hoped to create a loyalist party after Mississippi gave 87 per cent of its vote to Goldwater in 1964.

The white membership of the board was characterized by its opposition to ex-Governor Barnett, which in Mississippi qualifies one as a moderate. Hodding Carter, III, a Greenville newpaper publisher, is an officer of the Young Democrats of Mississippi, another embryonic loyalist group which has thus far been unsuccessful in gaining any constituency. Other board members include a second newspaper publisher, two plantation owners, a wealthy industrialist and the white director of a Baptist Seminary for Negroes. All in all, the board conspicuously lacks representatives of the labor unions, of the poor and of Catholics, who already sponsor a state-wide adult literacy program funded by OEO.

Perhaps more damaging than this precedent for bald political use of poverty funds is the retreat to a pattern whereby leadership is selected from the top. In effect, the "substitute" board has all the characteristics of a gigantic CAP board, selected this time by OEO itself rather than by the County Board of Supervisors. The lack of participation by the poor, the clandestine formation and the tie-in to the existing power structure (the charter provides for eventual control of MAP by the governor himself) are all too familiar to us from our examination of community action programs. The funding of MAP will result in the containment of independent poverty programs such as already exist in the Delta counties of Bolivar, Panola and Tallahatchie, all of which will face their own battles for additional money before the end of the year. The development of new independent programs will be almost impossible.

The elimination of independent, Negro-controlled programs appears to be a relief to OEO, which has come to see CDGM as a divisive influence in local communities. It has provided the Negro community with the resources to prevent its "integration" into "legitimate" structures, and has provided jobs for poor people who might otherwise have to remain part of the existing system on terms which they do not control. In the eyes of the poverty program officials, this has fostered a kind of separation which is equated with black power, a fright concept today which blocks any rational thought about race problems. They ask: "If we support an independent, largely black-controlled project, are we not in effect federally subsidizing some form of black nationalism?"

The answer seems to be quite the opposite. In many ways

CDGM has been more in step with the stated goals of community action than the established community action agencies themselves. Since it is staffed, operated and controlled by the poor themselves, it is attacking one of the "root causes" of poverty. As a precondition to effective community action, the poor must obtain training and experience in exercising the responsibilities required for participation in the institutions of a highly structured society. By drawing people from the poor community into administrative and supervisory positions, while at the same time providing training in the necessary skills, CDGM was taking a major step in this direction.

In this context, black power means nothing more than developing the organization and skills already possessed by the white community, so that the two groups could relate to each other. In Mississippi, this would necessitate an intermediate period of what Christopher Jencks has called "paragovernmental" structures, within which the Negro community could compensate for centuries of powerlessness and the lack of opportunity to develop responsibility and decision-making skills.

Fears of a permanent system of parallel institutions are unfounded. (In addition, it should be emphasized, the continued existence of the K.K.K. organization and mentality which has led to public threats and intimidation of whites involved in these programs is an incomparably greater force toward separation and segregation.) Experience in CDGM had already begun to produce a better poverty program and a better community. In several counties in which it has been operating since its inception, CDGM-affiliated community people now sit on the CAP boards themselves and are in the process of building a bridge between the "parallel" operations, thus opening the possibilities of convergence in the near future. If CDGM were permitted to continue operating in the rest of the state, this pattern of increased community cohesiveness through the temporary support of intermediate parallel operations would no doubt multiply.

Instead, the parceling out of CDGM to MAP on the one hand and to existing CAP boards on the other, threatens to lead to what Negroes in the state have begun to speak of as the "New Plantation," on which the black man remains at the mercy of the boss man and the "head nigger," who stand between him and the decisions and choices which govern his life.

The parallels between these recent developments and the events of post-Reconstruction history are all too apparent. However, the actors may not perform their roles according to the old script. On October 8, 3,500 people attending a state-wide CDGM meeting in Jackson, voted to boycott the new MAP organization, to operate CDGM centers voluntarily until funds could be raised—from private sources, if necessary—and to seek a Congressional investigation of CAP agencies in Mississippi and a hearing for CDGM. In the Delta county of Sunflower, the home of both Senator Eastland and Fannie Lou Hamer, Negro parents have continued to operate their own Head Start program on a volunteer basis for the past eleven months, rather than subject their children to the already funded program run by the CAP board. Whether the stubborn integrity of this effort can be duplicated on a state-wide basis remains to be seen.

IRAN

POLITICS OF ANTI-AMERICANISM

MAJID TEHRANIAN

Mr. Tehranian is an instructor in political economy at Leslie College, Cambridge, Mass.

Persians have always had a soft spot for Americans. There are understandable historical reasons for this. Until World War II, the United States was only a peripheral power in Iran. Unlike Russia and Britain, which were major influences in the Middle East, the United States could afford to champion the cause of Persian independence from its "foreign oppressors." Moreover, the American policy of anti-colonialism well suited this role, and a number of heroic deeds on the part of private Americans in defense of the Persian struggle for democracy and independence also helped considerably. John Baskerville, a young American schoolteacher who was one of the first constitutionalists to fall in 1908 in defense of Tabriz against the siege of that city by the absolute monarchists, remains a "Persian" national hero to this day. Morgan Schuster, the American financial adviser, hired by the young and inexperienced constitutional regime, celebrated the cause of Persian independence against the diabolic machinations of Anglo-Russian rivalry in a classic book, The Strangling of Persia. American missionary schools and hospitals also made their contributions in the social and educational fields. On a less elevated level, the wooing of the Persians by American oil companies (Sinclair and Standard of New Jersey, primarily) struck some Persian nationalists as a welcome opportunity to break through the British monopoly.

The effect of all these factors was that the United States enjoyed an enormous reservoir of good will in Iran. However, the situation has undergone such radical change in the last two decades that the present regime in Iran now finds it profitable to engage in some anti-American politics of its own. And this, ironically enough, despite the fact that the regime has been brought to power and maintained there so far largely by United States military and financial aid. The tragicomic scenario of this turnabout is somewhat complicated, and its understanding requires a keen sense for the ironies of Persian political life.

For the origins of anti-Americanism in Iran, as elsewhere in most of the Afro-Asian world, one must return to the period immediately following World War II when official agencies of U.S. Government came to supersede private American charitable and educational institutions overseas. Practical requirements of American military and political strategy thus gradually overwhelmed the humanitarian idealism with which Americans had generally been identified. The change of America's image from a disinterested anti-colonialist power to the inheritor of colonialism and itself an arch-imperialist was, of course, helped by the Communist press. But the major responsibility for this transformation must go to the postwar foreign policy of the United States.

The occupation of Iran by Allied troops during the war, notwithstanding Iran's declaration of neutrality, was the real beginning of American influence. As a possible countervailing power against the British and the Russians, the Americans were at first welcomed by some Persian nationalists. In 1942, a mission headed by Dr. Arthur Millspaugh, an American economist, came to reform the government's financial organization. He was forced to resign shortly thereafter, largely because of his political ineptitude. In November, 1943, an agreement was signed to employ American military advisers for the Persian armed forces. There followed a series of other agreements: for trade (1943), for cultural exchange (1949), for sale of American war surplus (1949), and for technical cooperation.

The emergence of a strong nationalist movement in the late 1940s, led by Dr. Mohammed Mossadegh, provided an excellent opportunity for a real test of American intentions in Iran. Anti-imperialist, liberal-democratic and non-Communist, Mossadegh's government tried in vain to win over the Americans to its side in the struggle for the nationalization of Iran's British-controlled oil industry. When Mossadegh proved unwilling merely to exchange British for American control, it became clear that it was not so much communism that the United States opposed as any threat to its own economic interests.

With the CIA-sponsored coup d'état of August, 1953, which overthrew Mossadegh's government, any lingering fantasies the nationalists may have still held about American intentions in Iran fell apart. Mossadegh had presented a clear, viable and popular nationalist alternative to communism in Iran, but the United States rejected him in favor of a regime more securely in service of its own economic and political interests. The settlement of the oil dispute which ensued gave the American oil companies 40 per cent of the shares in a British-dominated consortium. This was the first time that Americans had obtained a working concession in Iran. Politically, however, Americans for all practical purposes replaced the British in the councils of state and fell heir to the influence the British possessed, as well as to the resentment they inspired. With the increasing U.S. commitment to the Shah's dictatorship, the simmering resentment and suspicion against American domination also grew, so much so that the American Ambassador, Selden Chapin, found it necessary in April of 1957 to disclaim publicly any attempt by the United States to "take" the country. The Bilateral Security Agreement of March, 1959, and the stepped-up military and financial aid to the Shah did little to dispel these suspicions, but anti-Americanism in this period expressed itself in such isolated but symbolic episodes as the assassination in March, 1957, of a few American officials by the rebel Dad Shah. Relations on the official level were extremely cordial and the government vigorously repressed any anti-American manifestations.

The advent of the Kennedy administration brought about a series of changes in official relations. President Kennedy's campaign speeches against U.S. sponsorship of military dictatorships helped to foster the rumor that the new administration would support the opposition in Iran. The subsequent cuts in American military assistance, prompted largely by persistent deficits in the U.S. balance of payments, gave further credence to these rumors. Once again the nationalist hopes for American support spawned fantasies. The liberalization of political activity during 1961-62, undertaken by a pro-American Prime Minister, Ali Amini, who came to power despite the Shah's hostility, provided some basis for a possible rapprochement between the National Front, Dr. Mossadegh's coalition of nationalist parties and groups, and the Amini government. The factors preventing such an alliance were recognized and clearly analyzed by Prof. T. Cuyler Young of Princeton University in an article, "Iran in Continuing Crisis," published in Foreign Affairs of January, 1962. In the end, the Shah's tactical political maneuvers, combined with his control of the armed forces, outwitted both Dr. Amini and the National Front.

In the internal strife which accompanied this power struggle, Americans were the most convenient and credible of all targets. The Shah increasingly blamed them for their lagging support of his ambitious military build-up — somewhat ungratefully, one might add, because he had received nearly $300 million in aid from 1952 to 1963. The National Front, stung by its memory of the 1953 coup d'état and the continuing U.S. support of the Shah's dictatorship, had abundant grounds for criticism of the American policies. American domination was, furthermore, the natural and obvious target of the Communist Tudeh Party's clandestine radios. Even the pro-American Amini found it necessary to blame the Americans for his fall in July, 1962. But the greatest damage to the American image was done, as usual, by American policies themselves. A bill which authorized the government to extend extraterritorial privileges to the American military was taken, under persistent pressures from the Shah and the U.S. Embassy, to the parliament. Even the hand-picked deputies of the Shah could not easily stomach an outrage strongly suggestive of colonial status; they put up an unprecedented opposition to the bill, although the hated measure was finally forced through in October, 1963.

These events would probably have had no dramatic consequences if Iran did not share a 1,200-mile border with the Soviet Union. American power in Iran is too firmly established in the economy and in the military to be thwarted overnight. But Russia's ever-present might to the north has also been difficult to ignore. The thaw in Russo-American relations, combined with changing security requirements of the Shah, has paved the way for peaceful economic and political competition to take place with mutual toleration. Persian observers have speculated that an Anglo-Russian understanding, reminiscent of their treaty of 1907 which partitioned Iran into spheres of influence, may be in the making—at the expense of the Americans. The fact that part of the pipe lines to transport gas from Iran's southern oil fields to Russia will be built by British concerns is cited as evidence. C. L. Sulzberger in The New York Times of January 28 conjectured still further:

> Moscow might be more inclined to mediate in the Vietnam crisis were it granted concessions elsewhere. There is no room for concessions in Europe. Such diplomats argue any concessions must come in Asia, and the only part of Asia where U.S. softening could directly benefit Russia is obviously that discussed above [i. e., Iran and Turkey].

Exaggerated though these speculations seem to be, they fit rather well with the Shah's newly pronounced conception of Iran as a buffer state between the East and the West, whose "independence" should be safeguarded by extending privileges to both sides. The nationalists object to this on the ground that the country's independence should not be compromised but rather maintained by refusal of unwarranted privileges to either side.

At any rate, relations with the Soviet Union began to improve in 1963 when the Shah, vexed by the American policy of sale rather than grant of arms, pledged that Iran will not become a missile base of aggression against the USSR. Following this declaration, which the Russians had sought unsuccessfully for some time, a number of agreements for extensive cooperation in economic fields have been reached by the two countries. The latest is a deal for construction by the Russians of a steel mill and machine-tool plant in exchange for the transport of gas from the southern Iranian oil fields to the Russian border. This was a successful coup for the Russians, particularly since the long-cherished hopes for an Iranian steel industry had been frustrated several times in fruitless negotiations with Western concerns.

What political capital the Soviet Union can make out of these developments will depend very much on their future steps. There are reliable reports that the Russians are willing, if not eager, to sell arms and surface-to-air missiles to Iran on the same terms that they have made them available to the UAR, Syria and Iraq. The Shah is once again using the leverage of Russian competition in his negotiations with Washington for more arms on the same easy terms the Russians are offering, i.e., prices as low as half the current Western prices and long-term credits at 2.5 per cent interest.

If the Russian arms deal goes through, it will have far-reaching and contradictory consequences. It would obviously gain the Russians hard foreign exchange as well as influence with the Shah; it would also open another of the Western satellites to serious Russian competition. Even Turkey, another member of the Central Treaty Organization as well as of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, is reported to be interested in Russian arms. All this may be a mixed blessing from the point of view of a Soviet-American détente, but the resentment of the progressive revolutionary forces, being squeezed between the two giants in their competition for the favors of the established ruling elites, will be inevitable. There are already clear signs of this in Iran. The pro-Russian central committee of the Tudeh Party, in exile in East Germany, has been isolated from its own rank and file, as well as from the nationalists who maintain a plague-on-both-your-houses attitude toward the United States and Russia. A "revolutionary" group to the left of the central committee has also sprung up to organize once again the Persian Marxist-Leninists.

In the meantime, the Shah's regime is putting to its own use the anti-American feelings the Persian public has had for a long time. By allowing some free expression of these feelings, the Shah is trying to gain public respect as "a ruler who could stand up even to the Americans," while increasing his bargaining power with the United States. Instances of officially tolerated, if not officially sponsored, anti-American expressions have been on the increase in the last year or so. The war in Vietnam has, of course, provided the most effective vehicle for press charges of American aggression and brutality. Editorials deplore American interventionism, citing examples from all over the globe except, of course, from Iran. A book entitled Inheritor of Colonialism, and quite openly anti-American, has gone into several printings, after being at first banned.

Official displeasure has been expressed indirectly at a seminar on Iran held at Harvard in April, 1964, by the Center for Middle Eastern Studies and the Iranian Students Association in the United States. The text of a paper presented to the seminar by Professor Young of Princeton, which was critical of U.S. policy for siding with the ruling elite rather than with the people, was severely attacked by the press after having been translated and secretly circulated in Teheran by the opposition. The daily Ajang, for instance, retorted that instead of discussing conditions in Iran, the seminar should have discussed American racism, assassination of Presidents, gangsterism, landing in the Dominican Republic and atrocities in Vietnam. Nor have other occasions, such as an American Air Forces Radio-TV station's slip in calling the Persian Gulf the "Arabian" Gulf, been missed by the press. And in recent months, the Shah himself has constantly hammered — in discreet but critical language — on his differences with the Americans on the questions of arms purchases and the level of oil production.

Asserting his "independence," he has not only veered toward a policy of trade and economic cooperation with the Soviet bloc, to the obvious displeasure of the American authorities, but has also turned to France and Britain for Iran's most recent deals in oil and arms. The petroleum agreement just signed in Teheran between the National Iranian Oil Company and a group of French companies is reported to be based on an unprecedented 91 to 9 per cent profit-sharing arrangement in favor of Iran. If true, that will further undermine the old 50-50 formula of the Anglo-American concessions. The arms deal with Britain for the purchase of $62.3 million worth of vessels and ground missiles may also be taken as a warning to the Americans who have been the Shah's sole source of arms. Significantly, however, the Russian arms deal—with its serious political implications—is being dragged on in the negotiating stage while the Americans are asked to improve their bargaining terms.

These are propitious times for the Shah to indulge in a potentially dangerous game. With Vietnam on its hands, the United States is at the peak of its diplomatic isolation and can ill afford to sponsor a military coup against him. In any case, the experience of the coup against Diem and the unsettling effects it produced in South Vietnam do not encourage another such experiment. For practical purposes, the Shah is the State Department's best alternative after all. The institution of monarchy assures relative stability; the Shah's armed forces have so far been armed and "advised" by the United States; the country is aligned to the West by the Central Treaty Organization and a bilateral treaty with the United States; despite quarrels about prices and level of production, the Anglo-American oil interests are guaranteed safety; and, finally, the regime follows an open-door policy toward the rapidly growing Western imports of consumer goods and business investments. Here is at least one instance in which anti-Americanism pays for American business and political interests — at least for the moment.

TO DIE IN VIETNAM

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake, author among other books of The Bronc People (Harcourt Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster), recently spent three months in Southeast Asia.

"Last week," the major said.

The American air base is at the foot of the Phu Pan Mountains where the opium poppies grow, in Northern Thailand close by a town called Vientiane. Even closer to the American air base, in a village where the opium is refined, is a caravansaray called the Kool Virgin where our American heroes can get a drink and massage. Beneath the sign of the Kool Virgin is a sign that says AMERICAN SOLDIERS WELCOME. LET FREEDOM RING. The Americans did not build the airfield near the Phu Pan Mountains to be close to the Kool Virgin, but to outflank Laos, Cambodia and North Vietnam and cut enemy supply routes called the Sihanouk Trail and the Ho Chi Minh Trail. But while we are breathing down their neck at all these places they are breathing down our neck at the Kool Virgin. Although our American airfield was not built near the Phu Pan Mountains to be close by the Kool Virgin, the reverse cannot be said for the Kool Virgin.

"I believe every virgin is a Vietcong," the American major said.

"Even a Kool Virgin?"

"Especially since last week," the major said. The major put down his Kool-Aid gin to make a point. "The only good virgin is a dead virgin. Right, Vallorosa? Vallorosa is my gunner. We fly Search and Destroy in a chopper. Must have killed a thousand gooks. Right, Vallorosa? Vallorosa is my fifth gunner, but the gooks will never kill Vallorosa. Right, Vallorosa?"

Vallorosa was a buck sergeant from Framingham, Mass., and when he spoke, which was not now, he spoke with a New England accent. He had a clean white scar over his left eye which was all you saw as he stared into his Kool-Aid Scotch.

"God damn it, Vallorosa, when I speak I want to be spoken to." Vallorosa didn't say anything and the major said to me: "Since last week Vallorosa kills everything that moves. Today he killed a flock of chickens, a small elephant, three gooks, a whole line of laundry and two Chinamen."

The major put his left arm around Vallorosa. "Vallorosa, you need another drink."

The major gestured to an elderly virgin for a Kool-Aid Scotch.

"Never, never, never disclose security information to the masseuse," the major said as though reminding himself. "Just a bit ago a young lady tried to sell me the plans for our new airfield at Udorn. You're not a journalist?" the major said to me for the fourth time.

"That's right," I said.

"Then what are you doing here?"

"Drinking Kool-Aid Bourbon."

"Then I'll tell you something for your book," the major said. "I'll give you all the specs on our new 4X Phantom Fighter that arrived yesterday. If the young ladies can sell the plans for our new airfield I can give away the Phantom 4X. Interested?"

"No."

"Top secret."

"No," I said.

"I'm an idealist."

"Tell me about that," I said.

"I've seen a lot of people die," the major said. I thought the major was crying but he hid it behind his glass.

"I thought the war was about something, then last week. . . ." The major paused. He still had Vallorosa in his left arm. "Then last week . . . well, you know all about it, don't you?"

"No."

"I thought the war was about something, then last week. . . ."

"Go ahead," I said.

"Last week the head of the government we're backing over here said his hero was Adolf Hitler." The major let go of Vallorosa and slumped ahead on the table so I couldn't see his face.

"Since then," he said, "I shoot everything that moves, chickens, flags, Americans."

"You need help."

"Who cares?" the major said. "You know what the commanding officer calls me?"

"No."

"An idealist."

"Oh?"

"Because I object to fighting for Adolf Hitler. I tell you, Billy, I saw too many people die. Too many people die, Billy. Too many people die. That's what Premier Ky said, Billy. Ky's hero is Adolf Hitler."

"You need a rest."

"I don't need a rest, Billy. Someone else does. Now we kill everything that moves, don't we, Vallorosa?" The major put his arm around the silent sergeant again. "We figured a way out. We got everything all solved. We kill everything that moves. Billy, cheer up."

He poked his glass toward me. I could see he had been crying.

"We'll drink to freedom."

I raised my glass and the major touched his glass against mine so hard that it rang.

"Let freedom ring!" the major said.

LETTERS (continued from page 402)

awareness of the limits to what the Russians could get. An opponent remains an opponent even when that country's foreign policy is cautious and conciliatory. Any explanation of the cold war as the result of an aggressive American mentality would have to show that this mentality had no real justification in Soviet behavior and therefore arose out of specific trends in American society. I still do not think the evidence so far available warrants such a view.

On this occasion I also wish to apologize for a stupid slip in misspelling the name of the French economist, Robert Fossaert. Barrington Moore, Jr.

rebel off shore

Kirkwood, Mo.

DEAR SIRS: You may be interested in what Earl Attlee, England's former Labour Prime Minister, has just written me on President Eisenhower's recent remarks:

"I think the remarks of Eisenhower remarkably foolish. The proposed action would have been likely to lead to a world war. It is curious that he cannot understand the natural reaction of the Chinese to the continued support by the United States of Chiang Kai-shek in Formosa.

"Suppose a foreign power had supported Jefferson Davis in Bermuda after the American Civil War. What would have been the reaction of Lincoln's successors?" Cyril Clemens

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Marking Off A Chunk of England

DARK PLACES OF THE HEART. By Christina Stead. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 352 pp. $6.95.

JOSE YGLESIAS

Mr. Yglesias is a novelist and essayist, and a translator of modern Spanish fiction.

In England, Christina Stead's new novel is named Cotter's England, and is not likely to be mistaken for a heart-throbbing addition to the shelves of a circulating library. Of course, it does not necessarily follow that the American title, Dark Places of the Heart, will keep serious readers from knowing what Miss Stead is about. The reissue last year of The Man Who Loved Children to uniformly prominent and good notices, twenty-five years after it had failed to sell out its first edition, may be insurance against flip dismissal of this one. Yet Miss Stead first published in 1934; for the last fifteen years no publisher has brought out any new work and, with the exception of the novel reissued last year, all her books are out of print. These are reasons for belief that critics and readers, not to speak of publishers, need every clue they can get.

Miss Stead's interest in showing how life is lived — what Randall Jarrell called her ability to imitate perfectly the surface of existence — has grown from book to book, along with her gift for dramatizing ideas. Impervious to literary fashions, she is now in serene possession of a fiction technique that is a perfect crossing (to use literary shorthand) of the Dreiser and James legacies: social documentation in which didacticism and moralizing are so transmuted that they seem almost entirely absent from either the surfaces or depths of her story. She throws reviewers not a single bone, she gives them no handle by which to place her, no text to explicate, no mythology to erect on her work; she seems simply to mark off a considerable chunk of contemporary life and say: This is the way it is.

But she does not do this simply. In her new book she has created a work in which narrative flow, characterizations and the supplest language achieve a classic unity, though she is so modern and original that no contemporary writer comes to mind with whom she can be compared to place her for a new reader. Miss Stead creates so integrated a form in Dark Places of the Heart that it resists paraphrasing or dismemberment for literary or ideological analysis. Throughout her writing career she has been working toward this accomplishment: a novel to which there can be no approach other than total submission.

This is not the demand of a fantasist, however, for Miss Stead has always answered the most immediate social questions about the various countries where she has lived and which have been the settings of her novels. She deals with common, accessible experience and immerses the reader so thoroughly in the scene that the reading becomes a life experience, not an entrance into that enclosed, other world of the novelist's about which it has become a cliché to speak.

After a decade in England, having wisely chosen to escape the suffocating atmosphere of McCarthyism here, Miss Stead now takes a long look at English working-class life and politics. The result is as authentic as was her last novel, The People with the Dogs (1952), which dealt with the middle class of New York's East 20s and Connecticut summer homes. (No other modern writer has her range of subject matter.) The time is postwar England, and the setting alternates between a shabby London suburb and a

THE DEATH OF THOMAS COTTER

Mr. Cotter had not been feeling very well, as he told it in his Sunday and Monday, his Tuesday and Wednesday pubs, his Thursday, Friday and Saturday pubs; in the Atheneum and football clubs; to his clients and colleagues in the insurance business; to the Mother Superior, and to Mrs. Riggs, a divorced woman who had been acting strangely since her divorce; and to all the policemen after whose health he enquired and who kindly enquired after his own. It was no surprise therefore when Mr. Thomas Cotter went into hospital and it was in the local newspapers as an item of interest; Thomas Cotter, who as a young professional footballer had played for Wales.

Mr. Cotter had an anesthetic and went under the knife; and when he came out of it he was worse than before. "They kept me in the hospital," the big man said genially, between spasms of agony, "for they had to empty the liquor out of my veins and put blood in before they would operate. They tested me: they found I was ninety proof"; and when his visitors twitched and paled to see him lying down there in such terrible pain, he said in his large way, "It's not the worst; the very worst is Tuesday, when they'll be talking about me at the Cross Keys, if I'm not there, as if I were a dead man. It's Tuesday and where is Thomas Cotter? I don't like to think of it." His next operation was to be in a few days. The first had been a success; "If that's what you call a success," he said, jumping at a stab of pain; "I was all right, I was just a little down, till they started on me and found out all my secrets! And now they can't stop; they've got to go on and on." But on Wednesday, he couldn't help feeling depressed that he was absent from the Princess, his Wednesday pub. What would they be saying, that Thomas Cotter was a goner? On Thursday, the night before his operation, with his stitches and his pain, he got out of bed at eight o'clock at night, put on a hospital dressing gown and telling a taxi driver he knew, whom he found outside the hospital gates, that he was discharged, he got him to unload him at the Ravenscourt, his Thursday pub. There he had a fine time, half doubled with pain, but of interest to all, before the taxi driver, struck with doubt, and the tavernkeeper, struck with compunction, insisted upon getting him back to hospital; for now, for the lark and for the pain, Mr. Thomas Cotter freely admitted that he had climbed the wall, fooled the sentry, escaped from jail. He got back somehow and pretended that he had only been a bit of time in the men's room; and the next day, he died under the anesthetic, so that he would have felt himself quite justified in going out for his last drink, if he could have known.

— From Dark Places of the Heart by Christina Stead northern industrial town. Its central figure is Nellie Cotter, a left-wing journalist married to a labor leader, and the story is an exploration of her relations with her family in the industrial north and the stray, disoriented women who come and go, along with her husband, in the London house, where she's a free-and-easy hostess.

It is a period in Nellie's life when her husband is often away on the Continent, angling for a bureaucratic job with an international labor organization. She fills up her days dashing off to cover labor stories, seeing her family in the north, drinking and fulsomely talking with one friend or another at home and in pubs, and attempting to bind more closely again a brother who is roaming the country with a mistress dying of cancer. In the course of the novel her parents die, one woman friend commits suicide, the brother returns briefly when his mistress dies, and the Lesbian base of Nellie's philosophizing becomes shockingly plain. In the novel's last pages, the husband gets just the kind of job he wants; they move to Geneva; he dies within a year, and Nellie is back alone in London, on the prowl.

None of this takes place as plot, but in the messy, disorganized ways of life; the talk is large, the concerns are petty, and in the interplay of Nellie's illusions and life's hard facts the narrative moves along, shaping the characters and their actions in directions that neither the cast of characters nor the reader expects. It is Miss Stead's extraordinary accomplishment that her style manages to create both suspenseful readability and the sense, which day-to-day life often has, that nothing is happening. (She in fact takes the entire book to explore a year in Nellie Cotter's life, but in two paragraphs she will do the death of Nellie's father in such a fashion that his whole life is limned in.) When the book is done, it comes as a surprise that so much has happened and that one has grasped so well the significance of the Cotters' England; this sort of thing can happen in life only in those rare moments of illumination when experience falls into place.

It is only at the end, after the reader has submitted himself to the experience of Miss Stead's story and put the kind of distance between it and himself similar to the novelist's to his material, that the basic questions of intent and meaning arise. During the reading, Miss Stead's wit, compassion and technique have served to keep the reader's cognitive and moralizing responses at bay, to make him live her people's lives as if he were a character in the book. Nellie Cotter is, in a flat sense, the grubbiest of characters: one of those unwisely tolerant bohemians who attach themselves to every radical movement or reformist cause and move out of it again, usually because it is not "big" enough to contain them; they often end, as happens with Nellie, in some crackpot circle, Far Eastern in inspiration or home grown. But Miss Stead's ear (Nellie's passionate clichés have an eloquence of their own) and her eye (Nellie's physical presence and her environment are palpably there) and psychological wisdom (Nellie's neurotic rationalizations contain remarkable insights into others) turn her major character, and everyone who comes within Nellie's grasping reach, into living presences, full of color, charm and fascination.

Miss Stead's insistence on not allowing the reader to make particular judgments is due to the curiosity about, and understanding of life she wants to pass on; it is also, in a cool and tough way, a method of guiding him toward a judgment that is inevitable and more profound. She has earned the right, at the novel's end, to ask the reader to come to some conclusions which should carry over into his own way of living. In this, she is old-fashioned and belongs in the great tradition.

The questions she makes the reader ask are always social and revolutionary in intent. In the present novel it is obvious (though one should be wary of this adjective when dealing with so neglected a great novelist) that she has asked why the English working-class movement has not made the revolution. Though she deals only with its fringes and does not go to the center of its trade union, Labour Party and intellectual circles, she has re-created the full ambience of its opportunism, charlatanism and demoralization. Her unspoken judgment is as harsh as the explicit ones of Balzac, Proust, Joyce; unlike them, however, she does not base her critique on the better life of another age, or turn inward or withdraw or become nostalgic.

Why, then, has she not received a measure of their recognition? Contrary to popular belief, great writers seldom go unhailed in their lifetime: there are only a couple of cases, like that of Stendhal, to a century. But because Miss Stead seems so old-fashioned, she doesn't interest the avant-garde; because her vision is so radical, she disquiets the mass of readers who are middle class; because she is original and tough-minded, left wingers feel no comfort of recognition. Yet for everyone she has one cementing, indispensable attribute: a sensual, deeply joyous appreciation of how life is lived. Once again she gives us another chance. Dark Places of the Heart is a great novel; it should not have to wait twenty-five years for its readers, for in the wings stand eight out-of-print novels which can tell us, as Balzac did for the same period a century ago, how the world has chosen us to live these last thirty, dirty years.

In the Air of Several Worlds

VIRGIL THOMSON. By Virgil Thomson. Alfred A. Knopf. 424 pp. $7.95.

HAROLD CLURMAN

On the last page of his book about himself Virgil Thomson declares that as long as he remains alive he will "fulminate." But Thomson never "fulminates"; he thrusts deftly and moves on with a concealed smile which is almost as bland as it is mischievous. He thinks of his music as sassy; it is generally cute, even "darling." His readers might have thought him a regular devil when he was music critic for the New York Herald Tribune, but he was, above all, a corruscating conversationalist of sound judgment and good taste.

He felt at home in Paris during the many years he spent there but he loved it because it reminded him of Kansas City! He does not precisely mean this but it is something of what he does mean, and for the sake of the fun he often says things which throw partial light on his true meaning.

This duality in Thomson which may irritate a few and charm many is altogether characteristic. Every phase of his work — writing and music — reveals the honorable citizen, the "good boy" beneath the surface of the sophisticated and slightly malicious cosmopolite.

He is no Christian, he tells us, but music he heard in Missouri churches supplies material for much of his composition. "His mother had prayed for him to hear the 'call' and become a preacher. He himself had become resigned to not hearing it." But he is a preacher and of a kind that our folk can embrace. "Whatever the government [he's] agin' it," but his rebelliousness is of the sort which no one need fear. He will always return to cultivating his garden. (But what if there were to be no more gardens?) After the outbreak of the Second World War he remained in Paris until the bombs began to fall, occupying himself "with the central esthetic problem in music today, the creation of an acceptable style-convention for performing Mozart." Shocking and delightful.

He writes extremely well. His style is straightforward, colloquial speech set in a syntax of almost Georgian elegance. Reading him one seems to be bathed in the air of several worlds: that of the English 18th century, our Middle West, New York and Paris. He skirts the fringes and occasionally appears to mix with "international snob bohemia" but he never joins it. He is too much the honest worker.

His permanent art heroes are the minor masters: Erik Satie and Gertrude Stein. These admirations fit his pattern. For all his playfulness Satie was essentially a modest composer, even a grave one; grandiose rhetoric was abhorrent to him. Satie wanted to create, Thomson says, "a musical reality as real as an apple or a child." Here we return again to Thomson's own basic simplicity or "fundamentalism." Then too he always and rightly refers to Gertrude Stein as a poet whose hermetic works he explains lucidly and plausibly. But perhaps her chief attraction for him lay in her basic attribute: an old-fashioned American hominess.

Thomson speaks of the "romanticism" of his music. The term as he uses it is more related to a classic bent than to 19th-century romanticism. The impression his music leaves is a homespun Americanism like the hymns heard in Protestant places of worship and the echo of small-town festivities. One of Thomson's early pieces, the Church Sonata, combines tango or near-jazz rhythms with something like traditional liturgy.

Some may conclude that this amounts to cussedness. It is really American horse sense, a calm resistance to bluff or pretense. Thomson has always preferred French music, transparent, light, moderately impersonal, to the huffing and puffing of latter-day German music sweating with self-importance. Yet for all that he has learned from the French he has always remained a stubbornly pragmatic red-white-and-blue!

For fourteen years the Thomson "mixture" made him the best critic in any of the arts writing for a New York daily. He knows it and admits it. Cockiness is one of the games he plays. When he says, "Description is the solid part of reviewing; spontaneous reactions, if courteously phrased, have some validity; opinions are mostly worthless," I entirely concur. As a critic he sometimes generalizes too glibly (as he does at moments in this book) but most of the time his rapid diction and winged witticisms are well grounded.

Readers in hopes of scandalous tidbits in this autobiography will be disappointed. Thomson's book is most discreet. When he wants to say something the least bit unseemly he employs euphemisms or circumlocutions that are almost coy and occasionally funny. He will say of a French poet that "he had just entered into housekeeping arrangements with a young woman," or speak of two ladies as "Amazons" to denote something else. He mentions suffering from "unrequited love" but he does not tell us on whose account. To this he adds: "My passion, like all my intensely conceived ones, came to nothing." In discussing intimate matters a certain detachment is always present. This is not a matter of reticence alone. Detachment is as much one of Thomson's strong points as one of his failings. It looks good on him.

To retain integrity as an artist or as an intellectual the American must forever remain intransigent. Thomson has been intransigent in the preservation of his personality. And his new book is best viewed as leaves of his personality. There is really more of the man Thomson in his critical writing (The State of Music and the others) than here. Autobiography rarely tells the truth about a person. Some of the boldest lie by exaggerating the writer's vices. To find truth, read fiction. There are too many inconsequential facts in this Virgil Thomson.

Still one does get a lively sense of the growth of modern American music when Thomson and others were trying to "establish" it. There is also a whiff of Paris and its arts in the book and we get to know something of Thomson's friends: the French composers Sauguet, Cliquet-Pleyel, the French poet Max Jacob, Sir Thomas Beecham, Roy Harris, John Houseman, and the painter-critic Maurice Grosser who is frequently mentioned but about whom we rarely learn anything specific.

One vastly entertaining section consists of an exchange of letters between Gertrude Stein and Thomson, in which they argue like two horse traders about the division of royalties on their opera Four Saints in Three Acts. For a man reputed to be capable of naughty spite he is remarkably free of hostility. The volume is profusely and admirably illustrated, adding much to its vividness and to our pleasure.

Leaving Out the Letter 'E'

THE COMMUNIST CONTROVERSY IN WASHINGTON: From the New Deal to McCarthy. By Earl Latham. Harvard University Press. 446 pp. $7.95.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantine).

A controversy involving national security has agonized and riven the country during the course of each one of the last three decades: the Red-hunting investigations beginning in the thirties and the ultimate institutionalization of the Congressional anti-subversive committees; the charges by Chambers and Bentley in the forties of espionage by Communists in the employ of the government; and the flowering of McCarthyism in the fifties. These conflicts still wound and torment us. Court decisions, jury verdicts, commission reports, Executive orders, Congressional declarations — official acts which sometimes seal up hostilities over great national issues — have, in this case, merely supplied one side or the other with fresh ammunition.

Earl Latham's study is very important. One of a series on "Communism in American Life," originally sponsored by the Fund for the Republic and written by the head of Amherst's Political Science Department, it is a scholarly examination of the attacks on politically suspect government employees; an academic attempt to analyze the techniques of the anti-subversive committee, and one of the first treatments by a political scientist of the relationship between McCarthyism and legislative investigation, as a "mode of governance." While not aimed at the general reader, its intended audience is not merely the specialists who have been eagerly awaiting it for years (Latham had been working on it since at least 1957).

The book arches over an enormous area: the Sixth World Congress of the Communist International in 1928 ("the strategy of alienation"); the soft, popular-front Communist line which emerged in 1935 ("the strategy of enticement") and its impact on the professionals and intellectuals who were recruited into the New Deal; the organized Communist groups in the federal Establishment; the espionage charges of Chambers and Bentley; the Amerasia case; the Tydings Committee's probe of Senator McCarthy's charges against the State Department; and the investigation by Senator McCarran of the Institute of Pacific Relations.

The Communist issue ("the politics of hysteria"), the more original portion of the study, deals with McCarthyism, the political exploitation of the Communist "problem." McCarthy, in Latham's view, was the instrument of traditional Republican conservatism, rooted in the Midwest and far West, which is now and since 1940 has been locked in a bitter intramural struggle with the liberal Easterners for control of the Republican Party. Latham's analysis of McCarthyism is rich in important insights, but it ultimately does not persuade because it does not explain why the political exploitation of the Red issue worked. It fails to take account of McCarthy's affective appeal, so skillfully analyzed by Richard Hofstadter. It was not fundamentalist conservatism alone which gave McCarthy the approval of half the electorate in January, 1954, according to the polls, but his capacity to move transient anxieties and passions to new emotional heights by placing them in an apocalyptic context ("the battle for America").

Nor does Latham take into account the extent to which many American liberals contributed to the success of McCarthy. The attractions and pressures of the cold war recruited American liberals to the politics of anti-communism, almost without a struggle, and led them to embrace a fake NATO-ized "freedom" as a justification for suppressing the old-fashioned variety. As anti-communism became a national religion (it still is), liberals—reinforced by droves of recanting Communists seeking to purge themselves of the Stalinist taint, together with their former anti-Stalinist ideological rivals on the Left—became its theologians, authenticating its rituals and deploring its occasional frenzies. They developed a fruity rhetoric of conspiracy and refined moralizing justifications for increasingly coarse political perceptions. This cold-war trahison des clercs in turn created a climate which strengthened conservative trends in the social sciences and which enthroned "neutral" (i.e., politically safe) quantifying and behavioral modes of interpreting our society and its institutions.

Latham's book is itself an example of the ritualistic anti-communism of American intellectuals—all the more striking because it comes at a time when the faith is beginning to lose some of its support. The author insists (without a shred of proof) that the Communists did, in the fifties, menace our institutions (both inside and outside of government), and that all the legal steps taken by the Truman and Eisenhower administrations, including purging the federal establishment of "loyalty risks" (a euphemism for nonconformists of all shades), dealt with this alleged menace "not inadequately." Latham's failure to deal with the federal employee loyalty program—beyond suggesting in passing that its purgative efficiency weakened McCarthyism by eliminating its targets—is a measure of the extent to which his anti-Communist assumptions have overwhelmed his detachment. For this program, which after all lies at the very heart of his subject, bristles with oppression. And the author's anti-Communist rhetoric more than matches his assumptions. It ranges from the floridly moralizing ("the Communists were seeking to take democracy from the Democrats and, by pre-empting its values, to monopolize—and to make squalid with ulterior intent—decent impulses of democracy and humanism in American culture"); the sneering hyperbole (Elizabeth Bentley is seen as a "simple school teacher working for ferocious goals of world domination," bent "on freeing the toiling masses of the oppressions of bloodthirsty capitalistic masters"); the irrelevant gibe (John Wexley's moving play about the Scottsboro case, They Shall Not Die, is said to have been "done in a vaudeville dialect that even Amos and Andy would have found grotesque and objectionable"); to a Jamesian de haute en bas drawl of contempt ("a [Communist] principle of philosophic grace—the principle of democratic centralism").

His acceptance of the Chambers-Bentley charges results from no fresh investigation of the facts, interviews with the principals, or discovery of new documents. He concludes that party members "and their supporters" occupied "numerous positions" in the federal government (his estimate of actual party members in the thirties is seventy-five out of about half a million federal employees in Washington); that they co-opted one another into federal jobs but without a politically inspired plan of infiltration and were organized into groups which had no meaningful influence on policy formation but which had "espionage functions," a highly ambiguous conclusion since Latham does not use the term "espionage" in a technical sense, as a state crime, and never bothers to define what he does mean by it.

Latham fails to tell the reader that before the Chambers and Bentley disclosures were aired before a Congressional committee they were investigated for a period of fourteen months by a federal grand jury—the same body which indicted the twelve Communist Party leaders — and that no espionage indictments were returned. This circumstance would indicate at the very least that the "'confidential information' which is alleged to have passed into Communist hands must not have been of very great importance," as New York Times reporter Cabell Phillips observed at the time. In fact, Chambers himself conceded that "political espionage" by government employees "was a magnificent waste of time."

In Latham's view, the gravity of the "problem" cannot in any event be determined by evaluating the hard evidence. But if there was more then than meets the eye now, he does not establish it. The quality of his reservations is indicated by his comment on the testimony of a cooperative ex-Communist federal employee witness before the Un-American Activities Committee that the party members at his agency were told and believed that they could best discharge their obligations by a zealous devotion to their duties. Such statements, according to Latham, "illustrate the confusing blur of democratic and dialectical values, to which a form of self-hypnosis contributed. . . . The silence of the cell about its affiliation betrayed the secret guilt that covert membership may have suggested to the sensitive."

Latham has substituted for the traditional emphasis on political institutions and their normative roles, a "value-free" scrutiny of political behavior. He banishes from his frame of reference the prohibitions of the Constitution, and especially the First Amendment; court decisions and the limitations imposed on our institutions by the tripartite system and the mechanisms of checks and balances also fall by the wayside. In this way, Latham plucks his inquiry out of its crucially relevant

EDMUND WILSON

Europe Without Baedeker

A new edition of Wilson's famous book of travel impressions, which has been out of print for many years. With a new section: "Notes from a Diary of 1963-64: Paris, Rome, Budapest" — now in book form for the first time. $6.50

The Children of the South

by MARGARET ANDERSON

A young Southern teacher's personal story of the impact of school desegregation on all the children of the South, black and white. "It will be remembered and kept when many other books coming out of the fever and torment of the South will be forgotten."
—RALPH MCGILL, in his Foreword.
$4.95

Now at your bookstore

FARRAR STRAUS GIROUX

context, for these democratic restrictions on the exercise of power are facts which interact with and condition the functioning of the committees; indeed, they are the "factors which make the facts." The approach is reminiscent of a word game in which a contestant is required to write a 100-word essay without using a word containing the letter "e." Though it can be done, the results are usually bizarre.

Latham develops a case for the anti-subversive probe by describing it in an abstract and artificial way and divorcing its operation from reality. Thus he dubs what lawyers and courts call "exposure," the modus operandi of the anti-subversive Congressional committees, "prescriptive publicity." He defines this as a "form of public notice intended to instruct and deter" which "stopped short of enactment and was therefore not fully ritualized." To translate from this academese: Latham contends that investigative exposure is really in itself a sort of instant statute, slightly foreshortened, a piece of legislation to which something funny happened on the way to the forum—it was not enacted. But this attempt to make exposure respectable is invalid if for no other reason than that the identifying essence of the anti-subversive investigation is not "prescription" but its opposite, "specification," the use of power directly against the witness to punish him for his politics.

The author's ultimate defense of his analysis is a negative one—that the critics of the anti-subversive committee system are inconsistent. Thus he insists that the New Deal investigations and those of the twenties (like Teapot Dome) are precedents for later exposure probes. But the earlier investigations were directed at conduct and not at speech and association. Latham rejects this distinction and berates the liberals for inconsistency because, in his view, joining the party is also a form of conduct. But the issue posed by the anti-probe forces cannot be transformed into a metaphysical debate. The issue is a constitutional one: whether the characteristic inquiry of the exposure committee ("Are you now or have you ever been a member of the Communist Party?") involves an invasion of the First Amendment area. Because Latham has forsworn the letter "e," he has barred himself from considering an issue crucial to his study—namely whether the exposure system is consistent with the protected freedoms. (Only the tenacious pursuit of irony has forced him to deal with the question even in passing.) What is even more astonishing is his failure to take note of the Supreme Court's ruling that the very disclosures to which he has denied distinguishing significance invade the First Amendment.

In developing the thesis that the liberals of the thirties originated the later anti-subversive techniques ("still another of history's depressing ironies"), Latham blurs another essential difference — the earlier investigations were fact finding and not punitive as the later ones were. The anatomy of anti-subversive exposure finds no counterpart in the investigations, either of the twenties or of the New Deal: the use of power to drive witnesses from employment and to ruin them; the recalling of witnesses several times if one exposure did them no injury; the requirement that the witness name others under the threat of contempt sanctions; the compiling of dossiers and the issuance of catalogues of condemned organizations to make blacklisting more efficient; and the operation of propaganda mills from which hate-filled literature pours in a torrent to a special constituency of rightist collaborators in the exposure process.

The Supreme Court has condemned this personalized "exposure for exposure's sake"; but Latham insists that the Court is "wrong" in failing to comprehend that exposure is really an (unenacted) law of general application.

Latham scolds critics also because they have been inconsistent in demanding procedural protection for witnesses, including the right of cross-examination, while they applauded the earlier probes. In the same vein he rebukes Justice Black for defending legislative investigations when he was a Senator and attacking the anti-subversive probes as a Supreme Court Justice. But they were not the same kinds of investigations and Latham seems unaware of the considerable extent to which the earlier investigations did observe the procedural decencies—including the right to cross-examination. And protest against the Red hunters' darling, guilt by association, is not an unrealistic demand for a form of protection not even available in a courtroom—as Latham sees it—but an expression of a libertarian concern for the damage to freedom which results when A is blamed for the views of B.

Latham's tin ear for the realities of the exposure process inevitably causes him to misconstrue the responses of the witnesses under attack. These are easily explained as reactions to a felt threat: the witness who "presumes to instruct" a committee on the meaning of the Fifth Amendment is fighting to hold his job; the witness who is nervous to the point of incomprehensibility has not been previously intimidated by the Reds but is terrified by his ordeal; and the fiery shouter of defiance has not been "sent" (by you know who) to disrupt the hearing—he simply does not want to go down without a struggle even though the contest is unequal.

The author's lack of comprehension of the exposure system flows, in part at least, from his distortions of its origin. The launching of the Dies Committee in 1938 was not a response to a concern about "the threat posed to established institutions" by the 1935 Communist popular-front line, or by a fear of Red infiltration of the federal establishment. The Dies Committee was a creature of the Dixiecrat-Republican coalition to fight the New Deal. The huge 1936 pro-Roosevelt majority broke the back of the American Liberty League and its subsidized network of organizations. In 1937, the constitutional attack on the New Deal agencies was closed off by the Supreme Court decision in the Jones and Laughlin case. The Dies Committee sprang from the need to find a new weapon of attack. Its master strategy was to discredit the New Deal agencies as Red by smearing the employees who manned them, to use the same technique against private organizations and in this way to create a climate of opinion which would erode the New Deal majorities.

It was not because the line had become so blurred "between revolutionary ambition and mere nonconformity" that legislative investigation was embraced as an alternative to legislation. Dies and his supporters did not think that legislation was "inept" or "inadequate" to deal with a tricky new threat posed by fronts; they knew that legislation would violate the Constitution—and Dies repeatedly said so. Who needed legislation anyway when you could smite the Communist, the non-Communist and the ex-Communist with fine impartiality and escape constitutional censure? Latham's thesis is carpentered from abstractions far removed from the realities and is not even internally coherent. If the fronts were so sneaky as to defy legislative therapy and make exposure a more practical alternative, how did the Internal Security Act of 1950 come to be passed? And, after the enactment of this statute for policing the fronts, following hearings by the anti-subversive committees, why did exposure continue with unabated zeal?

Latham has denied his readers an appraisal of the exposure system in the light of the constitutional ban on bills of attainder, legislative punishment without trial. Before investigative exposure grew into its style, the House experimented with another form of legislative punishment of government employees, the rider to appropriation bills which withheld payment of salaries to named "subversive" employees. In 1943, the House passed such a Dies-inspired rider directed at three "subversive" New Deal functionaries. The Roosevelt administration made a momentous decision to fight the rider in the courts as an attainder. This decision marked the crest of the resistance by the Executive to the use of the Red issue by the Congressional coalition in the competition between the two branches for the control of policy. If the rider went unchallenged, the indications were that some thirty other employees were slated for similar treatment. In 1946, the Supreme Court in the Lovett case invalidated the rider as an attainder, leaving exposure as the coalition's chief weapon. Although Latham purports to summarize this important case in passing, he misstates its central holding, assigns an erroneous meaning to it, and never refers to the fact that the rider was condemned as an unconstitutional attainder—too high a price to pay for avoiding the letter "e."

Latham bastes his book with anthropological terminology without explaining its relevance, a procedure reminiscent of the facile Freudianizing in the social sciences. Because this terminology is used not metaphorically or to lend color but literally, it creates serious problems of meaning. Judicial review of acts of Congress, for example, is not a "custom of the culture." It did not exist until 1803 when the Supreme Court decided Marbury v. Madison. "Ceremonials," "rituals" and related terms are not valid descriptions of formal institutions or practices which have been created by positive law.

Of all of Latham's exoticisms, the most ambitious is his attempt to legitimate exposure as a practice which is sanctioned by the "culture." (Not the least of the difficulties raised by the author's anthropological sorties is his selectivity; he never tells us why the right to dissent or an abhorrence of legislative justice has not yet been absorbed into our culture.) The desperation of this particular evasion of the letter "e," for which more than mere rhetorical support is offered, becomes apparent from the mélange of inapposite precedents which are cited, such as post-World War I vigilantism, Greek ostracism and the disgrace rituals of the Trobriand Islanders. (One can only wonder how the author could have overlooked such "culture-sanctioned" precedents for exposure as lynching or the expulsions of Ann Hutchinson and Roger Williams by the Puritan theocracy.)

Latham's study is, in the end, an elaborate apology for the Congressional witch hunt, the prime tool of McCarthyism. In the vacuum of suppressed norms, the noisome realities of the exposure system are transformed into a time-honored, self-justifying investigative routine, perfected and approved by the very liberals who now criticize it most bitterly, and the witch hunt itself takes a bow in a glamorous new role as an authentic political response to a grave threat to our institutions. Irony, pervasive and almost mechanical, silences the doubter and quietly flatters the objectivity of the author. Commitment, we are told, was a mask for opportunism. Now we will finally hear the bleak autumnal truth pronounced by the white-coated scholar in his laboratory. Will we? Most of the author's assumptions and conclusions are blatantly tendentious, and the facts he adduces to support his ironies are incomplete or questionable. If irony is the name of the game, this is the crowning irony.

The Seal of Approval

TWENTYONE TWICE: A Journal. By Mark Harris. Little, Brown & Co. 288 pp. $5.95.

CHARLES R. LARSON

Mr. Larson, a former Peace Corps volunteer, teaches English and African studies at the American University in Washington, D. C.

On July 28, 1964, American novelist, Mark Harris, received a telephone call from Sargent Shriver inviting him to evaluate a Peace Corps project in Africa. Shriver told Harris he had read his autobiography, Mark the Glove Boy, and felt that Harris "was the kind of person who could examine the work of the Peace Corps and say useful things about it." The plan was for Harris to write a report for "internal circulation" which would be readable and succinct or, as Shriver put it, filled with no bureaucratic nonsense. Was Harris interested? Of course. When could he begin? Right away. Or so he thought, until he discovered that Shriver's call was only the preliminary to a revealing little drama in which Harris' sanity and loyalty were investigated by a "routine" security check lasting five months.

Harris' security check was frustrating and illuminating, but thoroughly familiar, by now, to hundreds of Peace Corps volunteers who have been similarly subjected

In the Northeast of Brazil, 23 million people are getting ready to explode in revolution

This electrifying book, by one of Latin America's best known social scientists, shows why. Dr. Josue de Castro — himself a native of the region — graphically reveals conditions of destitution, disease, and feudal backwardness on a scale Americans little suspect and can hardly conceive. He indicts the Alliance for Progress, which helps mainly to support the old order. And he gives frightening substance to the warning of The New York Times' Tad Szulc that "the Northeast will go Communist and have a situation ten times worse than Cuba if something is not done."

DEATH IN THE NORTHEAST
Poverty and Revolution in the Northeast of Brazil
JOSUÉ DE CASTRO author of The Geography of Hunger
$4.95, now at your bookstore.
RANDOM HOUSE

to what is commonly known in volunteer jargon as "limbo"—a reverse kind of cultural shock which reduces the person to something less than a human being.

Harris waited weeks and weeks for his clearance, thought up ways to get even if he were turned down and sometimes considered chucking the whole thing. By the time the Peace Corps had "stamped his ass" (to use Harris' own term) with the Good Housekeeping seal of approval, he had solved the problem of retaining his sanity by keeping a journal. The result is a thoroughly compelling document of cultural breakdown, for Harris has used the face of his Peace Corps experience and African trip as a kind of cracked mirror, reflecting — in pieces — the problems and inadequacies of his own culture. Reading his journal, one gets the distinct impression that the United States—as well as the country Harris will eventually visit—is also a developing nation and that the United States' reverse form of cultural shock is far more disturbing than any of the problems confronting the newly independent nations of Africa.

Twentyone Twice is a record of Harris' dialogue with the inner self—the inner depths of a sensitive man 42 years old, who realizes that if there had been a Peace Corps when he was 21, he would have joined. "I wouldn't mind being the Ernie Pyle of the Peace Corps," he writes, before his enthusiasm is subdued by official red tape. But later, when the frustrations of limbo begin to get to him, he admits he is rapidly losing touch with the culture around him. "Can I Make Contact with the United States of America? Does America Permit Growth and Maturity?"

Harris is not just writing to expose the FBI's investigatory process—by now we are all familiar with the enormous records kept on us. Though he becomes haunted with the idea that he will be rejected, he never loses all of his faith in his country. He whines, he mopes, he sends off telegrams to Washington:

> IT'S ALL SO LUDICROUS I DON'T KNOW WHETHER TO LAUGH OR CRY. I WAS NEVER A COMMUNIST. AT AGE 21 I MINGLED WITH PEOPLE WHO PROMISED TO SAVE US FROM WHITE SUPREMACY AND POVERTY. AFTER AGE 21 TIME AND INTELLECT IMPROVED MY COMPANIONSHIP. I AM STILL OPPOSED TO WHITE SUPREMACY AND POVERTY, AND I THINK I AM ESPECIALLY WELL SUITED TO UNDERSTAND THE MOOD OF KIDS AGE 21 WHO ARE IN THE PEACE CORPS. IT'S TOO BAD I DIDN'T HAVE A PEACE CORPS TO GO INTO. PERHAPS YOU WILL SEE FIT TO PRESENT THIS MESSAGE TO THE COMMITTEE EXAMINING MY CASE. BEST REGARDS.

Like a child counting the days until his birthday, Harris becomes obsessed with the number of days since he has heard from Washington. His journal becomes a profoundly human fabric of daily trivialities, realities and imaginings, a strange admixture of brutal self-criticism and optimism for a culture he knows is often as precariously balanced as the one he hopes to visit in Africa.

During a personal interview, Harris endured the absurdities of two FBI investigators who had examined, among other things, his lifetime employment record. "I'm sure you know what you omit may be significant," one of the investigators informed him. Adrenalin coursing through his system, Harris was then reminded that he had forgotten to list his four-day job as an addressograph machine operator in Peekskill, N. Y., seventeen years before. (A review of Harris' early novel, The Southpaw, in the Daily Worker thirteen years previously also made him particularly suspect.) "I want my government to stop investigating me and accept me with all my faults, and I will do the same for it," Harris writes, when his patience is about to snap.

Harris finally got this clearance and his African assignment, which was to check the so-called "risks" in the country of Kongohno, and this is the substance of the second part of his journal. Obviously there is no nation called Kongohno, and Harris' reasons for obscuring the identity of the actual country make one conscious of the whole absurdity of international euphuistic games. (From a more probing side, one wonders what else in Harris' journal has been altered?)

When Harris got to Kongohno and began his interviews with the "risks" Washington had been so worried about, he concluded that the "risks" were exactly the kind of volunteers the Peace Corps needs if it is to remain unafraid and free. "The Peace Corps was itself a 'risk' when it began," Harris says in the preliminary summary of his trip, and the danger will be the organization's "forgetting its original ideals, and becoming timid, safe, avoiding 'risks.'" Ostensibly about the Peace Corps, Africa and the United States Government, Twentyone Twice more importantly is the inner record of a man who has digested more of his culture than most of us will ever even try to swallow.

Where the Stakes Are Real

THE NON-CONFORMIST: The Autobiography of a Conscience. By George Abbe. Drawings by Rockwell Kent. Branden Press. 306 pp. $5.95.

CHARLES L. SANFORD

Mr. Sanford teaches at Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute. He is the author of The Quest for Paradise: Europe and the American Moral Imagination (University of Illinois Press).

In the 20th century, we have constantly been memorializing the last Puritan and the end of innocence. But as Mark Twain once remarked of news reporting his death, it was somewhat premature. Certainly, the Puritan conscience exhibited in this work by George Abbe is remarkably alive and viable.

In the form of a novel, Abbe tells a story of his personal struggle against McCarthyism. His trials began at Mt. Holyoke College at the outbreak of World War II. Abbe, a young English instructor and poet whose background included the ministry and pacifist teachings, decided finally to enlist in the war against Hitler. Surviving a surrealistic horror in boot camp, he finished the war instructing naval classes at Yale. Then came a teaching post at a YMCA college from which he was dismissed for critical analysis of the Reader's Digest in his propaganda classes. The only organized group which had the courage to defend him was the Communist Party, which he joined but soon left when it refused to permit him independence of mind and spirit. He was subsequently hired and dismissed by the University of Connecticut, the University of Pittsburgh, Wayne University and other places for publicly airing views which a great many intelligent people were privately thinking.

Though she stuck by him in the end, Abbe's wife retreated from him several times to the security of her parents' home in Connecticut. He accepted a pulpit call to Annisquam, Mass., only to be dismissed for his membership on the Committee to Defend Dirk Struik. Bill Cunningham of the Boston Herald later hunted him down and was instrumental in destroying his following in a rural pulpit in New Hampshire. The great witch hunt was on.

The characters in Abbe's book are vividly realized—cantankerous, yeasty, fearful, hypocritical, noble—never mere caricatures in a melodrama of vice and virtue. The stakes are real. Most interesting of all is the character of the author, revealed with honesty, a Chaplinesque figure groping wistfully from defeat to defeat, but somehow maintaining a dignity in the face of repeated humiliation at the hands of a vast economic machine. The overall theme is one man's growth in understanding and compassion without compromising his fierce attachment to ideals, including his faith in people.

The sources of his idealism are twofold: a semi-Christian mysticism which unites man, beast and nature, and an American democratic tradition which goes back to Whitman, Emerson and Thoreau. It is an inheritance which proves capable of assimilating itself to the needs of our modern industrial society, if we can imagine an Emerson or a Thoreau working in a Negro slum, collecting signatures for Wallace's Progressive Party, or fighting in various humble ways to realize a socialistic vision of brotherhood on earth. Does this seem incredibly naive, a willful distortion of American traditions? Abbe says:

> What we need is more naïveté in America, less hardboiled practicality and self-interest; for then, perhaps, we would act, for conviction, for principle, rather than holding back, saving ourselves as we do now for comfort, convenience, the secure.

But Abbe is not really naive. He is self-aware in all the ways in which a highly intelligent, educated contemporary can be: aware of the traps of temperament and of his own tendency to a martyr complex, aware of the dangers of self-righteousness, of ego — aware, above all, of man's great capacity for mischief and cruelty. He recognizes in this the vast distance between man and God, whose face is a "fierce axe-head" testing our worth (an image, incidentally, which hardly conforms to his pantheism).

The ultimate question Abbe raises is whether we are good enough in the mass or as individuals to achieve the democratic socialism he advocates. He believes the question demands a practical answer, since socialism may be the alternative to a total evil that could overwhelm our nation, for he seems to see us entering a new period of tension, hysteria and propaganda more dangerous than that of the forties and fifties.

Abbe's book revivifies a great democratic tradition: the strength to speak out against suicidal rigidities. In it, he has summoned forth a living presence which is completely believable, whatever the reader's faith or lack of faith, a presence filled with anguish, but also reverence and great beauty, and the wondrous brooding mystery that envelops all life. Idea coalesces perfectly with sight and sound and dramatic situation to charm and enlighten the reader and to lend the strongest support to the American dream. The book itself, devoid of bitterness and self-pity, is a magnificent revenge upon those who would silence him.

THEATRE / Julius Novick

Mr. Novick recently completed a survey of the American National Theatre for The Nation, based on a Ford Foundation grant.

Since I wrote about the Tyrone Guthrie in these pages some weeks ago, The Dance of Death—an excellent production of one of Strindberg's lesser works—has been dropped from the repertory. As You Like It and The Skin of Our Teeth—two entertaining and superficial productions that represent the triumph of directorial showmanship over drama——have been retained. And new productions of Shaw's The Doctor's Dilemma and O'Neill's S. S. Glencairn have been added. Both new productions are entertaining, in their varying fashions, but they did not dispel my feeling that something is not right at the Guthrie, that optimal use is not being made of its tremendous resources.

S. S. Glencairn is the overall title for four early plays by Eugene O'Neill that deal with the crew of a freighter plying between Great Britain and the West Indies; the faults of the Guthrie production, directed by Douglas Campbell and Edward Payson Call, are too minor to mention. This is a classical company, proficient in Shakespeare and artificial comedy; but Paul Ballantyne, Lee Richardson, Ed Flanders, Ken Ruta, John Cromwell, Len Cariou, Sandy McCallum and almost everyone else in the large cast deal with O'Neill's sweaty realism as if they were born to it.

Dahl Delu's settings and the uncredited lighting provide all the assistance our imaginations need to turn the stage into the deck or the fo'c's'le of the Glencairn. The actors, principals and bit players alike, singing sea chanteys in deep-throated chorus, perform the set changes most entertainingly before our eyes. But surely something is slightly askew when the set changes are more fun than the plays themselves. O'Neill's early études in the naturalistic manner are worth reviving when they can be revived this well; but they are not genuine classics, nor do they represent a voice from the past that at this moment we particularly need to hear.

The Doctor's Dilemma is also not a genuine classic, nor does it have any particular pertinence for us at this moment; yet I am quite willing to accept it as its own excuse for being on the Guthrie stage. It is perhaps a personal quirk of mine to prefer good-but-not-first-rate Shaw to good-but-not-first-rate O'Neill. Yet what has the S. S. Glencairn got to match the buoyant brilliance of Shaw's dialogue?

Dr. Ridgeon's dilemma is that he can treat only one more patient by his new opsonic method, and must choose between a young artist who is both a genius and a scoundrel, and a middle-aged fellow doctor who is a good man, but a nonentity; the one not chosen will die. Uncharacteristically, Shaw dodges the issue by having Dr. Ridgeon fall in love with the artist's wife and make his decision on that basis. The play suffers from its too-great length, from the featurelessness of its central character, from implausibilities in its plotting, and from the sheer cranky inaccuracy of its author's opinions about doctors. And yet, sixty years after its composition, much of The Doctor's Dilemma still plays beautifully, because Shaw's dialogue (as some tin-eared people still do not realize) was made to be spoken.

The last time I reported on the Guthrie, I wrote that "unless its talented directors confine their attentions to plays they like and understand, it may be in serious danger." Douglas Campbell, who directed The Doctor's Dilemma, is known

COMMENTARY,
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
Commentary
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address..................
Zip..................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

$2.95 each
SAVE YOUR COPIES OF THE NATION
- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25
ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

to feel a special affinity to GBS, and so I had high hopes for the production. Mr. Campbell has indeed been duly respectful, and has not overwhelmed the play with "production," but he has managed to botch it nevertheless. As the dullish Dr. Ridgeon, Lee Richardson does all that can be done, and Robert Pastene is suitably crisp and dry as a surgeon who thinks that the answer to everyone's problem is to operate and remove the "nuciform sac." But with these exceptions, every important part has been in some measure miscast.

Ken Ruta plays Sir Ralph Bloomfield Bonington, the fatuous society doctor, in an ecstasy of burbling self-esteem; in twenty years he will be ideal for the part, but at the moment his white hairs and padded belly obviously do not become him. Mr. Ruta is so funny that only a perfectionist would be unwilling to forgive the fact that he is not the one young actor in a thousand who can play an elderly man with complete conviction; but the other miscastings are more serious. As the oldest doctor of all, John Cromwell is certainly old enough (and what a pleasure it is to see a genuine old man on the stage of a resident theatre), but the character is written to be sharp and gruff, and Mr. Cromwell's hesitant, gentle delivery tends to smother his laughs.

As the young artist and his fascinating wife, Ed Flanders and Nancy Wickwire — brilliant actors both — are too old. The wife is described as an unworldly, ardent girl from Cornwall, with more passion than brains; Miss Wickwire is unmistakably a shrewd, self-possessed American woman with more brains than passion. Mr. Flanders handles his comedy with irresistible, cheeky ebullience, but his death scene is a long failure. In spite of all his rascality and all his jokes, this is supposed to be a 23-year-old genius dying of tuberculosis before our eyes—think of Keats. If the scene is to work at all it must touch our emotions somehow, but Mr. Flanders is totally lacking in the gallantry and youthful glamour that might have made it pathetic.

Multiple miscasting is not the production's only fault. It might be asked why, in a theatre crawling with speech teachers, one single way of pronouncing the English language might not have been adopted for The Doctor's Dilemma, instead of allowing each member of the cast to speak English or American English as he pleased.

The Guthrie Theatre, moreover, with its thrust stage, is far from ideal for drawing-room comedy, and Dahl Delu's settings were not much help. Mr. Campbell's staging was often a positive hindrance. For long stretches in crucial scenes, I was nearly driven distracted by wondering when some actor was going to get his broad back the hell out of the way so that I could see what was going on. And when this consummation finally came about, it often served to block the view of another group of would-be spectators.

Mr. Campbell has demonstrated before now his insensitivity to some of the scripts he works with; but as artistic director of the Guthrie he might at least be expected to know how to use this stage, and how to use these actors. For the most part, indeed, he does; but you would never know it from The Doctor's Dilemma, which is only rescued by the splendid professionalism of the company (evident through all the miscastings), and by the enduring sparkle of Bernard Shaw's dialogue.

WORLD'S BEST ?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

10-24-66
THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ [illegible] Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

MAHLER: Symphony No. 6. BERG: Le Vin (with Phyllis Curtin, soprano). Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7044.

Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744.

Symphony No. 10. The Philadelphia Orchestra; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735.

Although the Sixth is evidently Mahler's most interesting symphony, the very individuality and complexity of its internal ideas tend to make even more extrusive the theatrical "strokes"—march rhythms, snare-drum rolls and the whole gestural type repertory of "hymns," "Ländler," and "Liebeslieder" (or perhaps better Liebestodlieder) — that Mahler superimposed on these ideas out of an apparent inability to find a projective medium uniquely appropriate to them. Still, there are extraordinary passages throughout the Sixth Symphony, particularly the simultaneous unfoldings of linear successions, in varying multiplicities and densities, the transparent woodwind-, bell-, harp- and string-tremolo sonorities in the first movement, the extreme sonority changes that emerge from texturally continuous passages in rapid succession without losing the thread of continuity, and the still remarkably original-sounding opening of the last movement, with its single lines unfolding tenuously against an almost unrhythmized, bassless, tremolo background that gradually defines out into a fully articulated multilinearity to fill the entire orchestral range.

But in performance such qualities are all too easily submerged beneath the surrounding pseudo-trivialities. The nervous locomotion of Leinsdorf's approach, scarcely pausing to acknowledge a transitional point or to adjust the rate of unfolding or the manner of succession to the requirements of individual passages, combined with the almost uncontrollable crudity of some of the Boston Symphony's playing, particularly of its brass section, is hardly adequate to the task.

The performance of Berg's Der Wein, in its French-language version, is perhaps even more catastrophic from its lack of any evident observations of dynamic differentia in relations between orchestral and vocal inflection, in the muddled orchestral tangle in which at most one element is audible while innumerable details of inflection and sonority go unarticulated within the general

THE MAILMAN AND
DAS EWIG WEIBLICHE

Through a dark drizzle of rain, Plodding to work on mountain-heavy shoes,
The jumping thing to see is
The old mailman as sudden nun float up to front doors in black-draped raincoat, hooded helmet
flare like a wimple, and deliver the mail
through a driven, coffee-tense scatter
of masculine commuters, as if the envelopes were sealed with quietude, a female gift.

JAMES SCHEVILL

"background" morass, and in the shrill, uninflected and careless vocal performance by Phyllis Curtin. Once again, all these recalcitrant elements are efficiently thrust ahead by Mr. Leinsdorf, as though getting from beginning to end had the same relevance to music as to bus driving.

The "performing version" of the sketches left by Mahler for his Tenth Symphony seems to have been quite responsibly assembled by its resurrector, Deryck Cooke, but Mahler's kind of composition, in which the minute particulars of inflective details were far more significantly the loci of his most original ideas than the broad section-to-section characteristics, defeats this attempt to learn much about what the Tenth's ideas would have been like. One is aware throughout of the consistent absence of those attributes that are most apt to be remarkable in a Mahler work: one hears literal conjunctions of "lines" and instruments for long stretches, recurrences of ideas with identical orchestration, textures that suddenly drop out and are replaced without transition, and instrumental "entrances" and "exits" that seem to function purely as "color" but from no significant relational path. The "performing sketch" perhaps has its greatest value in making us vividly aware of what is left out; but this may be insufficient to warrant a project as expensive as the present recording, when so much of the significant, fully composed orchestral literature remains unperformed and unavailable. In this performance, the Philadelphia flows over everything with its customary indiscriminate competence.

Walter's Mahler performances contrast sharply with both Ormandy's and Leinsdorf's in the evident particularity of every attack, inflection, entrance, transition, cadence, textural or timbral change, and the considered variation of duration of each pitch in an "even" succession as well as a similar variation, on a large scale, of the tempo of sectional unfolding. The combination of cleanliness and plasticity of attack in the performance of the Ninth Symphony is especially endearing, particularly when judged against the strenuous Boston Symphony attack. And, by comparison with Walter's previous recordings of the work, the superiority of the vocalists in the present version of Das Lied perhaps overweighs some of its deficiencies, such as the rather remote and tenuous orchestral sound.

are you your own boss ?

If you are, there's a new law allowing you to set up a fund for your retirement... and obtain substantial tax benefits, too. Our specialists will be happy to explain the benefits to you, and customize a retirement plan to suit your needs. Just write or call.

Matt Jaffe ASSOCIATES, LTD.

INSURANCE SPECIALISTS
431 Fifth Avenue, N.Y., N.Y. 10016
MU 4-5779

FILMS / Robert Hatch

The Polish movie, Salto, comes close to being the obverse of Our Town, nostalgia without the hope of innocence. It also seems at the opposite pole from the arena of social violence that the Polish film makers were exploiting a few years ago, though Zbigniew Cybulski, who was the hulking Americanized beat hero of Ashes and Diamonds, plays the lead in the new film (and still leans heavily on dark glasses). The mood of Salto is end of the line, entropy; it is a tone I have not heard before from postwar East Europe.

The film opens with an apparently hunted young man dropping from a train and floundering through outlying impediments to take shelter in a nearby town. Like Wilder's town, this one is manifestly a stage set; there is no pretense that it really exists and it is empty save for the handful of people involved in the action. These include a good man (who takes in the fugitive); a retired military realist; a hedonistic womanizer; a child-exasperated poet; a nonentity named Blumenfeld who would assume the attributes of his namesake, a recently deceased actor of renown; a fortuneteller; the good man's daughter (whom the hero mistakes for her mother); a couple in love. One gets the feeling that these are all clockwork figures, set in motion by the fugitive who has apparently come this way before (he digs for a trove he had once buried and comes up with an unexploded hand grenade, which goes off in a nearby thicket). The poet rages at the stranger for having frightened his children, but a little later the stranger heals them of a sudden alarming illness. The good man confesses that he lacks the capacity for evil; indeed, he dreams of playing his neighbors a really nasty trick. His daughter sleeps with their guest, as presumably her mother would have done. The realist wrestles with him and is defeated; the fortuneteller has her fortune told; Blumenfeld prepares his stage debut; the hedonist turns maudlin. These encounters all start up with the abruptness of restored animation.

The climax occurs at the town's annual party to itself, held in the almost empty community hall. There the poet recites verses which include the observation that the times have become so shallow that men who fall now fall horizontally. Partly in response to this, the stranger teaches them all a dance—the Salto—which appears to be an exorcism of cross-purposes (when A sways left, B sways right), and one can feel a warmth beginning to creep through the hall.

But then a woman with two children arrives, to demand her husband. He is no fugitive, no one pursues him; he is merely a shirker of domestic responsibility and the monotony of married love. The villagers stone their visitor out of the town.

These proceedings are crowded with more allegory than I have patience to unravel or space to set down, but the overall intent surmounts the tangle of allusion. Life — frightened, hunted, quixotic,

FREE! With every new subscription to

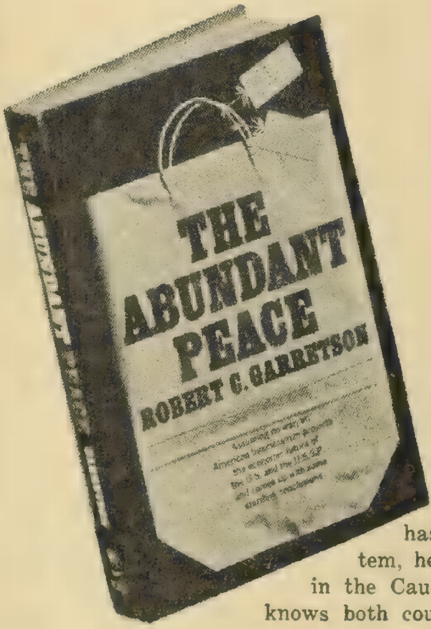
THE NATION

THE ABUNDANT PEACE



by Robert C. Garretson

World Publishing Company
255 pp. Hardback edition.
Original price $5.95.

"The real value of the book comes from Mr. Garretson's experience as a businessman in America who has also lived with the Russian system, helping to set up a canning factory in the Caucasian area in 1929. He therefore knows both countries at first hand."

. . . The Economist, Feb. 5, 1966

● Executive Vice President of the Carling Brewing Company, Robert C. Garretson spent many months in the Soviet Union in 1930 and 1931 as representative of an American manufacturing company. Those who read Mr. Garretson's Nation article: "Why Fight? Ruble-Dollar Road to Peace" will want to read this provocative and highly original projection of parallel industrial trends in the USSR and the United States and the prospects for world peace through abundance which these trends open up.

For your FREE copy of THE ABUNDANT PEACE, fill out the coupon and start receiving America's oldest weekly journal of opinion (founded in 1865).

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send my FREE copy of THE ABUNDANT PEACE.

☐ 1 Year, $10 ☐ 2 Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip No. ....

10-24-66

cruel and beckoning — comes to a community parched for the lack of it into a state of paralysis. A dreamlike suspension begins to break toward awakening, but then life himself proves fraudulent, mere triviality decked out as desperation and power, and the townspeople drive him out. Coming and going, he interrupts two giggling girls who are bathing nude in a stream. They, presumably, are what the elders should be spying on if it is life they seek; but the circular futility of the situation is that the bathers are themselves lay figures of the community.

Tadeusz Konwicki has directed these proceedings in a style of sleepwalking outside of time; the characters express an oddly vivid vacuity and the effect overall is slapstick in a burial ground. The disillusion strikes me as woven deep into the piece, not worn as a costume for comment. It is a coldly memorable film.

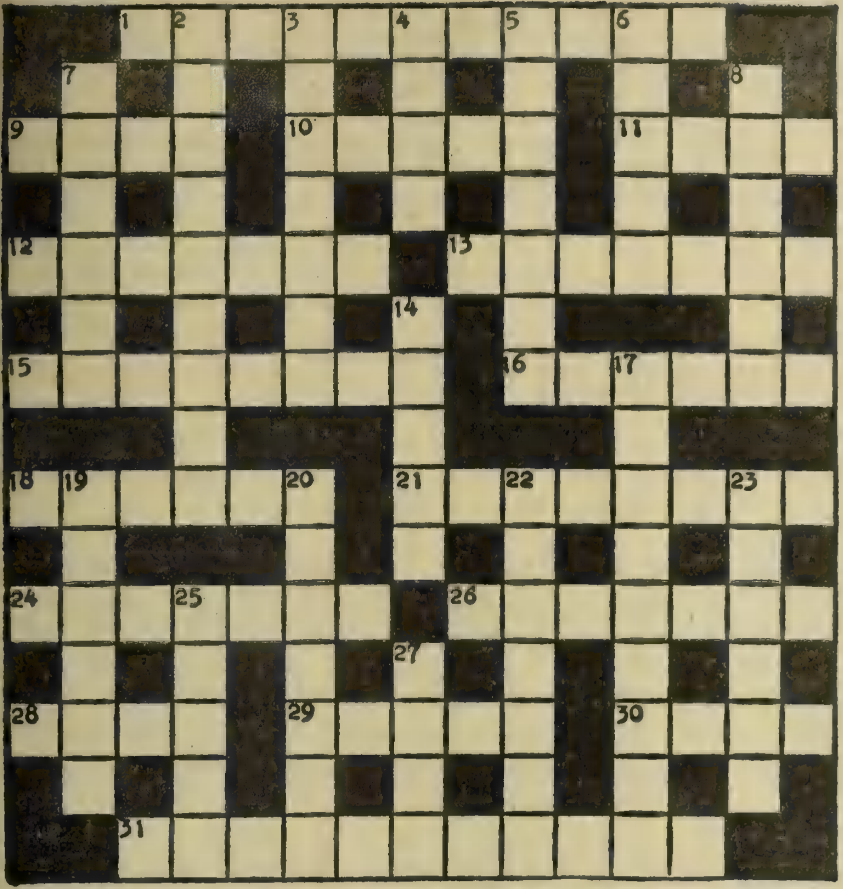
John Korty is a young producer-director who relies almost entirely on his own resouces. The attitude is excellent and I wish I could say as much for The Crazy Quilt, the first of his pictures to be distributed commercially.

The film is based on a story with the mock-naive title, "The Illusionless Man and the Visionary Maid," and mock naive is the rather tiresome signature of the picture. A termite exterminator who hunches his shoulders and declares everything no damned good takes up with (eventually marries) a girl who flings wide her arms and declares everything just wonderful. He thinks every timber is rotten at the heart; she invests butterflies with souls. The struggle is to make him say "I love you," which he does along about their twentieth year together, the moral of the picture being that human life may have its inadequacies, but it is the only life we have. Somehow I knew that, and the rather ghastly spirit of jolly community theatricals that pervades the picture does nothing to make it more persuasive.

The exasperating thing about The Crazy Quilt is that from time to time it breaks out in blotches of excellence. Tom Rosqui, who plays the misanthropic termite menacer, is an eloquently impassive actor, the dialogue occasionally glints with a witty line and some of the ironic details (particularly when the wife seeks "fulfillment" with a succession of shoddy males) have the bite of recognition. But the effect was killed, for me at least, by the self-indulgences of its "let's make a movie" amateurism and its repetitious embroidery of the self-evident. Man's fate is all that the theatre has had to work with since the first savage tried on a wolf's skull for dramatic effect, and it is late in the day to proclaim that the meaning of life is the living of it.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1172

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Jumbo sales implied by it? (3, 8)
9 Her circle might suggest a one-course meal for some. (4)
10 and 28 Inferior to nothing more than a slight cold, certainly. (5, 4)
11 See 4 down
12 One way 1 help, on acquiring a simple camera type. (7)
13 Stolen gangster weapons? They might help in a fast get-away. (3, 4)
15 Food for a large number, little brother, in another continent is out of this world! (8)
16 A sort of battle commemoration on it, perhaps. (6)
18 Might it be put on after spats, as recommended? (4-2)
21 Palliated. (8)
24 It might seem peculiar to have an animal follow most of the procession. (7)
26 By the sound of it, those who have problems with their lungs or chests. (7)
28 See 10 across
29 Beat in time with Robert? (5)
30 See 7 down
31 Wet, nowadays, but one-time favorite in play. (3, 4, 4)

DOWN:

2 Press mount, associated with a plain roller in early days. (4, 5)
3 Doesn't quite catch the implication? (7)
4 and 11 across Leaves one's food, but one's work has material significance. (8)
5 City that suggests it could fit into an old bottle. (7)
6 Agriculturist who gets by as a composer? (5)
7 and 30 across One concerned with other than quick communication, rather uncommon with directions for one course. (6, 4)
8 Draw back in resentment more than a bit! (6)
14 Charles and Mary reputedly innocent? (5)
17 Serif? (Exhausts the source, possibly.) (9)
19 How one stood when home on the range. (6)
20 Charted a course, as Fawkes did. (7)
22 Certain animalculae. (7)
23 They might result from 3 in the field. (6)
25 The distinctive flavor of an Italian roadsign? (5)
27 Made an early-morning sound for the gang? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1171

ACROSS: 1 Soapsuds; 5 and 29 A Taste of Honey; 10 Dignity; 11 Private; 12 Lilac; 13 Head-first; 14 Ticks; 16 Daladier; 19 Capstone; 22 Balsa; 24 Healthier; 26 Until; 28 Cottage; 30 Stroke; 31 Headland. DOWN: 1 Sodality; 2 Angel; 3 Suitcases; 4 Dry-shod; 6 Thief; 7 Stairwell; 8 Everts; 9 Sprawl; 15 Character; 17 Debouched; 18 Parleyed; 20 Oliver; 21 Earlobe; 23 Shocks; 25 Track; 27 Tonga.

PUBLICATIONS

Antidote to Capote
History in the Open

Why fester in quicklime morbidness with his Dust-Bowl ghouls in locale of sodden dreariness when just beyond loom Rockies tops lit up gloriously (p. 85-87). Other episodes galore, all U.S. annals. PANORAMAS, concise text, unique insights. A real book innovation, its super-graphic pages absorbed at a glance.

$2 postpd., 200 pp., cloth
B. F. JOHNSON
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

just published:
PEACE POLITICS, THE NEW LEFT and the PITY OF IT ALL . . . offers a genuine peace politics . . . 16 pp 25c
WORLD WITHOUT WAR COUNCIL
1730 Grove, Berkeley 94709

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue; N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

"NEW POLITICS" ORGANIZATION seeking Executive Director. Imagination, efficiency, maturity basic requirements. Experience with issues-oriented liberals & peace, civil rights, student movements desirable. Attractive salary. Send particulars. Box 595, c/o The Nation.

NEW RELIGION. Explains virgin birth. Free details. Casselman, 1301 H, No. 6B, Sacramento, Calif. 95814.

PUBLISHER'S EDITOR — Analyzes manuscripts; revises fiction, non-fiction. French-English. Box 594, c/o The Nation.

BUY YOUR BOOKS
through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

MR. PRESIDENT!

June 22, 1966

The Honorable Lyndon B. Johnson
The White House
Washington, D. C.

Dear Mr. President:

...Our hopes for world peace, and our fears of world disaster, are centered at this time on Vietnam...

You, the United States Government, and Americans generally have looked for ways to end this unhappy war. The search has been extraordinarily difficult. Profoundly discouraging, too, has been the fact that the numerous efforts to find a path to peace in Vietnam have not only failed in themselves, but that we have been unable to understand these failures and to learn from them how we might succeed.

Much of our policy in Vietnam has been based on the historical analogy of our encounter with Nazism and Stalinism, an experience of ten to thirty years ago. A group of historians has now examined a past more recent and more relevant: the history of American involvement in Vietnam itself since 1963. Their findings are presented in the attached study.

The historians disclose a disturbing pattern of connections between negotiations and escalation, between political opportunities to approach peace and military actions that widen the war. The authors are well aware that, working only from the public record, their facts are incomplete and their perspective partial. Yet, the recent pattern they discern in the history of United States policy is of such grave import that we believe it to merit your serious attention: if wrong, to be refuted by evidence; if right, to become a guide to policy...

Respectfully,

Charles A. Bane, John C. Bennett, Eugene Carson Blake, Robert McAfee Brown, Benjamin J. Buttenwieser, Benton R. Cancell, Grenville Clark, Barry Commoner, Clifford J. Durr, William Eastlake, Marriner S. Eccles, Robert C. Garretson, Maxwell Geismar, J.W. Gitt, Patrick E. Gorman, Abraham J. Heschel, Robert M. Hutchins, Arnold Kaufman, Martin Luther King, Edward Lamb, Irving F. Laucks, David Livingston, Arno J. Mayer James G. Patton, B.T. Rocca, Sr., Frank Rosenblum, Carl E. Schorske, Jacob J. Weinstein, C. Vann Woodward,

A Citizens' White Paper on U. S. responses to pressures for a political settlement of the Vietnam War, prepared by a team of competent scholars, was submitted to the White House four months ago. A cover letter signed by 29 prominent and responsible American leaders and educators urged that the people of this nation be given a forthright official reply to the disturbing conclusions of this study.

Since no adequate official response has been made, this white paper is now being called to the attention of the American people through the publication of an expanded book-length edition entitled

THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM

By Franz Schurmann, Peter Dale Scott, and Reginald Zelnik (of the University of California at Berkeley), in consultation with additional scholars on that and other campuses.

With a Foreword by Arthur Schlesinger, Jr.

ASK FOR IT AT YOUR BOOKSTORE NOW

$3.95 hardcover edition published by BEACON PRESS, 25 Beacon St., Boston 02108. Premier paperback edition published by FAWCETT PUBLICATIONS, Greenwich, Conn.

Concerned citizens may also use the coupon below to obtain the hardcover edition by mail.

To: BEACON PRESS
25 Beacon St.,
Boston, Mass. 02108

I enclose $_______ for _____ copies of THE POLITICS OF ESCALATION IN VIETNAM (@ $3.95), to be mailed to me promptly, postage prepaid.

Name______________________________

Address____________________________

City_______________________________

State__________________Zip_________

PUBLIC LIBRARY

NEW STRAVINSKY BENJAMIN BORETZ

THE NATION

OCTOBER 31, 1966 35 cents

REAGAN vs. BROWN

HOW TO SUCCEED WITH THE BACKLASH

CAREY McWILLIAMS

'THE RUSSIANS FAKED IT'

DANIEL COHEN

THE 'CULTURE' RIOTS

Mao at Bay

ISAAC DEUTSCHER

EVERYDAY WORD USERS

Literature Is Language / WILLIAM H. GASS

Hammett's Continental Op / FREDERICK H. GARDNER

Damon Runyon, Linguist / D. W. MAURER

BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

cost of neutrality

Philadelphia, Pa.

Dear Sirs: May I speak my welcome to the uncommon good sense in your editorial on the California elections [The Nation, Oct. 17].

The decision of the Conference for a New Politics ignores the central lesson of the past half century of political history—that in a contest between candidates of the Center and the extremist Right, the Left dare not be neutral, unless it is strong enough to elect its own. How dearly the Germans and the world paid for having blundered in this regard.

The "new radicalism" is so postured to break with the old radicalism that they do not study it to find its positive and negative sides. Consequently they are repeating its crudest mistakes, and not salvaging any of its virtues. In 1934 in California a much stronger than now exists Left made a similar error in the gubernatorial campaign and contributed considerably to the election of the wicked Merriam machine. If Reagan is elected, at best the awful days of the Rolph-Merriam rule will return, and at worst, which is very likely, the motley crew of Nazi-like ultra-rightists to whom Reagan is attached will capture the state, an outcome sinister for the entire nation.

The drive to make Vietnam the criterion for support of Brown sounded very idealistic—it was in fact a sure pattern for Brown's defeat. Were he to support the President, he would lose the Liberal-Left. Were he to oppose Johnson, he would lose a part of the Democratic organization and middle-of-the-road vote. Did the Liberal-Left believe that the election of Reagan would make for a better climate in which to achieve peace?

It is a worthy subject for political study, that ever since the LaFollette campaign of 1924 the political Left has developed a lemming psychology; as soon as its numbers increase somewhat, it leaves the congenial surroundings that made for growth to begin a march to its own destruction. Instead of crying "bankrupt" and "irrelevance" to the Liberal-Left and Marxist past, as the leaders of the "new radicalism" in California have done, it would be more profitable to study that era.

The California "new radicals" have often battled gallantly and worthily, but it is easy to become intoxicated with the eloquence of one's own self-righteousness and militancy. It's an occupational disease for leaders to avoid if the major objectives of a larger strategy are to be realized.

I appeal especially to those Californians who shared many hard battles with me to prevent that magnificent state from falling into the grasp of the ultra-Right extremists. After the rhetoric is trimmed away, there is only one way to do that—elect Pat Brown, despite his imperfections. S. A. Darcy

the Fulbrights

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: I was distressed by Richard Kostelanetz's article "In Darkest Fulbright" [The Nation, June 13]. As chairman of the United States Board of Foreign Scholarships which administers this program, I have some concern about correcting inaccuracies that do an injustice to a program which in twenty years has aided the exchange of 100,000 persons and performed an inestimable service to the international academic community. I regret that you allowed The Nation to become the vehicle for a spiteful and ignorant diatribe.

Here follow corrections of some of the grosser misstatements of fact: "Many Fulbright programs are

(Continued on page 452)

EDITORIALS

Top Secret

The best kept—and gloomiest—secret of the Johnson era is just what the Vietnamese war is costing. It is a truism that the social costs of any war are incalculable, and even the money cost cannot be ascertained to the last dollar; but this hardly accounts for the murkiness that surrounds a subject so important to the American people. The real reason is that deception is being practiced on a grand scale, by experts in the art. That this is not a groundless assertion the following facts attest:

¶ Governor Scranton, emerging from a White House conference, told newsmen that the war in Vietnam may cost as much as $10 billion more in the next fiscal year. The statement was almost immediately denied.

¶ Sen. Richard B. Russell, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said a few days ago that he and other Senators have been unable to get firm estimates from the Pentagon on Vietnam costs, present and future. He thinks the outlays are currently running between $1.5 and $2 billion a month.

¶ Sen. John Stennis, chairman of the preparedness subcommittee, estimates $2 billion a month.

¶ Wilbur D. Mills, chairman of Ways and Means, is irked by the reluctance of the Administration to give him a straight account of costs. If he doesn't know, who would?

¶ Marquis Childs, in September, said flatly that the cost at that time was $2.7 billion a month. He added: "Rather than a random figure picked out of the air, this is a careful calculation accepted at the highest levels of government concerned with taxes and debt and the storm cloud of threatened inflation hovering over the economy."

¶ Under a release date of October 20, Prof. Raymond J. Saulnier declared that we are faced with inflation and "we need a realistic assessment of defense spending requirements, which have been consistently underestimated. . . . It is impossible to plan monetary policy, let alone fiscal policy, without having a candid assessment of what military operations are going to cost."

There is tricky accounting all over Washington. One device is to estimate war costs in terms of actual expenditures, a technique which automatically hides the truth. The Pentagon has been slow in paying contractors. When the government is slow in paying, vendors do not write threatening letters or hand accounts over to collection agencies: they turn to the banks for money. George A. Murphy, chairman of the Irving Trust Company, says that the Defense Department slowdown, which he calls "widespread," has been a "significant factor in producing extraordinary loan demand." One need not be unduly cynical to connect this situation with the pre-election minimization of the financial disruption caused by the war. Only the most credulous could imagine that bad news is not being withheld from the public now, when it could influence votes, to be released after the votes have been counted.

That costs must be high is self-evident. We are chewing up materiel at a fantastic rate. In terms of materiel, this is our third largest war. According to Senator Morse, a greater tonnage of bombs per month is being dropped on the two Vietnams than all Europe and Africa received in the same time in World War II. It is a small war only in terms of the area involved. Devastation at this level of intensity is expensive for the receiver in lives and property; for the donor the cost in lives is less but the money cost is enormous.

And the worst is yet to come. Counting the crews of the Seventh Fleet, the United States now has nearly 400,000 men engaged in the assault on Vietnam. It is common talk in Washington that 1967 will see an increase in the air and ground forces from the present level of some 330,000 to 600,000 or 700,000. The major voice in the conduct of the war has passed from the civilians to the military. Writing from Saigon in the New York World Journal Tribune, Ward Just asserts that the recent visit of Secretary McNamara "marked the beginning of the end of civilian supremacy in the American effort here." Gen. William C. Westmoreland, though no Caesar like Douglas MacArthur, is now in the top spot. Public relations tribute will continue to be paid to the importance of winning "the hearts and minds of the people," but the war will be fought with bombs, cannon and firearms in ever greater measure. The role of the South Vietnamese army in combat will be further reduced, and the brunt of the war will fall with ever greater weight on the American forces. Ambassador Goldberg will continue to bleat at the UN, but American lives and American dollars will be poured into the South Asian cauldron with no limit in sight. On the financial side alone the American people are in for unpleasant surprises; how unpleasant they will not know until Mr. Johnson and his aides are forced to give an accounting—after November 8.

Korea and Vietnam

A Korea-type settlement in Vietnam would be a political godsend for the Johnson Administration, would further the long-term U.S. policy of containment and military frustration of Red China, would relieve the anxieties of American youths and their families, and partially restore the luster of American democracy in the UN. Something on this order is in fact the objective of such planners as Arthur Schlesinger, Jr., Richard Goodwin, John Kenneth Galbraith and the "No Wider War" committee said to be in the making. Almost any kind of end to the war would be welcomed by a majority of Americans: they would applaud its artificers as they applauded General Eisenhower's promise to bring peace in 1952.

Unfortunately, this hopeful picture is visible only from the American side. As seen from Hanoi and Peking—even from Moscow—it is shot through with wishful thinking, an indulgence which among all human activities can be least afforded in war.

There is, indeed, one condition on which the war might be ended with American troops garrisoned in Vietnam (or Thailand) and air bases in readiness for re-use by American bombers, whether under USAF occupancy or some caretaker arrangement with the native military. That condition, in a slight modification of General LeMay's formula, is that we can manage to twist the enemy's arm hard enough so that he yells "uncle" and, still sobbing, staggers to the conference table. This outcome is conceivable, though not probable, in relation to North Vietnam; but it is unimagi-

IN THIS ISSUE

October 31, 1966

EDITORIALS

434

ARTICLES

438 Reagan vs. Brown:
How To Succeed with the Backlash
Carey McWilliams

442 The "Culture" Riots:
Mao at Bay
Isaac Deutscher

445 "The Russians Faked It"
Daniel Cohen

447 Mauritius:
World Strains in Microcosm
Colin MacInnes

449 National Data Center:
The Computer vs. the Bill of Rights
Anthony Prisendorf

BOOKS & THE ARTS

453 A True Lie-Minded Man
William H. Gass

454 Return of the Continental Op
Frederick H. Gardner

456 Gumming Up the Syntax
D. W. Maurer

457 Two Views of Two Germanys
Heinz Pol

458 Romantically Anti-Bourgeois
Michael Hamburger

459 Theatre
Harold Clurman

460 Ouija Message from JFK (poem)
Charles Martell

461 Music
Benjamin Boretz

463 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: Three weeks' notice is required for change of address, which cannot be made without the old address as well as the new.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 14

nable in relation to the Chinese, who are in a position to exercise veto power over any proposed settlement. So the solution is likely to reduce to LeMay's earlier prescription: bombing North Vietnam back into the Stone Age and, if the Chinese attempt countermeasures, meting out the same treatment to them.

Short of total defeat, the enemy will not, because it cannot, settle for the Korean pattern. To Hanoi that would mean not only the loss of the war presently raging but a reversal of the victory over the French which led to the Geneva Agreements of 1954. Hanoi's objective, identical with that of the National Liberation Front, is a share for the latter in the future government of South Vietnam and, ultimately, reunification of North and South under Communist auspices. The last they may never achieve, but they will continue guerrilla warfare indefinitely rather than abandon in toto the aims which they have pursued since the end of World War II, when French intransigence finally made it impossible for them to remain in the French Union.

Nor can the Chinese settle for another Korea, this one on their southern flank. Already the cordon sanitaire that has been drawn around them is tighter than the one Clemenceau devised for the Soviet Union after World War I. The only remaining gaps are in the south. Actually, with Shanghai some 500 nautical miles from Okinawa, Peking a slightly greater distance from Seoul, and southwest China across the Taiwan Strait from another complex of de facto American bases, and Polaris submarines cruising the Pacific, the additional peril from the direction of Thailand and South Vietnam makes a bad situation only slightly worse, but Chinese psychology has reached the so-far-and-no-farther stage. Their hostility toward both the United States and the Soviet Union is aggravated by a factor rarely mentioned in discussions of Chinese militancy: that both Soviet and American ballistic missiles must long since have been targeted on Chinese population centers and nuclear plants, with the Soviet sites probably within intermediate range. No nation likes this sort of close-up missilry — not the United States when Khrushchev did it in Cuba, nor the Chinese when it is done to them.

In war, to assess enemy intentions with any certitude, one must put oneself in the enemy's place. If one does this with respect to Hanoi and Peking, only one conclusion can be drawn. Even if we withdrew to defensive enclaves in accordance with General Gavin's proposal, the war would not end. The enclaves would be attacked and the initiative would be with the enemy. The no-wider-war position has merit insofar as it provides a pause for reflection; as a solution it is unworkable. The war can end only if the United States comes up with a promise of eventual withdrawal more persuasive than anything the Johnson Administration—or its critics—have so far offered. And both might as well make up their minds that Vietnam is not Korea.

Can Dr. Condon See It Through?

It's hard to feel sorry for an organization like the U.S. Air Force, but the present flying-saucer situation almost moves us to sympathy. For twenty years the Air Force, which is charged with investigating UFOs (unidentified flying objects), has been saying that there is no evidence that earth is being visited by spaceships from another world. Not only has this position failed to impress many people, it has made them furious at the Air Force.

Now, with excitement over flying saucers again at fever pitch, the Air Force wants to get off the hot spot. It has therefore commissioned the University of Colorado to conduct an independent fifteen-month study of the phenomenon at a cost of $313,000. The choice of Dr. Edward U. Condon to head the study is an unusually happy one. He is not only a world-renowned scientist, he also has a rare ability to communicate ideas to the nonscientific public. In addition, Dr. Condon had enough troubles with the government during the McCarthy period to protect him from the easy label of government stooge.

Dr. Condon is approaching the saucer project with enthusiasm, but we wonder if he knows what he is letting himself in for. Word is already spreading that the project is a put-up job and that the real results will be suppressed. If Dr. Condon and his associates come up with anything less than the little green men from Mars, they will be crucified.

But the Colorado investigation can have some useful results. It may explain some of the small number of genuinely puzzling sightings that have occurred. And, perhaps more important, the psychologists on Dr. Condon's staff may be able to provide some insight into the reasons why so many Americans must look to beings from beyond the earth as the only hope for escape from the tensions, dangers and boredom of modern life.

The Search for Santa Claus

On November 8, New York voters will be asked to approve an amendment to the state constitution which would authorize a state lottery, the proceeds of which shall be applied exclusively "in aid or support of education in this state." One of the oldest dodges in promotion of rackets is to link them to good causes. It will be noted also that this is a blanket authorization, with no indication of how it is to be set up, or the number of drawings, or what safeguards are to be incorporated against the infiltration of criminals. A pig in a poke is being offered to voters in the Empire State.

Lotteries have been outlawed in New York since 1833, and with good reason. The New York Post has published a series of articles on the history; in one of them (October 5) John S. Ezell, author of Fortune's Merry Wheel, pointed out that a study of more than 1,300 legal lotteries in the United States proves that the most careful supervision cannot eliminate abuses. Anthony Scaduto notes in the same series that lotteries have been characterized as "a tax on imbeciles" and "a plague invented by despots to silence the people."

But historical evidence is outweighed in the minds of proponents by the New Hampshire experiment, which has been in operation for three years without scandal. This brief record is hardly a guarantee of purity in the future; besides, in terms of net revenue the New Hampshire lottery has been a disappointment. A large percentage of the New Hampshire sweepstakes tickets—perhaps as much as 85 per cent—are sold to out-of-state visitors, and in other respects the differences between the two states, one with a population of less than 700,000, the other with 18 million, surely outweigh the similarities. In New York, with its heavy urban population—8 million in New York City alone—it is a foregone conclusion that most of the gambling would be done by those least able to afford it.

The argument is adduced that the mob-operated policy games, bookie setups, etc., now take tremendous sums from the poor, and that a government-operated lottery would at least be honest and would provide the state with much-needed revenue. Unfortunately, the history of government lotteries shows that they can be as dishonest as those privately operated; countless schemes are evolved for control by criminal elements, which have quite enough power in government already. Nor does government-sponsored gambling dry up other forms of gambling. The poor continue to play the numbers and buy lottery tickets, hoping to make a killing somehow, somewhere.

Puerto Rico has a lottery, and Governor Rockefeller points out that when a strike of lottery employees halted the sale of tickets for ten days, food sales in the supermarket chain the Rockefellers control shot up 30 per cent. A lottery is a typical sucker setup, both for the customers and for the state. In effect it is a search for Santa Claus —a particularly benevolent Santa Claus who will finance public services painlessly. If New York becomes the second state to go into the lottery business, other states will follow suit, and there is even the prospect of a national lottery atop the state lotteries. This contagion should be stopped before further mischief is generated.

Union Stripes

The enemies of progress are right, from their crazed perspective, to scotch the organization of equality wherever it appears. Equality is an extremely "catching" idea, and groups that are a moon flight removed from Harlem, Watts and the Mississippi Delta are beginning to develop the fever.

Catholic priests, who for some time have been appearing on other people's picket lines, have recently been heard to wonder whether a union of their own would really be incongruous. And now from the West Coast comes word that the San Francisco County Jail No. 2 has been organized by a rank-and-file group known as the Inmates Activities Committee (IAC).

This "union" called public attention to itself when it submitted its first memorandum to Sheriff Matthew H. Carberry and with public relations finesse sent copies to the local press and radio stations, members of the grand jury, Congressmen, Assemblymen and the police commission. It is a model document: cool, specific, realistic and tough (convicts cannot very effectively strike, but frustration can move them to riot).

The principal grievance of IAC is racial discrimination in jobs and housing within the jail, a charge persuasively documented and for which remedies (including the firing of two prison officers) are succinctly outlined. Beyond this the memorandum demands, among other reforms, more and better food, improved bathing facilities, frequent changes of bed linen and clothing (many of the inmates do farm work) and the right to know how much money the jail commissary makes and to have a voice in the spending of it.

To a reader on the outside, the statement offers some surprises. One wonders who among its drafters cited as one sign of racial discrimination the fact that weekend movies are always shown in the predominantly Negro wing, whereas the white wing "escapes this inconvenience entirely." And who would have expected prisoners to recommend that an orientation course for supervisory personnel be conducted by the Community Relations Department of the San Francisco Police Department? The men who drafted this paper are intelligent, thoughtful, articulate and not without humor (in one paragraph, they deplore the use of cell toilets as iceboxes, however effective this "ingenious practice"). Of course, they may also be fearful villains, but if the Sheriff is a wise man he will have received their memorandum in the spirit in which it was written. As canny industrialists learned long ago, a self-respecting union is a wonderful device for keeping the plant operating smoothly. The IAC could make the operation of County Jail No. 2 a warden's dream of utopia; or, if its grievances are ignored, it could produce "labor unrest" of a peculiarly acute variety.

And the bloody minded need not worry that conditions will become too good for the scoundrels. The essence of jail is that the gate is locked; no amount of justice and common decency on the inside will make that fact more than endurable.

The Penance of Matthews

As an American institution, The New York Times is properly subject to evaluations which might be irrelevant or impertinent in relation to an ordinary newspaper. Every day, for every working journalist, how the Times judges news, how it reports news, what news it sees fit not to print, are facts that are themselves news. This is what makes Gay Talese's article in the November Esquire, "The Kingdoms, the Powers, and the Glories of The New York Times," such racy—and important—reading. It offers just the right combination of gossip, insight and vivid detail, seasoned with a touch of malice. But one item, buried in the body of the article, warrants special emphasis.

"The Times," writes Mr. Talese, "is quick to denounce the suppression of news and ideas, even when such may be contrary to its own editorial policy, and yet in recent years its news department has refused to print anything by Herbert L. Matthews, who now sits rather quietly in Room 1048 along a corridor of editorial writers."

Matthews became famous in the thirties with his reporting of the Spanish Civil War. He became famous again when he interviewed Fidel Castro, before Castro came to power. In 1963, he revisited Cuba—and Castro—and on his return, according to Talese, offered to do some articles; the offer was declined by the Times news department. Apparently the source of the embarrassment, on the Times's side, is that Matthews in 1958 did not believe that Castro was a Communist, and even now believes that Castro was not then a Communist. However Matthews might handle the subject, the mere fact of this opinion, and the absence of a recantation, leave the implication that if the United States had managed matters differently Castro might never have become a Communist. He certainly would not have been a Yankee-style capitalist either, but there need have been no Communist island sticking into the Gulf of Mexico, no Bay of Pigs; fewer Cubans would have gone into exile and those who remained at home would have suffered less hardship.

Last spring, Matthews again returned to Cuba—it cannot be said that the Times is niggardly with travel allowances, even for employees who are not in the highest favor with those Talese calls "powerful princes in this church." He reacquainted himself with Castro and conditions in Cuba and, with his characteristic thoroughness, amassed 25,000 words of notes. On his return the news department again declined his offer to write articles. Nor, since he went representing the Times, is he free to write about Cuba for other publications—at least that is his position, naturally regretted by The Nation and other magazines whose editors would like to inform their readers of what is going on in Castro's island.

Matthews has said—we think correctly—that no news of consequence about Cuba is being regularly published in the United States today. The only American correspondent, representing the Associated Press, can get very little copy through his New York office. The general paucity of coverage may be due to the fact that there is an American market only for bad news (bad from the standpoint of the Castro regime and ordinary Cubans). And Matthews told one inquirer that he "found the situation infinitely better than the picture that has been presented to the public this year." Could that be the rub?

The notion that a particular land mass must become terra incognita if it is Washington's policy so to regard it, and therefore that nothing happening there, short of the assassination of its leader, could be news, is no doubt a natural govermental attitude in a time of permanent cold war. But The New York Times is not an arm of the government—that is one of the blessings for which Americans can still be thankful. Nor (see "When Is News News?" The Nation, June 20) should we forget that once before the Times decided not to publish a story about Cuba. Its editors had learned about the plans for the Bay of Pigs invasion, and President Kennedy later assured the executive editor and publisher that it would have been better for all concerned if the Times had told what it knew. It is not inconceivable that similar regrets may some day be voiced about the material accumulated by Herbert L. Matthews in 1963 and again in 1966. It is certainly to be regretted, today, that the output of a distinguished journalist with a long acquaintance of Latin American affairs is barred by the newspaper whose motto is, "All the news that's fit to print."

REAGAN vs. BROWN

How To Succeed with the Backlash

CAREY McWILLIAMS

California is in the throes of one of the most subtle and intensive racist political campaigns ever waged in a Northern or Western state. As Ronald Reagan admits privately, his chances of victory over Governor Edmund Brown lie in his ability to exploit overwhelming voter opposition to open-housing laws while building up and maintaining an image of moderation. The task isn't easy, but that it can be done was proved by Sen. George Murphy, who two years ago defeated the Democratic candidate, Pierre Salinger, in the face of a Johnson landslide, by exploiting the muted and evasive approval of Proposition 14, the initiative measure designed to pull the teeth of the Rumford Fair Housing Act and prohibit all future open-housing laws. Of course, Murphy wasn't quite the right winger that Reagan is—and was publicly seen to be, until Spencer-Roberts, the public relations managers, took him under their auspices.

Reagan began his retreat from liberalism more than a decade ago, after having noisily supported Helen Gahagan Douglas in her Senatorial race against Richard M. Nixon in 1950. He stamped himself as an all-out convert to the right-wing cause when he managed Loyd Wright's forlorn primary campaign against Sen. Thomas Kuchel in 1962. Wright once called for preventive war against Russia; and he sees civil rights as a part of the Communist conspiracy. Two years later, Reagan plunged into the Goldwater primary campaign so wholeheartedly that Spencer-Roberts, then managing the Rockefeller campaign in California, referred to him as an extremist. During the Presidential race, his carefully worded phrases on such subjects as voluntary social security, the United Nations, Supreme Court decisions and violence in the streets made Reagan the darling of the right wingers. He sent them into ecstasies with his artful radio and TV performances, and they launched his gubernatorial campaign the day after the election. Reagan was appropriately coy, but after the proper arm twisting he announced that he would yield to public demand. He tested that demand through state-wide tours, and in announcing his candidacy said that one of the prime issues was civil rights. He got the pre-primary backing of all reactionary GOP groups, including the Neanderthal Young Republicans, thus insuring victory in the primary over moderate George Christopher, former Mayor of San Francisco, but his backers knew that he would need a more moderate image for the general election. Spencer-Roberts came in to do the job, and in an enthusiastic moment one of its executives said that the agency was going to make Reagan the John V. Lindsay of California. That's quite an order, but the real problem is to make Reagan palatable to the middle-of-the-road voters without offending the Right.

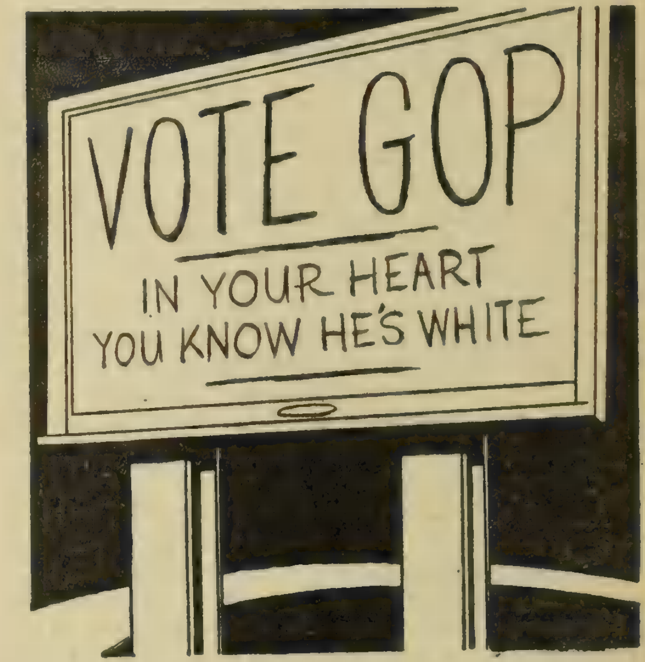
Apparently Reagan discussed the problem with his friend and political associate, former Rep. John Rousselot, the John Birch public relations man, because he confided in an unguarded moment at a pre-primary gathering that "John" was quite a good fellow who was willing to help in any way he could from publicly denouncing the Reagan candidacy to outright endorsement. In the ensuing ruckus, Reagan dismissed the statement as a wry joke of his own making. His official position is that he will not denounce the John Birchers, nor will he solicit John Birch support, but that he will support known John Birch members who are Republican candidates. If elected, he says, he will appoint "qualified" John Birchers to office. He says that if Birchers support him it is because they subscribe to his program and not he to theirs. It is no secret that the Birch brass is lined up solidly behind him and that reactionaries such as Walter Knott and Henry Salvatori and John McCone are in his corner. He has avoided the embarrassment of having Goldwater or Sen. Strom Thurmond campaign for him by saying that he doesn't think it proper for out-of-state people to advise Californians on political choices.

Reagan's bid for the middle-of-the-road vote consists of taking ambiguous stands on public issues. He's all for voluntarism, including a voluntary box-office tax to be levied by theatres to help the movie industry; he sees such a tax as a way to ward off the horror of government subsidy to the producers. He approves the social security system, but thinks it is possible to "let some young men who are just starting make [voluntary] arrangements," since they won't be able to take as much out as they might put in. He approves voluntary action to stamp out pornography, but supports an "anti-obscenity" initiative measure called "CLEAN" that is so unbelievably bad it has earned the condemnation of the Council of Churches, the State Bar, all leading newspapers, the state's district attorneys, and even that of the Republican candidate for lieutenant governor, who agrees with all knowledgeable lawyers that it is unconstitutional. (See "California's Dirty Book Caper" by William Wingfield, The Nation, April 18.) "Constitutional or not," says Mr. Reagan, "if this measure is voted down, my opponent might take this to mean that the people of California are not opposed to pornography." What that means is anybody's guess.

Of course Reagan is for tax reform and against tax increases, but if we must have increased taxation, he's all for a raise in sales taxes. What he regards as turmoil at the University of California pains him; he wants an investigation of the school under the leadership of former CIA Chief John McCone. He's opposed to right-to-work laws for California, but he wants to keep Section 14(B) in federal laws so that states may have a free choice. Welfare payments are too high, in his opinion, and he would reduce them by putting relief recipients to work at tasks unspecified.

By his own say-so, Reagan is opposed to bigotry and racial prejudice, but he's also opposed to civil rights legislation. Republican Attorney General Edward W. Brooke of Massachusetts, a Senatorial candidate and a Negro, heard him try to explain his position for about an hour: "It was all vague and hazy," Brooke said later. "I don't think he thinks very well. I couldn't always make out what he was driving at except that he was trying to tell me that although he wouldn't have signed the [1964] Civil Rights Bill he was a friend of the Negroes. He seemed embarrassed." The "umbrella issue" dominating all other campaign issues, says Reagan, is that old Goldwater chestnut "morality in government"; the details are not defined, but it is apparent that morality in government will be furthered by the election of all Republican candidates. This bland diet doesn't excite the voters, and Reagan's managers know it. But they believe that if they can present him as a reasonable man, he will win his share of middle-of-the-road votes, and the undertow of opposition to open housing will land him in Sacramento.

The potency of the fair-housing issue in the election is a political gift to Reagan from Los Angeles Mayor Sam Yorty, Brown's Democratic primary opponent. Yorty was wooing Negroes and liberals in 1964 and opposed Proposition 14 when it appeared on the ballot; but as soon as the measure scored its victory by a greater margin than President Johnson's triumph over Goldwater, he changed his strategy, taking to TV and radio in the last three weeks of the primary campaign to charge that "Brown's supreme court"—Brown has appointed six of the seven justices—had made up its mind to invalidate Proposition 14 and was waiting until after the primary to announce its decision. Alarmed real estate brokers and their friends and lower-middle-class and working-class Californians who had formed the backbone of Proposition 14 support began to rally around Yorty. Reagan's stock also shot up; most Republicans had favored the proposition when it was on the ballot and Reagan now appeared as their champion in contrast to the moderate Christopher.



Renault, Frontier: Ben Roth

When the court did overturn the initiative, Yorty appeared as a prophetic opponent of open housing, and Reagan loomed as the man upon whom Republicans would have to depend to safeguard their homes against the specter of Negro invasion. As an incumbent, Brown was able to turn back Yorty's bid, though by a reduced margin: Christopher didn't stand a chance. Pollsters, who sensed and commented on the swift tide that ran in favor of Yorty and Reagan in the last two weeks of the primary campaign, professed perplexity at its cause. There was no mystery: a strong racial factor had been introduced in the campaign. The same thing was to happen in Maryland and in Georgia a few weeks later.

As soon as the California supreme court announced its decision, the California Real Estate Association (CREA) said it would carry the case to the United States Supreme Court, but California enemies of open housing fear that the Supreme Court won't reverse the state court. They want in Sacramento somebody who, if Proposition 14 is really dead, will lead a fight for legislative repeal of the fair-housing acts, which remain in full force by reason of the invalidation. That somebody is Ronald Reagan; certainly not Governor Brown, the man who signed the Rumford Fair Housing Act and who opposed Proposition 14.

But Reagan can't afford to put all his eggs in the open-housing basket: too many voters are tied to Brown on varied issues. Even those tempted to vote against the Governor because of the housing question might not bring themselves to vote for a Goldwater right winger or a Reagan who favored retention of Section 14 (B) or opposed social security or because of his stand on welfare issues. That's the reason for the Reagan all-things-to-all-men stance. There is also no doubt that Reagan has his eyes fixed on national objectives. As an ambitious Northern politician he has to pay at least lip service to civil rights: you ride the backlash, you don't champion it.

Reagan's tactics are simple. He insists that civil rights is a campaign issue—"one of the three or four most important issues," he says—and he rejected out of hand Brown's proposal that open-housing legislation be referred to a nonpartisan committee. But he stops short after making it plain that he will propose and support repeal of existing fair-housing laws. He offers no affirmative civil rights program, a stand in keeping with the public mood of halting all further equalitarian action. The calculation of the Reagan backers is that it is up to Brown to take the initiative on civil rights issues and that the Governor dare not do so because his every proposal will only stimulate the white backlash. As one of the actor's advisers put it, Reagan has a basic residual interest in civil rights issues "even when he is not saying a damn word about it."

Whenever civil rights problems are broached, Reagan bristles with self-righteousness, proclaims that he is not a bigot, and says that he utterly abhors racial discrimination. He stormed out of a pre-primary meeting last spring with his heart beating on his sleeve because he said he had been accused of bigotry. Whenever he can find an opening, he brands "bigots" as "sick people." His cure for their ailment is "voluntary action" and he said after the recent San Francisco disturbances that the Governor hasn't adequately explored voluntary action as a remedy for urban disorders. Reagan has never defined "voluntary action."

Reagan is also reaping a harvest from various attempts to void the Rumford Fair Housing Act and punish its supporters. After the California court had invalidated Proposition 14, Reagan supporters in the CREA set up a dummy organization headed by aging lawyer Frank Doherty who had spearheaded opposition to a fair-employment initiative way back in 1946. The Doherty organization announced grandiose plans to gather 292,662 valid signatures to force legislative repeal of open-housing laws. The calculated effect of the announcement and consequent widespread publicity was to pinpoint Reagan as an opponent of fair-housing laws and to underscore Brown's approval of such legislation. Shortly afterward, a usually reliable poll reported that 72 per cent of California voters "believe that a property owner has the right to discriminate any way he sees fit in the sale or rental of his property." However, the repeal initiative never got off the ground and has been abandoned, largely because its backers think that legislative repeal is in the offing without it. It had served its purpose in the Reagan campaign.

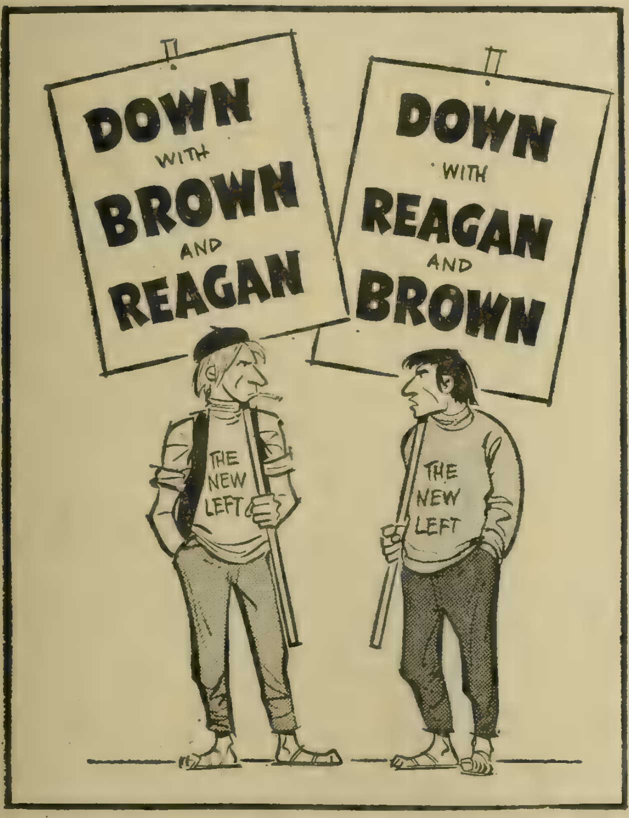
CREA has polled every Assembly and Senatorial candidate in the state as to his stand on repeal of open-housing laws, and rumor has it that an overwhelming majority have signed on the dotted line for repeal, another undercover maneuver that aids Reagan by emphasizing his leadership in the repeal program. A Reagan supporter has noted with impeccable logic that "you don't elect a legislature to repeal a law and then choose a governor who will veto the repeal." CREA president Burt Smith told reporters at its recent convention that the association will mount a major campaign to repeal the Rumford Act. He added that it would be "awfully naive" to assume that open-housing laws would not have "a major effect on the race for governor," but added somewhat archly that "as an association" CREA would not endorse either candidate.

Another ploy that aids Reagan is a campaign to punish the four supreme court justices who voted to invalidate the housing initiative and who must seek election in November. Under California law, a justice's name appears on the ballot with the question as to whether or not he shall be retained in office. He has no opponent, but if the vote is negative, the governor appoints a successor. The right wingers are out in the open to oust the four justices so that, as they say, "Reagan can appoint a new supreme court." He has not seen fit to denounce that bigoted appeal to discipline judges for their faithfulness to their oaths of office.

The biggest boost to Reagan's evident attempt to win the anti-civil rights vote came on October 4, when the Republican Coordinating Committee and former President Eisenhower demanded a crack-down on what they called "rampant crime in our cities and on the streets" and on "violence and mob madness." (See editorial, "Party Politics and Race," The Nation, October 17, p. 371.) As the Los Angeles Times Washington bureau chief noted, the statement "made some strong Republican campaign medicine, dispensed at a moment when reaction against racial violence and disorder is a potent factor in many Congressional and gubernatorial races." Reagan took his cue quickly and rapped Brown for "failing to exhibit the leadership required to forestall riots." He added, "We must not recognize the rioters"—a code phrase which means that demands for reform made by demonstrators must be rejected out of hand.

Governor Brown's counter to the racist campaign isn't very high-minded, and it is hard to gauge its effectiveness. He panicked when the state supreme court threw out the housing initiative and proposed a moratorium on enforcement of state fair-housing laws until the United States Supreme Court had acted. When the fatuity of that course dawned on him, he announced that he would appoint a nonpartisan commission to examine the Rumford Fair Housing Act and the objections to it. He has named the committee, and the inference is that he will recommend whatever changes it proposes—if any. Later, he suggested that open-housing laws be dropped as a campaign issue, an obviously absurd suggestion as far as Reagan is concerned. Meanwhile, the Governor bowed to Sam Yorty's insistence and pushed through the legislature an anti-riot bill that is so badly drafted as to be little short of incoherent. In general, the Governor and the Democrats had been playing down civil rights and hoping for the best, when the San Francisco riots put the issue on the front pages. Brown's swift action in calling out the guard in San Francisco probably won him some friends among fearful whites.

Negroes cast about 90 per cent of their ballots for Brown in the primary. Despite dissatisfaction and grumbling over what they regard as the Governor's failure to fight for the civil rights in which he believes, the chances are that Reagan will get less than 10 per cent of the Negro vote. Brown will get 90 per cent, and a small percentage of Negroes will go fishing. But Negro voters will cast only 4 or 5 per cent of the total vote on November 8, and they can't rescue Brown if the anti-civil rights current is running as wide and deep then as it is now.



DOWN WITH BROWN AND REAGAN
DOWN WITH REAGAN AND BROWN
THE NEW LEFT
THE NEW LEFT

Alexander: San Francisco Examiner

Just how strong that current will be depends to a great extent on labor. Union brass is all out for Brown, who won his first two elections on the strength of labor, lower-middle-class and minority support. But the California white workmen and lower-middle-class citizens are bitterly opposed to open housing, just as they were shown to be in Maryland and as they obviously are in Chicago. Los Angeles' CIO suburbs contributed crushing majorities for Proposition 14 two years ago, far heavier majorities than came out of the middle-class and upper-class suburbs. The southeast working-class and lower-middle-class suburbs of Los Angeles are concentrated in the 23rd Congressional District, where Democrats outnumber Republicans by one and a half to one, but are represented by a Republican dullard, Rep. Dell Clawson, who stays in office because his consistent votes against all civil rights legislation reflect the sentiments of his constituents. The district is heavily unionized. Unless Governor Brown can find some potent issues to outweigh this obsessive fear of open housing, he is in grave danger.

Every informed Californian knows how deep-running is the undercurrent of racism in the gubernatorial campaign. The New York Times California news bureau commented on September 29 that "many California votes on November 8 hinge on feelings among electors about the racial backgrounds of their neighbors, about nondiscriminatory sale or rental of property, about the Watts riots of last year and racial violence everywhere." The Los Angeles Times's Richard Bergholz said last July 5 that there are "those in both parties who will tell you that race relations is the one campaign issue that can tip the scales against everything else." At the same time he reported that Richard Nixon told Republicans, "I want everyone in California to believe that [Lieutenant Governor] Glenn Anderson was responsible for Watts." The reference was to Anderson's supposed reluctance to call out the national guard during the Watts disturbances. Bergholz added that Brown's refusal to back away from support of the Rumford Act "may frighten more voters who are already resentful of Negro militancy and who don't like their mandate on Proposition 14 nullified by some judges and politicians." It is to the obvious advantage of those who want Reagan elected to fish in these troubled waters and to trouble the waters to make fishing good.

The Ronald Reagan campaign is more, much more, than a mere Republican Party effort to elect a governor. Essentially, it is a carefully contrived campaign to strengthen and perpetuate right-wing control of the GOP machinery. Top-level decisions are not being made by titular heads of the party or by Spencer-Roberts. The Republican Party label is invaluable, and party leaders must be buttered up and kept content; Spencer-Roberts' job is to package the candidate and make him salable. The crafty politicians who are directing the Reagan campaign are at once stage-managing and taking full advantage of every possible racist maneuver that will benefit their candidate, not because they are bigots or racists per se but because they think they have a winning issue that will cement their control of the Republican Party. They were the architects of the move to put the legislative repeal initiative of fair-housing laws on the November ballot; they now encourage and further the drive to oust the supreme court justices who voted to invalidate Proposition 14; they stimulated the CREA to put legislators on record as favoring repeal of the Rumford Fair Housing Act and engineered the association's tacit endorsement of Reagan; they helped whip up the recent national attack by the Republican Party on "crime in our cities and in our streets."

Ronald Reagan knows what's going on. But he wants to be governor. He's willing to do whatever is necessary to achieve that ambition, no matter what his private sentiments are. On October 6, he told a cheering CREA convention that Negro complainants who alleged discrimination in housing had made "staged attempts to rent homes, when in truth there was no real intention of renting, only of causing trouble." Thereafter, he said, the "state commission acted as accuser, judge and jury." After criticizing the courts for overruling the people's "constitutional right to put an end to" what he called these unfair practices, he wound up by saying that "the right of an individual to the ownership and disposition of property is inseparable from the right of freedom itself." He got a standing ovation from the real estate brokers. There will be more of this kind of demagogy as the campaign comes to a climax, with Reagan using code words and phrases to let the electorate know his right-wing stand on racial issues without his having to voice outright racist sentiments.

There won't be much plain talk from Californians about the racism that they know permeates the Brown-Reagan contest. Most of them won't talk about it at all if they can escape it. They don't want the nation to know—they don't want to admit to themselves—that the number-one state may elect Ronald Reagan governor in order to "keep the Negro in his place."

THE 'CULTURE' RIOTS

MAO AT BAY

ISAAC DEUTSCHER

Mr. Deutscher is the author of many books on the USSR, among them The Great Contest: Russia and the West, and a three-volume life of Trotsky (both Oxford University Press).

Accumulating evidence about recent events in China makes it increasingly clear that Peking is now emerging from a deep and grave political crisis, which was partly concealed behind the dramatics of the "cultural revolution." The Chinese Communist Party is in disarray. At least since the early summer, large and influential sections of its hierarchy have been in revolt against Mao Tse-tung and his policies. Peking speaks openly of Right, Left and Center factions struggling against one another within the party, and although the official spokesmen do not identify the programs and the leaders of the factions, the admission itself is unprecedented in post-revolutionary China.

At the plenary session of the Central Committee, held in Peking in the first half of August, Mao found himself in a minority, and was either outvoted or was on the point of being outvoted. He then carried out a coup against the majority by staging the "cultural revolution" — that is, he mobilized and incited a huge mass of rowdy school children and undergraduates against the party hierarchy. In this way he cut short a crucial debate in the Central Committee that was turning against him. If Mao had brandished the school children as his chief striking force, the coup would have been merely farcical, but he also threatened to use the army against the party: that was the meaning of the sudden promotion, in the second half of August, of Marshal Lin Piao to the position of Mao's second in command.

The reports that have come out to us indicate that all aspects of Mao's policy, domestic and foreign, were under attack; but the main issue was his stubborn refusal to open any negotiations with the present Soviet leaders. Mao's critics demanded resumption of talks with Moscow; and he was bent on obtaining from the Central Committee a resolution decrying on principle any "united front," i.e., any coordinated action with the Russians over the war in Vietnam or over any other aspect of Communist policy. The Soviet leaders, so the Maoist argument ran, are stooges of American imperialism, bent on bringing the Vietnamese Communists to the conference table with the Americans and then selling them down the river. Peking must go on pressing the Vietnamese to fight to the bitter end, as the Maoists fought in the 1940s, without entering into peace parleys with any foreign invader. Mao obtained his resolution from the Central Committee, but only after a showdown.

And that is not all. Mao insists that China, though it must do nothing to provoke a war with the United States, must prepare economically, politically and militarily for American attack. In case of war, he holds, China must fall back upon its tradition of partisan fighting, the strategy that can neutralize the technological superiority of any invader, and that allowed Mao's armies, in the Yenan period, to hold out and to win against Chiang Kai-shek, the Japanese and in the last instance, the Americans as well. The whole of China is in effect being converted to something like the Yenan regime. Administrative units, economic regions and military establishments are to achieve a degree of self-sufficiency and decentralization that will allow them to carry on under American bombardment, without orders and instructions from the center. A transformation so profound is bound to affect the nation's entire social and economic life. It renders centralized national planning and industrialization in the Soviet style virtually impossible; it is certain to reduce the rate of economic growth, to obstruct efficiency and to lower living standards. Such a policy inevitably produces discontent, frustration and opposition.

Mao evokes the heroic spirit of Yenan and denounces every manifestation of opposition as a variety of Khrushchevite revisionism. It is more likely than not that quite a few people in the party hierarchy have been in secret sympathy with the Russian revisionism, although Khrushchev's economic reprisals against China must have dampened their enthusiasm. But revisionism is at present not the sole or even the main issue. To judge by what Peking says of the divisions within the party, Mao is opposed from both sides, from a left wing as well as from a right; but, like Stalin in this respect, he finds it convenient to lump them all together under the single discrediting label of revisionism. It is thus most improbable that Liu Shao-chi, who until August acted as Mao's second in command, should have voiced any "revisionist" ideas. Throughout the Russo-Chinese controversy he has voiced irreconcilable hostility to Khrushchevism, and the party hierarchy has seen him as the spokesman of the Left. Yet Liu Shao-chi has been Mao's chief antagonist in the latest phase of the struggle: he has been demoted since August, although he still remains China's President, and he has not yet uttered a single word in support of the "cultural revolution." To some extent the more opportunistic Chou En-lai also appears to have opposed Mao's policy; and although the Premier associated himself with the "cultural revolution," he did so rather ambiguously, in order to pour cold water on the fervor of the "Red Guards." Liu Shao-chi, Chou En-lai and their numerous adherents could not fail to feel humiliated when Mao set China's youth upon them.

The clash has been primarily over matters of high policy. Liu Shao-chi, for all his previous Maoist orthodoxy, appears to have become critical of the way Mao has been handling the conflict with Moscow. And, indeed, a strong case can be made from the orthodox point of view against Mao's present tactics. He is clearly overstating and thus rendering incredible the Chinese case when he charges the Russians not merely with acting against China's interests but with restoring capitalism in the Soviet Union and working hand in glove with the Americans against North Vietnam. He is further overreaching himself when he refuses to contemplate any united front with the Russians.

The obvious fact is that even if Messrs. Brezhnev and Kosygin were as eager for collusion with American imperialism as Mao says they are, they have not been able to practice it. Despite the détente, Russo-American antagonism remains a basic factor in world relations, and this creates the objective possibility (and from a Communist viewpoint the imperative need) for joint Soviet-Chinese action. By refusing such action Mao weakens China's position and brings on himself the odium for the break in the Communist camp. His tactics are ultra-Left rather than Left; and his radical verbiage and the fireworks of the "cultural revolution" conceal a policy which is essentially passive and inert. Liu Shao-chi and his adherents argue that Peking needs a more flexible policy precisely in the interest of anti-revisionism, and that the Chinese party should press the Russians relentlessly for joint action over Vietnam. The argument is sound enough. Indeed, not since the early thirties, when the German Communist Party refused to join hands with the Social Democrats against the Nazis, has any Communist party committed as many dangerous and even suicidal mistakes as Mao is committing at present.

King, Daily Telegraph (Australia): Ben Roth

"No, you're in the Street-of-the-Great-Leap-Forward-of-the-People's-Commune. You want the Street-of-Mao's-Epic-Swim-Against-the-Cruel-Current-of-the-Decadent-West."

In recent years, these issues have been repeatedly debated among the Chinese leaders. Hongqi (The Red Flag) speaks of a Right deviation that came to light at the Central Committee's session in 1962; of another, a leftist deviation, in 1964; and of "errors in matters of orientation and political line," committed by unnamed party leaders in the current year. It is no accident that the Central Committee was not convened for four full years — Mao was evidently not sure that he could muster enough support for his line. Even now his mouthpieces speak of an "unprecedentedly strong resistance" to his policy. Significantly, the workers and peasants have taken no part in the "cultural revolution"; Renmin Ribao (The People's Daily) has even warned them not to interfere with the school children and the students who were its sole actors. Foreign correspondents in Peking tell of widespread clashes between the students and factory workers, and Pravda has described fights between party men and "Red Guards." Even if these reports have exaggerated the turbulence, they carry enough circumstantial evidence to leave no doubt that the whole political structure of China has been convulsed.

And if this were not enough, Renmin Ribao testifies to how severe the showdown has been and how far it still is from being concluded: "Die-hards who take the capitalist road have absurdly identified their authority over party organizations in various localities with . . . the party's authority," the paper says. "The party organization of any locality that goes against . . . the Central Committee and . . . Comrade Mao Tse-tung . . . must be opposed. . . . We shall . . . crush those persons in authority who have taken the road leading toward the restoration of capitalism." Who are those "persons in authority"? Echoes of the Russian great purges of the 1930s reverberate in these threats.

It may be asked, then, was the "cultural revolution," which was proclaimed to the deafening accompaniment of all China's drums and gongs, nothing but a huge riot designed to help Mao swamp and crush an inner party opposition? Did it have no wider meaning?

Reading the endless official reports on the "cultural upsurge of the masses," one may be tempted to dismiss it as mere farce. The Chinese News Agency has described in detail the "fierce offensive against all old ideas, culture, customs and habits" that the "Red Guards have brought out into the streets of Peking since August 20." But one looks in vain for any clues as to what the new ideas and the new cultural customs and habits may be. In the name of Marxism and Leninism, the Guards have denounced Balzac and Victor Hugo, Shakespeare and Beethoven, as the products of a rotting bourgeois culture; they have defaced Pushkin's monument in Shanghai, and have voiced their contempt for the works of Chernyshevsky and Herzen, the progenitors of the Russian revolutionary movement. Peking's "cultural revolutionaries" are, it seems, quite unaware of Marx's lifelong admiration for Shakespeare and Balzac; of Lenin's love for Pushkin and Beethoven, and of the formative influence Chernyshevsky had on him.

We have been presented with long lists of streets and boulevards, the names of which have been changed from "Eternal Peace" to "The East is Red," from "Well of the Prince's Palace" to "Prevent Revisionism," from "Glorious Square" to "Support Vietnam," and so on. We are asked to rejoice in the fact that certain culinary establishments are no longer called "Collection of All Virtues," but "Peking Roast Duck Restaurants." Hosts of hairdressers and dressmakers have pledged themselves to produce no more outlandish styles: "duck tail" haircuts and "spiraling" hairdos, or cowboy jeans, tight-fitting shirts and blouses and various kinds of Hong Kong skirts. "We should not regard these matters lightly," the Chinese Agency says gravely, "because it is here that the gates to capitalist restoration are wide open."

Undertaking the all too easy task of ridiculing these exploits, the Soviet press has harked back to Proletkult, the Russian literary and artistic movement of the early years of the revolution, which renounced bourgeois art and promised to create a proletarian culture. A writer in Pravda has named Trotsky as the inspirer of Proletkult; an attribution presumably designed to make both Proletkult and the Chinese "cultural revolution" stink in our nostrils. The truth is that by comparison with the Chinese riot, Proletkult, which was akin to Western European futurism of those years, was an almost civilized affair; it was supported by Bukharin and Lunacharsky, while Trotsky, far from being its inspirer, wrote a whole book, Literature and Revolution, to repudiate it. Pravda could have found a much more contemporary parallel to recent events in China: in the late 1940s and early 1950s, Stalin, Zhdanov and Pravda's writers "disciplined" the intelligentsia, thundered against "kowtowing to decadent Western culture," banned the works of Einstein, Freud, Mendel and many other foreign thinkers, and indulged in a hysterical glorification of all things Russian.

Pravda avoids drawing that parallel because even now Russia has not fully lived down the effect of that period, and quite a few of the old bans are still in force. But the parallel is close enough; and it suggests that the Maoist "cultural revolution" is a deadly serious affair. Its effect on China's spiritual and intellectual life will, in all probability, be just as devastating and lasting as were the consequences of the Stalinist witch hunts. Its political meaning is also comparable. Like Russia in the last years of the Stalin era, China has now plunged headlong into a self-centered isolationism and nationalism and has shut itself off more hermetically than ever from all outside world political and cultural influences. To achieve this Mao had to organize a pogrom of the intelligentsia whom he suspects of being vulnerable to foreign, especially "revisionist," influences.

This is not to say that the developments foreshadow a new, aggressive phase in China's foreign policy. True, in the last few weeks Peking and Shanghai have resounded with cries for the liberation of Taiwan (Formosa), Macao and Hong Kong. But nothing indicates that Marshal Lin Piao is preparing marching orders, even though all Chinese, Communist and anti-Communist, Maoist and anti-Maoist, consider these territories part of their country.

China is even less ready than was Russia in Stalin's last years for warlike adventures or territorial expansion. Its ideological aggressiveness and shrill contempt for Western values are manifestations of an intensely self-defensive mood and a sense of complete isolation in a hostile world. Since Khrushchev ruthlessly canceled all economic assistance to China in 1960, that sense of isolation has grown heavy and stifling; and recent setbacks—above all the collapse of the pro-Maoist Communist Party of Indonesia and the slaughter of hundreds of thousands of its members—have aggravated it. Despite Peking's thunderous rhetoric about the "rising wave of revolution in Asia," events in Indonesia mark a deep ebb of revolution and a disaster for Maoism. The defection of the Japanese and North Korean Communist parties from the Chinese camp are further setbacks, and the ambiguous behavior of the North Vietnamese, who are more than ever dependent on Soviet aid, is causing discomfort to Peking. Above all, the Chinese believe that the threat of an American attack on their country is real and imminent.

One way of getting out of the isolation would be to try a reconciliation with Khrushchev's successors in Moscow. But since Mao Tse-tung has ruled this out, he has had to contrive some extra-powerful booster to national morale. Three nuclear explosions have demonstrated China's new technological capacity to the nation and the world; but this feat is not enough to dispel the malaise, for many Chinese realize at what cost, and under what backbreaking handicaps, their nation has entered, so belatedly, the nuclear arms race. Nor does Maoism offer China the pride of rapid industrialization that Stalinism once gave Russia: China's tempo of economic advance is relatively much slower. The "cultural revolution," and an almost mystical apotheosis of Maoism, are to provide moral compensation for all these disappointments and frustrations.

It can be said in advance that the "positive" effect of this booster shot to national morale will be short-lived, but that its adverse consequences will be felt for a long time. The party, its hierarchy and cadres, will not soon recover from the humiliation the "Red Guards" have inflicted on them. The old intelligentsia—the scientists and the technicians, but especially the writers and artists—who have been associated with the broad current of the Maoist revolution and have directed the educational work among the masses since 1949, are being degraded and eliminated from their posts. They have not, yet, been destroyed as Stalin destroyed their Russian counterparts, but they are forced to make room for a new intelligentsia, one brought up since the revolution and thus having far fewer ties with either their own native cultural tradition or the heritage of the outside world.

To some extent, this change of generations is inevitable in any post-revolutionary society, but when it is carried out as abruptly, brutally and demagogically as it was in Stalinist Russia, and now in China, the nation suffers losses it can ill afford: a gap in its cultural consciousness, a lowering of standards and an impoverishment of spiritual life. Post-Stalinist Russia is still smarting from such losses, and Maoist and post-Maoist China will be hurt similarly for years to come.

'THE RUSSIANS FAKED IT'

DANIEL COHEN

Mr. Cohen is a free-lance writer specializing in scientific subjects.

While he was President, Harry Truman never believed that the Soviet Union had developed the atom bomb. The Russians announced they had tested the bomb; U.S. Government scientists confirmed the Soviet test and Truman himself announced it to the American public — but he never believed it. He just didn't think the Russians were capable of that level of scientific and technical development.

Most Americans, knowing nothing of Truman's doubts, took his announcement at face value, but many consoled themselves with lurid tales of stolen atomic secrets. Without the traitors and spies, the thinking ran, the Reds could never have built the bomb. The notion that the Russians are backward peasants skilled only in trickery and deceit, and that communism is incompatible with scientific or technological development, has deep roots in the American consciousness.

In 1957, I asked a Congressman from central Illinois about reports that the Russians had been testing powerful rockets. He assured me, and I think he was sincere, that he had definite information that these reports were false. Besides, he confided, the Reds simply weren't able to do that sort of thing. This incident has stuck in my mind because a few weeks later I watched a bulletin announcing the launching of the first sputnik come in over the news wire.

Sputnik was a real shock to most Americans. There could be no talk of stolen secrets, for as one scientist remarked, "if they are stealing our secrets, where are the carbon copies?" That shiny metal grapefruit circling the earth panicked America into an enormously expensive space program which changed the face of large sectors of the economy; and into a well-intentioned, but often confused "crash program" for education. And things got worse. There was a sputnik with a dog inside, then a sputnik large enough to be seen from the ground with the naked eye, then lunik, sending back photos of the dark side of the moon. Meanwhile back on earth the U.S. space program was experiencing a series of well-publicized humiliations. In a few months the backward-peasant view of Russia had received a critical wound.

Of course, there was talk of German missile scientists directing the peasants, but since the head of our Army rocket program, the only one getting anything into orbit in those early days, was Wernher von Braun, it was cold comfort. So some people fell back upon the belief that those sneaky peasants had faked the whole thing. Well perhaps not the whole thing, because you could get up early in the morning and see a Russian satellite streaking across the sky — but they faked the important parts. While the United States was engaged in a serious program of scientific research, the Soviets were orbiting gaudy but unimportant propaganda baubles. Now, nine years into the era of artificial satellites, this argument has lost much of its force, but it is by no means completely dead. Last January, Science and Mechanics magazine splashed these words all over its front cover: "Exclusive! Proof that the Russians Faked Their 'Space Walk.' " It was the beginning of a lengthy three-part "exposé."

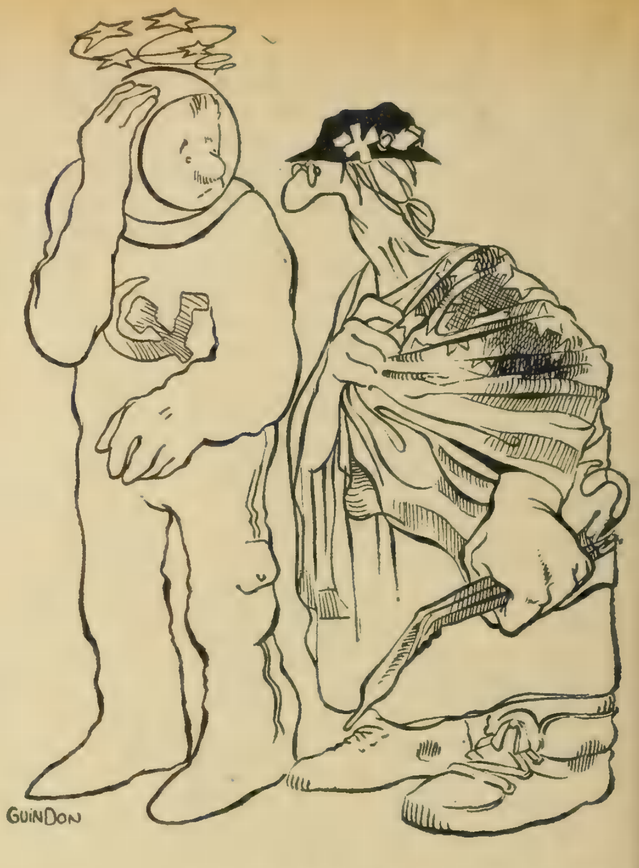
Clearly the series was a success because in the June issue the magazine presented: "A Startling Sequel! Exclusive. The 'Manned' Soviet Space Flights That Were Never Manned!" It was another three-part series. The November issue had a similar exclusive. "Proof That Red Missiles Can Not Destroy Our Cities" was the screaming headline on the cover. In addition the magazine offered its readers all the articles "greatly expanded" in book form.

The author of these remarkable exclusives was Lloyd Mallan, a prolific writer on space and military subjects and the most active supporter of "the Russians faked it" school. In 1959, Mallan had written another three-part series, "The Big Red Lie," for True magazine. In it he claimed that the Soviets had not only faked portions of their space program but had also grossly exaggerated all their scientific, military, educational and industrial progress as well. Russia, he said, was a backward country. It was a very comforting thesis to the man in the corner bar who believed passionately that communism and slavery were synonymous and that America could beat the Reds with one hand tied behind its back. Because he was so sure of American superiority, this man, in his more reckless moments, had been wondering out loud what the double-domes in Washington were waiting for. Why not just drop the bomb on Moscow and get it over with?

Because of his True series, Mallan became a popular lecturer and TV and radio personality, and in 1960 he was off again, this time charging in Popular Photography that the Russians had faked the shots of the dark side of the moon.

Mallan's technique of proof is simple. He plays the tough-minded observer who doesn't trust the Russian scientists, or the American scientists either. He thinks that our government knows the Russians are faking but for some obscure reason is keeping it a secret. He seems unable to recall that in the past the government has cheerfully pointed out Soviet satellite failures that the Soviets themselves failed to announce.

If there is something about the Russian space program that he cannot understand Mallan jumps to the conclusion that it is faked, no matter what anybody else says. An example of this technique appears in the February, 1966, issue of Science and Mechanics. Two photos are run side by side. The first shows U.S. astronaut Edward White floating in space. The reader is asked to "note the swirls and loops of umbilical cable." The second photo is from the "Red's film alleging to show cosmonaut Leonov in space. Note strange kinks and sharp bends in umbilical cable." This is to show that the very dramatic films of cosmonaut Alexi Leonov "walking" in space are nothing but a bit of clever trick photography used to fool the world and humiliate the United States. Indeed, the appearance of the umbilical in the White and Leonov photos is quite different, and this might puzzle and impress the ordinary reader who would never connect the Leonov pictures with photos taken of Eugene Cernan, the second American to "walk" in space. These photos show Cernan's umbilical with more kinks and sharp bends than Leonov's.



In another piece of photographic evidence, Mallan points out that both the floating Leonov and the clouds behind him are in perfect focus. This he implies is photographically impossible. Yet during the Gemini 9 flight, when the U.S. astronauts photographed the target vehicle that was orbiting near their capsule, both it and the clouds behind came out in perfect focus. All Mallan has really shown is that photographic interpretation is far from an exact science, and that when photographs taken with unfamiliar equipment under alien conditions are examined by people without any special knowledge, any sort of interpretation may result.

In order to fill six articles with "startling evidence" that the Soviets faked their entire manned space program Mallan really has to strain. Since he will not accept the word of anyone connected with either the U.S. or Soviet space program, and since practically no private individuals have the equipment to conduct extensive space studies, his field of research is drastically limited. Therefore, he sets out to examine the persistent rumors that several Russian cosmonauts were killed in unsuccessful space flights. These reports have never been given credence by any officials in Washington or Moscow, so they are a perfect area for Mallan's investigation. If the Russians did die in space then the Soviets do have a space program — if the stories are false then, Mallan reasons, the entire manned-space program is suspect.

The rumors got their start long before Yuri Gagarin became the first man to orbit the earth. Strangely, the source for one of them was the London Daily Worker. Three days before the Gagarin flight the paper headlined an exclusive story claiming that a Russian cosmonaut had made three orbits but had returned suffering grievously from the effects of his flight. The story was exclusive, all right, since the Russians denied it. Late in 1959, Continentale, an Italian news agency, released a story that four cosmonauts, one a woman, had been killed on unsuccessful space flights. Late in 1960, two young brothers, Achille and Gian Battista Judica-Cordeglia, claimed to have picked up several distress messages from Russian cosmonauts at their amateur space-tracking station in Turin. One came from two men and a woman who were hopelessly circling the earth without hope of return. This story received worldwide publicity, and as late as 1965 was picked up in Reader's Digest in an article entitled "Italy's Amazing Amateur Space Watchers." The author of the article, J. D. Ratcliff, added that the distress signals had also been heard by amateurs in Texas, Germany, Alaska and Sweden. Mallan tracked down Ratcliff and found that although he was "very nice and tried to be cooperative" he couldn't remember where his information had come from. A couple of overseas calls to the Judica-Cordeglia brothers themselves were remarkably uninformative.

As might be expected, Mallan believes that the Russians were responsible for all the rumors about men and women being killed and injured in space. They leaked the stories to friendly journalists or put tape recorders in satellites to fool unsuspecting Italian amateurs. The reason: to test the world's gullibility. If they got caught they could deny the whole thing. But when they got away with it, and psychologically prepared the world for a manned space flight, they pulled the biggest hoax of all by announcing officially that Yuri Gagarin had become the first man to orbit the earth.

The most uncomfortable point of the entire Mallan thesis is that he can offer no remotely convincing reason why the Soviets would have bothered to fake a manned space program at all since they have undeniably accomplished more difficult space tasks. Even Mallan's free-swinging arguments will not allow him to deny that the Soviets did land Luna 10 intact on the moon's surface and that the device did transmit photos back to earth. The photos were also received at the Jodrell Bank radio observatory in England. In addition, the Luna photos nicely complement the photos sent back a short time later by America's Surveyor 1. Compared to this, putting a man in orbit or having him float outside a spacecraft is an easy task. The only reason for faking a manned space program that comes to mind is that the Soviets have such respect for life that they will not risk a human being on such a dangerous mission, but that in order to keep up in the space race they must fake a manned

(Continued on page 462)

MAURITIUS

WORLD STRAINS IN MICROCOSM

COLIN MacINNES

Mr. MacInnes, British novelist and critic, received his early education in Australia. He is the author of City of Spades, England, Half English and many other books published in England and the United States. His works have been translated into many languages.

Mauritius is a minute volcanic island, 38 by 29 miles in extent, and 1,250 miles east of Africa in the Indian Ocean. Its 750,000 people are of four chief races, five religions and ten languages. Of these, 480,000 are Indians, 220,000 Creoles, 25,000 Chinese; most of the rest are French Mauritians.

When the British freed the slaves in their colonies, labor deserted the plantations for the growing towns. To fill the gap, the British imported "indentured" Indians. This created a racial problem that has complicated immensely the process of decolonization. In Trinidad, where the Indians are only one in three, the transition to independence has not been hindered. But in three other countries, Guiana, Fiji and Mauritius, the descendants of the Indians now outnumber those of the original inhabitants.

Putting aside for the moment its confusion of races, Mauritius has two basic problems: population and production. There are 1,000 people to the square mile. More than half of these are under 20. If nothing is—or can be—done, the population will be 3 million at the end of the century.

Emigration might be an answer, but where to go? For the 10,000 white Mauritians this is not an insuperable problem, and many have settled in Europe and South Africa. For the Indians and Creoles it is a different matter. There are already 7,000 of them in the United Kingdom, but immigration to Britain is now restricted. Madagascar, a mere 500 miles away, though underpopulated, doesn't want them. France and Canada offer some faint hope, and so possibly—with its new attitudes to colored immigration—does Australia.

Birth control clinics exist on the island, but Mauritians are dubious about this solution, since the racial and religious ethos of both the Indians and Chinese favors enormous families. Meanwhile, improved medical care aggravates the problem: malaria, once a killer, has now almost disappeared, and life expectancy rises.

What about increased production? At present, 96 per cent of the island's exports are sugar and its derivatives, though tea, tobacco and aloe fiber are also grown. But mechanization, which increases both production and profits, reduces the labor force. Apart from the soil, which is itself poor, there are no natural resources, so that only the lightest of industry is competitive, and even many foods—rice, for example—must be imported.

Three main forces are involved in trying to solve these seemingly insoluble problems: the two chief Mauritian political parties, and the British. The Americans are also involved indirectly. One begins to understand Mauritian politics by noticing first what kind of jobs most of the islanders do. In general, the Indians are field workers, though some are also small importers; the Creoles are clerical workers and artisans; the Chinese are engaged in retail trade; and the French Mauritians are estate owners and administrators. From this division it follows that the majority Parti Travailliste (Labour Party) is largely Indian and rural based, while the Parti Mauricien is strong in the cities among the Creoles and handful of white French.

In the present provisional parliament, of the forty elected members (thirteen others are directly appointed by the governor), eighteen are Parti Travailliste, and eight Parti Mauricien, the remainder representing splinter parties. However, in the capital, Port Louis, and in all the cities except one, the Parti Mauricien is in control. The chief minister is Sir Seemoosagur Ramgoolam, head of the Labour Party, an Indian doctor in his 60s. The opposition leader is Gaëton Duval, a Creole lawyer in his 30s.

The British have promised Mauritius its independence by the end of 1967, six months after an election to be held on a new franchise at present being determined by a British electoral commission. But whereas earlier there had been a certain amount of concord between the two parties—they both favored independence and were represented together in a coalition government—a few months ago the Parti Mauricien started vigorously to attack the Parti Travailliste.

This is where the Americans come in. By an accident of colonial rule, Mauritius administers several groups of islands in the Indian Ocean, among them the Chagos archipelago, 1,200 miles to the northeast. The British and Americans wanted to build an air base on one of its islands, a horseshoe of coral called Diégo Garcia. They offered Mauritius 4 million pounds for the privilege; the Parti Travailliste agreed, but the Parti Mauricien did not.

What is wrong with 4 million pounds? Everything, says the Parti Mauricien. In the first place it is not enough. Also, granting a base to the Anglo-Americans would bring down on the new state of Mauritius the wrath of the Communist world. What matter, says the Parti Travailliste? If the base is built, we'll be protected, and since we have only a tiny army (and no air force or navy), and will be responsible for dozens of islands dotted all over the Indian Ocean, we'll need protection. Agreed, the Parti Mauricien replies, but if we don't allow the base to be built, no one will want to attack us.

So the Mauritian party demanded a referendum which the Labour Party refused, demanded a new constitutional conference which the British refused, appealed to the UN and was ignored. Finally, its leaders organized monster rallies throughout the island against the base. Whatever one may think of such tactics, they were certainly effective, since many Indian supporters of the Parti Travailliste prefer neutralism to pro-Western involvement.

Of the adversaries leading this dispute, Sir Seemoosagur Ramgoolam is the senior politician in Mauritius, and a wily one. He has denied that the Parti Travailliste is not broad based, pointing to Creoles and Chinese in his government, and claiming non-Indian electoral support. He wants to be friendly with the West, the Commonwealth and Britain. Despite economic difficulties, he claims a higher standard of living in Mauritius than in India or any black African nation. He boasts of the aid his government has given to education. His own party, he says, finds its strength in the trade unions and villages, whereas the Parti Mauricien belongs to conservative sugar planters.

Gaëton Duval, of the Mauritian party, tells another story and he tells it well. He is handsome and witty, and at the same time manages to seem frank and dedicated. He grants that his Parti Mauricien was originally rightist, but alleges that it has been swinging to the left. Far from being exclusively French and Creole, it has appointed Muslim mayors in two of the towns it controls. As for the Labour Party, says Duval, many of its prominent non-Indians are mere front men. My own feeling is that both parties are narrowly based, although each is trying to spread still wider racially at the expense of the other. I also believe that, if the terms mean anything today, the Labour Party is more leftist and the Parti Mauricien more "nationalist"—however ridiculous nationalism may seem as a doctrine for a microscopic island like Mauritius.

On the issue of the air base, does Duval want to cut off relations with the British and Americans? Not at all, he says. The Parti Mauricien wants close relations with both—after a renegotiation of the base. As to the terms for this, I found him vague, and got the impression that he is troubled most by the conviction that Sir Seemoosagur sold Mauritius short in granting it. How, in any case, could Mauritius stop landings on Diégo Garcia?

But Duval and his party very much want something else—which introduces us to yet another problem; this time less racial and social than linguistic and cultural. The Parti Mauricien believes that the island should join not only the British Commonwealth but the French community as well. It wants France as well as England to be its godparents in external affairs. But this fondness for France, so deep in the Creoles (and, of course, the few thousand French Mauritians) means nothing to the Indian supporters of the Labour Party, who already object to French being an official language along with English.

The tenacity of French culture in Mauritius is astonishing, and a thumbnail history of the island is required to explain it. The first Europeans on the island were the Portuguese in the 16th century. Then came the Dutch, who named the island (after Prince Maurice of Nassau) and exterminated the unfortunate dodo. The French arrived in 1715; they planted the sugar, brought in the Africans (and interbred with them), but lost Mauritius to the British after the Napoleonic wars.

But although the French left more than 150 years ago, the whole feeling of the island, despite the presence of the British and the Asian races, remains Latin. Towns, bays, mountains, shops, products, even many of the people, still have French names. Only the educated speak good French, but almost everyone on the island—including the Asian majority — can speak the patois. This is to the nation's advantage: despite ten or more basic mother tongues, everybody can communicate. "A French island administered by the British" is what the Creoles call it, and it seems a justifiable definition.

And yet there is the amazing racial diversity: there are Hindus, Tamils, Telegus and Bengalis with shrines to Siva and mosques to Mohammed; Chinese Catholics and Chinese with Buddhist temples; Creoles of European, African and Indian descent; French and (rather disconsolate) Mauritians.

This suggests another economic possibility for the island, and one which vaster nations have come to rely on. There could be tourism. The Tamils walk on fire and climb ladders made of swords; the Muslims offer their Ghoon festival, the Chinese their Wolf dance; and Creoles swing in their erotic sega by the sea. To these attractions may be added that Mauritians of all races are unusually alert and welcoming.

There is also the appeal of an island—and a volcanic one at that. The climate is "subtropical maritime," warm throughout the year, and the only catch is the occasional descent of hurricanes (Carol, in 1960, swept in at 160 mph and destroyed 60 per cent of the sugar crop and 40,000 homes). The beaches are superb, with deep-sea fishing, and a coral reef is thrown in. The volcanic scenery is arresting, if rather eerie. The cities, all small, are charming—Port Louis, despite modern buildings, has the air of a provincial French town of the 1900s.

Who might come? The British, French and Australians run regular air services, so they are potential visitors. South Africans are being enticed, and Rhodesians too, whatever Harold Wilson may have to say. Indians too might come, and perhaps Americans.

Yet even if the dream of free-spending tourists were fulfilled, the economic troubles of the island seem, to the outsider, almost insoluble. Sugar is a fickle crop and demands large-scale production, which is at odds with the small holdings such as the Indians have on 30 per cent of the land, the remainder being company or state owned. For industry, Mauritius at present flies in from Europe and processes for re-export products needing a high labor content at low cost (for instance, watches); but such possibilities seem limited. As for population, unless the world movement of peoples becomes much freer (and of this there are as yet few signs), the situation seems really desperate.

Political tipsters name the Parti Travailliste to win the critical pre-independence elections, despite the Parti Mauricien's aggressive agitation about the base. There may, of course, be a return to coalition. Presumably, the British will have to continue subsidizing the new nation and, because of the base, demands will no doubt be made on the Americans. Communism is gaining ground among younger Indians and Chinese, but is as yet an ineffective force.

Racialism in Mauritius is black-black and not the more usual white-black. Although there were riots a year ago and British troops had to be sent out, the probability is that the Creoles and Indians will come to terms, if only because there isn't the economic and even geographical elbowroom for the luxury of emotional racial attitudes.

A final reflection is that though one might think of Mauritius as being vaguely African, it is hardly so at all. The Creoles' ancestors left Africa 250 years ago, and the real mother countries are India and France, with Britain as a kind of foster mother. Now possibly America, once its troops are on Diégo Garcia, may find itself becoming a reluctant mother country too.

NATIONAL DATA CENTER

The Computer vs. the Bill of Rights

ANTHONY PRISENDORF
Mr. Prisendorf is a reporter on the New York Post.

The right of privacy is in trouble again. Tormented in the last few years by electronic eavesdropping devices, federal psychological tests and peepholes in post-office washrooms, it now faces an even more formidable adversary in the Bureau of the Budget's proposed National Data Center.

That an individual's private affairs should be of perennial concern to his fellow man is not surprising; the curiosity in human nature accounts for that. What is surprising is that the Constitution nowhere provides a clear-cut guarantee of the "right to be let alone," as Supreme Court Justice Louis Brandeis described it in 1928. The reason for this deficiency is apparent, says Charles A. Reich, professor of constitutional law at Yale University: "The idea of privacy being invaded in the way it can be today never occurred to the people who wrote the Bill of Rights." Nonetheless, Justice Brandeis, in his far-reaching interpretation of privacy, wrote: ". . . every unjustifiable intrusion by the Government upon the privacy of the individual, whatever the means employed, must be deemed a violation of the fourth amendment."

Opponents of the National Data Center would like to think that Justice Brandeis had the Budget Bureau's proposal in mind when he wrote his opinion. They seem convinced that the plan to use a central computer to pool statistical information now guarded by twenty federal agencies, including the Census Bureau, the Internal Revenue Service and the Bureau of Labor Statistics, is nothing less than the premature materialization of the Orwellian nightmare, 1984. Perhaps this view was best expressed by Vance Packard last July when he was testifying before a House subcommittee on invasion of privacy. Speaking of Big Brother, he said: "My own hunch is that if he comes to the United States he may turn out to be not a greedy power seeker but rather a relentless bureaucrat obsessed with efficiency." Such an obsession, Packard warns, could lead to the "ultimate of horrors, a humanity in chains of plastic tape."

The proposal for a statistical data center is the logical consequence of an efficiency study begun three years ago by the Budget Bureau in collaboration with the Social Science Research Council. Its report concluded that "the amount of overlapping and resource waste [in government agencies] is substantial." Accordingly, the bureau's Office of Statistical Standards proposed a data center "to improve the storage of and access to information for statistical users"—defined as the government, industry and the research community. In addition to the study, the Budget Bureau hired as a consultant Edgar S. Dunn, Jr., a former Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Economic Affairs. As he sees it, the fundamental purpose of such a data center would be to answer an "infinite" range of questions such as these: "What proportion of the residents of Appalachia possess incomes of less than $3,000? What activities seem to figure prominently in the recent rapid growth of the Southeast, Florida, the Gulf Coast and the Boston-Washington corridor? What proportion of the registered voters turned out in a recent primary, and how were they divided between Republican and Democrat, urban and rural, white and nonwhite?"

Prompted by the "appalling" thought of government records neatly bundled together in one revealing file, with no assurance given that such dossiers "would always be used by benevolent people for benevolent purposes," Rep. Cornelius E. Gallagher, a New Jersey Democrat, convened his special subcommittee on invasion of privacy on July 26. The purpose of the hearings: "to create a climate of concern" and to find answers to Representative Gallagher's challenging question posed at the start of the hearings: "Shall we create an elite who can narrow and dominate the 'corridors of power'? And who shall they be?"

The lead-off witness on behalf of the proposed National Data Center was Raymond T. Bowman, assistant director of the Office of Statistical Standards, and described by Representative Gallagher as the man "directly responsible" for the project. Bowman testified that the data center's objective is twofold: "We want to be sure that we are making effective use of new technological development because (1) we want to bring all available statistical information to bear on problems which confront the nation; and (2) we want to hold down the burden of statistical questionnaires." Bowman went on to suggest that the goal is by no means new. Government agencies, he said, continually try to find ways of using existing records for statistical purposes. To demonstrate this long-standing practice, he said that the use of federal income tax returns "as a source of statistical information," relieves 1 million small businessmen of "the burden of filling out census forms every five years." And this is done, Bowman asserted, "without compromising the confidentiality of a single return."

In an attempt to scotch the obvious misgivings of some subcommittee members, Bowman assured them early in the hearings that a data center "would not have an interest in building up dossiers on individuals because statistical interests do not center on individual cases." Nevertheless, he demurred when a subcommittee member suggested that the identity of these statistics could be erased, thereby eliminating the threat to privacy without interfering with the operations of the data bank. "You would not be able to use this information meaningfully unless this kind of identification were maintained," Bowman said.

"To achieve the purpose we have in mind," explains his assistant, Paul Krueger, "we need to be able to collate the information obtained from different sources. As an example, we have tax returns which provide a considerable amount of information about the incomes of people. But they do not provide demographic information. We have census reports which provide all the demographic information. If you want to be able to relate incomes with demographic characteristics, there must be some sort of connecting link."

The importance the Budget Bureau attaches to personal identity is what principally concerns critics of the proposal. They fully suspect that today's statistical center may become tomorrow's intelligence center. Representative Gallagher did much to foster these suspicions in a June 14 speech on the floor of the House:

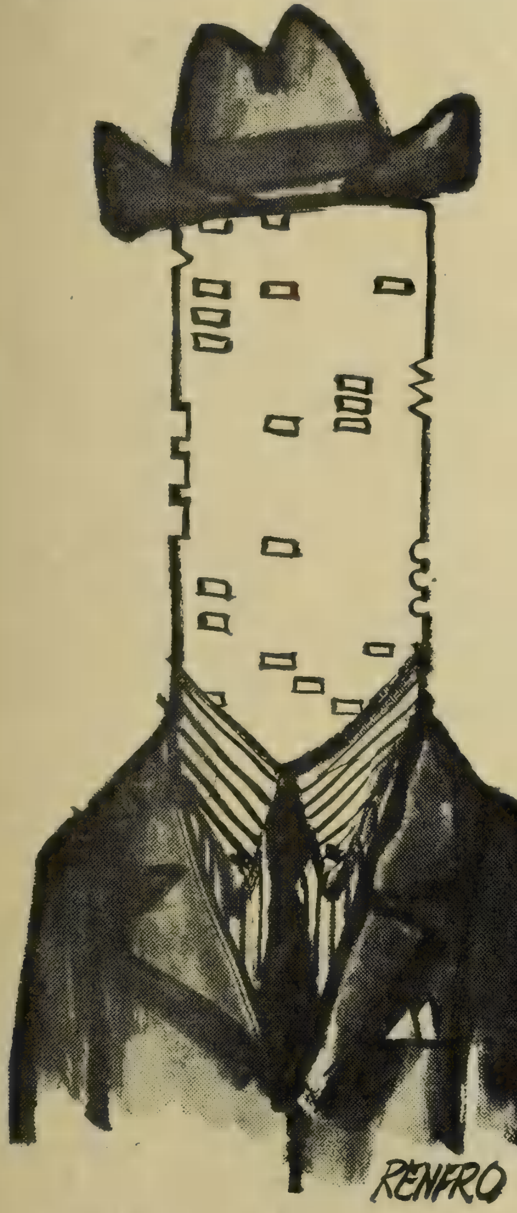
> If the government does set up a central file or "dossier bank" of personal data on our citizens, there will be a huge store of information at hand to feed it. That list includes tax returns, census responses, social security data, military records, security files, fingerprints, mortgage guarantees, research involving individuals, and, if state and local governments are tied into the system, such things as school records, police files, driving violations, and property holdings. Confidentiality is now protected in many cases by the law. Centralization will create the need for a new set of safeguards. It might even be possible to pump credit reports and bank accounts into the computer. It should be apparent to anyone the great power that would exist behind the federal official who has the authority to push the button that would produce such a dossier instantly.

Representative Gallagher's misgivings were reinforced at the subcommittee hearings one month later by Paul Baran, an analyst for the RAND Corporation of Santa Monica, Calif. A member of several ad hoc committees for the Defense Department, as well as a consultant to the Institute for Defense Analyses and the Stanford Research Institute, Baran's credentials are impressive. Speaking as an individual and representing no special interest, Baran warned that should this machinery become available to the administrators of a government substantially different from the existing form, "it would make for an extremely efficient police state. While our computers and communications are foolproof, they are not smart-proof," he said. "These systems are wide open to tampering by anyone sufficiently intelligent and motivated enough to take advantage of their weak spots."

It is precisely these weak spots that alarm opponents of the data bank. They acknowledge that technology has enriched human life, and that a federal data center will probably add to this enrichment. But, says Representative Gallagher, "just as democratic governments historically have secured the freedom of their citizens partly by controlling the fruits of scientific progress, so, too, must we now make sure that the government computers do not provide the means by which federal officials can intrude improperly into our lives." If safeguards are not built into such a facility, he believes "it could lead to the creation of the computerized man . . . stripped of his individuality and privacy. His status would be measured by a computer. His life, his talent and his earning capacity are reduced to a tape with very few alternatives available."

This grisly warning may come too late. Ten years ago, there were fewer than 1,000 computers in the United States; ten years from now, it is estimated, there will be 100,000. Of the 30,000 computers in use today, half are in the service of the federal government. (Oddly enough, the forerunner of the computer was designed by a young engineer working for the Census Bureau near the turn of the century. Dismayed by the slow hand tabulations of the 1880 census, Herman Hollerith devised a "statistical piano" which assimilated census information fed into it on player piano type rolls.)

One danger inherent in an electronic memory system of the proportions envisioned by the Budget Bureau is the quality of information stored in it. "Unfortunately, the great bulk of information about an individual is not gathered as the result of inquiries by skilled government security investigators," says John deJ. Pemberton, Jr., executive director of the American Civil Liberties Union. "Rather, it is often acquired by government employees of poor judgment, by private agencies, credit unions, insurance companies and businesses."



Pemberton's impeachment of these collection methods parallels an axiom of Professor Reich that "information gets less reliable the further away it is from the source." In testimony before the subcommittee he illustrated this point by citing a traditional practice at Yale. Each freshman is assigned an upper-class counselor who writes a personality report of his charge for the dean at the end of the year. "If this information gets into a file and stays there, it slowly changes from a reasonably accurate statement to something that could be a tremendous falsehood. The freshman may change. Perhaps he had a chip on his shoulder the first year, but after he got to like the place he got to be one of the nicest guys around. So the information may no longer be true except as of the time it was made. Other people reading this may understand it in other ways." "The Christian notion of the possibility of redemption is incomprehensible to the computer," Packard observed at the hearings.

Addressing himself to the subcommittee's primary concern for safeguards, Bowman insisted that the centralization of statistical data in a computer memory bank would actually enhance the "confidentiality" of the information. Assembled under one roof, he argued, the material could be more closely guarded than it is now. This prompted one bemused Congressman to suggest that it would also make it easier for a federal employee to erase the disparaging dossier of a friend. Under the present decentralized system, the Congressman said, the friend "might exist in the Census Bureau and might not in the Internal Revenue Service. But he is going to totally not exist in a central data bank."

Under questioning Bowman conceded that a data bank of the type contemplated could endanger privacy, and recommended "very clear and specific regulations — legislation if this seems to be the desirable method." Asked who would have ultimate control of the data bank, Bowman replied: "Law." But sole reliance on legislative safeguards is not enough, cautioned RAND analyst Baran. He contends that "laws and laws alone have been pathetically ineffectual in stopping the growth of widespread electronic eavesdropping and wire tapping." In fact, so sophisticated have electronic snooping devices become that the security of the proposed National Data Center is threatened by them. Witnesses cited examples of "electronic radiation transmissions" from computers, and strongly urged that the walls of the data center be lead lined to prevent pirating.

Proponents, too, recognize these technological dangers, and disclosed at the hearings that they have devised elaborate safeguards that could be built into the computer. Budget Bureau consultant Dunn said that it can be programed to identify "trick" inquiries — accidental or intentional. "You can teach the machine to say, 'This is a statistical inquiry but it is framed in such a way that the population or group you have defined contains only one individual — less than the specific number of individuals.' " In addition, Dunn says, the computer can be "taught" to disguise records. If all individual identification were replaced by a special security code, no one could identify a person's record without that code.

As conceived, the proposed National Data Center would cost $3 million to $3.5 million and take between three and five years to stock with existing federal statistics, to be stored on 20,000 reels of magnetic tape. However, a less ambitious center could be stocked with a "respectable volume and variety" of data for $260,000 in about a year. Although the National Data Center is still in the discussion stage, opponents report that there are rumors circulating in Washington that the Budget Bureau will request federal funds in next year's budget to establish the statistical center.

Centralizing government files would eliminate perhaps the best safeguard of personal privacy — bureaucracy. Compiling all that is recorded about an individual is now often a difficult and, consequently, a discouraging task. If the National Data Center were established, the mere push of a button would end all that.

Equally important, the statistical data center could set a dangerous and irrevocable precedent. Its enemies warn that its existence would lead to pressures — within and outside the federal government — for the creation of a Personal Data Bank. It should be remembered that when Social Security was instituted Americans were assured that their identification number would be kept secret. And when a provision was included in the Constitution for a national census every ten years, it was for the sole purpose of "enumeration." The 1960 census contained 165 questions, some of them dealing with subjects as personal as purchasing habits and incomes. What is more, there are pressures within the Census Bureau to include in the 1970 census prying questions about religious affiliation, education and ethnic origin.

To the suggestion that computers threaten to degrade mankind, John W. Macy, Jr., chairman of the U.S. Civil Service Commission, retorted in a magazine article recently: "Far from it! By removing the clerical decisions and the mass of paperwork details the computer may well free the mind of man for more worthy use."

Aristotle regarded machines with about the same degree of optimism. "When looms weave by themselves," he said, "man's slavery will end."

Perhaps.

LETTERS

(continued from page 434)

subsidized by war debts, a fact that is nothing but an embarrassment to those who do research and to their hosts." This accusation is a product of your author's imagination. Of the 100 countries with which exchanges are conducted, war debts are a factor only in the case of Finland, the government of which has agreed to use its voluntary repayments of the World War I debts for this purpose. Elsewhere funds come entirely from the United States Government, or by joint contributions from the two governments involved.

"One can hardly imagine Norman Mailer, Marshall McLuhan, Allen Ginsberg or William Faulkner as Fulbrights." Faulkner was a Fulbright, McLuhan is a Canadian and therefore not eligible, and neither Ginsberg nor Mailer is an academic personality.

"The stipends are too low." The amount of the grant is limited by the budget approved by Congress and is geared to comparable grants in the host country. British students on government grants receive just over £6 a week; those under the Fulbright Program just over £15 a week to compensate for additional expenses as foreigners. The accusation comes with particular poor grace from Mr. Kostelanetz, whose wife also held a Fulbright grant and who was somehow able to take a trip to Paris, also a driving tour of the United Kingdom, in the course of his stay.

"When a Negro student had considerable difficulty finding lodging for himself and his family, the commission refused to supplement his stipend or to acknowledge that James Crow lived in England." This is simply untrue. There were two Negro students in the year Kostelanetz spent in London, one in London and one in Cambridge. Neither made any request for additional funds for housing and both in their reports professed themselves satisfied with their quarters.

"Officials tend to be failed academics." The people with whom Kostelanetz chiefly came into contact at the commission were Cleanth Brooks, professor of English at Yale and D. P. Edgell, professor of the Humanities at San José College, both on leave of absence. I know intimately the executive secretaries of the commission in each of the European countries and many in other parts of the world. Not one of them is a "failed academic."

No doubt there were causes for Mr. Kostelanetz's unhappiness in London. But they were not those to which he referred in his article.

Oscar Handlin

new brand of virtue

London, England

Dear Sirs: Outside the United States the view is widespread that your country is financially and militarily power drunk, and that moral considerations no longer weigh with you. Recently it was reported that at an official press conference Arthur Sylvester, Assistant Secretary of Defense, stated that to believe that any American official is going to tell the truth is to be a fool; and a number of your recent editorials have exposed the nature of this lying. Without denying that this attitude is not confined to the United States, it is surely a new brand of virtue for a government to admit it is a liar. . . . This peculiar public confession destroys all confidence in any promise the U.S. Government may make. . . .

Are the people of the United States too preoccupied with their color problem or with the Dominican Republic or with Cuba to care that the almighty dollar and all it stands for now stinks in the nostrils of decent people? Do they or do they not know of the terrifying and barbaric atrocities that are being committed in their name in Vietnam? What sort of people have you become that you can remain silent and inactive while this is going on—financially and militarily power drunk so that moral considerations no longer weigh with you?

Hyman Levy, Professor Emeritus
University of London

BOOKS & THE ARTS

A True Lie-Minded Man

WILLIAM H. GASS
Mr. Gass teaches philosophy at Purdue University. He is the author of Omensetter's Luck (New American Library).

It seems a country-headed thing to say: that literature is language, that stories and the places and the people in them are merely made of words as chairs are made of smoothed sticks and sometimes of cloth or metal tubes. Still, we cannot be too simple at the start, since the obvious is often the unobserved. Occasionally we should allow the trite to tease us into thought, for such old friends, the clichés in our life, are the only strangers we can know. It seems incredible, the ease with which we sink through books quite out of sight, pass clamorous pages into soundless dreams. That novels should be made of words, and merely words, is shocking, really. It's as though you had discovered that your wife were made of rubber: the bliss of all those years, the fears . . . from sponge.

Like the mathematician, like the philosopher, the novelist makes things out of concepts. Concepts, consequently, must be his critical concern: not the defects of his person, the crimes on his conscience, other men's morals, or their kindness or cruelty. The painter squeezes space through his pigments. Paint stains his fingers. How can he forget the color he has loaded on his brush or that blank canvas audience before him? Yet the novelist frequently behaves as if his work were all heart, character and story; he professes to hate abstraction, mathematics, and the pure works of mind. Of course, unlike poetry, and despite its distinguished figures, for a long time now the novel has been an amateur's affair, an open field for anybody's running, and it has drawn the idle, sick, and gossipaceous, the vaguely artistic; prophets, teachers, muckrakers, all the fanatical explainers, those dreamily scientific, and those anally pedantic.

Paint stains the fingers; the sculptor's hair is white with dust; but concepts have no physical properties; they do not permit smell or reflect light; they do not fill space or contain it; they do not age. "Five" is no wider, older, or fatter than "four"; "apple" isn't sweeter than "quince," rounder than "pear," smoother than "peach." To say, then, that literature is language is to say that literature is made of meanings, concepts, ideas, forms (please yourself with the term), and that these are so static and eternal as to shame the stars.

Like the mathematician. For the novelist to be at all, in any way, like a mathematician is shocking. It's worse than discovering your privates are plastic. Because there's no narration among numbers. It is logically impossible. Time's lacking.

When David Hilbert, the great logician, heard that a student had given up mathematics to write novels, he is supposed to have said: "It was just as well; he did not have enough imagination to become a first-rate mathematician."

The yammer of thought, the constant one-after-another of sounds, the shapes of words, the terrible specter of spelling, are each due to this fact that meanings are heavenly bodies which, to our senses, must somehow announce themselves. A word is a concept made flesh, if you like—the eternal presented as noise. When I spell then, let's say, "avoirdupois," I am forming our name for that meaning, but it might, just as well, be written down "dozzo," or still more at length, with the same lack of logic, "typary," "snoddle," or "willmullynull." "Avoirdupois." An unreasonable body. Nonetheless lovely. "Avoirdupois."

There is a fundamental contradiction in our medium. We work with a marble of flaws. My mind is utterly unlike my body, and unless you're an angel, so, I am certain, is yours. Poor Descartes really wrote on the problems of poets: word sense and word sound, math and mechanics, the mind and its body, can they touch? And how, pray God, can they resemble? In the act of love, as in all the arts, the soul should be felt by the tongue and the fingers, felt in the skin. So should our sounds come to color up the surface of our stories like a blush. This adventitious music is the only sensory quality our books can have. As Frost observed, even the empty sentence has a sound, or rather—I should say—is a series of nervous tensions and resolves. No artist dares neglect his own world's body, for nothing else, nothing else about his book is physical.

In the hollow of a jaw, the ear, upon the page, concepts now begin to move: they appear, accelerate, they race, they hesitate a moment, slow, turn, break, join, modify, and it becomes reasonable to speak of the problems of narration for the first time. Truly (that is to say, technically), narration is that part of the art of fiction concerned with the coming on and passing off of words—not the familiar arrangement of words in dry strings like so many shriveled worms but their formal direction and rapidity. But this is not what's usually meant.

For most people, fiction is history; fiction is history without tables, graphs, dates, imports, edicts, evidence, laws; history without hiatus—intelligible, simple, smooth. Fiction is sociology freed of statistics, politics, with no real party in the opposition; it's a world where play money buys you cardboard squares of colored country; a world where everyone is obediently psychological, economic, ethnic, geographical; framed in a keyhole and always nude: each figure fashioned from the latest thing in cello-see-through, so we may observe our hero's guts, too, if we choose: ah, they're blue, and squirming like a tickled river. For truth without effort, thought without rigor, feeling without form, existence without commitment: what will you give? for a wind-up world, a toy life? six bits? for a book with a thicker skin? six bucks? I am a man, myself, intemperately mild, and though it seems to me as much deserved as it's desired, I have no wish to steeple quires of paper passion up so many sad unelevating rears.

Nay, not seems, it is a stubborn, country-headed thing to say: that there are no events but words in fiction. Words mean things. Thus we use them every day: make love, buy bread, and blow up bridges. But the use of language in fiction only mimics its use in life. A sign like GENTS, for instance, tells me where to pee. It conveys information; it produces feelings of glad relief. I use the sign, but I dare not dawdle under it. It might have read MEN or borne a mustache. This kind of sign passes out of consciousness, is extinguished by its use. In literature, however, the sign remains; it sings; and we return to it again and again.

In contrast, the composer's medium is pure; that is, the tones he uses exist for music, and are made by instruments especially designed. Imagine his feelings, then, if he were forced to employ the meaningful noises of every day: bird calls, sirens, screams, alarm bells, whistles, ticks, and human chatter. He could plead all he liked that his music was pure, but we would know that he'd written down sounds from a play unseen, and we would insist that it told a story. Critics would describe the characters (one wears a goatee) and quarrel over their motives, marriages, or mothers, all their dark genes. Although no one wonders, of a painted peach, whether the tree it grew on was watered properly; we are happily witness, week after week, to further examinations of Hamlet or Madame Bovary, quite as if they were real. And they are so serious, so learned, so certain—so laughable—these ladies and gentlemen. Ah well, it's merely energy which might otherwise elucidate the Trinity.

So the novelist makes his book from boards which say LADIES and GENTS. Every scrap has been worn, every item handled; most of the pieces are dented or split. The writer may choose to be heroic—poets often are—he may strive to purify his diction and achieve an exclusively literary language. He may pretend that every syllable he speaks hasn't been spit, sometime, in someone else's mouth. Such poets scrub, they clean, they smooth, they polish, until we can scarcely recognize their words on the page. A star glide, a single frantic sullenness, a single financial grass greediness, wrote Gertrude Stein. Toute Pensée émet un Coup de Dés, wrote Mallarmé. Most novelists, however (it is one of the things that make them one), try to turn the tattering to account—incorporate it cleverly—as the painter does when he pastes up a collage of newspaper, tin foil and postage stamps. He will recognize, for example, that stories are wonderful devices for controlling the speed of the mind, for resting it after hard climbs; they give a reassuring light to a dark place, and help the reader hold, like handsome handles, heavy luggage on long trips.

A dedicated storyteller, though—a true lie-minded man—will serve his history best, and guarantee its popularity, not by imitating nature, since nature's no source of verisimilitude, but by following as closely as he can our simplest, most direct and unaffected forms of daily talk, for we report real things, things which intrigue and worry us, and such resembling gossip in a book allows us to believe in figures and events we cannot see, shall never touch, with an assurance of safety which sets our passions free. He will avoid recording consciousness since consciousness is private—we do not normally "take it down"—and because no one really believes in any other feelings than his own.

However, the moment that our writer concentrates on sound, the moment he formalizes his sentences, the moment he puts in a figure of speech or turns a phrase, shifts a tense or alters tone, the moment he carries description, or any account, beyond need, he begins to turn his reader's interest away from the world which lies among his words like a beautiful woman among her slaves, and directs him toward the slaves themselves. This illustrates a basic principle: if I describe my peach too perfectly, it's the poem which will make my mouth water . . . while the real peach rots.

Sculptures take up space and gather dust. Concepts do not. They take up us. They invade us as we read, and they achieve, as our resistance and their forces vary, every conceivable degree of occupation. Imagine a worry or a pain, an obsessive thought, a jealousy or hate so strong it renders you insensible to all else. Then while it lasts, you are that fear, that ache, for consciousness is always smaller than its opportunities, and can contract around a kernel like a nut. A piece of music can drive you out and take your place. The purpose of a literary work is the capture of consciousness, and the consequent creation, in you, of an imagined sensibility, so that while you read you are that patient pool or cataract of concepts which the author has constructed; and though at first it might seem as if the richness of life had been replaced by something less so: senseless noises, abstract meanings, mere shadows of worldly employment; yet the new self which fine fiction and good poetry should provide you is as wide as the mind is, and musiced deep with feeling. While listening to such symbols sounding, the blind perceive; thought seems to grow a body; and the will is at rest amid that moving like a gull asleep on the sea. Perhaps we'll be forgiven, then, if we fret about our words and continue country-headed. It is not a refusal to please. There's no willfulness, disdain, exile . . . no anger. Because a consciousness is electrified by beauty: is that not the aim and emblem and the ending of all finely made love?

Are you afraid?

Return of the Continental Op

THE BIG KNOCKOVER: Selected Stories and Short Novels. By Dashiell Hammett. Introduction by Lillian Hellman. Random House. 355 pp. $5.95.

FREDERICK H. GARDNER

Mr. Gardner is a free-lance writer based in San Francisco. He is presently writing a book about the theatre of Lillian Hellman.

In its heyday the McCarthy committee investigated writers, among them Dashiell Hammett, on the pretext that any radical's book in a U.S. Information Service library would undermine the anti-Communist function of that library. Preceding Hammett on the stand, a contrite Langston Hughes had thanked the chairman for his "courtesy and friendliness." Hammett wasn't going to be so nice. McCarthy asked: "Mr. Hammett, if you were spending, as we are, over a hundred million dollars a year on an information program allegedly for the purpose of fighting communism, and if you were in charge of that program to fight communism, would you purchase the works of some 75 communist authors and distribute their works throughout the world, placing our official stamp of approval upon those works?" To which Hammett quietly replied: "Well, I think — of course I don't know — if I were fighting communism I don't think I would give people any books at all." Laughter swept the hearing room and for a few televised seconds the chairman himself giggled. That tittering acknowledgment by McCarthy of his own ludicrous position was a turning point in the emotional course of the inquisition.

The nature of the scholarly, dignified man strong enough to force McCarthy to laugh at himself is movingly recalled by his close friend Lillian Hellman, in her introduction to a new collection of his stories. More about his life comes through in Tulip, an unfinished autobiographical novel included in this book.

Hammett was born in southern Maryland in 1894. During the First World War he contracted tuberculosis and spent seven subsequent years in army hospitals. Apparently cured, he went to work as a detective for the Pinkerton agency in San Francisco. After a recurrence of the disease he decided to spend his remaining time as a writer. The detective stories he published in Black Mask and other pulp magazines grew very popular. By the end of the twenties he was extending his detective tales into novels for which Hollywood paid him well. He had beaten his TB, too.

He wrote four novels between 1927 and 1930, another in 1934, and none thereafter. Once he had been in the employ of strikebreakers; now he became a Marxist. "Whatever he believed in," Hellman tells us, "came from reading and thinking." He also became an alcoholic, "partly," he says in Tulip, "because I was still confused by the fact that people's feelings and talk and actions didn't have much to do with one another." He played a small role in the publication of PM, wrote the screen version of Hellman's play, Watch on the Rhine, and re-enlisted in the army at the age of 48. He failed his physical examination, probably for several reasons, but the one the doctors gave him was rotten teeth. He went out and had them pulled and when he came back they had to induct him. He served in the Aleutians.

He came out of the army with emphysema, and seemed to be drinking more heavily than ever. In 1948, when one of the few doctors he liked told him he would die if he kept it up, he stopped. "Now, more than ever," writes Hellman, "he sat down to read." He was interrupted in 1951 and sent to jail for refusing to reveal who contributed to the bail-bond fund of the Civil Rights Congress. In 1960 he died.

None of Hammett's experience, except his sleuthing, is used in his stories. Even the Continental Op, hero of all the tales in the present volume (discounting Tulip), is supposedly based on another man: a chief of Pinkerton's Baltimore office whose competence was legendary.

Fitzgerald said he was haunted by the conviction that Ring Lardner "got less percentage of himself on paper than any other American author of the first flight." Hammett got even less on paper, so much less that his rank is uncertain. His use of language is, certainly, "first flight." He did for American slang — the argots of hobos, cowboys, seamen, boxers, longshoremen, miners, Wobblies, and, of course, cops and robbers — what Mark Twain had previously done for the American vernacular: used it on the level of art. Hammett never merely played lexicographer to the underworld. He selected the witty, colorful elements of the jargon and used them naturally, knowledgeably, without dazzling or digressing for the sake of innovation but always to advance his story. In Fly Paper, for example, as the Op tries to figure out where a criminal has fled, he reasons:

> The big man was a yegg. San Francisco was on fire for him. The yegg instinct would be to use a rattler to get away from trouble. The freight yards were in this end of town. Maybe he would be shifty enough to lie low instead of trying to powder. In that case, he probably hadn't crossed Market Street at all. If he stuck, there would still be a chance of picking him up tomorrow. If he was hightailing, it was catch him now or not at all.

As for commonplace profanities, Hammett would skirt them with a graceful précis such as: "He called her four unlovely names, the mildest of which was, 'a dumb twist.'" Occasionally he would slip in a newly coined obscenity to test his editor's conversance with the ever-changing language. One editor failed to blue-pencil the word "gunsel." He took it to mean a gunman's young assistant; it actually meant a homosexual hanger-on. Other writers of detective stories, emulators of Hammett, repeated the editor's mistake and began using "gunsel" in the inaccurate sense. Their errors stuck and the word, when it is used nowadays, is usually used incorrectly.

The imitators proliferated and Hammett soon became typecast as "the founder of the hard-boiled school of detective fiction." It might be useful to consider his work in terms of what had come before. Twain had made the literary break with Europe, but those in the first flush of freedom always look back to make sure the bonds are really broken, and that's what Twain did in The Innocents Abroad. Hammett was second-generation free of the genteel tradition; to him "abroad" meant across the Pacific, not the Atlantic.

Hammett shared with Twain, and perhaps derived from him, a narrative style based on the most American of all forms of humor: understatement. Consider the way Twain begins The Mysterious Stranger:

> It was in 1590 — winter. Austria was far away from the world, and asleep; it was still the Middle Ages in Austria and promised to remain so forever. Some even set it away back centuries upon centuries and said that by the mental and spiritual clock it was still the age of Belief in Austria. But they meant it as a compliment, not a slur, and so it was taken and we were all proud of it.

And the way Hammett gets into Red Harvest:

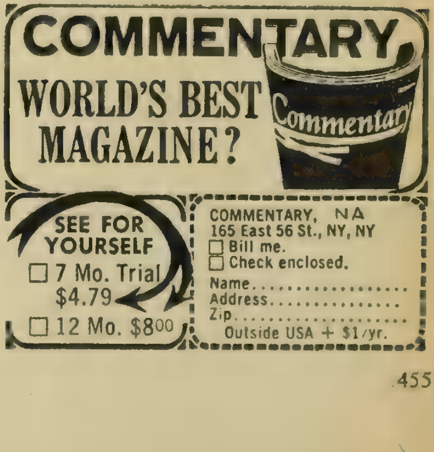
> I first heard Personville called Poisonville by a red haired mucker named Hickey Dewey in the Big Ship in Butte. He also called a shirt a shoit. I didn't think anything of what he had done to the city's name. Later I heard men who could manage their r's give it the same pronunciation. I still didn't see anything in it but the meaningless sort of humor that used to make richardsnary the thieves' word for dictionary. A few years later I went to Personville and learned better.

Since he conceives of murder and mayhem as proper subjects for matter-of-fact humor, Hammett's stories never become gruesome even though the situations are inherently gruesome. In The Big Knockover (a tale I thought was part of Blood Money, but which is run separately in the volume at hand) the Op comes into a house containing fourteen dead men, eleven poisoned, three shot. Instead of describing the gore, Hammett provides a roster:

> There was the Dis-and-Dat Kid, who had crashed out of Leavenworth only two months before; Sheeny Holmes; Snohomish Shitey, supposed to have died a hero in France in 1919; L. A. Slim, from Denver, sockless and underwearless as usual, with a thousand-dollar bill sewed in each shoulder of his coat; Spider Girrucci wearing a steel-mesh vest under his shirt and a scar from crown to chin where his brother had carved him years ago; Old Pete Best, once a congressman; Nigger Vojan, who once won $175,000 in a Chicago crap game — Abracadabra tattooed on him in three places; Alphabet Shorty McCoy; Tom Brooks, Alphabet Shorty's brother-in-law, who invented the Richmond razzle-dazzle and bought three hotels with the profits; Red Cudahy, who stuck up a Union Pacific train in 1924; Denny Burke; Bull McGonickle, still pale from fifteen years in Joliet; Toby the Lugs, Bull's running-mate, who used to brag about picking President Wilson's pocket in a Washington vaudeville theatre; and Paddy the Mex.

Understatement, coolness if you will, enables Hammett to keep some distance from his characters. He needs the distance because, shades of Twain, he is torn between fondness for human beings and disgust over their depravity. Hammett's Op is frequently turning in women whom he would not turn down. Sam Spade does so in The Maltese Falcon. The Op, in Blood Money, shoots a young colleague whom he particularly likes when the colleague turns to crime (because he cannot resist a girl). In The Dain Curse, a man whom the Op was once "chummy with" turns out to be the villain. Thus the style based on understatement lends itself to an understatement of theme, freeing Hammett from the sentimentality and good-against-evil framework of the traditional mystery. To the Op each case is just a job, not a moral crusade.

Hammett's use of understatement is



COMMENTARY,
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address..................
Zip..................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

often mistaken for terseness. He could narrate in what seems like the rhythm of spoken words, and his stories move fast; but he also has a great penchant for elaboration, which he indulges with every character, no matter how minor, who comes onto the scene. You can go through the tale called The Scorched Face, count the number of people (and even buildings) that figure in it and the number of descriptions, physical or otherwise, given for them. The numbers are equal. A maid, interviewed briefly, goes undescribed, but we learn that a lawyer who doesn't figure in the tale at all is "a pink faced, white-haired old boy named Norwall, who had the reputation of knowing more about corporations than all the Morgans, but who hadn't the least idea as to what police procedures was all about." Upon inspection, Hammett's style is the opposite of terse. His settings are exotic, and his inclination as a plotter is toward the more intricate and inclusive.

Why he allowed himself to be confined so strictly by his subject matter, why he relied on the mystery situation to bring a story to life is a mystery more profound than any the Continental Op ever tackled. Hammett himself tries to solve it in Tulip. Tulip is the name of a retired lieutenant colonel under whom Pop (as Hammett was known in the Aleutians) served in World War II. When they first met Pop "had a feeling that he might come to represent a side of me." Now Tulip is visiting Pop at the country place where he resides — reading, tinkering with gadgets, scrutinizing the natural world, but not writing — after his release from prison. An egotist, Tulip wants his life story written up by Pop. This starts Pop to thinking about his own life:

> I've been in a couple of wars — or at least in the Army while they were going on — and in federal prisons and I had t.b. for seven years and have been married as often as I chose and have had children and grandchildren and except for one fairly nice but pointless brief short story about a lunger going to Tijuana for an afternoon and evening holiday from his hospital near San Diego I've never written a word about any of these things. Why? All I can say is they're not for me. Maybe not yet, maybe not ever. I used to try now and then — and I suppose I tried hard, the way I tried a lot of things — but they never came out meaning very much to me.

Fitzgerald wrote that Lardner's topic, baseball, was "a boy's game with no more possibilities in it than a boy could master, a game bounded by walls. . . . However deeply Ring cut into it, his cake had exactly the diameter of Frank Chance's diamond." The Pinkertons did for Hammett what the Cubs did for Lardner; they provided material but walled him in. Eventually this man who deplored violence must have developed a deep ambivalence toward writing about it. Fitzgerald says that when Lardner became ambivalent toward his work he fell into "a habit of silence." Hammett did, too. He tried "to start a new literary life" with Tulip, Hellman writes in the introduction. But the novel is sad and truncated, like Pete Rieser's career:

> "When you write," Pop tells Tulip, "you want fame, fortune and personal satisfaction. You want to write what you want to write and to feel that it's good and to sell millions of copies of it and have everybody whose opinion you value think it's good, and you want this to go on for hundreds of years."

His writing brought Hammett fame and fortune. If it did not bring him personal satisfaction in fullest measure, I like to think that the difference was made up by the pride he took in Hellman's work. It was he who got her going as a serious writer by suggesting that she use an actual event as the basis of a play; that advice led to The Children's Hour. Through the years, Hellman acknowledges, his encouragement and criticism, his physical presence, helped her develop as a playwright. Evidently her progress meant a great deal to him. When he expressed his disappointment over an early draft of The Autumn Garden he told Hellman: "You started as a serious writer. That's what I liked, that's what I worked for." On another, quite different occasion, he spoke of her as "my left arm."

I think Hammett is due for a renaissance and I hope The Big Knockover hastens it. Crime on the scale Hammett described is less significant in America now that the gangsters belong to country clubs and sit on the boards of directors. But significance, literary or otherwise, is not this book's selling point; the cult of nostalgia is. Dashiell Hammett, after all, created the character Humphrey Bogart merely portrayed. One of his smaller accomplishments, I think, but it would be good to see Hammett in vogue no matter how ironic the reason.

Gumming Up the Syntax

RUNYONESE: The Mind and Craft of Damon Runyon. By Jean Wagner. Stechert-Hafner. 173 pp. $4.50.

D. W. MAURER

Mr. Maurer teaches linguistics at the University of Louisville. He is the author of Whiz-Mob (College and University Press Services) and many other books and articles.

Leslie Stephen quotes a literal-minded Irish Bishop as saying about Gulliver's Travels that "the book was full of improbable lies, and for his part he hardly believed a word of it."

Perhaps this paraphrases the view the critics took of Damon Runyon during his lifetime, for his work has been damned as full of "improbable lies" and fit only to entertain. He has had very little recognition as a serious writer.

Meanwhile his selected works have gone through twenty-two American editions, thirteen British editions, and translations into French, Dutch, Italian and Indonesian. He has been briefly mentioned in various anthologies and literary histories, and has been the subject of one or two recent biographies, all of which indicates that some people still read him twenty years after his death.

The first serious treatment by a competent literary critic comes from Jean Wagner, a Frenchman, a professor at Grenoble University and a very astute observer of the American scene. He has written a wise and witty little volume which ranks Runyon with Twain and leaves one wondering why American critics have so universally discarded him. In fact Twain's stated credo: ". . . the deriding of shams, the exposure of pretentious falsities, the laughing of stupid superstitions out of existence . . ." might have suited Runyon very well. Just as it took French enthusiasm to establish Poe as a master of the short story, so it may take a Wagner to get Runyon his due.

Wagner makes the point that American critics rejected Runyon because they had formed stereotyped impressions of the world of crime and rascality from the highly synthetic whodunit school of crime and detective-story writers. I am inclined to believe that he is right. They brushed his characters aside as improbable because they did not fit the stereotype. They refused to accept the world he depicted because they did not believe it existed. They blasted his style because it was ungrammatical and what's more, they knew that no one manhandled the English language the way his characters did. (In one of Runyon's satirical reviews of his own work, he comments: "I do not commend this book for its literary qualities. It contains enough gummed up syntax to patch hell a mile.") They dismissed his plots as fantasies which could happen only in a cheap world of make-believe. Because he frankly wrote for money, they branded him a charlatan.

With an almost surgical touch, Wagner analyzes Runyon's methods and shows him to be not only a skilled short-story writer but a satirist of the first rank. What he was satirizing was the world of respectability. And he used the underworld, with values diametrically opposed to most of those held by the dominant culture, to do it. In those days our culture was thinner skinned, the academicians were still entrenched in criticism and the Establishment a little more sacred. Today, when we are perhaps more enlightened sociologically, we are better prepared to appreciate Runyon's bitter and often cynical social criticism than we were while he was writing it. Under Wagner's analysis, Runyon emerges as the chief — and perhaps the only — competent American practitioner of an art form long respectable in Europe, the art of the picaresque.

That Runyon knew the fringes of the underworld well, Wagner shows with commendable documentation. But it is in his treatment of Runyon's use of language that he is at his best. Wagner is one of the few to challenge the findings of Funk and Wagnalls, publishers of the Standard Dictionary, that Runyon was one of the ten most fecund creators of slang then writing. This myth, incidentally, took in so sharp an observer of the American language as H. L. Mencken, who quoted it up to and including his Supplement II of 1948; it has since been corrected. Wagner shows that Runyon did not, as many believed, create his slang; he borrowed it. He borrowed it from the people who did create it and used it as their native dialect. With skill and a great deal of humor, Wagner runs down item after item to the original source in subcultures on the borderline of criminality, and even to those groups who are specialized professionals. He indicates that Runyon adapted their language to his own use and came up with a unique literary style. He stops short of saying that Runyon wrote directly in the idiom of his characters, that he took over, lock, stock and barrel, their language, which became his special style.

I can fully agree with his position. In the course of more than thirty years of study of the obscure argots of many criminal subcultures, I have collected thousands of samples, by stenographic transcription and on sound tape, of the speech of those who live by their wits outside the law. I think it safe to say that much of the typical idiom used by Runyon can be verified from these records, and many passages, both in writing and in speech, suggest the Runyon style. The people from the subcultures who use this language did not learn it from Runyon; he learned it from them, for their argot has a long history outside the traditions of print. Indeed, many of them do not read anything except the racing forms, and those with difficulty.

Wagner's little volume is written with verve, in a pungent and refreshing style. It has authenticity stamped all over it, which is remarkable for a book written by a foreigner and treating a social area still obscure to most Americans. Naturally, it does not attempt to place Runyon as a major American writer. But it does deftly and skillfully establish him as a competent minor writer, a satirist who, when he is in top form, ranks with the best. It is a distinguished contribution uniting the new science of socio-linguistics with sound literary criticism.

Two Views of Two Germanys

THE MUTED REVOLUTION: East Germany's Challenge to Russia and the West. By Welles Hangen. Alfred A. Knopf. 231 pp. $5.95.

TWO GERMANIES: Mirror of an Age. By Peter Lust. Harvest House (Montreal). 239 pp. $5.50. Paper $2.50.

HEINZ POL

Mr. Pol is the U.S. correspondent of the Frankfurter Rundschau, one of West Germany's leading liberal dailies.

> Fanatic anti-communists are almost as small a minority as fanatic pro-communists in the weary land between the Elbe and the Oder. Intelligent West Germans know this, but they have not yet been able to stop Bonn from picturing East Germany as a big concentration camp peopled by pitiable helots who dream only of being reunited with their prosperous federal cousins. The West German government not only deludes itself about present realities in the East; it also hinders their evolving to the West's advantage.
>
> The men who conceived the present East German agricultural system were brilliant, and they succeeded. Fortunately for the West it has been limited to East Germany. If China or the USSR had originally instituted the LPG [German abbreviation for "agricultural cooperative"] system of the Ulbricht government, the large Canadian wheat sales to these nations might never have been necessary.

These quotations are taken from two most interesting recent surveys of the Germanys of today, and in particular of East Germany, called the German Democratic Republic (Deutsche Demokratische Republik). The first quote is from the book by Welles Hangen, an N.B.C. foreign correspondent who has traveled extensively between the Rhine and the Oder. The second is from the book by Peter Lust, a German-born Canadian journalist who works for the German-language newspaper Montrealer Nachrichten. Invited by an East German group to visit the DDR, Lust accepted only after he was invited by the West German Government as well. In both Germanys Lust was accompanied by guides but free to see whatever he wanted. Hangen, as an American correspondent, did not need a guide. In spite of the different backgrounds of these two observers—one a German-Jewish refugee, the other born in New York City and barely 15 years old when the Third Reich collapsed—they come to surprisingly similar conclusions.

There are, of course, nuances. Lust is slightly to the left of Center. He and his Montreal paper have always kept in touch with the DDR, and not merely with the Federal Republic. Hangen is less emotionally involved; he remains objective although basically he leans to the West-

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3. Dept. N

WORLD'S BEST?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)

☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Name
Address
City State Zip

ern point of view on the German question. And whereas Lust is obviously pleased to find that conditions in East Germany are by and large as good as he had hoped they would be, Hangen grudgingly, and sometimes to his own surprise, concedes that the DDR is on its way to becoming one of the leading industrial countries in Europe. Lust is a lively reporter who describes his day-by-day impressions and manages to get a most interesting interview with Walter Ulbricht, the almost absolute ruler of the DDR, an apparatchik who has been the leader of his nation longer than any other statesman of our time. Hangen, an equally conscientious reporter, but inclined to editorialize, has met other influential men in East Germany, but not Mr. Ulbricht, of whom he has only second-hand knowledge.

This does not diminish the value of Hangen's observations and judgments: they are if anything more impressive since they come from someone who had no sympathy whatever for the Communist regime but came to respect it and even discovered that it has a future to be reckoned with. Indeed, in reading the two books we become almost painfully aware of how little we know about what is really going on in that part of Germany, and how greatly we are deluded if not brainwashed by the propaganda emanating from Bonn and Washington. This state of affairs is all the more regrettable as the officials in both capitals are fully aware of what is happening in the DDR but, for political reasons—that no longer make sense and may even cause harm—fail to give the public an accurate picture.

What Hangen has to report on this vital subject is of the utmost importance. He states that Washington, almost twenty years after the founding of the DDR, still has not developed a policy toward this state, mainly because Bonn insists that the Federal Republic alone can speak for all Germans. The official contact, therefore, remains almost nonexistent. On the other hand, as Hangen states: "Despite protests from Bonn, it [Washington] has licensed the export of synthetic-fiber manufacturing equipment and radio isotopes to the DDR and lifted the ban on American participation at the annual Leipzig trade fairs." And Hangen strongly suggests that Washington should reflect on the advisability of "denying itself regular access to the Soviet Union's most important ally."

The most valuable contributions of both authors to our inadequate knowledge of conditions in East Germany touch upon the degree to which industry and agriculture have developed into economic entities almost completely directed by private managers, and not controlled by the Communist Party. Moreover, these managers are accepting to an ever-increasing extent capitalistic techniques or, at the very least, methods of widening and improving their production that are used by no other Communist country in the world. To put it briefly: East German industry and agriculture are being run strictly by the profit motive. In order to make a profit, the products have to be fairly good. This is a new way of thinking, at least in terms of the orthodox economic ideas which have so long dominated, and are still the rule, in most Socialist countries.

Both journalists of course deal with the question of Germany's reunification. Though this is without doubt an extremely important issue, it has been inflated out of all proportion by propaganda from both sides, but particularly from Bonn's.

Lust takes the view that for the foreseeable future there simply does not seem to be any genuine prospect of ending the schism: "Different doctrines had remoulded the character of each side. Two political organisms had indeed become two nations."

Hangen says that a kind of confederation of the two countries may not be impossible, provided the East German Communists are really willing and Bonn gives up its rigid policy of "fraternal enmity." Meanwhile, Washington could speed up the process, at least by developing trade with East Germany, which in turn would free that country from its almost total economic (and hence political) dependence on Moscow.

But Hangen is not sure, any more than anyone else, whether confederation would be a lasting solution: "No one can foretell how the Germans will finally heal their twentieth-century diaspora." It seems clear that the Germans alone will never solve it, if only because the German question has developed into a world problem. But the day when the world powers can make this happen seems far away.

Meanwhile, the world would do well to note what is going on in both Germanys. Judging by these two books, and by several other reports, conditions in East Germany are not as bad as we are led to believe, and the political situation in booming West Germany is not as good as we have been told. In both states, things are moving—faster than we expected.

Economically, the DDR is still far behind the German Federal Republic. On the other hand, West Germany has entered into a climate of political instability. It is rather hard to say a kind word for a man as crafty and unscrupulous as Ulbricht, but he may well outlast Chancellor Erhard as he has already outlasted Adenauer. The political stability of any system—even the DDR, and in spite of its many cruel episodes—is nothing to be sneered at. And if Bonn should sink into a new and by no means un-German era of inner dissension and political pulverization, the eternal German problem may once more become a dangerous headache for the world.

Romantically Anti-Bourgeois

MANUAL OF PIETY (DIE HAUSPOSTILLE). By Bertolt Brecht. Bilingual edition. Translations by Eric Bentley. Notes by Hugo Schmidt. Grove Press. 312 pp. $10.

MICHAEL HAMBURGER

Mr. Hamburger, poet, critic and translator of German poetry, has published many books here and in England, including Modern German Poetry (Grove Press) and Günter Grass: Selected Poems (Harcourt, Brace). He is currently Purington Lecturer at Mt. Holyoke College.

Brecht's first collection of poems, Die Hauspostille, belongs to his romantically anti-bourgeois, but pre-Communist, phase. First published in 1927, it includes work written at least a decade earlier, during the First World War. The poetic persona that dominates it—even in poems seemingly impersonal, like the ballads and songs—is closely akin to the Baal of Brecht's early play; and in fact the collection includes songs from Baal and Mahagonny, most of which are already well known to English and American readers. Brecht arranged the poems in sections or "lessons" that parody those of popular devotional manuals, and quite a number of the poems are openly didactic. The new bilingual edition follows the precedent of the privately printed Taschenpostille of 1926, of which only twenty-five copies were issued, in imitating the physical appearance of such "manuals of piety," at least when the jacket with George Grosz's drawing is removed.

Parody is very prominent in the poems themselves, of works ranging from Villon to jazz lyrics, from 17th-century hymns to Goethe's Wanderers Nachtlied, from Rimbaud to Kipling. True, with Brecht it is not always easy to distinguish between parody and appropriation or plagiarism. His "Grosser Dankchoral" (Grand Hymn of Thanksgiving), for instance, does not merely guy the hymn "Lobe den Herren," but ingeniously adapts its solemn rhythm to a Brechtian morality which, though un-Christian, is serious enough:

> Es kommt nicht auf euch an
> Und ihr könnt unbesorgt sterben
>
> You do not count for a thing
> And without qualms you can perish

This conclusion sums up one of the basic themes or theses of the collection as a whole, the anti-individualism that was to lead Brecht to communism. Yet Eric Bentley is right to point out that this thesis has a dialectic antithesis in the early work, a glorification of the individual's self-assertion in the teeth of his insignificance. Hence the swashbuckling tone of so many of the ballads and the attraction for Brecht at this time of a Western-style America, all hard living, gambling and "whisky-bars."

Bentley believes that Manual of Piety is "one of the most remarkable books of first poems in modern literature" and "Bertolt Brecht's best book of poems." I would agree with him that it is "impressive for the quality of individual items, for its singleness of vision and, within this unity, for range and variety of subject and statement." It includes a high proportion of poems that have become famous outside their context in the Manual—poems like "Memory of Marie A.," "On the Drowned Girl," "Legend of the Dead Soldier" and "On the Poor B.B.," not to mention those incorporated in the Mahagonny cantata or opera. Despite the element of parody and plagiarism, what is most striking about the book as a whole is the variety of Brecht's rhythmic invention and his capacity to make the most diverse media his own. In this regard there is no disparity between the early and the later Brecht. What is missing in his wide range here is the chastened, "Chinese" manner of so many later poems.

"I put together word mixtures like strong drinks," Brecht said of this early period, and a good deal of crude alcohol, methylated spirits and the like were thrown into these concoctions. The cult of brutality—again it is Brecht himself who draws attention to it, describing his poems as "vertiert," "bestialized"—becomes just a little monotonous, perhaps because there was something self-conscious and deliberate about it. At best it corresponds to something real and important in Brecht's vision—to an acceptance of what is coarsely physical in human nature, to a sympathy—somewhat like Georg Büchner's long before Brecht—that embraces this side of human nature and builds a new morality on a sturdy, unidealistic compassion. "Every vice, says Baal, is good for something," and Brecht says so too in all these poems, if not as explicitly as in the "Chorale of the Man Baal." The brutality, therefore, has its antithesis also, in a kind of tenderness which other poets of the time reserved for characters thoroughly washed and exquisitely perfumed.

The diction of most of these early poems is more difficult to render in another language than that of the later poems, with their more proselike, though never prosaic, clarity and discipline. In the early poems there is much fruitful play with assonance and alliteration, and the sound of one word tends to suggest the choice of the next. Furthermore, most of these poems are rhymed. Their rhythms, though irregular and flexible, are strong, and a good many of Bentley's versions suffer not only because rhymes are sacrificed but because the rhythm flags, as in the last line of "Exemplary Conversion of a Brandy Peddler":

> If you want the filthy lucre
> That's in my cash register

as compared to the German,

> Gébe ích in Zúkunft díeses
> Ségenlóse Schmútzgeld hín

with its continuous and dynamic accentuation. The tone of Brecht's poems, on the other hand, is accurately and scrupulously observed; and a good many poems, such as "Orge's Answer" and "Ballad of Hannah Cash," come across extremely well, even where rhymes have been dropped. Hugo Schmidt's highly informative notes are a valuable complement to the translations.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

They are excellent actresses—Beryl Reid, Eileen Atkins, Lally Bowers—who play Frank Marcus' comedy The Killing of Sister George at the Belasco Theatre.

Beryl Reid in particular is a wonder. "Sister George" is her first role in what is loosely called a "legitimate" play. I saw her first in a mediocre English musical revue in which her comic verve and versatility inspired me to a panegyric in the London Observer. What impressed me then, besides her relish and precise sense of characterization, was the tact with which Miss Reid managed to make every trait she drew hilariously vivid without vulgarity and without flagrant caricature. She is both a "born" actress and a highly skilled one. I can think of no one like her at present on our stage.

In Sister George Miss Reid's part is an especially difficult one. She is required to be rough, raucous, vicious and funny. With all this she brings a remarkable delicacy to the role, making it at times not only charming but touching. Watch her, for example, as she comments on her girl friend's bare legs.

Eileen Atkins too is very good, bringing a sickly and depraved attractiveness to the (well-written) role of an abjectly dependent, parasitic woman of over 30 who fears any responsibility (including motherhood) and who is indeterminate in sexual inclination because her need for protection is greater than her desire for gratification. (What corruption in her eyes!) Miss Atkins fascinates in a part that might easily have proved to be disgusting.

Lally Bowers plays the part of a television executive as the sort of English lady who combines correct tailoring, maddeningly calculated speech, frigid politeness and iron canniness—all of which is not incompatible with low-grade intelligence. The three English actresses are ably abetted by the American Polly Rowles, whose Russian accent is disarming because it is so unconvincing.

I begin with the acting because the play's merits are peculiar. It presumes to mock the television business as conducted by the British Broadcasting Company. The joke is that a middle-aged lady who for years has been the central character of a radio serial, the kindly, ever helpful, immaculately and cozily Christian "Sister George" in Applehurst, emblematic of a tiny English town, is in private a cigar-smoking, gin-guzzling, tough-tongued,

Cultural Tours
TO THE SOVIET UNION
East and West Europe
- Performing Arts Tour
- Education Tour
- Historic Capitals Tour
- Holiday Festival Tour

— 21 DAYS —
Frequent Departures from $813 complete
Write for Booklet NC 66
AFTON TOURS, Inc.
1776 Broadway, N. Y., N. Y. 10019
PLaza 7-9595

sadistic Lesbian. Also a covert Lesbian is her steely, suave and ever so proper producer who finally abducts "Sister George's" girl friend. For poor "George" has been "killed"—removed from the program—and is now reduced to an engagement in a probably far less remunerative and certainly less glamorous role as a cow.

As a lampoon of the television industry in Britain (or elsewhere) the plot is a non sequitur. It is not relevant criticism of the entertainment world to say that among those who become the public symbols of virtue there may be some who are privately scapegraces. This is the kind of attack out of context which seeks to downgrade art by proclaiming that a number of its masters were (or are) homosexual.

Why then was Sister George elected "Best Play of the Year" by London's theatre critics? There is some clever and literate writing (the passage describing "Sister George" scaring the nuns in a taxi), it is stagecrafty, and adopts an ironic tone toward British hypocrisy. In addition, it demonstrates an aptitude for bitchy thrusts beloved in Mayfair coteries.

This has become a favorite vein in London's West End, a reduction to the smartly trivial of the more acrid and occasionally probing jibes initiated in the mid-fifties at the Royal Court Theatre by Osborne and others. It is one facet of London's "sexual revolution."

The first of our own corresponding "revolutions" occurred in the twenties when permissiveness and promiscuity purported to be a protest against a previous "puritanism." This had its English counterpart in the early Noel Coward-Aldous Huxley era, a loosening of morals inevitable after a war, especially since the conflict's aftermath was the beginning of the Empire's deliquescence. Our second sexual seizure began in the fifties as a blatant reaction against conformity. The result with us is to make sex unimportant, conformist and possibly "square." In England, however—specifically in London's more articulate circles—the rebellion is a defiance of the Establishment (which, since the reign of Edward the Seventh, has always masked its licentiousness in cool decorum), a weapon more ostentatious than effective.

OUIJA MESSAGE FROM JFK

When I died in Texas it was not my desire that the whole country follow my example

CHARLES MARTELL

The cry for "freedom," D. H. Lawrence once pointed out, is often a mere rattling of chains. The sexual bravado in England today appears to produce little pleasure. There is more leering than lustiness. Such comedies as The Killing of Sister George or the more affable but inferior and now defunct How To Stamp Out Marriage (a great hit in London) are further from joyous abandon than Harold Wilson's government is from socialism. Though tolerably benign — enjoyable too when acted by such as Beryl Reid and company — the "sexual revolution" is frequently a grim affair which, when prolonged after its simple point has been made, becomes distasteful.

Ben Jonson's The Alchemist is "satire keen and critical" in the guise of a Gargantuan farce. Its targets are two of mankind's ruling vices: greed and lechery. One gathers the impression in seeing and more emphatically in reading the play that, while Jonson reviled the lust for gold, he roared with ambiguous appreciation at the other. His construction is tight, his diction obstreperous with lewdness and learning. He was a scholar with a leaning toward the streets, the cribs, the gamblers, the bawds, the duelists, the braggarts, the thieves, the pimps, the military swaggerers and finally the librarians of Jacobean London. While London today "swings" in cocky response to Britain's imperial and economic attrition, Jonson's London swells in the savage and overripe abundance resulting from the prosperity gained under Elizabeth.

If it were not for the flush of Jonson's frantic energy, his catchall vocabulary which mingles gems of erudition with merdes of the market place, he might strike us as being as cold as he is sometimes obscure. For all his zest and fondness for stage riot he is as much driven by scorn as Shakespeare, for all his melancholy, was impelled by love. Jonson had a soft spot for the greater bard's basic gentleness, but the world they both inhabited chiefly roused him to anger expressed for the most part through splenetic laughter. Jonson has no faith, little hope and much less charity. He would not be gulled.

I say all this because it is often charged that the Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center, which has opened its second season at the Vivian Beaumont with The Alchemist, has chosen its plays unwisely. It must be repeatedly affirmed that on the contrary most of their texts have been masterpieces which deserve display on our starveling stage. The pity is that these texts have been traduced through their production. The Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center, if it does not soon mend its ways, will succeed in making the classics look bad.

I shall not speak of the acting company for I doubt whether in this instance it is largely to blame. For there is a fundamental flaw in the direction of The Alchemist which bespeaks an appalling amateurishness. The actors appear to have been instructed to improvise comedy tricks. The louder they speak the uglier the sound and the more unintelligible they become. Fun in the theatre is created not by aiming directly at its result but by the surprising, illuminating, humorous or witty completion of an authentic human action expressing the will of recognizably real persons. Comedy is an extension of truth and reality to a realm heightened through a special insight provoking in us a happily renewed recognition.

The clowning in this production—extremely pronounced in Michael O'Sullivan—simply obliterates all sense, which is in effect a denial of comedy. We get no relation to time, place, original meaning or adult intention, only burlesque high jinks as misguided college brats might perform them. What Jonson's characters want—specific desire is the seed of all action—is wealth or women (in Sir Epicure Mammon's case the "women" might also be boys); the actors at the Vivian Beaumont want nothing more than to be madly comic, which is as disastrous for comedy as the headlong efforts to achieve beauty or majesty is damaging to tragedy.

Please, please, Messrs. Blau and Irving, mount a production which I can compliment for something more than its worthy purpose. I'm getting even more sick and tired of recording my complaints than you must be of reading them.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 10-31-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ____________
ADDRESS ____________
CITY ____________
STATE ________ ZIP NO. ________

MUSIC / Benjamin Boretz

After all the ephemeral furors of last summer's multi-event Stravinsky Festival (see The Nation, Aug. 22) in New York, it was instructive to attend a single concert, given under university auspices at Princeton, that offered the essential qualities of focus and significance which were conspicuously absent from the big festival: in particular, the projection of the qualities of Stravinsky's most recent music, and performances of works rarely or not yet heard. One would certainly have expected the Philharmonic to play the 1965 orchestral Variations, for example, and, even more obviously, to have commissioned a new Stravinsky work for performance at "his" festival.

But now, thanks to the evidently superior resources of the university (assisted, to be sure, by a generous alumnus), we have at last heard the Variations, played by a superior orchestra of New York free lancers conducted by Robert Craft. And the new vocal-choral-orchestral Requiem Canticles, commissioned for the occasion, was given its first performance under Craft's direction as well. Stravinsky's presence as conductor guaranteed the "festive" nature of the occasion; and his conducting was unusually extensive and strenuous, including the athletically demanding Symphonies of Wind Instruments, the three rarely heard a cappella Russian church choruses, and the 1948 Mass.

It was, however, Stravinsky the still profoundly exploratory composer who, as always on such occasions, dominated the evening. Requiem Canticles appeared as "surprising" as one has come to expect each new Stravinsky work to be; in this case, one was astonished to encounter a time scale of deliberate, regular unfolding that seemed at first totally diametrical to the direction of Stravinsky's development, especially over the last twenty years, and recalling perhaps only a few "ritual" pieces of the thirties and forties in his entire output (parts of Oedipus, the solo viola Elégie, the Credo of the Mass). But the events thus unfolded are, in pitch relation, inflection and macroformal design, unmistakably the twelve-tone Stravinsky of the fifties and sixties. And the ultimate result of this apparently incongruous juxtaposition is the emergence of an extraordinary slow-motion quality that projects those considerations of external "appropriateness"—in this case to the "dramatic" idea of a Requiem—whose conversion into an internal idea of structure is a perennial Stravinskian conceit. This is, indeed, the only instance I know in all Stravinsky where his fantastic time sense is employed to slacken, rather than intensify, the temporal framework for event succession. And the penetration of this idea to every aspect of the Requiem is also evident in an instrumentation of almost exaggerated plainness that represents an equivalent inversion of Stravinsky's usual razor-sharp particularity of a projected timbral image. The constructive subtlety that emerges in the development of this "plainness" from its maximally viscous, homogeneous opening with muted strings layering evenly repeated pitches against the evenly unfolded linear successions in two unmuted solo violins, through a series of vocal movements that carry it to extremes of transformation on the one hand, to the central and final instrumental movements that successively "descend" into increasing stasis of durations and sound on the other, is an awesome demonstration of the abundance of idea and technique still available to Stravinsky at 85.

Perhaps even more striking evidence of this vitality is the complete disparity in approach and appearance of the Requiem and the orchestral Variations, although they were composed in immediate proximity. Of all Stravinsky works, the Variations is in fact the most drastically time compressed; it manages, in an extremely concentrated time span, to articulate a structure of large-scale developmental scope and variety by ranging with breathtaking rapidity among extremes of differentiation in timbre and texture, from unisons to sustained twelve-part polyphonies, from rapid alternation of contrasting timbres to passages for solo piano and, once, for twelve solo violins interweaving in a single narrow registral band. The result is certainly one of the most immediately dazzling experiences in Stravinsky's music, approached in intensity and interest perhaps only by Movements.

As for the Philharmonic itself, this current season has opened with a promise unprecedented in recent years. First, the appointment of David Nadien as concertmaster suggests a concern for the orchestra's executive improvement that had not previously been evident. And the programs of this year's "Symphonic Forms of the Twentieth Century" series include a few American works of much more interest than anything offered last year, notably Salvatore Martirano's Contrasto, the Copland Short Symphony (one of the most frequently canceled works in the literature), and music by Irving Fine, Harold Shapero and Lukas Foss, as well as the Bartók opera Bluebeard's Castle and a work from the Soviet compositional "underground," Denisov's Crescendo and Diminuendo. On the other hand, the continuing omission of key figures—most of all Roger Sessions—remains inexplicable.

But the really novel aspect of the season is Leonard Bernstein's programing of the first Schoenberg works he has (to my knowledge) ever conducted with the Philharmonic. The first two of these, played during October, seemed to have been chosen with particular alertness to the delicacy of the encounter: the Second Chamber Symphony is, of all mature Schoenberg works, a minimal extension of the kind of sonority and continuity characteristic of late Mahler, an obviously comfortable domain for Mr. Bernstein; while the Survivor from Warsaw must have seemed safe by virtue of its highly charged theatrical surface and its irresistibly pathetic subject.

In more significant respects, however, these choices themselves reflect a rather ominous naïveté. For the Chamber Symphony, virtually as a consequence of its nostalgically compulsive mellifluence, is not really one of Schoenberg's most interesting works. Still, its performance may have provided some valuable insights, through a medium relatively accessible to conductor and audience, into Schoenberg's thought and auditory imagination, which

This advertisement is not an offer to sell or a solicitation of an offer to buy these securities. The offering is made only by the prospectus.

New Issue

A NEW REAL ESTATE INVESTMENT TRUST WHICH INVESTS IN HOUSING OPEN TO ALL.

Please send without obligation the M-REIT Prospectus.
Attn.: Morris Milgram, Mgr., M-REIT, 51 E. 42nd St., Suite 211, New York, N.Y. 10017
N-10-31

M-REIT

Mutual
Real Estate
Investment Trust

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

might facilitate future performances and auditions of more advanced works. And although Bernstein's performance revealed the consequences of his and the orchestra's inexperience in this literature by proceeding far too much from sound to sound, without much sense of linear connectivity and large-scale contour, it remained, for the most part, within reasonable bounds of sobriety and restraint—although one suspects that some of that quality was imposed by the orchestra's manifest unfamiliarity with the score.

The Survivor, on the other hand, was a far more deceptive problem, for it conceals, beneath its surface of melodramatic Mickey-mousing of the spoken text (read here by Vera Zorina) and slightly hysterical effect, one of those remarkably developed music-dramatic scenarios that invoked Schoenberg's maximal orchestral and compositional virtuosity. His capacity to "time" dramatic events in sequence by purely music-constructive means, such as associations of layers of density, dynamics and registral dispersion, is masterly in such situations. And the culmination in the superimposition of the unison chorus on a full, polyphonically articulating instrumental texture, after the sharply pin-pointed, isolated events preceding, is in its simultaneous climaxing of both the musical and the dramatic situations, a great coup de structure. Predictably, this kind of multi-dimensional conceptual and technical complexity was beyond any capacities the Philharmonic could summon, and all the vividly articulated timbral and rhythmic contours dissolved in a muffled confusion of indeterminate attacks. And Mr. Bernstein's valiant attempt to subsume all the muffed details within the sweep of an overall momentum simply added to the confusion in music where the momentum exists only as a consequence of the precise articulation of significant details. Perhaps, in the end, this unhappy experience will have helpful results for the performances of the even more problematic Violin Concerto later this season. That would justify a more substantive optimism regarding the future quality of the Philharmonic's contribution to musical activity.

'THE RUSSIANS FAKED IT'

(Continued from page 447)

program. Somehow this does not seem to be the sort of answer Mallan is looking for.

Although Mallan's articles have attracted more attention than they should have, they have little appeal for intelligent right wingers. The May 3rd issue of National Review featured an article entitled "Spacewise: What the Russians Really Did — What They Faked." The writer is John W. Campbell, editor of Analog (formerly Astounding) Science Fiction, and probably the only friend the baby-deforming drug thalidomide has in the world. His reasoning runs something like this. Thalidomide was banned by the Food and Drug Administration. The FDA is comprised of big-government bureaucrats. Big-government bureaucrats are evil fools. Anything that is disliked by big-government bureaucrats can't be all bad. Campbell was also a major supporter of two popular pseudo-science fads of the 1950s, dianetics and psionics. Today he favors water dowsing and is an absolute bug on the subject of extrasensory perception. Yet even with this staggering record of credulity he cannot swallow Lloyd Mallan and savagely attacks what he labels the "say-it-isn't-so syndrome." Campbell, however, agrees that the Russians did fake their space-walk film, not because they faked the walk itself but because a 100 per cent honest film would not look very impressive to "the backwoods native." Campbell's article is followed by an agonized and evasive answer by Mallan, who seems to have been expecting friendlier treatment in the pages of National Review.

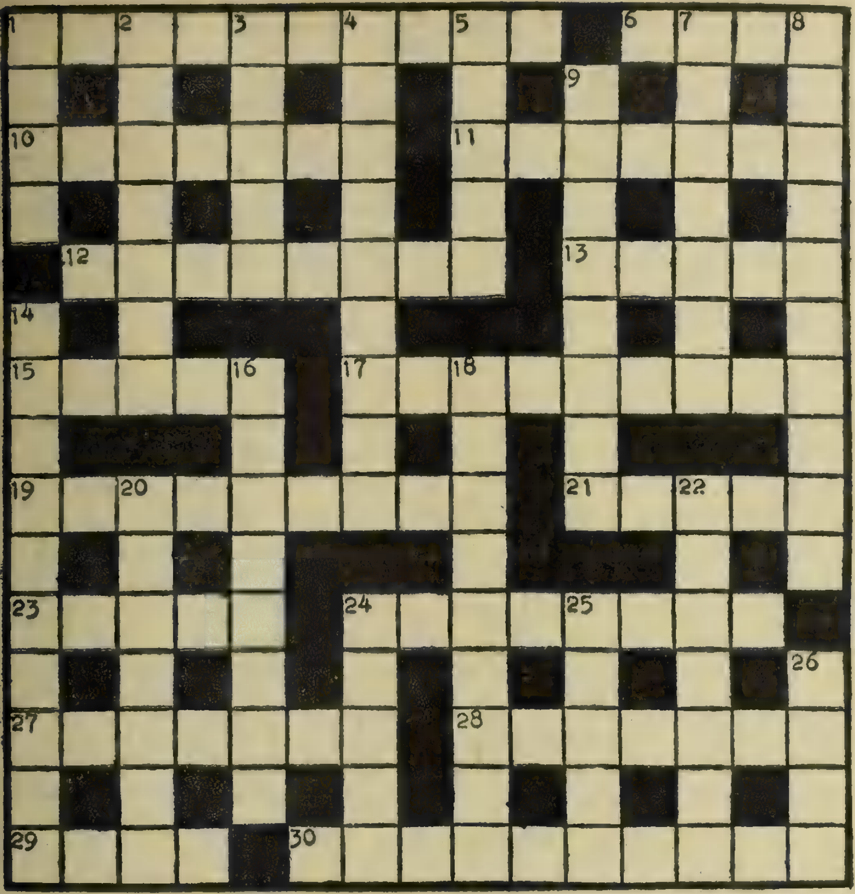
However, articles like those by Lloyd Mallan are considered serious by a depressingly large number of people. A good part of the blame for this state of affairs can be laid at the door of the Soviets and the way they release their space information. For a nation reputedly skilled in the subtle arts of propaganda they are often remarkably inept. Obviously, no one expects either Soviets or Americans to release all the technical details on their respective space programs. But the public relations office of the National Aeronautics and Space Administration is the busiest in Washington. It floods journalists with more solid information than they can possibly digest. Network TV covers space shots with a thoroughness that borders on tedium. And although failures and problems are not trumpeted about, they are quietly admitted.

The Russians, by contrast, send their smiling cosmonauts on a lot of world tours but they don't release much hard information, at least not at a time when it is likely to be transmitted to the man on the street. They are improving a bit, but access to data is still poor. They announce no mission plans, even after a spacecraft has actually been launched, and no matter what happens, each vehicle — manned or unmanned — is said to be "successfully carrying out appointed tasks." When technical details are released at an international meeting, like those of the Committee on Space Research (COSPAR), it is months after the mission. Strictly speaking, these meetings are the proper place for responsible, unsensational scientific or technical pronouncements. On the other hand, by that time the popular press has become bored with the old space mission and is busily whipping up enthusiasm for the upcoming spectacular. Thus, the information never gets beyond a limited circle. On-the-spot television coverage or even news films of launchings are unthinkable. Charles de Gaulle, during his tour of Russia, became the first Westerner to witness a Soviet satellite launching.

Too often, the Soviets treat their space information in a manner that is genuinely odd. In April, 1965, they released the first photos of one of their manned spacecraft, the Vostok one-man craft, that had been used in the early days of manned flight but has not been employed for several years. The more advanced craft, capable of taking two or more cosmonauts into orbit, is called Voskhod. The photo shows a spherical vehicle sitting in the middle of a field of grass, and that is all. At one time the United States tested spherical spacecraft and found the shape unacceptable. Soviet use of this shape is a tantalizing enigma. There are other intriguing aspects of the photo but no explanations. The caption material supplied is worse than useless; it is confusing. The Soviets may have their own reasons for this obsessive and seemingly childish secrecy, but Lloyd Mallan would offer a reason too — it's all a big fake. If several million people in the U.S. believe him, the Soviets can, in large measure, blame only themselves.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1173

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 and 6 What some foreign ambassadors would like to have in March? (10, 4)
10 What protest groups might stage when there are no seats available, working for a star? (5-2)
11 Animal in a shaggy coat, in improvised style. (7)
12 The sun rises about here, if you're interested in getting something to eat. (8)
13 In the first place, they're beside the point! (5)
15 and 1 down This you might have to see with—or else! (9)
17 If the man's disturbed by it, it might go deep. (9)
19 Crude weapons? Pitch in for the birds!
21 and 23 Decides to discourage booby traps, possibly. (10)
24 Throw into disorder by mild imprecation. (8)
27 Well rid of it? (7)
28 Schopenhauer said this is like a pendulum and obeys the same law. (7)
29 It can't be expressed rationally. (4)
30 Self-restraint suggests the five or six we could name in school. (10)

DOWN:

1 See 15 across
2 and 25 One of the things responsible for the tears of Madrid. (7, 5)
3 Is this trial of labor long and tortuous?
4 It's self in Jeeves? (9)
5 Hat so crumpled as to be almost indecent! (5)
7 What might be played is aught in a circling automobile. (7)
8 Passing rains try to settle it. (10)
9 Having 5 flung at it? (8)
14 and 26 Is part of the scrub team so injury prone? (10, 4)
16 Likes pickles, for instance? (8)
18 Following a clue concerning what the first horse might be doing? (6, 3)
20 O, might it be so! (7)
22 Evidently the strain is up in part of the joint. (7)
24 It's a larger part of San Francisco than it is of Texas. (5)
25 See 2 down
26 See 14 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1172

ACROSS: 1 Big business; 9 Hero; 10 and 28 Below zero; 12 Pinhole; 13 Hot rods; 15 Ambrosia; 16 Tablet; 18 Make-up; 21 Blanched; 24 Paradox; 26 Coffers; 29 Throb; 31 Way Down East. DOWN: 2 Iron Horse; 3 Bobbles; 4 and 11 Silkworm; 5 Newport; 6 Sower; 7 and 30 Medium rare; [illegible] Bridle; 14 Lambs; 17 Backfires; 19 Amazed; 20 Plotted; 22 Amoebae; 23 Errors; 25 Aroma; 27 Crew.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

BERKELEY IS WHERE THE BARB IS AT

"Sex Group Picks First Maiden Head"

"Walkout As Co-Opers Vie With Board"

You read about us in TIME, etc. Our photos of anti-napalm action at Port Chicago used nation-wide.

Weekly now 12 pages with hippy-ads and freaky-classifieds. $5 year.

MAX SCHERR, editor
2421 Oregon, Berkeley, Calif. 94075

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

HOMOSEXUAL theme fiction, non-fiction listing available free. Trojan Book Service, Box 2121B, Philadelphia, Pa. 19103.

FOREIGN PAPERBACKS and Discount Books. Free lists. P. O. Box 767-J, San Leandro, California 94577.

HUMAN SEXUAL RESPONSE/Masters and Johnson. Send $10 to: Marie Brower, 7800 Essington, Philadelphia, Pa. 19153.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

NEW RELIGION. Explains virgin birth. Free details. Casselman, 1301 H, No. 6B, Sacramento, Calif. 95814.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

THE FERVENT YEARS

by Harold Clurman, 302 pages; list price, $1.75

In this book, a classic in its field, The Nation's drama critic recalls the ideals, personalities, triumphs and errors behind the Group Theatre. That brilliant experiment in the American theatre brought together such then little-known talents as Lee Strasberg, Cheryl Crawford, Clifford Odets, Franchot Tone, Elia Kazan, John Garfield, Irwin Shaw; it produced such memorable and influential plays as Men in White, Johnny Johnson, Awake and Sing, My Heart's in the Highlands and Golden Boy. But beyond recapturing the excitement of those people and events, Mr. Clurman, himself a founder and director of the Group, has written one of the best social and intellectual histories of the 1930s—those tumultuous, tormented and fervent years that a new generation has just begun to discover with mounting pleasure and excitement.

> "Has the fascination of a novel. . . . Mr. Clurman's 'characters' . . . wander in and out of his pages as undraped as if, spiritually at least, they were at a nudist colony."
> —John Mason Brown
>
> "A tale of almost heroic struggle, of clashing vanities, of successes and mistakes, which will always have a place in the history of our stage."
> —Walter Pritchard Eaton, New York Herald Tribune
>
> "Light on the forces in the theatre and in the surrounding social and economic climate of the thirties that drew this wildly assorted collection of actors, directors, writers and eager aspirants into a vociferous effort to create a unity in which they could work and through which they might also live."
> —Theatre Arts

For your FREE copy of THE FERVENT YEARS, fill out subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FERVENT YEARS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

10-31-66

NOV 7 1966
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY

HOW TO RUN A PEACE CANDIDATE

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 7, 1966 35 cents

Restyling the States

50 DINOSAURS

CONSTITUTIONS

The Politics of Power

HAROLD NORRIS

• • •

LEGISLATURES

The 100-Year Lag

DAVID H. BEETLE

THE IRISH

Rehearsing the Future / KEVIN SULLIVAN

Behan and the Rising / SEAN CRONIN

Morning's Twilight / ANTHONY C. WEST

5-22-67 PL5-801
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

punishing the blameless

New York City

Dear Sirs: There is one aspect of the abortion question [editorial, "The Right to Abortion," The Nation, Oct. 17] which seems always to be left out, the most important in my view, namely the unwanted child. . . . To force motherhood on one unwilling is not "punitive motherhood"—it is immediate, unending punishment for the only one who is blameless. Ann Jackson

the New Left replies

Oakland, Calif.

Dear Sirs: Both your editorial and the article by Gladwin Hill ["Barbecues and Other Trivia," The Nation, Oct. 17] in discussing our recent "New Left" Conference on Power and Politics in Los Angeles, contain serious errors and distortions which should be corrected. From your magazine's failure to adequately cover the recent California primary races involving "peace" candidates to your rather cavalier coverage of the conference (which grew out of the primaries), you have evidenced an unseemly obtuseness as to the meaning, composition and direction of the "New Left." . . .

Contrary to your flat assertion, many more Negroes attended the conference than have ever attended CDC or similar meetings in California—and they did not walk out. As you did point out, perhaps the unique feature of the conference was the participation of the organized poor, who were impatient to condemn Brown and get on to other business. To have involved such groups indicates a viability for the New Politics that the proponents of politics-as-usual disregard at their peril.

The conference voted approximately 7 to 5 to substitute a statement to the effect that it opposed both Brown and Reagan for one which said that it could not support either candidate. Though there is a difference of degree between them, both resolutions opposed Governor Brown. That fact must be understood! No more than 10 per cent of those attending the conference evinced any desire to support Pat Brown! Thus, any split which you saw as an outgrowth of the conference was over tactics, not over the basic question of opposition to a Governor who almost all concede has failed and repudiated the Left and the liberals of California. . . .

Most important, your readers must understand that we were and are willing to support Brown, or any other political figure who engages in at least a minimally liberal performance—but Brown has recently been bad on farm labor, civil rights, police-community relations, economic justice, welfare and the war. He has made his choice; he will woo the Right, not the Left. You must pardon us for not wanting to be a member of that wedding.

Malcolm Burnstein, Northern Chairman, Conference on Power and Politics

Evanston, Ill.

Dear Sirs: Gladwin Hill's article on the California gubernatorial election seems to me remarkably unperceptive. . . . Clever reporters like Mr. Hill may sneer at or ignore the elements of what is sometimes called the New Left, but Pat Brown should know that their alienation from him will probably cost him this election. The Left, both old and New, has finally gotten tired of being given only a choice between the near Right and the far Right and is asking for something better, even at the price of having Ronald Reagan as governor for the next four years. Because the Left has finally seen that be-

(Continued on page 484)

EDITORIALS

The Great Road Show

Lyndon B. Johnson made most of his money in television far out in the provinces, but if fate had placed him at a network headquarters he would have been one of the greatest creators of spectaculars in the industry. The political significance of his trip to Asia was synonymous with the showmanship of the affair. Lyndon B. Johnson presented Lyndon B. Johnson. And most of the audience loved it.

This requires some qualification. With the exception of the protesters against the Vietnamese War, the crowds which saw the President in person were obviously entranced. He was not aiming only at them, however. An equally important target—perhaps more important—was the folks back home. The TV coverage for them was no small effort: according to Newsweek, C.B.S. had a crew of forty-seven along the route, N.B.C. had forty, A.B.C., fifty. But whether the stateside audience was proportionately impressed is doubtful. The smarter ones knew what LBJ was up to, and the ones eager to admire are seeing an awful lot of their idol. They must be getting a bit tired of a face that has none of the charm that President Kennedy radiated, of speeches on Vietnam that are always the same. On this mammoth junket he declared that the North Vietnamese "aggressors" must be taught that might does not make right—this coming from the greatest military power that has ever been seen on land or sea, in the air or in space, fighting on the other side of the world against a country with a population of some 16 million!

The real victims of the Johnson expedition were the newsmen who went along and had to explain its political significance to the home folks. Aside from spectacle, it had none, but the reporters had to pretend that something was happening. The President himself had warned against any high hopes; few journalists were bold enough to say that the results fell below even the lowest expectations.

The Manila Conference was in large part an effort to give the impression that we are fighting alongside a dedicated group of allies, when actually the war would fall to pieces the next morning if the United States gave notice of withdrawal. The signatories of the meaningless communiqué which the conference brought forth are not so much allies as clients, swilling at the trough of the U.S. Treasury. The three big Asian or Eurasian countries not directly involved in the Vietnamese War—Japan, India and the Soviet Union—stood off at a safe distance, and, even as the Manila Conference went through its clumsy maneuvers, the leaders of India, Yugoslavia and the United Arab Republic called on the United States to stop the bombing of North Vietnam "without any preconditions." They also said that the National Liberation Front should be "one of the main parties" in any effort toward peace.

This makes sense, whereas the lucubrations at Manila merely added to an already surplus stock of verbiage. Our latest offer, to quit South Vietnam—presumably to retire to our bases in Thailand—six months after the fighting has subsided, is a mere reiteration of the policy which was set in motion when the bombing began. If the North Vietnamese will abandon the National Liberation Front, in six months (if we and the Saigon militarists are satisfied) we will depart. If the North Vietnamese bargain on this basis, it will be a startling departure from the position to which they have clung during all these years of fighting.

FEB 19
APR 30

Peace will come to Southeast Asia one of these days. But when negotiations are started, the confabulation at Manila, and the President's triumphal tour, will have nothing to do with this consummation. It will be the result of secret diplomacy behind the arras of the Johnson spectacular.

Bavaria, U.S.A.

In the depressed thirties, with fascism preparing to overrun Europe, there was widespread apprehension that a like fate awaited America, and that our variant of the Fascist plague would be spawned in the South. It is still possible. Huey Long's often quoted aperçu—that fascism would come to America in the guise of Americanism—may yet prove prophetic, and that it would be a racist form of "Americanism" Long would have been the last to deny.

An explosion is clearly in the making. The Negroes of the urban ghettos are in revolt and, even if the war in Vietnam should end tomorrow, their wants will not be satisfied for years. Legal progress toward integration has about run its course as a tranquilizing influence among middle-class Negroes. And at this juncture the South is in process of staging a rebellion, a counterrevolution which bodes no good either for the Democratic Party or the nation. The showdown may not come until 1968, but in a period like the present the years pass all too quickly.

But is "counterrevolution" the right word? That the Negroes have staged a revolution is, when one reflects, a romantic and misleading notion. Dr. Leslie W. Dunbar contends that it has been a mistake from the beginning to call the civil rights movement a revolt, a rebellion, a revolution or anything that resembles an uprising, peaceful or violent, with intent to change the existing form of government. The Negro has been calling not for a change in the legal order but for changes in society to conform to the Constitution and the spirit of laws long since enacted. If an American citizen demanding the rights due him by virtue of his citizenship is a revolutionist, the term has been given a new and discordant meaning.

The real revolutionists, of course, are in the South. "Any political observer taking a swing through Dixie," writes Ted Lewis in the New York Daily News, "realizes . . . that a significant revolution is under way. . . ." As Mr. Lewis points out, Negro voters, new and old, are being denied a real option in Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana. The choice offered between Lester Maddox and Bo Callaway, between Lurleen Wallace and James D. Martin leaves the Negro, for the time being, on much the same spot he occupied before he was permitted to register. In the South, and in the North as well, the pace of segregation has been slowed to a walk, if not reversed. The difference is that in the North the segregationists are still on the defensive and in the main reluctant to show an openly racist spirit, while in the South regression is openly aggressive and bent on rolling back such slight gains as the Negro has made. The center of this furor is U.S. Commissioner of Education Harold Howe II. Under the law, aside from his personal

IN THIS ISSUE

November 7, 1966

EDITORIALS

466

ARTICLES

469 How To Run a Peace Candidate Robert K. Byron

Restyling the States: 50 Dinosaurs

472 Constitutions: The Politics of Power Harold Norris
475 Legislatures: The 100-Year Lag David H. Beetle
479 Junkets to Apartheid: America's Press on Safari Francis Pollock
481 The Pilot Shortage Karl M. Ruppenthal

BOOKS & THE ARTS

485 Ireland Rehearses the Future Kevin Sullivan
486 Where the Martyrs Died Sean Cronin
487 Hospitality (poem) David Ray
488 Morning's Twilight Anthony C. West
490 For Each Her Own Tiny Revolt Nancy Reeves
490 The Potential Prisoner (poem) Sandra Hochman
492 Abortion on Demand Edwin M. Schur
493 Theatre Harold Clurman
494 Films Robert Hatch
495 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 15

convictions, Howe is obligated to move ahead with desegregation along a clearly specified line. As he puts its, "We are not under obligation to see that there is no discrimination but to see to it that no federal funds flow if there is." This leverage the Southern segregationists are bent on disabling. Already they have managed to get a measure through the House to require a hearing in advance of any official attempt to delay payment to any school district suspected of discrimination. Such a measure would tie Howe's hands almost completely.

The Southern rebellion is being pressed on a broader front than this. In Georgia, Lester G. Maddox and his cabal are engaged in taking over the Democratic Party lock, stock and barrel. The Wallaces and all the other Dixiecrats now whooping to the Confederate colors purpose to defy the Constitution, to thwart the federal government, and to halt the forward march of American democracy. Wallace is no political nitwit, nor should Maddox be underestimated—so rapid a rise from selling fried chicken to a probable ascension to the governor's mansion cannot be taken lightly. Wallace is not likely to be President, but in 1968 he could tie up a formidable block of Southern electoral votes. About all this there is a smell of something highly indigenous, yet European too—upstarts and demagogues seizing power and doing it as Hitler did, under cover of legality and with an appeal to the worst instincts of the worst section of the electorate. Whether the parallelism with the thirties will develop further is something to be watched. If it does, terms like fascism or crypto-fascism, which have fallen into desuetude, may have to be brought into the political vocabulary once more.

Symbol of the Backlash

Like Proteus, the white backlash has many shapes. One is the measure on the New York City ballot giving the voters the opportunity to abolish the Civilian Review Board which Mayor Lindsay imposed on the police department. As with many such measures, the way in which the question is put is confusing. The question reduces to this: shall the civilian board be abolished? If you favor retention of the board, you must vote no.

It is a real question whether civilian review can get to the basic issues that trouble relations between the police and the citizens. Prof. Walter Gellhorn, in the summer issue of The Columbia University Forum, points out that at one time the New York police were in the habit of beating up labor organizers and other not quite respectable persons, but when times changed and politicians changed with the times, orders came down from on high and the police changed their ways—at least to the extent of finding other groups to beat up. Presumably they could be induced to change their attitudes on racial matters as well, if they were impressed by firmness in the top command.

But this evades the political question. Right-wing groups have moved into the field and have made the police their particular pets. In the crude shorthand of politics, "Support your local police" has come to mean "Rally in support of the right wing." It is another of numerous code phrases which now bemuse politics: it means backlash. And it puts normal law-abiding citizens in the position of being against the police—a piece of political slander by innuendo characteristic of right-wing strategists.

The deplorable consequence is that if the police review board is repealed, the outcome will be construed as a rebuke to civil rights groups and a setback for the whole civil rights movement. Actually, the review board as it exists is already heavily weighted in favor of the police. Civil rights groups could properly object to it. But even a symbolic victory for the backlash in cosmopolitan New York City would contribute to the growing sentiment nationally, the more so if Ronald Reagan should win the gubernatorial election in California. For the results would be interpreted as meaning that the backlash had prevailed in the country's two largest states.

Testimony by Contract

Since its inception as a standing committee, the House Committee on Un-American Activities has in effect been free of supervision by the House. Its budget is largely unquestioned: the House dutifully votes the generous appropriation it demands, since few members dare to brave the wrath of those who, after twenty years of Red-hunting, still fear the overthrow of the government by the Communist Party.

The House's other obligation toward the committee is to cite recalcitrant witnesses for contempt. This used to be done routinely, but of late there have been signs of reluctance. An uproar developed when citations were requested in the case of three Chicagoans who had defied HUAC. Debate began at 4 P.M. on October 18 and two witnesses were cited, but a third case had not been disposed of when the House adjourned at 9 P.M.

The following day this witness was duly cited, but his case had become something of a cause célèbre and the debate brought out some information which, one may surmise, the committee would have preferred to keep private. The witness is Dr. Jeremiah B. Stamler, head of the Chicago Board of Health's heart disease control program and winner of the Albert Lasker award for medical journalism. In citing Dr. Stamler, 219 to 69, the House disregarded a petition on his behalf, to which were appended signatures which filled 20 pages of the Congressional Record. Among them were 400 law professors, 1,000 political scientists, 700 physicians and biomedical workers, 250 history professors and 400 religious workers. One of the physicians was Dr. Paul Dudley White, the Boston cardiologist who treated President Eisenhower. If it had not been so eager to adjourn, the House might have taken this massing of intellectuals more seriously.

The dirt on HUAC was brought out by one of the most respected long-term members of the House, Rep. Wayne L. Hays of Ohio. Last August the committee held hearings on the far left Progressive Labor Party's opposition to the Vietnamese War, with Rep. Joseph Pool in the chair. The star witness was Phillip Abbott Luce, who had briefly joined the 5,000-member organization and lengthily exposed its inner workings. Mr. Hays complained about committee fees received by witnesses, including $1,000 paid to Mr. Luce six days after he testified. The staff director, Francis J. McNamara, denied that Mr. Luce was paid for his testimony; the money, he said, went to the witness for a study of "ultra-revolutionary groups." Two witnesses against Dr. Stamler were also financial beneficiaries of the committee, and Mr. Hays recalled that Elizabeth Bentley, one of the committee's greatest assets in the forties, had received $100 a day for her expertise.

It appears that it has been common practice for HUAC to put friendly witnesses under contract as consultants, after they have proved their value in testimony. One can imagine the shrieks of protest which would ring in the House if such a procedure were followed in, say, an inquiry into the trucking industry, or into price fixing in the fuel oil industry, or anything else pertaining to business. It would seem that the least the House can do is to insist that HUAC make public all such payments in the past, and when future friendly witnesses appear, to divulge what their fees as consultants are to be. It is a safe prediction that the House will do nothing of the kind.

The Coy Chancellor

Should a college English instructor assign Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress" as the topic for a theme? We don't know. It would depend on the maturity of the students, the way in which the poem was presented and the instructor's reasons for thinking the exercise useful. In other words, it is a matter of professional academic judgment.

But an instructor at the University of North Carolina did assign the poem to his class and all hell broke loose in Chapel Hill when a commentator on a right-wing radio station in nearby Raleigh bleated over the air that the pure minds of the students were being smirched by the lecherous impetuosity of the 17th-century English poet. The instructor has been relieved of his teaching duties and the students are beginning to wonder in their campus paper whether their education is being shaped by Station WRAL-TV, an institution in which they did not enroll.

The University of North Carolina became a great center of learning during the many years when Frank Graham was its president. More recently, Dr. Graham has become one of the country's most revered and effective public servants: National War Labor Board, the President's Commission on Civil Rights, the United States Senate, the United Nations. But last week Dr. Graham was back on the Chapel Hill campus to assist at the installation of the unversity's new chancellor, J. Carlyle Sitterson. It was Chancellor Sitterson who met the attack of the yahoo broadcaster by saying of the instructor that "it did not appear that he had effective communication with his class."

Back in 1932, when the students invited Norman Thomas, the Socialist candidate for the Presidency, to speak, Dr. Graham had the visitor stay at his house. Had he been in his old office when Marvell's plaintive lines burst on Chapel Hill, he would at least have invited the instructor home for tea. What he might have said to him, only he can know; but everyone knows what he would have said to WRAL-TV. That was one reason why Chapel Hill became great; the question now is how long it will remain so.

The Cook Campaign

Robert Cook's independent candidacy (see article below) is a model of how to run a peace candidate in a Congressional election. For one thing, it was clear from the outset that Mr. Cook's candidacy could hardly provide an upset victory for the Republican nominee and that if it did it wouldn't matter much. Also, the fact that Mr. Cook decided to run as an independent meant that his candidacy could not be cut short at the primary. As an independent candidate, he has had the full campaign time in which to carry his ideas to the voters of the district. Finally, his campaign was projected on the assumption that the major objective was to build a new base of political power in the district (the 3rd Connecticut C.D.). In other words, his candidacy was not a "one-shot" affair but a carefully planned attempt to found in the district a permanent organization which would continue to function after November 8. On the evidence, Mr. Cook's candidacy has accomplished the objective he and his supporters had in mind. Regardless of the size of his vote—which will measure the immediate impact—his candidacy is certain to have continuing consequences. Looking toward the future, the Cook campaign is a good demonstration of how to set the "new politics" in motion at the Congressional District level.

How To Run A Peace Candidate

ROBERT K. BYRON

Mr. Byron is a senior at Yale University whose area of special interest is the growth of the British Labour Party between the World Wars. He has reported on the Cook campaign for the Yale Daily News.

A few anti-war candidates ran close races in this year's Democratic primaries, but many more went down to lopsided defeat. There were strong showings in three California and three New York Congressional districts; elsewhere the "peace campaigns" offered no threat. The hopes of Johnson's critics on the left now lie almost entirely with a few independent candidates who are presenting vigorous anti-war platforms.

Perhaps the most promising of the independents is Robert Cook, a Yale sociologist whose ambitious campaign in Connecticut's 3rd District (New Haven and vicinity), has cast doubt on a previously certain Democratic victory. Cook has taken on four-term Democratic incumbent Robert Giaimo and Republican nominee Stelio Salmona. Journalists and experienced political observers see Cook as a greater threat than Salmona to the popular Giaimo.

Connecticut's 3rd District could hardly have seemed promising for a "peace candidate" when the Cook for Congress campaign was born last March. Comprising New Haven and twelve surrounding cities and towns, it almost invariably votes heavily Democratic. Thus, New Haven's powerful Democratic machine has kept Giaimo in office with barely a scare since 1958. Democratic Mayor Richard Lee has been re-elected five times since taking office in 1955. All thirty-three of the city's aldermen are Democrats, and what little strength the Republicans once had in the district was swept away in the Goldwater debacle of 1964.

And this solid Democratic district depends heavily on the defense industry to support its economy. Within its boundaries are the huge Pratt & Whitney jet-engine facilities, Olin Mathieson's Winchester gun division, Marlin Firearms and the Sikorsky helicopter plant.

Congressman Giaimo had registered an acceptable, if unspectacular, record. The district as a whole was prosperous, and the poor in New Haven were reportedly receiving the nation's highest per capita poverty-program allotment. There seemed no reason to expect that Robert Giaimo would not be back in Washington next January.

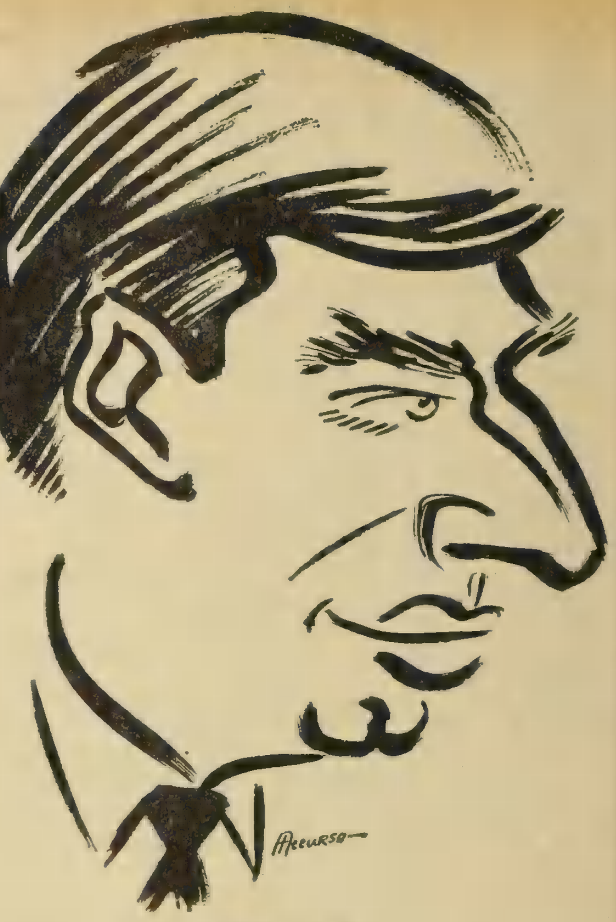
But early in 1966, a group of a dozen Yale graduate students, faculty members and New Haven intellectuals decided to buck the odds. They formed an Independent Political Action Committee (IPAC) to run a "peace candidate" against Giaimo. After being turned down by at least one prospective candidate, the group found its man in Cook, a 32-year-old assistant professor whose opposition to the war was total and outspoken.

Cook saw the war not as an isolated issue but as a symptom of the basic problem in American society. He said it was but one expression of the political powerlessness of the vast majority of the American people. A "New Left" thinker, he linked the war with poverty. Both, he said, show that politicians are not truly responsive to the needs and wishes of their constituents.

With a candidate and a few hundred dollars for a war chest, IPAC faced its first major decision. Was Cook to face Giaimo in a Democratic primary or in the general election in November? Connecticut's primary laws, the group soon discovered, are structured to make it all but impossible for an insurgent to challenge the nominee of the party machine. Even to get his name on a primary ballot, Cook would first have to receive 20 per cent of the votes at a party convention—in itself an unlikely event—and then within two weeks gain 2,000 signatures from registered Democrats and post a $1,500 bond.

To run as an independent in November, he would need only about half as many signatures, and they could come from any registered voter. No bond was required and no party professionals needed to pass on him. IPAC had virtually no choice: Cook would run as an independent under the label of a new party to be called the American Independent Movement (AIM).

The next step was to build a campaign organization. Not a single IPAC member had experience in practical politics, but all were ready to learn. A novice himself, Cook had done little public speaking outside Yale lecture halls. To head up this inexperienced but determined team, an outsider was called in from the South. Robert Zellner, a 27-year-old white man from Atlanta, had been a charter member of SNCC and had gained his campaign experience the hard way with the Mississippi Freedom Democratic Party.



Robert Cook

Since Cook was almost unknown to the 3rd District's quarter million voters, Zellner made it a first concern of the IPAC organization to get him on view. With the end of Yale classes last spring, Cook began campaigning ten to twelve hours a day, six to seven days a week. He took easily to shaking hands and seemed to enjoy talking with commuters, people on tenement streets, shoppers and workers.

At plants he told union members that high corporate profits are causing inflation. Money going for arms, he said, should be used instead to create permanent jobs. As the summer wore on, there were labor disputes and one wildcat strike in the district. In each case, Cook was at the scene to investigate and to take a stand on the issues involved. To advise Cook on labor matters, assistant campaign manager Jack Osborne, a former state AFL-CIO staff worker, was usually close at hand. Osborne's contacts with local unionists won Cook a hearing at many plants.

When not guiding Cook through the district's plants, Osborne was busy gathering signatures for the petition to put Cook's name on the ballot. By mid-August he and his volunteers had gathered some 2,000 names, more than twice as many as were needed.

Now that college has reopened, Cook must spend the bulk of two days a week on class preparation and teaching. On the other five days and every evening he campaigns even harder than during the summer. Cook's message to voters everywhere in the district is simple and direct. There is something wrong with "the system," he keeps saying. "Our politicians come to us every election, and then disappear. . . . They forget that they work for us." He consistently asks voters whether they have been consulted about the war, about conditions in their neighborhoods, on their jobs, and in their schools.

His criticism of Giaimo is not that he is a bad Congressman but that he is a typical Congressman. Like many Representatives, he depends on party label and public apathy to win re-election. He seldom strays from the Administration camp, and when he does, it is to compromise a piece of forward-looking legislation. Cook supporters like to point out that Giaimo voted against a New England power project opposed by private power and coal interests, against the Appalachian Development Bill of 1964, and for the crippling Sisk Amendment to the Washington, D.C., Home Rule Bill of 1965.

Many voters tell Cook they are worried about the war, and even those who disagree with him are pleased that for once a candidate is bothering to find out first hand about people's problems. Cook's interest in labor matters is already paying small dividends. To no one's surprise, the state AFL-CIO council officially endorsed Giaimo, but it also strongly commended Cook on all but his Vietnamese stand. And Cook staffers say that many labor delegates have informally expressed "warm and generous support."

As the pace of the campaign accelerates, Zellner's role as coordinator of all activities is becoming increasingly important. From Cook for Congress headquarters, a shabby second-story office in downtown New Haven, he oversees the work of volunteers throughout the district, as well as the preparation and distribution of campaign materials, ranging from balloons, bumper stickers and buttons to a slick biweekly newsletter, numerous fliers and occasional policy statements.

To reach the voters whom Cook cannot see personally, Zellner has organized his workers down to the ward level. A nucleus of thirty full-time personnel (only five receive even subsistence salaries) staffs seven offices, two in New Haven and five in surrounding towns. Each office takes charge of two or three towns and assigns volunteers to specific wards. "By the time of the election," says Zellner, "we will have contacted every voter in the district."

Nearly 2,000 persons have done part-time work for Cook, and in the final weeks as many as 1,000 may be canvassing. All the volunteers are ordinary citizens who have never before been involved in a political campaign. Most full timers are housewives. Yale, which is far from being a center of activism, figures in a relatively minor way. Only a few faculty members give time to the campaign, and fewer than 150 students are doing any canvassing or office work.

One of the few Yale people deeply involved in the campaign is Robert Gelbach, a 25-year-old graduate student in political science who acts as Cook's chief fund raiser. Money had been thought a stumbling block, but funds have been raised with surprisingly little effort. By October, the campaign had raised and spent nearly $20,000, and Gelbach "fully expects" to raise an equal amount before the election. He is "now convinced that finding funds is not the major obstacle for an independent campaign."

Money has come from a variety of sources. Several individuals have given large sums, including an anonymous $2,500 matching gift. A rally for Northeastern "peace candidates" at Powder Hill, Conn., in August raised $1,000 for Cook's coffers, and a September benefit concert by Harry Belafonte in New Haven brought $4,000. Support has also come from outside peace and civil rights groups, including Massachusetts PAX which donated $2,500 and the National Committee for a New Politics which gave $1,000. The bulk of contributions, however, have been small ($5 to $25) donations solicited from ordinary citizens at benefit parties and through the mails. One letter asking for 10c a day for the duration of the campaign—about $10 total—drew $100 to $120 a day for more than three weeks.

A large portion of the fund is being reserved for billboards, newspaper advertisements and radio and television spot coverage. Five billboards, showing the candidate in nine characteristic poses against the blue field of a simplified American flag, are seen daily by commuters moving in and out of New Haven. Cook staffers have been disappointed with the coverage given their policy statements by New Haven's morning and evening Republican papers. To publicize their candidate's key positions, they are contracting for several issue-oriented ads.

In addition, a large number of radio spots and thirty television spots, varying in length from ten seconds to a minute, are being planned for the last phase of the campaign. Both types will give some attention to issues, but time limitations dictate that they must be largely image building. And all commitments for advertising are necessarily contingent on funds.

What IPAC cannot buy are debates with Giaimo. A Hartford TV station sent out invitations to all three candidates in August before Cook was officially on the ballot. Cook and both regular party nominees accepted, and the debate took place as scheduled on Sunday, October 9. It is unlikely, however, that many 3rd District voters saw the debate, since reception of Hartford-TV is poor on most New Haven sets. Those who did tune in saw a provoked Giaimo heatedly defending himself against Cook, with Salmona figuring only slightly in the verbal exchanges. Since then, Giaimo has declined all offers to debate Cook on the air or at public meetings.

Until recently, Giaimo had publicly ignored Cook altogether. But at a local press conference on October 3, he broke his silence. Cook, he admitted, seemed to have a better grasp of the issues (he "had done his homework") than the Republican. But he thought Cook should explain his past and his "associations." For instance, Cook had once said at a Wesleyan symposium that America was fighting on the wrong side in Vietnam. Did this statement mean, Giaimo wondered in the manner of Nixon, that "he would have us fighting for the Communists"? AIM had received money from SNCC and CORE. "What was Cook's connection wtih Stokey [sic] Carmichael and black power?" Whether this play for backlash and super-patriot votes was a passing thrust or the beginning of a concerted drive remains to be seen. What is certain is that Giaimo has recognized Cook's challenge.

At the same press conference, Giaimo patronizingly dismissed Salmona, who says he is waging "a Crusade Against Arrogance," as an "old friend" ignorant of the issues and inept at sloganeering. Apparently the Congressman sees no danger from Salmona, and he is probably right. The Republican Party is almost impotent in New Haven, and by any standard Salmona is an uninspiring candidate. A graying former TV newscaster who registered as a Republican only two days before the party convention, he describes himself as a "liberal," but admits that he voted for Goldwater "because of his Vietnamese policy." He advocates "peace in Vietnam through military strength" and promises a fact-finding trip to Vietnam if elected—an apparent echo of Ike's 1952 promise to visit Korea. He has made few appearances in the district and has had little publicity.

Surprisingly, Cook supporters say that suburban Republicans, disappointed with Salmona's slack campaign and "hard-line" stand, might turn to Cook. AIM people report that many normally Republican voters express support during Cook's handshaking tours of commuter trains. Running under an independent label makes it easier for him to attract such Republicans, and also, of course, the 56 per cent of voters who register as independents.

Reliable predictions are difficult to come by. Giaimo says only that he will win, and Salmona says nothing at all. Cook sometimes tells an audience that he intends to surpass Salmona and is optimistic about taking Giaimo's seat. His optimism, however, may be at least partly designed to counter the well-known tendency of voters sympathetic to a third-party candidate to defect at the ballot box because of a fear of "throwing away" their vote. It is conceivable that Cook might draw more votes than Salmona but unlikely that he can do much better than that.

Whatever the outcome in November, IPAC will continue. As an independent community force, it will seek to encourage major parties to nominate forward-looking candidates, and as far as funds permit, to offer independent candidates when the major parties fail to respond. This year, in a mixed Negro and Italian state assembly district, it is sponsoring Fred Harris, a Negro, who is running on a program that stresses the identity of problems and needs in black and white ghettos. The Harris campaign has generated considerable local enthusiasm and won the wholehearted support of a dozen student radicals who disapprove of the traditional campaign techniques (handshaking tours, billboards, television spots) used by Cook's organization. Neighborhood campaigns for local office, like the one Harris is running, doubtless have a greater potential, both in terms of voter education and of actual victory, than does a Congressional campaign.

The long-term hopes of IPAC to reform 3rd District politics probably lie in similar intensive local efforts. For the present, however, much depends on Cook's showing. If he can draw an impressive share (say, 20 to 30 per cent) of the vote, as some observers think possible, IPAC will be off to a good start. Otherwise, it will probably encounter serious difficulties.

50 DINOSAURS

(Restyling the States)

Constitutions: The Politics of Power

HAROLD NORRIS

Mr. Norris, professor of constitutional and criminal law at the Detroit College of Law, was a delegate to Michigan's recent constitutional convention. He is the author of Mr. Justice Murphy and the Bill of Rights (Oceana).

On April 4, 1967, the state of New York will convene its first constitutional convention since 1938. Early on the morning of September 29, Howard J. Samuels was on the platform of the White Plains railroad station, stopping commuters to tell them that he was running for delegate to the convention and to ask for their votes. As The New York Times reported next day: "He confirmed what he already suspected; people seemed to know little about the convention and to care less."

Yet it is not an overstatement to say that the serviceability and longevity of the American federal system is at stake in the growing number of state constitutional conventions. According to the National Municipal League, constitutional revision is, or recently has been, the subject of official action in approximately half the states. While more than 180 such conventions have been held in America since Massachusetts convened the first one in 1779, at no time in the nation's history has the basic law of the states been under such widespread systematic scrutiny.

The immediate stimulus for all this activity has been the required revision of legislative articles to conform with federal court decisions on patterns of representation—the so-called "one-man-one-vote" decisions. A more basic impetus is the frequent inability of state and local governments to deal with problems as fast as contemporary society produces them.

Nevertheless, the question may be put: are the voters of the several states ready to consider the choices inherent in constitutional conventions? Are the New York voters? Candidate Samuels' experience, confirmed by seasoned political observers, strongly suggests that they are not. The intellectuals of the nation have for the most part written off state government as a meaningful target for their analysis and urgings. Indeed, the national experience with state constitutional conventions is that the electorate does not adequately understand its sovereign role of constitution making. In Michigan, for example, less than 25 per cent of the voters turned out to select the 144 delegates who were to write Michigan's fundamental law. Urban Democrats were more delinquent than the Republicans, and in a state where allegiance to the two major parties is about even, the Republicans won ninety-nine delegates to the Democrats' forty-five. While malapportionment of the convention was itself a factor, lack of awareness, concern and action was clearly evident and particularly in areas with the greatest problems and therefore the greatest stake. The 2-to-1 Republican advantage preordained the conservative constitution eventually produced. Michigan's experience is not unusual, and whether the people of New York have developed a more appropriate means to make known their sovereign will remains to be seen.

Emphasis on constitutional change has brought to light a new though not generally recognized stage in American politics and in the political education of the American people. While the voter has an improved understanding of issues, he has generally less insight into power. He may be better informed about factors on the state level dealing with education, highways, taxation, civil rights, conservation, recreation, crime, pollution. He is much less aware of and sensitive to the more fundamental political question of who has the power, governmentally and factually, to deal with these issues. The voter and the student as well are confused by the echelons of government: on the vertical level, legislative, executive and judicial; and on the horizontal level, federal, state, county and municipal. In short, it is easier for the voter to sense the issue than to perceive the power behind that issue, or to hold that power accountable.

A constitution is a power document; it is a charter of power. Fundamental to a constitution is the governmental power it arranges and the political power it reflects. A state constitution, deriving its character as a direct act of sovereignty—only the people of a state by direct vote can ordain and establish a constitution—is authority over authority. It states who shall do it.

But it is harder for people to get excited about the question of power (who shall do it?) than about issues and program (what shall be done?). Power has a greater reach into the future; program is more immediate. It takes more political insight and vision to understand power than program. To enlarge that insight and vision about power requires qualitatively improved political education. With more constitution making in the states, including the precedent making state of New York, a national as well as state effort is needed. People, power, program and politics, pocketbook politics, have to be related in a new and more understandable way. Chief Justice Marshall's historic injunction is applicable here: "We must remember, it is a constitution we are expounding," a charter of government in which merge yesterday and tomorrow, principle and practice, means and ends. Making a constitution is the supreme act of government.

State government is on trial. Technological, population, financial, human relations and other problems abound. In the next ten years, New York, Michigan and the nation will change more than they did in the last fifty. Government must be able to respond sensitively and precisely. Genuine representation, and the clear-cut accountability of those with power, will help bring about the prompt and peaceful change necessary to democratic growth and survival. Indeed, it must be asked: what is the function of state government in this period of American history? The Tenth Amendment of the federal Constitution says: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." But within that reserved power, what is the state's purpose? It can deal with matters that are too big for a city and too local for the nation. This range of concern may not, with advancing technology, justify "state" government forever, but for today the state must assume responsibility for planning and locating state public schools and highways—the two largest items in every state's budget—creating recreational facilities, cleaning up rivers, promoting welfare services and civil rights, establishing justice, taxing fairly, adequately and responsibly.

These objectives require insight into power; they mean that the sovereign people of New York (or any other state) will have to think about how to define state power in their constitution. What are the main power questions?

The one that dominates, animates and permeates all others at state constitutional conventions is apportionment. James Madison noted during the convention that founded this nation: "The great difficulty lies in the affair of representation; and if this could be adjusted all others would be surmountable." The pattern or formula of apportionment will decide who holds the legislative power in the state and can thus check and balance the governor and the courts. How shall the legislative representatives be related to the voters? How much variation in population, size and shape of assembly and senatorial districts shall be permitted? Shall districts follow county lines? Shall the legislature apportion itself or shall that be the duty of some other group? Prior to the U.S. Supreme Court rulings, which decreed a population standard for both houses, the New York legislature drew only the senate district lines. In all counties entitled to more than one assemblyman, the county board of supervisors (or, in New York City, the City Council), drew the assembly lines.

Michigan's experience is relevant. The courts have invalidated the 1962 convention's apportionment formula and caused the adoption of the Austin-Kleiner district plan which permits only 1 per cent variation in the senate and 3 per cent variation in the house. However, a charge of gerrymandering has been made against the plan.

The Michigan constitution set up an apportionment commission of eight members outside the legislature, composed of four Democrats and four Republicans, whose plans were subject to state supreme court review. The members of the commission have consistently split according to party lines, and the impasse persists without immediate remedy. New York could profit by this experience and designate the highest election official in the state, or a nonpartisan commission composed of an odd number of members, subject to judicial review. Insulating the apportionment job from the legislature and from partisanship appears wise. Few legislators will apportion themselves out of a job.

The judicial power is likewise strategic. Prof. Jack Weinstein of Columbia Law School has urged a state-financed court system for New York to achieve a "uniform equal system of justice." In this respect, Michigan has adopted the Dean Roscoe Pound conception of "one court of justice for the state" divided into the supreme court, court of appeals and subordinate courts. This organization does permit greater supervisory control over the bench in the public interest.

Mayor Lindsay of New York City has vigorously proposed a "local option merit system" of judicial selection. He urges that the mayor be empowered to select local judicial officers from a list prepared by a judicial committee. This is merely a variation of the "Missouri Plan" advocated across the nation by the American Bar Association. Michigan's Republicans couldn't agree on the "Missouri Plan" but they did agree on removing from the governor the appointment power to fill judicial vacancies. They were determined not to let another Soapy Williams appoint judges for twelve years, but by taking this power away they also prevented Republican George Romney from appointing a large number of Republicans.

The allocation of power between state and local governments will need careful definition. Home rule and fiscal matters—taxation, expenditures, the budget—often conflict. The real behind-the-scenes power struggle on home rule is between the urban interests and the rural legislators who control the state capitols over who shall tax, who shall receive and how much. The big cities, New York or Detroit, with budgets equal to that of the state itself, must go cap in hand to the state capitol to secure funds and authority to meet their multiplying problems. But the rural representatives are most aware of the cities as sources of revenue, which fact, coupled with their legislative power, has led to rural indifference toward urban concerns. The state is the sovereign power and legally all of the sixty-two cities, 931 towns and 554 villages within New York are agents of the state. But as Frank Adams put it, "why should a resident of Niagara Falls have a determining voice on how much New York City should charge for a subway ride?"

One solution tendered by students of the problem is that cities be delegated power to legislate locally on all matters not specifically excluded in home-rule laws. However, what would be within and without city powers would still be a question. The problem is to grant cities power to meet their problems and yet preserve the power of the state to intervene to prevent misconduct. Governor Roosevelt's action during the Jimmy Walker administration is an example of the occasionally needed state action.

Constitutional conventions have generally not altered basically the Bill of Rights in the states. However, New York may consider eliminating literacy in English as a voting requirement, lowering the voting age to 18 and restricting wire tapping. It may also wish to create in the constitution a civil rights commission, as Michigan has done, but with more explicit jurisdiction over housing. However, the dominant Bill of Rights issue in the New York convention will be church-state relations, particularly state aid to parochial schools. Pressure against separation of church and state is building up. Federal programs to aid education and fight poverty have contained provisions aiding religious institutions. Michigan passed an auxiliary services act, now being contested, that has national portent. New York Catholic spokesmen are vigorous and candid. J. Eugene McMahon of the Buffalo Catholic Charities said he hoped the convention would "cut through shibboleths of separation and frozen doctrinaire positions on church and state to see and acknowledge the child who is to be served and educated." Dean Mulligan of Fordham Law School called Article 11, Section 3 "an anachronism of the know-nothing era." That provision reads:

> Neither the state nor any subdivision thereof shall use its property or credit or any public money . . . directly or indirectly, in aid or maintenance . . . of any school or institution of learning wholly or in part under the control or direction of any religious denomination.

If this provision is retained in New York, it will be a victory for those who want to protect religious freedom by keeping church and state separate. The national trend and Michigan's experience does not augur well for those who would confine the public treasury to public schools.

In a constitution, every sentence is important. Each line has relevance to the citizen's rights, liberty, property and power. Hence, no less significant than proposals on apportionment, the judiciary, taxation, home rule and church-state are a host of others, including, in New York, reorganization of the executive power over 133 state agencies that now report to the governor, fiscal and budget reform, and such specific matters as education, elections, amendment and revision, local government.

The overriding problem in state constitution making is that of creating a mechanism of government that is responsive and responsible to the people's sovereign power. Responsiveness and responsibility can be attained only when power is both perceptible and accountable. Responsiveness and responsibility must also be reciprocal—between the governors and the governed. They can be greatly increased during the preparation for, and conduct and ratification of, a state constitution. The holding of such a convention is the occasion for converting the entire state into a vast classroom. Exclusive reliance upon a state preparatory commission for information and leadership is a mistake. Every school, classroom, student; every publication, foundation, community organization, business and trade union can be drawn into the political process of writing a constitution. There is no more democratic act. New York can capitalize on the experience of other states such as Michigan and influence the shape of self-government and federalism in the nation for a generation.

Legislatures: The 100-Year Lag

DAVID H. BEETLE

Mr. Beetle is a special correspondent for the Gannett Newspapers at Albany. He is the author of The New York Citizen (Taplinger).

"State Legislatures may be our most extreme example of institutional lag. . . . In their formal qualities they are largely 19th-century organizations, and they must, or should, address themselves to 20th-century problems." Faced with this preamble by Alexander Heard, Vanderbilt University chancellor and political scholar, the American Assembly's 1966 Arden House Conference on State Legislatures (now spawning more than a dozen regional conferences across the nation) had no doubt about the seriousness of the problem.

The state law-making (or buck-passing) bodies appear to be in a period of eclipse. Congress and the federal agencies are using aid programs (there are now more than 250 of them) to take over decision making in so many areas where the states were once sovereign that state legislatures run the risk of becoming mostly employment agencies for clerks, doorkeepers and lawyers.

But just as the citizenry moved at the last moment to save the whooping crane from oblivion, groups have sprung up to see what can be done to get legislatures to adapt and survive. A recent conference held by the National Municipal League simply to coordinate these efforts brought out no less than nine national agencies. Collectively, they have nearly $4 million to spend on the cause within the next two or three years. Much of it is Ford and Carnegie money.

Even without the inroads of federal aid, the action comes none too soon. James Q. Wilson, a Harvard political science professor, has been moved by the flow of indictments following from the Massachusetts Crime Commission investigations to write an article in a recent Freedom House quarterly: "Corruption—the Shame of the States." Herein he observes that opportunities for boodle, lack of public attention from newspapers and civic groups (which are oriented toward national policies on the one hand, and to city problems on the other) and the continuance of a political ethos that places high value on "favors, personal loyalty and private gain," has visited on states evils that in the 19th century dominated cities.

The captain of this new reform movement is Jesse Unruh, the square-jawed, energetic Speaker of the California Assembly, who now heads the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders. The odds are getting to be ten to one that he'll be on hand wherever and whenever modernization of state legislatures is discussed nationally. One feels that he has found an outlet for energies which the facts of California politics have temporarily diverted from his quest for the governorship. It might be recalled here that in an earlier day, Alfred E. Smith, though an able New York assemblyman, made no impression on the assembly's antediluvian procedures, but went on, as governor, to reorganize the executive branch. A number of other states copied the New York reorganization. For lack of any parallel movement in the law-making branch, legislatures have fallen back on saying "yes" to the governor or—and this happens less often—opposing him with what few facts (if any) they are equipped to muster.

To give Unruh credit, he did his work at home before setting forth to convert the heathen. Earlier, to be sure, Californians had given him a better than usual base on which to build. If you go to Sacramento today you will find the assembly teeming with foundation interns—bright young economists, political scientists and public administration aides, busy with depth research. You'll find a well-preserved system for analyzing the governor's budget, a sort of junior Library of Congress staff to answer legislators' queries regardless of party, and a merit civil service phalanx of legislative counsel.

The legislators themselves number only 120 (a low but efficient total for so populous a state). They have secretary-staffed offices both at home and in the capitol, an administrative assistant and, if committee chairmen, often a college-trained specialist. The legislators get $6,000 salary, which sets no record in itself, but is supplemented by generous expense money and piece-work stipends for interim committee attendance. It is no paradise, but if all legislatures were as good as California's the current save-the-species drive wouldn't be so urgent.

The origins of this drive aren't entirely clear. Certainly the Supreme Court decision mandating one-man-one-vote representation played a role—if only because it made legislatures seem salvageable. Had they continued to be dominated by rural cliques, the urban and suburban voters might have entirely forgotten the state house in their "march on Washington." Indeed, the cities, fearing that one-man-one-vote favors the suburbs, are almost doing that.

One of the most promising efforts toward legislative reform has been the creation of the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures, a two-year-old idea that seems to have emerged out of the Ford Company's "community relations" program, a euphemism, perhaps, for "the Ford lobby." One may mistrust lobbyists, but it's a fact that of all people they are the ones most appalled by legislative goings on. This isn't as curious as it seems. Lobbyists tend to believe thoroughly (even though blindly) in the righteousness of their cause. They like to think no sensibly run legislature would give them a hard time. Moreover, citizens—well, perhaps, the League of Women Voters excepted—tend to become interested in legislation only when taxes go up. But to lobbyists, the legislature—what it does and how it operates—is bread and butter. It's a rare citizen who knows one legislator well. What he knows, he may not like, but he still doesn't see legislative ineptness as epidemic. A lobbyist for a national organization—especially one who operates regionally—begins to get the broad picture.

The Citizens Conference, supported by Ford, Carnegie and such other funds as it can get, operates out of Kansas City, Mo., with former Kansas Governor John Anderson, Jr., as a working (half-time) board president. Its staff numbers about ten and includes George Morgan, a former lawyer-legislator from Missouri.

The organization started with the conviction that legislatures can no more reform themselves meaningfully without citizen committees than most of them could reapportion themselves without orders from the courts. Its first approach might be called "feminine": It made sure folks knew that it existed and waited for suitors to call. A few did: Illinois, Washington, Utah, Indiana, one or two others. By now it is beginning to take the initiative. The first result has been a Montana committee. By 1967, Governor Anderson hopes to have had an impact on sixteen states.

Another parallel effort is being made by the National Municipal League, which though interested in states, is historically saddled with "municipal" in its name. This year, using Ford Foundation money, it has moved state legislative reform to first priority. The league channeled funds to the American Assembly, which last spring brought to Columbia University's Arden House in the Hudson Highlands some seventy-six knowledgeable and concerned citizens to discuss legislative matters. After three days they pounded out a 6-page manifesto that tells legislatures the directions in which they ought to be moving. Regional assemblies to follow from this general conference will refine the recommendations to fit specific states.

From another quarter, the Eagleton Institute of Politics at Rutgers used foundation funds last summer to bring together one or two reform-minded younger legislators from each of eighteen industrial states for a weeklong seminar in Miami. (Unruh was on the faculty, is on the board of the Citizens Conference, and was a conferee at Arden House.) Working with the Unruh-headed National Conference, the Rutgers group has set up a service center to answer legislative inquiries. For a fee, it will come into a state, study it and map out needed legislative reforms. New Jersey, Maryland and Rhode Island are the first customers.

There are other efforts. The long-time (but not always spectacularly successful) work of the National Legislative Conference, a Council of State Governments affiliate, continues. Through the years it has encouraged what turned out to be the painfully slow build-up of legislative services: bill drafting, research, fiscal analysis of state budgets. Unruh has been giving the Legislative Leaders group a reform twist. A new association for rank-and-file legislative members has been formed. The American Political Science Association has been given a $1,250,000 grant to spend on legislative reform—part of it to set up model orientation programs for new legislators in five states (the turnover averages about one-third each session). The League of Women Voters is concentrating on legislative operations in seventeen states. The Committee on Economic Development, which recently got out a chilling blast on municipal government, is shifting its attention to the states.

Most of the reformers think that what the patient needs—in most places anyway—is a quick transfusion of cash. (The median operations budget is now around $2 million.) They think legislators should get better pay. (New Hampshire is rock bottom at what amounts to $1.50 a day.) They would give them secretarial services, offices (some have only a desk), adequate research facilities, larger bill-drafting staffs, and sources for campaign funds better than well-heeled lobbyists.

They would consolidate committees (the two Mississippi houses have together a total of ninety-six), cut down on the size of most houses (tiny New Hampshire has more than 400 members in its lower house) and remove limits on the length of sessions. Some think legislatures should meet the year around, as does New Jersey's—or, for that matter, city councils.

The Arden House group was particularly eager to remove various kinds of constitutional hobbles, many of which were imposed in the early 1800s when legislatures seemed to be getting out of hand. It felt that legislative responsibility would emerge from an increase in legislative power, though there was a vocal minority that would prefer to see the responsibility come first.

There is wide agreement that most of the other problems would clear up if legislatures began attracting citizens of quality who would stay with the job and build up tenure. But no one seems to know how to achieve this. The Arden House meeting, curiously, declined to bind legislators by ethical standards—full disclosure of financial interests, limits on lawyer-legislator practice, and such—which might deter able candidates from running. One could, of course, argue that really ethical candidates would not be handicapped by such strictures.

A basic issue is whether a state—at least a big one—should in these days of complex legislation continue to get along with part-time lawmakers. It is argued that part-time legislators provide a better cross-section of the community. Actually, if lawyers, insurance men and other self-employed persons were removed from the New York State Legislature, the rest could be crowded into a Volkswagen. It is contended that full-time legislators could more easily be pressured, since if they failed of re-election they would lose their livelihood. Many see part-time legislators with exceptionally adequate staffs as a compromise.

There is also the question of unicameralism—at least it's a question outside Nebraska, where in 1937 Sen. George Norris, shackled neither by the past nor by the fact that the new capitol had two freshly gleaming chambers, persuaded the state to merge its two houses into one. The Arden House conference (where Nebraska was not represented, by the way) waded into the unicameralism issue gingerly, despite the fact that one of its sponsors, the National Municipal League, has stuck with one house through six editions of its Model State Constitution. While the conferees weren't sure there was much wrong with unicameralism, they seemed to feel that if they came out for it strongly they would get branded as "eggheads" or "dreamers" and that their other recommendations would suffer.

Those who have recently been advocating unicameralism around the country get the impression that the man in the street is readier to accept it than the politicians. The difficulty is that in more than half the states there's no very practical way for the citizens, as distinguished from the politicians, to effect unicameralism even if they want it. In short, it faces the same obstacles that delayed reapportionment until the courts stepped in.

It seems to me that most groups pressing for legislative reform give too little attention to one of the root evils: rotten politics.

"Vigorous party organizations should be encouraged within a state and its legislature," the Arden House group agreed. "Well-organized majority and opposition parties contribute to effective and responsible legislative performance. Organization of the legislature should be on a partisan basis in two-party states and the majority party should elect all officers except the officers and leaders of the minority party."

This is a sort of Apostles' Creed for both politicians and political scientists, and its weakness is not that it is completely untrue but that it leaves so much unsaid.

Professor Wilson in his article on legislative corruption has this to say:

> One can be reasonably confident that much the same results could be produced by similar commissions in many other states, particularly industrial states of the Northeast such as Pennsylvania, Ohio, and the like. Many of these states would never have been described as "pure" by Lord Bryce at any stage of their history (he singled out New York and Pennsylvania as having legislatures that were "confessedly among the worst"); about all that seems to have happened in the last fifty years is that, on the whole, their governors have become more respectable and their political parties have become more disorganized, thereby transforming what once was well-organized machine-like corruption into disorganized, free-lance corruption.

Simply to have "a well-organized majority and opposition parties" (to use the Arden House phrase) is not enough. It depends on what they are organized for. The New York State Republicans have been second to none in their praise for the virtues of "party responsibility," but one can wonder at the result when for eight years this responsibility led to the door of a state chairman who has since been found guilty of bribery to obtain liquor licenses.

Most Nebraska political scientists feel that George Norris overshot the mark when he banned partisanship in the one-house legislature. This particular feature of the Nebraska legislative set-up is something of a well-kept secret. Thus it's no trick at all to find people who know that Nebraska's legislature has only one house, but the equally unique circumstance that in a two-party state the legislature, elected without regard to party, has no minority or majority leader, is seldom noised around.

"That silence is the worst thing about it," may be a typical political scientist's reaction to this second Nebraska innovation, but it is not the whole answer to Senator Norris. He argued: (a) that political parties are mostly interested in jobs and favors; (b) that if legislators are elected under the banner of the major national parties, they often win or lose on national rather than state issues.

"If I had a Democratic legislature," says Gov. Frank B. Morrison, a Nebraska Democrat, "it might pass something because I proposed it. If I had a Republican legislature, it might kill something for the same reason. Neither is good. With a nonpartisan legislature, my proposals are more likely to get considered on their merits."

In 1935, Thomas C. Desmond, a veteran member of the New York State Senate from Newburgh, argued in an article, "Those Dinosaurs, the State Legislatures," that party organization operated in such a way in his state that good men were discouraged from running for the legislature because, when elected, they found themselves simply voting as they were told. There is a striking conformity between this view and the observation two summers ago by Mrs. Fern Hubbard Orme, a Nebraska legislator, who said: "I'm sure if I had a majority leader I wouldn't do half as much as I do now. He would be calling the boys in and telling them what to do. From what I've heard of other legislatures there's a lot of goofing off."

Other states may not want to follow Nebraska's nonpartisanship, but the gap between a truly "responsible party" and one that is simply "well organized" is too wide to be ignored. Parties can be more interested in jobs or favors than in pushing sound government. They can be more interested in getting a governor nominated for President than in serving the state. Minorities can be alert critics or they can "sell out."

Unless the reformers come to grips with this situation (the Arden House group coped with it only peripherally when it urged new methods of financing campaigns), encouraging legislators to spend more money on salaries, office space, research, bill drafting and such will do no more than expand the boodle. New York's legislature in the two years, 1964 and 1965, cost $23.3 million. That is $4 million above the sum for California and $20 million above the national average, but it is difficult to find a major legislative area in which New York excels. There is no evidence that successive salary boosts in recent years have raised the caliber of men attracted to the job. A few New York legislators stand out like skyscrapers in Moscow—but a few always have.

The New York legislators—and in this they are probably typical—complain that a legislative image is bound to be bad because legislators are referees, constantly making compromises among warring groups in the community. And nobody likes "the ump." The fact is that too often legislatures compromise between warring groups when they ought to be figuring out who's right and who's wrong and then taking decisive action. For nearly two centuries—or until 1966—the New York legislature "compromised" on the divorce issue by doing nothing.

A really good umpire gets respect, if not love. Legislatures, indeed, seem to work overtime figuring out ways to get a bad image, yet at the same time "image" seems to be their perennial concern. It was placed early on the 1964 agenda of the National Conference of Legislative Leaders. The delegates discussed it at a four-day migratory convention that touched down at Reno, Carson City, Lake Tahoe and Las Vegas—locales that didn't appreciably improve its image.

The discussion was led by the then New York speaker, Joseph Carlino (R., Nassau) who, when he failed reelection in the Johnson landslide, turned up in 1966 as a race-track lobbyist. He took the job within the two-year waiting period required by the state's new ethics code for legislators who turn lobbyists, but the assembly ethics committee (without calling in its two ex officio advisers, the State Bar Association head and a law school dean) decided that the code was passed too late to apply to Carlino. The ex-speaker's friends argued that he was showing unusual integrity when he even bothered to ask for the committee's opinion, but it's hard to believe that the total incident helped the legislative image much.

In the same year, the New York assembly devoted a half-hour to eulogizing a former assemblyman who died in a New York City hospital after being convicted of conspiring to bribe a detective. No one would argue over a conventional resolution of respect, but the average citizen may have had trouble believing his ears when he heard that the legislature gained stature by this man's presence.

As for the National Conference of Legislative Leaders (to show what its new president, Speaker Unruh, has inherited), it finished up that trip in New Orleans, where its members were guests at a huge reception put on by the air lines, took a Mississippi River boat ride at the invitation of the brewing industry (it was decided at the last minute that something stronger than beer would also be served), and arranged that Southern Bell Telephone would handle its press room.

The way to meaningful legislative reform looks long and tortuous. The premise of the Citizens Conference on State Legislatures—that nothing much will happen unless civic-minded citizens get interested and active—is the only prediction certain to come true.

JUNKETS TO APARTHEID

AMERICA'S PRESS ON SAFARI

FRANCIS POLLOCK

Mr. Pollock spent three years in Africa working for the United States Government.

The United States is becoming more and more involved in the destiny of South Africa. In that unhappy country, where 3 million whites rule 14 million nonwhites—exploiting their labor and denying their right of self-determination—American investment continues to mount, continues to support in no small way a nation which almost certainly must face a painful day of reckoning.

Here in the United States, South Africa's official spokesmen have been wooing American opinion on the basis of five contentions which have proved dramatically effective, though there is considerable reason to question their accuracy:

¶ That South Africa is a bulwark against communism.

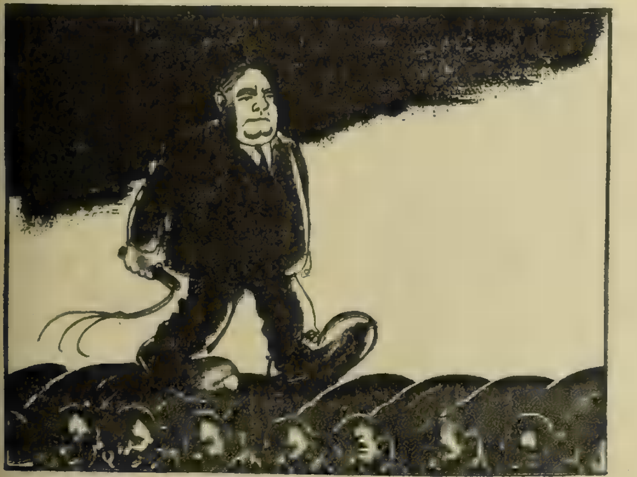
¶ It has a stable government, and a lucrative, fully protected investment climate.

¶ It is Western civilization's staunchest defender on the continent.

¶ The great Bantu migrations into its territory occurred only after the whites had settled South Africa.

¶ The whites are properly providing for the well-being of the blacks through the policy of separate development.

At the heart of South Africa's official propaganda activities is the South African Information Service (SAIS). It distributes magazines, subsidizes books, makes available radio and television tapes, produces travel films and attempts constantly to improve its image in the American press. One of the ways by which it attempts to solicit approval is to offer our journalists free trips to South Africa. Fifteen such writers were selected to take an expenses-paid tour of South Africa in 1965; fourteen more made the trip this year at a reported cost to the South African Government of $35,000. That is slightly less than the cost of six full-page advertisements in The New York Times, a form of propaganda also pursued by SAIS. Such ads, of course, must bear the imprint required by the Justice Department; the glowing testimonials of journalists do not.



Franklin, London Daily Mirror: Ben Roth

"I will walk further along the road set by Hendrik Verwoerd."—Vorster

A few samples of articles written in conjunction with the tours indicate what returns South Africa gets on its hospitality.

Ed Fitzhugh, editor of the Phoenix Gazette, wrote at least fourteen articles for his paper, the last of which was headlined: "Bantus, Whites Both Sold On Race Policy." Mr. Fitzhugh quoted one African who, he wrote, "is typical of many blacks." According to the account, the African piously declared: "I think I am better off under the government here than I would be if the government were all black, as in the north. I do not want to change."

Thomas Waring, editor of the Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier, made the trip last year. So too in 1966 did R. C. Hoiles, an ardent Goldwater supporter, and the publisher of the extreme right-wing Freedom Newspapers.

Brig. Gen. Frank Howley (Ret.), former vice president of New York University, has as yet written little as a result of his South African tour, but his secretary says that he intends to do so. In 1955, the General produced a lengthy defense of the Chiang Kai-shek government for the Hearst newspapers. Much as South Africa is trying to convince Americans that it is the staunchest anti-Communist nation in Africa, General Howley wrote eleven years ago that Nationalist China was the key anti-Communist nation of Asia. "If we Americans now allow Chiang Kai-shek's troops—our allies—to be eliminated . . . we won't have a friend left in Asia. All of Asia, I am convinced, would go Communist."

George N. Crocker writes for the San Francisco Examiner. Among other things in his African series, he pictured black Africans as actors in a comic opera, who owe whatever progress they have made solely to the white man. About an Organization of African Unity meeting in Addis Ababa, he wrote: "In the name of peace, they [are planning] to contrive fresh mischief against peaceful Rhodesia."

And in an article from Johannesburg headlined, "South African Boom: Blacks Want In," he picked up where General Howley left off with the Nationalist Chinese:

> More importantly, the South Africans are anti-Communist and loyally pro-West. They are the most reliable opposition to communism on the African continent and to the outflanking of Europe, which is known to be a major objective of both the Russian and Chinese apparati of the world Communist conspiracy.

It appears that in the past there has been an occasional fly in the junket. Joseph Lelyveld, the New York Times correspondent who was recently forced to leave South Africa, writes in a letter:

> Most ordinary American journalists whom it brings out "double-cross" it by writing nasty things. So it concentrates now on right wingers. (Recently it toured a > bunch of journalists from what was described here as a "cross-section of right-wing American newspapers.") At the moment, William J. Simpson, head of the Citizens Council of America, of Jackson, Miss., is getting the tour. . . .

H. Louwrens Buurmans, deputy director of SAIS in New York, also describes the 1966 group as being "more representative."

On the whole, though, South Africa has reason to be pleased with its journalistic tourism, particularly since the five elements of South African propaganda were repeated over and over in the subsequent stories—and repeated by ostensibly responsible journalists, who gave little or no indication of how or by whom these "observation tours" were financed.

On the other hand, South African officials are distinctly chilly toward newsmen and scholars who the country feels would not present its case to the American public. Mr. Lelyveld's experience is an appropriate example. Without giving a reason, the South African Government informed him in mid-April that his visa would not be renewed when it expired on April 28.

The adventures of Henry Morgenthau III, a producer at WGBH-TV, Boston, are also instructive. In May, 1964, National Educational Television commissioned him to do a film on South Africa. SAIS in New York led him to believe that if he were willing to make his picture in the Transkei (the first of South Africa's Bantu homelands), there would be little trouble in procuring a visa. He agreed, but after a three-month wait, received a one-sentence letter, informing him that his visa application had been rejected, and a State Department appeal to the South African ambassador was unavailing.

Determined, nevertheless, to make the film, Mr. Morgenthau set up a corporation in the names of a Canadian and a Briton, arranged a tie-in with an educational television station in the South, and in their names sent a letter to SAIS on corporation stationery, explaining that the people in the American South would be interested in a film on South Africa, to be done by the corporation's production team. The permission came with no difficulty.

In the meantime, Morgenthau located a black South African student here who was willing to go home and shoot some film. The Canadian and Briton were sent with instructions to film anything the government would permit; the South African went to get shots secretly. After five months of work, he presented himself to South African customs with rolls of film in packages marked "Zulu beads" and "Christmas gifts." He got them through, reached America safely and plans to stay here permanently.

From both sets of films, Morgenthau produced South African Essay. At SAIS in New York he is dismissed as a Communist sympathizer.

A striking instance of the support South Africa receives in some segments of the American press is the reaction to the Carnegie Endowment's study, "Apartheid and the United Nations—Collective Measures." One of the most thorough published analyses of the subject, the study includes an appendix which considers the logistics of possible military measures against South Africa. Like a spark in gasoline, it touched off a violent reaction in the conservative press.

Vernon McKay, one of the authors of the Carnegie monograph, outlined in a recent New Republic article at least four different "devil theories" invented by critics to explain who "really" originated the alleged battle plan. Supposedly, wrote Dr. McKay, those responsible for the study were the United Nations, the Council on Foreign Relations, the State Department or unnamed, "naive, 'liberalistic' elements who control and corrupt our foreign policy."

Some of the adverse reactions follow:

Barry Goldwater wrote in his column of August 8, 1965: "If [the Carnegie Endowment thinks] the separation of

In the last two years, the following journalists have traveled to South Africa on tours sponsored by SAIS:

1965

Jeanne Bellamy, Miami Herald.
Jack Cowie, Columbus (Ohio) Dispatch.
Devin Garrity, Devin-Adair Co., New York.
Mr. and Mrs. Henry Holzer, Verdict Magazine, New York.
Brig. Gen. Frank Howley, U.S.A. (Ret.), former vice president of NYU and author.
Richard Laney, Salt Lake City Deseret News.
Edwin McDowell, Phoenix Republican.
Paul McKalip, Tucson Daily Citizen.
Walter Mickelson, New Ulm (Minn.) Daily Journal.
Charles Pierson, St. Louis Globe Democrat.
George Shannon, Shreveport (La.) Journal.
Mrs. Esther Van Wagoner Tufty, Tufty News Bureau, Washington.
Thomas R. Waring, Charleston (S. C.) News and Courier.
Dorothy Williams, Washington correspondent for newspapers in Iowa and elsewhere in U.S.

1966

Louis C. Harris, Augusta (Ga.) Herald.
John W. Jarrell, Omaha World-Herald, Washington Bureau.
Peter H. Binzen, Philadelphia Bulletin.
J. Warren McClure, Burlington Free Press, Vermont.
John O. Hjelle, Bismarck (N. D.) Tribune.
R. C. Hoiles, Freedom Newspapers, California.
Priscilla Buckley, National Review.
Edwin A. Fitzhugh, Phoenix Gazette.
Niel Heard, National Federation of Independent Business, Washington, D.C.
Col. L. Robert Castorr (Ret.), National Federation of Independent Business.
Edgar C. Bundy, Church League of America, Illinois.
B. J. McQuaid, New Hampshire Sunday News.
George N. Crocker, Sunday Examiner & News Call Bulletin, San Francisco.
E. K. Livermore, Sapulpa Herald, Oklahoma.

—Source: South African Info. Service races in South Africa is worth UN invasion, what must they think about Communist segregation?"

He then attacked the Endowment for not criticizing the policies of Russia and China.

The Montgomery Advertiser and Alabama Journal editorialized on August 7, 1965: South Africa is the greatest anti-Communist bastion in Africa. It is proposed [by the Carnegie report] that Uncle Sam join Nasser, Algeria, Ghana, Indonesia and Russia in destroying this anti-Communist ally. . . . This is all a vicious lunacy."

The Manchester (N. H.) Union-Leader devoted a front-page editorial to the subject (the editor of the Union-Leader's Sunday newspaper, the New Hampshire Sunday News, made the expenses-paid trip to South Africa):

> As it is, white South Africa—which don't forget, was founded by white people before there were any black people in that part of Africa—is a prosperous, modern nation of skyscraper cities, great gold and diamond mines, steel production, a great Western civilization. . . .
>
> This nation has a right to know, at a time when American boys are dying in Viet Nam to stop the Communist expansion in Asia, that an organization in this country is secretly plotting to have more American boys killed in Africa, not in the interests of peace, but in the interests of forwarding the Communist conquest of that continent.

The Liberty Lobby—which says it represents more than 150,000 families—wrote in its September, 1965, issue:

> South Africa's "problem" seems to be that it is the only remaining free nation on that unhappy continent. . . . And even worse (to the Liberal mind), its leaders have indicated that they will not turn their varied peoples over to the Communists and cannibals.

Articles such as these prompt officials of SAIS to say that they feel South Africa's image is improving in the American press.

Perhaps the only American Africa-oriented organization of any significance that can be described as conservative is the American African Affairs Association (4A). Predictably, it is a friend of South Africa, and of Rhodesia and Portugal as well.

It was established in the fall of 1965, "to seek out and disseminate the truth" about Africa "without reference to prevailing shibboleths." Co-chaired by William Rusher, publisher of National Review, and Dr. Max Yergan, a Negro, 4A has made an ambitious attempt to turn conservative thought to Africa. In its initial bid for public support, the group's sponsors said they hoped to solicit a first-year budget of $161,000, of which $70,000 was to come in grants from "African sources."

Although 4A quickly procured tax-exempt status as an "educational organization" from the Internal Revenue Service, some of its enemies are currently trying to convince the Justice Department that it is merely an American spokesman for the Rhodesian, South African and Portuguese Governments. They find suspicious the fact that 4A and the Office of Rhodesian Affairs in Washington have used the same postage meter (Pitney-Bowes No. 102150).

Among the "educational" material churned out so far by 4A are elaborate defenses of the Rhodesian Government and a grotesque book, The Fabric of Terror. Patently racist in tone, the book defends the atrocities committed by Portuguese troops in quelling the Angolan uprising of 1961. It was published by the Devin-Adair Co., whose president, Devin Garrity, made the expenses-paid trip to South Africa in 1965.

THE PILOT SHORTAGE

KARL M. RUPPENTHAL

An air-line pilot for more than twenty years, Mr. Ruppenthal is director of the Transportation Management Program at Stanford University.

The air lines are running out of pilots. Already acute, the shortage shows no signs of abating in the near future; indeed there are indications that it may become the most bothersome personnel problem with which the air lines must contend. For lack of men trained to air-line standards, one major company was forced last year to cancel some 2,000 hours of scheduled flights. That comes to about 1 million plane miles—sufficient capacity to transport 48,000 people from San Francisco to New York together with several hundred tons of baggage, air mail and freight. The potential revenue represented is on the order of $10 million. In 1966, some flights are being canceled; others have been consolidated. But most of the loss will be in proposed flights that might have been scheduled had there been pilots to operate them.

At first thought it is surprising that the air transport industry could allow such an incredible shortage to occur. It is not, after all, one of those stodgy, tradition-burdened industries in which change always produces crisis. It is young and exciting, and from the start its technology has changed rapidly, with each change usually bringing new and complex problems. Since the industry was born, each new generation of planes has been markedly better than its predecessors. When the lines graduated from the DC-3 to the DC-6, a pilot's productivity (and his revenue potential) increased some 500 per cent—a fact that allowed one major air line to cut its pilot force in half in a single year.

Productivity rose again with the arrival of the jets. Indeed, at the dawn of the jet age flight crew members so feared the impending loss of jobs that the air lines were swept by the greatest scourge of strikes the industry has ever seen. Industrial relations executives spent much time devising plans for employee retrenchment and gave little thought to the possibility that still more pilots might be needed. Some of them were so busy trying to convince union negotiators that there was no need to write a "no lay-off" clause in the contract, since no reduction in force was in prospect, that they failed to plan for the possibility that their arguments might be true.

Management had never needed to worry about the source of new pilots. Something like 85 per cent of all air-line pilots learned to fly at the expense of the taxpayers in some military organization. At the end of the Korean War so many ex-military pilots sought flying jobs that the air lines could afford to be selective. Some firms did not even bother to acknowledge an inquiry unless the applicant had an instrument rating and several thousand hours of multi-engine transport experience. And regardless of the number of hours they might have logged, the thousands of fighter pilots were seldom given a second glance; it was generally assumed that it would be too expensive to retrain them and to break them of their daredevil habits.

In those years an applicant had to be physically fit, between the ages of 21 and 27, not too short, not too tall, reasonably intelligent and handsome enough to have "the pilot look"—whatever that phrase might mean to the interviewing officials. Even after passing several intelligence tests, a flight proficiency check and a rigorous physical examination, an applicant could be rejected if he did not meet the interviewer's notions of personality, poise or promise.

Once hired (there were occasional openings), the new pilot was on probation for a year, during which time he could be discharged for any reason whatsoever—performance, whim or caprice. Not until he had passed through those limbo months could he join the Air Line Pilots Association and gain some job security.

At the end of the Korean War the stream of pilots discharged by the military resembled the running of the smelt. To this abundance was added the product of the services' flight schools, which were programed to operate at wartime levels and were not immediately shut down. While no reliable statistics have been gathered, the indications are that a hundred qualified pilots were available for every air-line vacancy.

Now all this has changed. Operating under more stringent financial controls, the armed services have been hard put to train as many pilots as they would like to have. As military airplanes have become more complex, the expense of training a pilot has risen. The Defense Department estimates that it now costs $100,000 to train a single pilot. Since the outlay per man has risen faster than the budget available for flight training, the number of pilots in training has been cut. And money is not the only reason for reducing the pilot training program. Rockets, helicopters and other space-age devices have all but made military planes obsolete.

The large post-Korean pilot reservoir is now mainly dried up. Many of these former fliers are established in other occupations and cannot be lured back to flying. But in addition, most of those who would still be willing to give the air lines a try are too old for the job.

The other face of the pilot shortage problem is the fact that the air lines are doing so well today. Long accustomed to an annual growth rate of about 10 per cent, the industry was shaken in the late 1950s when the anticipated rise did not occur, and the president of one of the larger carriers remarked ruefully that the days of substantial air-line growth were over. He reasoned that the planes had already enticed most of the passengers away from the railroads and the bus lines, and that additional increase of air travel could come only with population growth. His company's economists dutifully predicted an annual growth of some 3 per cent—perhaps as high as 5 per cent if competition was not on its toes.

But in 1964, U.S. air-line travel increased some 20 per cent. One line recorded a 30 per cent increase, and followed it with another 30 per cent in 1965. Early 1966 figures indicate that another phenomenal year is in prospect.

This boom comes at a time when the pilot force is getting a little old. Many of those now flying were hired during the last great air-line expansion of some twenty years ago, and are now between the ages of 45 and 50. The mandatory retirement age is 60, and since pilots must meet rigorous physical standards a good number will drop out sooner.

It is understandable, then, that air-line financial officers are unhappy. The lack of but one jet-qualified Boeing 707 captain for one year could cut revenue as much as $4 million. But more is involved than the loss of immediate dollars. If an air line finds itself acutely short of pilots, it may have to curtail its schedules, and a more foresighted competitor will jump to fill the gap. Furthermore, several lucrative major air-line routes still remain to be awarded. (The forthcoming Pacific route case will be the largest the Civil Aeronautics Board has ever handled.) Part of an air line's argument for being awarded new routes consists in proving that if it were certified, it would be capable of providing the service. An air line that is understaffed would be at a distinct disadvantage; to serve the new route, it might be forced to curtail service elsewhere, and the Civil Aeronautics Board does not favor that procedure.

The situation is flavored with irony. The embarrassing pilot shortage could have been much more severe had it not been for certain actions by the Air Line Pilots Association, which were strenuously resisted at the time by the management of several air lines. When the jets arrived, there was considerable controversy as to the appropriate composition of a cockpit crew. The ALPA established a jet study committee whose function, among others, was to study the work load in the cockpit. This group learned what it could from the jet experience of the military and from the operation of the British Comet (the first commercial jet in the air). Those studies convinced the pilots that the new aircraft would be sufficiently complicated and the traffic patterns sufficiently tangled to require two full-time pilots in the cockpit. Since there is always the possibility that one pilot may die or be otherwise disabled, the ALPA vigorously asserted that a third pilot should be added as a safety factor. Meanwhile the Flight Engineers International Association, fearing that the new planes would displace them from their jobs, declared that if there was to be a third man in any cockpit he must be qualified as a mechanic (and thus a member of the FEIA).

The controversy was resolved on several air lines by installing four men in the cockpit: captain, first officer, second officer and mechanic-trained flight engineer. It is that pool of second officers, literally forced on several air lines by the threat of a pilots' strike, that today enables those air lines to man their planes. Subsequent agreements between the air lines and the two unions have provided for pilot training for the mechanic-qualified flight engineer. As these men (who have a wealth of cockpit experience) qualify as pilots, they can assume the duties of the second officer and the second officer can in turn upgrade to copilot in relatively short time.

Of course, one man's problem is another man's opportunity. Young men with the urge to fly have a better chance to fulfill their dream than they have had in a good many years. Today a pilot can find work with virtually any U.S. air line, and perhaps with a foreign carrier or two. Less flying experience is required of a new recruit than at any time since World War II. This is not to say that standards will be lowered or that the copilot seat on a jet will be filled by "200-hour wonders" fresh from Piper Cubs. But it does mean that a pilot with relatively little flying experience can get his foot into the door and receive his future training at the air line's expense.

There are other ramifications to this sellers' market. The pilot shortage has already bid up the free market (non-union) price for pilots. Fixed-base operators, nonscheduled air lines and corporations that operate their own planes are already feeling the pinch. And since salaries for non-union pilots have advanced sharply in some quarters, it is likely that the unionized segment of aviation (virtually all air line pilots) will soon feel that the time has come to talk wages.

The pilot shortage will also affect the armed services. They have always had trouble persuading qualified pilots to be content with a military career. Aside from the hazards of combat, there is the possibility that a promotion will not be forthcoming or that a man will be declared surplus because of a budget cut. The enemy may declare peace and then large numbers of pilots will again be thrown onto the civilian market. Air line jobs are available now.

The pilot shortage could have meaning for Negroes, Puerto Ricans and members of other minority groups. Traditionally, pilots in the United States have come from middle-class white families. While employment has not specifically been denied to Negroes and the other minorities, exceedingly few of them have been able to become pilots in the military or to accumulate the requisite flying experience in other ways. Today, with pre-employment requirements sharply reduced, their chances are better than ever before.

Suddenly aware of the immensity of the problem, the air lines are looking for long-term solutions. Several possibilities have been suggested. The Civilian Pilot Training Program (CPT) of the 1940s could be reactivated. In that scheme, selected universities throughout the country provided the classroom training while nearby flight schools taught the flying itself. A new CPT would no doubt produce pilots, but it might be hard to persuade Congress to underwrite industry's training needs in this fashion today.

A second possibility is to provide substantially the same type of training but to do it under guise of national urgency (legally there is no national emergency today). An increased number of pilots could be trained for the military forces and the surplus turned over to the air lines. While this approach undoubtedly would have an easier time in Congress, it would be very expensive. It costs considerably more to train a pilot in a military flying school than it does under a civilian program. Further, there is no assurance that, once they had trained a pilot, the military would be eager to release him to the air lines.

A third proposal is that the government (through the Federal Aviation Agency) set up a gigantic pilot training program. A tremendous new flight school (perhaps in a politically important state) would undertake to train all the pilots for the air lines. Selection, training and testing would be standardized in the hope of producing a uniform product. While it is true that the air lines' managerial prerogatives would be seriously curtailed by such a program and that individualism might suffer in many ways, proponents of the scheme point out that it would be inexpensive for the air lines since the taxpayers would foot the bill.

A fourth approach to the pilot shortage is the suggestion that the air lines "grow their own." Already two of the major air lines are experimenting. Selected college graduates are given intelligence tests, a physical examination and several subjective tests. Once they are over these hurdles, they get a commitment of a job from the air line, provided only that they obtain a commercial pilot's license at an approved flight school. One air line will even finance the training, making arrangements for repayment through subsequent payroll deductions.

If this program is successful, and there are signs that it may be, the industry will be able to rescue itself from the pilot shortage. Equally important, it will demonstrate to the air lines that they can handle complex problems on their own, without continually running to the federal government for help.

LETTERS (continued from page 466)

tween a politician who thinks like a liberal and acts like a reactionary, and one who thinks like a reactionary and acts like a reactionary, there is really no choice.

Mrs. Marvin Shinbrot contribution

New York City

Dear Sirs: Your Literature of the Holocaust section [Oct. 17] is another vital contribution The Nation is making (above most first-rate journals, it seems), in its concern and responsibility to the world we are in.

Joseph Wiseman

the war ahead

APO, San Francisco

Dear Sirs: I commend John McDermott's "Welfare Imperialism in Vietnam" [The Nation, July 25] as being what I consider the best indictment of the war in print.

We have tried to enforce our middle-class values and prosperity upon a people who have rejected them (us). The Vietnamese peasants have challenged the very substance of our society (i.e., middle-class prosperity). Our reaction has been to destroy the peasants themselves, thereby ignoring (or trying to) the profound challenge to our way of life which they represent.

I can only conclude that it looks as if the greatest war this century has seen is still in front of us. . . .

Pfc. Darrel L. Welshans

McCarran, Smith and freedom

Ithaca, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Frank Donner, reviewing my book, Expanding Liberties [The Nation, Sept. 26], has written as if I approve the Smith Act and the McCarran Act. I cannot see how he could possibly have come to such an opinion if he has read Chapter IV of the book.

Regarding the Smith Act, on pages 118-119 and 122 I make it clear that I am on the side of the dissenting opinion of Justice Douglas; and on page 133 your reviewer will find this statement by me:

> The Smith Act and the cases which it spawned do not add up to a chapter in American history that can be read with pride. It has a nightmarish effect that evokes the question: Was it all real? Could it possibly be that mature, sophisticated men, in high office, could have thought that America's security and freedom would be strengthened by these actions?

Nor do I need to be told by your reviewer that President Truman attacked the McCarran Act in his veto message. On page 140 he will find a summary of that veto message, and on pages 149 and 151 he will discover that I condemn that act in words that no reader could possibly misunderstand, for I say: "President Truman's condemnation of the act in his veto message has been amply sustained by the events since 1950. . . . President Truman was right: the act is both nonsense and bad law."

Milton R. Konvitz

New York City

Dear Sirs: Dr. Konvitz misses the point of my criticism, which is not that he approves the repressive laws and court decisions in question but rather that the tyranny of his "progress" thesis has forced him to minimize their significance, to ignore their political and social context and, indeed, to cite them as evidence of "freedom's gains." His ultimate evaluations of their historic role . . . are that the Smith Act and the cases applying it did not turn out to be so bad after all; that the widely deplored McCarran Act procedures are "fair . . . genuine and superior" and that (most remarkably of a law that has been characterized by experts as the most repressive ever enacted in our history) the McCarran Act, together with its 1954 outlawry amendment (passed during a wild, tumultuous session of Congress at the height of McCarthyism), are "a tribute to the moderation and good sense of Congress [and] are not an expression of extremism. . . ."

For more than twenty years, Congress and the courts have permitted an anti-Communist fixation to deny full play to the right of political dissent guaranteed in the Constitution. Dr. Konvitz should have frankly acknowledged the existence of this historic impasse instead of eking out spurious reasons for taking comfort from "freedom's gains. . . ."

Frank J. Donner

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Ireland Rehearses the Future

THE MAKING OF MODERN IRELAND, 1603-1922. By J. C. Beckett. Alfred A. Knopf. 496 pp. $8.95.

IRELAND SINCE THE RISING. By Timothy Patrick Coogan. Frederick A. Praeger. 355 pp. $6.95.

KEVIN SULLIVAN

Mr. Sullivan is associate dean of the Graduate Faculties at Columbia University and the author of Joyce Among the Jesuits (Columbia University Press).

One, perhaps the only, stable element in Irish history has been the land. Irish writers, the best of them—from Maria Edgeworth to Patrick Kavanaugh—have always known this instinctively. In Yeats, despite his imaginative claim to the inheritance of "Goldsmith and the Dean, Berkeley and Burke" and the traditions of intellectual elegance handed down to him from 18th-century Ireland, this elemental instinct was early cultivated and, toward the end, openly asserted:

> John Synge, I and Augusta Gregory, thought
> All that we did, all that we said or sang
> Must come from contact with the soil, from that > Contact everything Antaeus-like grew strong.
> We three alone in modern times had brought > Everything down to that sole test again.

Here, as elsewhere, Yeats claims a little too much. He and his friends did not construct that "test," nor did they have any exclusive claim to it. What they actually did was to articulate what had always been part of the instinctive knowledge of the Irish peasantry, and this knowledge under the scrutiny of a critical and historically alert intelligence enabled them to find in the land of Ireland a touchstone by which an artist might be identified as truly Irish. This in distinction to the artist or writer who simply happened to be born in Ireland. The distinction is useful and at times enlightening. William Carleton and Padraic Colum are, for example, Irish writers, their work grounded in the Irish experience, earthy and of Irish earth a part. But an Edward FitzGerald or an Oscar Wilde could as well have been born in Athens or Teheran for all the relevance of an Irish birthplace to their exquisite literary performances. And in Joyce, most Irish and most cosmopolitan of writers, the land at last becomes—in the shape of a great giant recumbent between the hill of Howth and Chapelizod—the central figure in a complex cyclical drama that is no less Ireland's story because it is, or was intended to be, the story of mankind.

Since history, like criticism, follows in the way of literature, the flowering of an Irish literature early in this century may explain the new interest in Irish history that has been apparent since around the time of the Second World War. If so, the historian's task does not seem to have been made much easier, and professional historians today are quite ready to admit that the history of Ireland has not yet been adequately written. There may be many reasons for this, but the one generally given is that the people who, over the centuries, were attached or who attached themselves to the land have proved the single most unstable element within the Irish historical framework. "Great hatred, little room," in Yeats's phrase, had maimed them almost from the start. A bewildering and abrasive admixture of clan, race and creed, the claims of conflicting loyalties and adherence to impossible causes had so confused not only the people but the issues that, in a kind of despair, the complexity of Irish history was commonly reduced to a simple formula of confrontation between native and foreigner.

Of course the formula does not work except for the writing of debased popular history. But the picture is not wholly black. Edmund Curtis' History of Ireland, first published in 1936 and reaching six editions within fifteen years, is a straightforward, noninterpretative, highly condensed account of Irish affairs from the beginning down to 1922. There are also studies of particular persons, periods or events that, in addition to presenting a subject impartially and in depth, attain a dimension of significance that is one of the distinctive traits of fine historical writing. A collective work, The Great Famine: Studies in Irish History, edited by R. Dudley Edwards and T. Desmond Williams, and Conor Cruise O'Brien's lucid and original Parnell and His Party 1880-1890, both published in 1957, are outstanding examples of a new mode of accomplishment that has recently appeared in Irish historical studies. Special studies of this kind are propaedeutic to any fresh synthesis of Irish history that may appear in the future—such as the cooperative history projected by the Irish Historical Society for publication in 1970.

Meanwhile, readers interested in the subject can be brought up to date by Prof. J. C. Beckett's history of three centuries of English rule in Ireland (1603-1922) and by Mr. T. P. Coogan's account of what has been going on in the country since the Easter Rising of Sixteen. The two books complement each other in a number of ways. Coogan's account picks up approximately where Beckett's leaves off, the latter providing historical perspective on a series of events so recent in time as to be not fully meaningful outside that perspective. Then, too, Beckett is a Belfast man, a Protestant (one supposes), and a professional historian; Coogan is a Dubliner, a Catholic and a practicing journalist. What is important about these differences, about the first two especially, is that they make so little difference. For there is in both a fair-mindedness, an absence of bias, and a respect even for the unpleasant fact in remote or recent history that has happily nothing at all to do with geography or religion. The shenanigans of the Reverend Paisley in the streets of Belfast or the rattling of an Irish Republican Army (IRA) ghost in the South would, one feels, be accepted by both Beckett and Coogan with the same kind of bemused and painful resignation.

The real difference between the two is that one is a scholar and the other a newspaper man. Beckett's approach is explorative, his tone formal and judicious, his conclusions tentative. Mr. Coogan, writing about what are all but current events, is more hurried and quotidian, but resourceful in getting at the facts (he has interviewed many of the people—bishops, gunmen and diplomats—who had a hand in shaping the Ireland the world now knows), and setting these down while they were still, so to speak, hot.

Perhaps the most interesting chapter in the history of modern Ireland is the role it has played in world affairs since admission to the United Nations some ten years ago. This has been out of all proportion to Ireland's size, and out of tune at times with popular feeling at home. The UN delegation early adopted a stance of "noncommitment" in the East-

West division, and to the surprise of both sides adhered to that position with irritating consistency. Ireland opposed Britain over Suez, the United States over the admission of China to the UN, and has all along opposed the apartheid policies of South Africa. In the Cuban missile crisis of October, 1962, though appreciative of American anxiety, it refused to endorse the State Department's line and expressed understanding for "the concern which the Revolutionary Government of Cuba feels for their national security . . . in view of the attempt made by Cuban refugee elements to invade their territory in April last year." Ireland has even succeeded in irritating all sides at the same time. When, for example, Frank Aiken, leader of its UN delegation, first made his proposal on nuclear limitation and disarmament, it was condemned by America as communistic, by the Russians as a capitalist plot, and by Franco's Spain as undemocratic!

Whether or not Ireland can continue to play this role—a small but independent voice to trouble the liberal conscience of the world—is unknown. Its economic dependence on England, traditional ties to America and natural conservatism bred out of the bone of Irish Catholicism, seem little likely to encourage it. But for a small country, modestly endowed, it has made an admirable beginning.

In the broader perspective of Professor Beckett's study, Ireland may be seen as the small and turbulent theatre where many recent events in world history have been put through protracted and painful rehearsal. In this sense Ireland is the paradigm for those backward, underdeveloped, disadvantaged—all euphemisms for the exploited—nations that have emerged in the 20th century from the breakup of the old imperial systems. Its experience, ranging over eight centuries of colonial exploitation, provides examples of action vis-à-vis an aggressor ranging from the tactical advantages of guerrilla warfare to the possibilities of parliamentary strategy and international propaganda. Consider only the first of these: whenever the Irish risked pitched battle with the English—at Kinsale, at the Boyne, and in '98—the results were calamitous; but there was no way in which the English, forced to maintain large standing armies on Irish soil, could cope with native guerrillas—constantly active in Ireland over eight centuries, whether they were known as Raparees, Whiteboys, Fenians, or the IRA—without resorting to ultimate force, that is, the systematic extermination or transplantation of the native populace. This indeed the English attempted in the 17th and 18th centuries, and even in this they were only partially successful: desertum faciunt, pacem vocant. The Irish guerrilla emerged again in the 20th century and, the conscience of the world inhibiting the use of ultimate force by the English military, successfully wrested the country's independence from a great and powerful empire. The example is not without relevance to events in Southeast Asia today.

The creation of the Irish Free State in 1922 was the first step, the establishment of a republic in 1949 the last, in the total separation of Ireland from England. The process was gradual and undramatic and coincided in large part with the slow dissolution of the British Empire. Marx had foreseen that Ireland would provide the ferment for this dissolution, but he did not foresee that the Socialist revolution would be absorbed in the national—as has also happened elsewhere in the world during the last two decades. Even in the matter of partition (the six counties of Northern Ireland that remain outside the republic and still adamantly British) the Irish experience has foreshadowed the divided state—Korea, Vietnam and, in a different way, Germany—that begins as a temporary political compromise and continues in existence with every appearance of national permanence.

Ireland's tragedies are behind it, but all irony may not be. The political independence sought and won may yet be compromised by the dependence of its economy on that of England. Cooperation and friendship, so essential if the country is to prosper, may prove more dangerous than old enmities, if Ireland is to be made over now in the image of commercial England. The possibility and the peril are quite real. But it is difficult enough to understand Ireland's past without at this time predicting its future.

Where the Martyrs Died

CONFESSIONS OF AN IRISH REBEL. By Brendan Behan. Bernard Geis Associates. Distributed by Random House. 245 pp. $4.95.

DUBLIN 1916. Edited by Roger McHugh. Hawthorn Books. 399 pp. $6.95.

THE IRISH UPRISING 1916-22. A C.B.S. Legacy Collection produced by Goddard Lieberson. Set of book and two records. $10.95. The Macmillan Company (book only). 164 pp. $7.95.

SEAN CRONIN

Mr. Cronin is a journalist and author of a group of studies on Irish historical themes, including the 1916 Easter Rising, published in Ireland. He has lived in Ireland and the United States and has written for publications on both sides of the Atlantic.

When Brendan Behan died in March, 1964, at the age of 41, nearly all of Dublin turned out for the funeral. In death they gave him the kind of salute denied him in life. They would have done the same for Sean O'Casey, who sprang from a similar background and died an exile in his 80s. Both were products of that unique brotherhood, the Dublin working class. Both had little formal education. Both were nurtured in an area of Georgian tenements on the north side of the River Liffey.

Confessions of an Irish Rebel is Behan's last work. He didn't write a word of it. Rae Jeffs, who describes herself as a proper British lady until she met Brendan, recorded it on tape for his publishers and transcribed and edited it after his death. It must have been a rough assignment and she deserves praise for the attempt. Ribald, tender, comic, extravagant, flamboyant and occasionally sad, it is authentic Behan.

Yet despite her efforts, it is not worthy of him, being in effect a first draft. Borstal Boy, Behan tells us here, was rewritten several times. Confessions, billed as a sequel, contains errors the author would not have tolerated: misspelled place names, repetitions, political gaffes. As it stands it is hardly a serious work, reading rather like a collection of those weekly articles Behan wrote for The People, a mass-circulation London Sunday newspaper. On that level it succeeds. There is a laugh on every page and it is probably the funniest book of the year.

Confessions records the activities of a truly extraordinary character following his release from an English reform school in the early 1940s to the production of The Quare Fellow at the Pike, Dublin's small avant-garde theatre, in 1954. He spent much of the time in various prisons as an Irish Republican Army activist. He manages to make it all sound like a lark, which it wasn't; many of his comrades were maltreated, some were shot. But Behan, who hadn't an ounce of self-pity and little bitterness in his make-up, admits: "I have never been able to talk about things that mean a deal to me. . . ." He found other ways to exorcise his memories.

He wrote The Quare Fellow as a one-act play in Irish, a language he mastered in jail with the aid of Gaelic speakers. Based on a Mountjoy Prison hanging which occurred while he was inside, it is a forceful argument against capital punishment. The Abbey, Ireland's national theatre, rejected it, but after its triumph elsewhere, the Abbey staged an expanded version.

The Hostage, also written in Irish, was produced briefly in Dublin. Behan translated it, gave it to Joan Littlewood, was interviewed on British television by Malcolm Muggeridge, and became a sensation overnight. After that he was rarely out of the headlines. Ironically, The Hostage was among the plays that sparked the "new theatre" of the 1950s; for Brendan it marked the beginning of a decline that continued until his tragic death.

Perhaps the truth is that there were two Brendan Behans. The outgoing and uninhibited one cocked a snook at the world and its follies. The other, a sensitive introvert whom few people knew, was appalled at the things men do to other men, and died before his time because the conflict and the burden were too great to bear.

"I told the assembled company my story and, for the most part, I told the truth." The vigor of its style and the robustness of its contents notwithstanding, Confessions of an Irish Rebel is an unsatisfactory book, perhaps because Brendan did not write it.

HOSPITALITY

How do you feel about Me taking up space in Your city? Ah, it is not
An open house, to be sure.
Because some do not want to share
Others must suffer.
My little ones will bear
The cold another night
And late in your big mansion
Leave just once the one room
You use and pad through the long
Hall and consider the value
Of those other rooms and beds —
To another if not to you . . .
And I shall observe that
This year's monsters are much
Like last year's, and those of Another year. Though
You did not really get hold of me
One did, one did, long ago . . .
Is it her image I seek in you
Asking the smallest favor
Knowing how you will turn us out?
Cold hearts: it takes so many
To make a city like this one.
It is built on such a principle
That for kindness I look to the stars.

DAVID RAY

"The right of the people of Ireland to the ownership of Ireland" was, and is, a potent slogan. Prof. Roger McHugh of University College Dublin (UCD) draws on contemporary sources to tell the story of the Easter Rising in Dublin 1916. O'Casey, Shaw, Yeats, Lady Gregory, James Stephens, Sean O'Faolain, Frank O'Connor, Lennox Robinson, Sylvia Pankhurst are among the contributors.

The shock to the imperial system was profound when in the middle of a war ostensibly being waged "for the freedom of small nations," one small nation opted for freedom. The revolt was crushed in a week, sixteen leaders were executed, thousands were jailed and deported. But, as Yeats noted, Ireland was transformed by the deeds of her martyrs:

I write it out in a verse—
MacDonagh and MacBride
And Connolly and Pearse
Now and in time to be,
Wherever green is worn,
Are changed, changed utterly:
A terrible beauty is born.

P. H. Pearse, a revolutionary nationalist, and James Connolly, a revolutionary Socialist, inspired the resurgence that swept Ireland after their deaths. In 1919, De Valera could say in New York: "We are the spearhead of the movement for national freedom everywhere." He knew the Easter Rising had significance for all subject peoples. The compromise settlement with England in 1921 led to civil war; the spearhead became a rear guard. As Nehru noted shrewdly: "The English policy had won where it had been checked, and Irishmen were fighting Irishmen and England was quietly helping one party and generally looking on well content with the new development." Political stagnation and mass emigration followed.

Today the names of Pearse and Connolly are eulogized; their ideas are forgotten or ignored. Connolly would not be surprised. "The only true prophets are they who carve out the future which they announce," he wrote once. Dublin 1916 shows the prophets at work, even though they failed to carve out the future they announced.

One finds it difficult to know what to make of The Irish Uprising 1916-22, an expensively garbed C.B.S. book-and-two-record-set that will probably outsell Behan's Confessions and McHugh's anthology combined. It is issued, the sponsors say, to mark the fiftieth anniversary of the Rising "as a presentation of the events that led to Irish independence." Unfortunately, this is an over-

TO UNDERSTAND A HEADLINE GET BEHIND
IT

Murray B. Levin ushers you behind-the-scenes of big-stakes political campaigning with his controversial new book

KENNEDY CAMPAIGNING

The System and the Style as Practiced by Senator Edward Kennedy

Only a distinguished liberal scholar could have written it so sincerely and skillfully. ($5.95)

John Lofton takes you behind-the-fundamental-issues with his masterfully comprehensive new study of journalistic reporting of sensational trials — from Aaron Burr to Dr. Samuel Sheppard:

JUSTICE AND THE PRESS

Only a veteran newsman with solid legal training could have explored the conflict between press freedom and due process of law so usefully. "He has made a valuable contribution to those on both sides." — Harry S. Ashmore. ($5.95)

Joseph P. Ritz shows you how and why headlines were generated in the first full-scale reappraisal of the celebrated Newburgh welfare controversy:

THE DESPISED POOR

Newburgh's War on Welfare

Only a reporter who was on the scene could illuminate what happened (and its effects) so provocatively. Joseph Ritz is the reporter who first brought Newburgh to national attention. ($4.95) statement; Ireland did not win full independence then or later. What it got was self-government and partition, which is why Brendan Behan was a rebel many years after 1916. The book contains more than 100 good photographs, some reproduced for the first time. President De Valera supplies a foreword. Former President Sean T. O'Kelly is a contributor with historian Thomas P. O'Neill and novelist-critic Benedict Kiely.

BEACON PRESS
BOSTON 02108

No one can cavil at the production nor at what O'Neill and Kiely have to say. The two LPs are something else again. A running narrative interspersed with songs, poems and interviews, it winds up as a hodgepodge. The album presents the Rising and subsequent resistance through an emotional haze. As Arnold Bax put it:

And when the devil made us wise
Each in his own peculiar hell,
With desert hearts and drunken eyes
We're free to sentimentalize
By corners where the martyrs died.

Given his head and two LPs what Brendan Behan wouldn't have done with the story of 1916! He knew more ballads, poems and national lore than any other man in Ireland. But that searching, skeptical, scoffing, suffering mind is no more, and now it will never be done.

Morning's Twilight

THE DARK. By John McGahern. Alfred A. Knopf. 191 pp. $3.95.

ANTHONY C. WEST

Mr. West is an Irish writer now living in Wales. His short stories and novels, published internationally, include the novel The Ferret Fancier (Simon & Schuster).

When I was in Ireland in the summer of 1965 for the first time in twenty years, I was loaned John McGahern's The Dark, together with a farmyard of criticism, comment and gossip concerning the man and his work.

I had not read McGahern's first work, The Barracks. It was, apparently, very well received in England and in Eire, winning a number of lucrative awards. Unfortunately, as things are in Eire, the gaining of official plaudits could be much the same thing as consenting to wear a strait jacket. My own renewed contact with the existing atmosphere, despite the fact that the late Pope John's spirit is very active and seems to constitute the present party line, taught me that in most things cultural still, the whole belongs to the reverend Pat and political Joe, the leavings to myself. I might live in the country, daily dodging all the small chauvinistic mousetraps, and write my head off while knowing that not one Irishman in 10,000 would read, would be advised to read, or would want to read a word of me: official ignoration can work in much the same way as literary ostracism in Russia, concerning which we've had a recent legalistic example. And by all accounts, things aren't that much different in Protestant, evangelical Ulster, with which province I, myself, can claim native sonship. Small autochthonous prophets are always liable to be short served with honor. Never not unhearing the sounds and furies of the millennial Irish boast and blarney, this whole condition is a sad one, especially so when a man has lived long enough to let windmills alone; and, blood—orange and/or green—always being thicker than water, one worries for the future of one's country which none of us can help loving despite its transient, chauvinistic aberrations. In general and with enduring loyalty, we always wish it well, its health and progress somehow always an attached aspect of our personal contentment.

TWO GERMANIES MIRROR OF AN AGE
by Peter Lust
A vivid picture of the conditions existing in both German states, by a tireless Canadian editor.
$2.50 & $5.00
HARVEST HOUSE LTD.
1364 Greene Avenue
Montreal, Canada
Publishers

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name................
Address...............
Zip...................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

Eire refused McGahern's second book, The Dark, and has more or less disowned the man with, I suppose, after the gratis recognition of The Barracks, the implication that he has also spurned the feeding hand. This circumstance is a small but interesting facet of the entire relationship of the Irish artist with his own society, and which is in turn an active part of the world contest between art and power politics. I can well imagine that many an apparently democratic politician might secretly wish for the authority to gag his working artists who are always prone to describe the clay feet of his otherwise expensive idols. As regards McGahern, it seems that The Dark has also cost the man his teaching job: the subtle operation of the immortal sanction, I suppose—a kind of material excommunication. Recently, the whole affair was aired on a television program.

I am not concerned to ferret out a writer's personal motives, inhibitions and frustrations: if a writer's worth the name, he can use everything inside and outside himself as free and unprejudiced material. There is peace and beauty enthralled in every ugliness, but if bureaucratic civilizations and dictated so-called cultures insist on functioning under the makeshift compromise of the old Moslem-inspired notion of the Double Truth, the ultimate result can only ever be cumulative philistinism with all the associated backslapping and horrible in-breeding of used up ideas, life slowly degenerating into a go-round that is more dull than merry.

I am not camp following any one of the several existing sectarian bandwagons, orange or green. I think I've at last managed to see Ireland whole, if not entirely hearty. And, Ireland, as it is, the entire thirty-two counties of it, border or no border on its skirt, tends to limit this freedom of artistic selection and statement, bending over the artist's shoulder like an old spinsterish schoolteacher and suggesting deletions of what she considers unmentionables; this freedom is and must so remain the first point of liberty for any truly creative mind and must stand alone and apart from all direct religious and political suggestion and interpolation. If the artist abuses, ill uses or misuses his freedom, he demotes himself, has only himself to blame and must bear the responsibility, and the additional national and/or religious censure is not really required and only licenses the hindsighted rabble of grinding grundys to air their self-righteous complaints. I doubt if one has the fiat to judge the artist's actual material as offered; one may only criticize the method and manner of presentation, assessing relative success or failure on this level. However, and thank God for it, as regards McGahern and any other honest Irish writer, native parochial opinion has no weight at all in the general Anglo-Saxon literary forum and, if an Irish writer had to exist on native royalties, he would starve. And, at the hunt's heel, be it said that attempted identification of a creative writer with nationalistic and politico-religious expectations is all wrong, unless the man is asked to be no more than a mouthpiece journalist with suitable blinkers. There are such people and God bless them, but they have nothing to do with the cosmopolitan world economy of art. And good luck to John McGahern in this: he has obviously refused the poet laureateship offered by the status quo.

Taking The Dark as it is, I'm glad that yet another eye and mind take up the constant challenge of the rich Irish scene with its almost inexhaustible spiritual, social and economic patterns of living, grass-roots facts.

Ireland continues to offer us a unique and concentrated mixture of past forms and potential development: it hasn't yet consented to deposit all its eggs in the 20th-century basket and waits still, watching, slowly assessing, not quite in time, and so equipped with rather more than normal perspective, reducing the big world's doings to parish size, the ghost of the participative Celtic past rubbing shoulders with modern technology, with a trace, perhaps anachronistic, of respect for the seven medieval arts somehow still surviving, the cumulative confusion initiated by the eight-century-old Papal-Norman take-over never really accepted or rationalized, all present directions loaded with buried motives, many of which may, indeed, prefer the dark to daylight. Although I suppose there isn't one single pure Gael left alive, Ireland—the transcendent imagination of it—remains as the last station on the old lost road to Tir na rOg, its westward roads and rivers losing themselves in the burying ocean: it remains —sweet hollow, rattling stream, bleak bear-brown bog, lakes gray as old dreams, mountains nippled on constant cloud. . . . But maybe time with the help of technology will finally take it away from us.

In Ireland last year a four-engined jet plane zoomed westward overhead while I watched an old man splitting an ash log with a stone wedge and wooden maul, much as his neolithic ancestor would have done.

The Dark attempts to describe certain series of unadorned existences as they are today. It seems to be the author's basic, working conception to tell the story in a hard, stark, sparse and unexploited way, from the outset setting his mind against any inherent and related softening: after all, he is post-Beckett and may well have been influenced by the latter's strictly exiguous technique.

Nature, even Irish nature, hardly enters the book. Nor is anything mentioned about the vast mythological background, although the book is placed near Rath Cruachan, the royal mystical capital of the ancient province that goes back to De Danann days. I don't even know how many children there are in the family. The household is presented as a kind of lone bush without a tap root, a kind of island. (Maybe the household is Ireland?) With the exception of Father Gerald, there are really only two main measurable characters, the boy and his father. McGahern has omitted details, I think, with the intention of presenting a picture of spiritual barrenness—a wilderness that can only be lived in by clinging to cold and detached noninvolvement; by growing an exoskeleton and keeping the soft parts inside.

The Dark begins with a row between the father and the little boy over the latter's careless use of a four-letter word. One learns there is no mother. She has died previously. Mahoney, the father, is a whole person, and understandable (is the son described through the father?). Articulate resentment of others may only be, after all, a roundabout method of self-discovery.

The hero has few loves. The development of natural sensely affection is constrained by the early ambition to enter the Church, together with the lack of affection within the family unit. He accepts the standard educational pressures along with their moral directives that propose to aim him at the priesthood, which ambition inevitably provokes and unnaturally intensifies the pathetically naive conflict between life as it actually is and the future's ideal, if highly abstract, intentions, the official purpose seeming to be that the earthly vessel should be kept empty until ultimate consecration fills it with the sound of God.

The whole family bunches together against the parent. Behind his back they protect themselves against his bald authority by mocking him. The inward, sensitive son sleeps with the father and hates it, hates the physical contact and nightly breach of privacy, never unaware of the father's temporary superiority in physical strength. I've heard some private critics make rare comments on this episode but I'd say they are all reading more into it than is really there.

A rather similar episode occurs during the visit of the hero to Father Gerald when the long-drawn ambition to be a priest reaches its climax and end, and the amateur critics again see elements of active homosexuality in this section. No. I'd say that this interpretation is poor psychology. All of us hold elements of latent bisexuality—otherwise we wouldn't be able to tolerate one another.

The Eire commissars might well have thanked McGahern for the honestly drawn sketch of this priest. Father Gerald has lived long enough to come to some kind of terms with the appalling loneliness of his vocation, and he is no homosexual, aware or unaware. He has long ago accepted the physical abnormality of celibacy. If one knows something about priestly training one can't underestimate its power to help the subject navigate most sexual hazards in himself and in others. And if a state of mind is maintained and encouraged by powerful institutions and by national entelechies subject to the institutions, then it assumes the authority of law and is sanctified by custom, habit and tradition—by time itself. On the abstract, intellectualistic, nonparticipative level, as our master Mister Kant explained, antinomic hypothesis can dispute with antinomic theory, cold logic alone intact, the hungry human being confused and cross-purposed into ultimate apathy, God as Divine Adviser still right Up There even if the world below is half crazy.

O my country, fertile stud farm for politico-religious abstractions, beehive of prayer, plain song and penance, old wild laughing Celtica now named the same thing as solemn Vaticanism and ranting Calvinism. In modern above-board reality, celibacy and the religious outlook should be the result of a free decision, as

Not since de Tocqueville has any foreigner presented so challenging a picture of the U.S.

Behind the Golden Curtain

A View of the U.S.A.

by Susan Cooper

An English correspondent explores the inconsistencies between stated American policy and actual American behavior.

Behind the Golden Curtain

Her conclusions are startling and controversial — particularly in light of our world image today.

$4.95 at all bookstores

CHARLES SCRIBNER'S SONS
New York

act of free will, each man as individual allowed to decide the issue. Ireland badly needs a 20th-century Rabelais.

For me, The Dark touches lightly and swiftly on many themes and aspects of Irish life and, in all probability, these will continue to occupy McGahern in one way and another for the rest of his writing life. He may consort with the folk of other nations and may attempt to describe them, as a D. H. Lawrence tried to do, but his own folk at home will remain as the only ones he has learned to know, the hard way.

For Each Her Own Tiny Revolt

THE BETTER HALF: The Emancipation of the American Woman. By Andrew Sinclair. Harper & Row. 401 pp. $6.95.

NANCY REEVES

Mrs. Reeves is a member of the bar in New York and California. She has written widely on the status of women.

Contemporary American women still lead lives that are caricatures of their foremothers', seeking their fortunes in Oliver W. Holmes's description as "marriageable girls sittin' like shopkeepers behind their goods." Nor is this pattern limited to the "lady class"; it pervades every level of income and of education. Thus, for the majority of American women, sex and security are still centered in the same relationship. Even the minority, who are beginning to question the soft sell in the free ride, tend to make their forays into the fuller life from the protective custody of their husbands' solid incomes. Their dream is limited to self-realization: first person singular. Each individual struggles to achieve her own tiny revolution.

Andrew Sinclair's book is therefore salutary. In focusing interest once again on "the glorious phalanx of old maids" who led the suffrage movement, he reminds us that theirs was a creative insurgency concerned with self-realization for the human race: third person plural. In the ferment of the abolition movement, there was a tie very early between the peculiar institution and the peculiar sex, for women, in seeking to free the slaves, became conscious of their own bonds. They also learned techniques of organization and patterns of resourcefulness that stood them in good stead in their own cause. I like the picture, sketched by Henrietta Buckmaster, of a mob swarming into the building where Garrison was to address the Boston Female Anti-Slavery Society, whereupon the chairman, Maria Weston Chapman, calmly directed each white lady to take a colored "sister" by the hand and so they walked, two by two, out of the building, "their hands folded in their cotton gloves, their eyes busily identifying the genteel leaders of the mob."

Today, even though a dynamic fraction of American women are certainly absorbed in all current issues, there is no organic connection between these issues and the "summer of our discontent" that characterizes neo-feminism. Yesterday's rebels were concerned with social action; today's limit themselves to subjective search. It has been argued that the reason for this disparity derives from the fundamental change in objective conditions: in the past women fought for formal rights, now they are faced with the task of realizing them. Yet, if one reads the journals of the great figures and the various movements, it is clear that there were no illusions about laws: suffrage and other legal reforms were seen only as prerequisites for ultimate integration. The vote was a means. The overriding end was economic independence: the right to work, the right to equal pay, the right to retain one's wages and to be freed from the ignominy of femme couverte status. Even today, women's wages are substantially below the earnings of men, but this fact has little relevance to current discontent. The question arises: why not?

A clue may be found in Andrew Sinclair's theory of the development of the lady. Seeking to trace the process that set American women outside the mainstream of American life, and fixed the separate-but-equal philosophy that legitimates that exclusion, Sinclair points to the country's early affluence which made possible an increase in the class of "American ladies":

> . . . the idleness of the American

THE POTENTIAL PRISONER

The backstage of this airport
Was unfamiliar. We sat
In the cubicle of the Chief Customs Official
On broken wicker stools, staring

At framed portraits of great
Asian smugglers and close-ups
Of bizarre smuggling techniques.

I saw huge photos of men's common shoes —
Toes had pockets filled with opium. I saw False tops of suitcases; the stow-
Away techniques always amaze me, the pictures
Were so odd they made us smile.

Meanwhile, the potential prisoner
Never arrived. We drove back
To familiar things in this strange city
And spent the night
Exchanging information
Leading to the capture
Of our secret selves. Why should we Hide our own lives

In the toes of our shoes?
Later, we knew
We had arrived,
Without knowing why,
At that moment of revelation
When we threw out
The puffs and padding of
Our inner lies. Love,

After all, descends in the foreign dark
Apparently praying to be caught.

SANDRA HOCHMAN

> lady was the concern of every traveller who came to the New World expecting to see nothing but thrifty and industrious republican women. The English feminist, Barbara Bodichon, found the lady class of America more utterly idle than anywhere outside the harems of the East.

Given the fluid society of that time, the material wealth, and the ideology that as Veblen noted "required respectable women to be freed from any taint of utility," it is not surprising that even women at the bottom of the economic ladder failed to concern themselves with their position in the labor market. Even for today's rebels, the emphasis is on personal fulfillment, not financial autonomy. Redress is sought more in terms of therapy than of justice. Sinclair writes: "The curious fact about the Victorian lady was that her husband was prepared to work himself almost to death to support her." So is the contemporary husband as is proved by the incidence of male mortality among the dollar hunters. The standard assertion to dramatize women's advance (they now own two-thirds of all private wealth) is not very impressive when one reflects that "they have not earned it; they have married it, and have been left widows."

Despite these interesting ideas, The Better Half is not a successful book, perhaps because of the very dimensions of the task the author has undertaken: to document woman's role in American society, a subject neglected by most historians. In 1959, Eleanor Flexner published her definitive study of the suffrage movement: Century of Struggle. Sinclair must have decided to produce a broader work, for he sandwiches the period covered by Flexner between a flash-back to colonial times and a projection to the present. The result is a fast-paced, impressionistic chronicle, rather like a survey course, with no clearly articulated axis, despite the fact that the point of view is enlightened and many of the insights are valuable. Though there is evidence of considerable research in The Better Half, research is not necessarily scholarship. As Karl Mannheim has noted: ". . . even a slightly deeper study of social phenomena proves that naive observation of facts does not suffice because sociological conditions mostly appear in a distorted form, and it requires theory, knowledge and trained observation, to unmask them, and interpret their vicissitudes as a function of the underlying processes." It is this angle of vision that is lacking in most works on women and the result is a perpetuation of assumptions. One of the most pervasive is that women were historically invisible—outside past societies—and are only now coming into their own. As Mary Beard notes:

FREE! With every new subscription to THE NATION

RUSSIA AT WAR

by Alexander Werth. 1,100 pp. Avon Publications.
Paperback Edition, list price $1.65

A classic of war reporting by the distinguished European correspondent of The Nation which was on the bestseller list for weeks on first publication.

> " . . . no nation in the history of battle ever suffered more than the Russians suffered in the course of the Second World War. At least 20 million lost their lives. . . . A third of the nation's territory, including nearly two-thirds of its industrial base, was turned into a wasteland—a loss equivalent to the devastation of all this country east of Chicago. . . ."
>
> —President John F. Kennedy, June 10, 1963
>
> " . . . an extraordinary book, one of the most important books yet written about World War II and certainly the most important yet written about the Russian-German War."
>
> —Orville Prescott, New York Times
>
> "There is no book in any language with which to compare Alexander Werth's monumental but exceedingly readable and controversial history of the Nazi-Soviet war, that four-year struggle in the East which, in the words of Churchill, 'tore the guts out of the German Army.' "
>
> —Joseph Barnes, Life
>
> "The best book we probably shall ever have in English on Russia at war."
>
> —William L. Shirer

For your FREE copy of RUSSIA AT WAR, fill out the subscription coupon below and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of RUSSIA AT WAR.

☐ One year, $10 ☐ Two years, $18 ☐ 6 months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ________________

ADDRESS ________________

CITY ________________ STATE ________ ZIP No. ________

11-7-66

> . . . women merely dropped out of the pen portraits. They remained in the actuality. They were members of all the castes from the slave stratum at the bottom to the ruling families at the top and, even where restrictions were the tightest, took part in nearly everything that went on in the world.

On a smaller scale, there is the persistent assumption that the leaders of the suffrage movement were caricatures. Sinclair, though sympathetic to their cause, cannot resist the fad for curbstone psychoanalysis, attributing homosexual tendencies to Susan B. Anthony and marital disillusionment to Elizabeth Cady Stanton, as motivating factors for ideological action. To quote Mannheim again: "We are still at the stage in which we talk about the apple and rarely mention the laws of gravity."

And finally, Sinclair contrives an assumption of his own, in fitting the facts of the suffrage movement into his construct of small-town versus city, as a cultural theme. Thus, the most sophisticated, the most radical, the most intellectual of the leaders, Susan B. Anthony, is characterized as follows:

> . . . she displayed a fundamental belief in American rural values that was extraordinary in an educated and emancipated woman. Her hatred of the city and its ways, her belief that only the land was good, her simple ideas on the running of a government, her bias against intellectual life, and her contempt for the expanding commerce that was to develop the continent betray her underlying conservatism and her sentiment for a lost heritage. . . . But such beliefs made her useless in her attempts to secure the backing of slum or factory women. . . . In fact, her novelty was, as was that of Elizabeth Stanton, to believe in the literal words of the Declaration of Independence.

This about the editor of Revolution which spoke for the exploited woman worker and the social outcast! And one has to be an Englishman to imagine that belief "in the literal words of the Declaration of Independence" could spell conservatism at any period.

Abortion on Demand

ABORTION. By Lawrence Lader. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 212 pp. $5.95.

EDWIN M. SCHUR

Mr. Schur is a professor of sociology at Tufts University. His most recent book is Crimes Without Victims (Prentice-Hall).

Writing in these pages eleven years ago ["The Abortion Racket: Product of Laggard Law," March 5, 1955] I commented that Frederick Taussig's 1936 description of our "ostrich-like" refusal to face the facts of abortion was then still, unfortunately, a most apt one. It is a sad commentary on processes of rational socio-legal change that today—thirty years after Taussig wrote—the situation, at least officially, is little altered. True, the "conspiracy of silence" to which Lawrence Lader alludes in his new book is gradually being breached. Professional groups (both medical and legal) are beginning to demand a more critical scrutiny of the problem, and policy makers have even taken a few hesitant steps in the direction of actual legal reform. Nonetheless, the stark fact remains that abortion continues to be outlawed under American law.

Mr. Lader has performed a real service in providing the general reader with a well-documented and lucid discussion of all aspects of the abortion problem. He has done an extremely thorough job of researching his subject, yet presents his findings in nontechnical, readable form, largely avoiding the sensationalism which often characterizes books on such controversial topics. Case studies, statistics, general medical knowledge, historical and comparative data, and social and ethical perspectives are sensibly interwoven by the author to give a comprehensive and forceful picture of what he rightly terms "the system."

One of the striking features of the system has been a "mythology of fear." Perhaps because of lurid publicity given to cases of illegal abortion, few Americans seem to have become aware that "hospital abortion [in the early stages of pregnancy] has become one of the simplest and safest of all operations in recent decades," and considerable evidence exists that there need not even be adverse psychological aftereffects; such reactions, as Lader points out, may be culturally induced.

The gist of the "system" however, seems to be to keep hospital (i.e., safe) abortions at a minimum. In this connection, Lader analyzes the experience of various hospitals in developing special boards and procedures for the processing of abortion applications. As he rightly notes, the abortion board serves to restrict the number of approved hospital operations. I find that Lader is a bit severe in his criticism of doctors for maintaining such boards. Considering their extremely precarious legal position with respect to abortions, it is hardly surprising if physicians have developed these protective group-decision mechanisms. Similarly, Lader seems to exaggerate the role of the "board system" in creating an abortion situation which discriminates against the lower classes. Surely, here too the ultimate and major blame must lie at the center of the entire system—the repressive and senseless laws. As long as most abortions are defined as illegal unless necessary to "preserve the life of the mother," whatever procedures hospitals adopt, the bulk of abortions are bound to be illegal ones, and lower-class women will suffer the most. Of course these are simply questions of emphasis. Lader is well aware of the relation between the hospital rules and the broader legal proscriptions, a relation which does quite definitely come across in his book. And he may be quite right in charging physicians with the responsibility to challenge and test existing laws at every possible juncture. Certainly the physician who refuses a woman's application for a hospital abortion cannot evade personal moral responsibility for the likely consequences of such a ruling—her obtaining an illegal abortion, at far greater risk.

Lader shows very clearly that the legal limitations on hospital abortion (in which we find non-physicians telling physicians what is "therapeutic" and what is not) are utterly unworkable. Humanitarian indications (such as rape and incest) and eugenic indications (such as German measles early in pregnancy) are not allowed, and psychiatric indications are extremely difficult to determine and apply. (According to the letter of the law, abortion usually would be permissible only on psychiatric grounds where a "valid" danger of suicide could be shown to exist.) Under official policy, socio-economic factors, no matter how pressing, are held to be completely irrelevant to whether a termination of pregnancy might be considered "therapeutic." Studies summarized by Lader show that hospitals have in fact been performing some abortions which—if the letter of the law were strictly applied—would have to be acknowledged as illegal. This does support his argument that by adopting more lenient policies hospitals could usefully "stretch" the accepted (if not, technically, legal) indications for therapeutic abortion. One hospital he cites has simply gone ahead and taken an extremely liberal stance on this question—thus far, with no legal interference.

Lader's account provides much useful comparative material, demonstrating that the more permissive policies in other countries have not led to any of the horrible consequences so often detailed by critics of liberal abortion laws. He also offers an interesting exploration of the religious background and support for our present policies, expressing hope that recent statements by some Catholic spokesmen favoring the acceptance of pluralism in public-policy realms may bode well for the future of reform proposals.

Lader notes with approval both proposals for modifying existing therapeutic abortion laws to allow wider indications, and the more radical argument that women should not ever be compelled to bear unwanted children — that abortion should be available "on demand." Of course, as Lader's book eloquently shows, we have abortion on demand now. The only matters really in dispute are the auspices under which such operations shall be performed, and the attitude society shall express toward aborting women. It is to be hoped that Lader's excellent study will convince many people of the futility, hypocrisy and inhumanity involved in labeling such women "criminals." With the time ripe for a change in these outmoded laws, this book might well play a substantial role in bringing about a humane and sensible reform of public policy.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

George Kaufman's The Butter and Egg Man continues the "festival of American plays" at the Cherry Lane Theatre. Kaufman had a sardonic humor which he dissolved in Broadway sirup and soda water, a mixture that guaranteed popularity in the twenties. The period was both heartless and sentimental, murderous and gay, corrupt and juvenilely agitated.

Kaufman's talent consisted in his ability to sort other people's notions into surefire constructions. He knew nothing so well as stage mechanics and was able to infuse them with a spirit wholly characteristic of New York in his day.

The Butter and Egg Man, the only play he wrote without somebody to supply him with subject matter, reveals Kaufman joking about his chief concern: show business. Since the material is limited, the result is flimsy. It is nevertheless replete with facile gags, most of them amiably mirthful, assembled with transparent proficiency. We anticipate their coming and laugh at their punctual arrival.

When the play was done in 1925 it was accepted as a realistic comedy. Now it is quaint farce. It is ably directed by Burt Shevelove who has a penchant for Times Square rococo, vintage gimcracks daubed in camp color. Vicki Cummings conveys the Kaufman spleen deftly. The customary sweets—the nice boy and girl —are pleasantly served by Tyne Daly and David Christmas.

The Rose Tattoo is Tennessee Williams' most sanguine play. In it his mysticism—awe at the centrality of the sex act —is affectionately celebrated. There is also a covert irony in the play: friendly mockery at American inhibition in regard to the libido as contrasted with the Italians' honest sensuality. This gratifies our audiences almost as much as does the wistfulness of The Glass Menagerie. But even in The Rose Tattoo—all red wine and roses—Williams sounds a deeper note, a feeling for the fierce sanctity of carnal commitment.

This aspect of the play was missed in its first production (1950) and it is still diluted at the City Center. Directors are so pleased to display Williams in a mood of open humor that they obscure the play's more mature complexion. For all that, in view of the brief rehearsal period permitted by the City Center schedule, Milton Katselas has done a most commendable job of direction.

The tempo is a bit too hectic, the characterizations a little too broad but the production as a whole is coherently warm hearted. It is well cast throughout. Harry Guardino is the truck driver with the face of a clown and the body of a god. His performance is animated by boyish guilelessness, a sweet ebullience. Maria Tucci glows with Madonna-like passion and purity. Christopher Walken as the virgin sailor provokes no snickers; on the contrary he inspires cordial regard.

The triumph of the occasion, transfiguring it into an outstanding event, is Maureen Stapleton. Miss Stapleton was excellent when she played the central role originally but now she brings to it a fullness of experience as person and actress which proves my oft-repeated contention that she is among the four or five of our finest actresses.

She reminds me of Laurette Taylor, the true poet among American players of our time. Stapleton is vulnerability and valor, tremulous sensibility, with an unsuspected potential of strength, profound womanliness, innocence and a cleansing humor that springs from earthy simplicity, the rugged common sense of the natural person. Her skill is not "technique": it is the flower of truth arising from the rich loam of an unspoiled humanity.

This lyric genius occasionally quivers uneasily through some lack of confidence. Here and there I feel the actress verging on hysteria, especially as the rehearsal circumstances and the drive of the direction push her toward it. But there is more to the phenomenon than just that; it has something to do with a quality to be found in many of our best actresses.

The "nervousness" I refer to may even be detected in Barbara Harris. She dominates and is indeed the only justification for The Apple Tree at the Shubert Theatre. The show consisting of three one-act musical sketches based on stories by Mark Twain, Frank Stockton and Jules Feiffer, is borscht-circuit comedy in elaborate and expensive trappings—except for the first piece, "The Diary of Adam and Eve," in which I imagine costly scenery was dispensed with along with nudity. Jerry Bock's lyrics are flat. Sheldon Harnick's score is savorless, a fact which may not be noticed because of its suave orchestration and a superior sound system. There is barely a trace of true dancing in the show, and the fun is spread

WORLD'S BEST?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)

☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022

Name

Address

City State Zip

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 11-7-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP NO.

very thin. There is only Barbara Harris.

In the Adam and Eve bit, with Alan Alda as a good-natured and most likable Adam, abetted by the roguishly urbane Larry Blyden as the Snake, Miss Harris is a charmingly cute, effortlessly shrewd little girl. Her best "acting" is in the delivery of Oh, To Be a Star in "Passionella" (the evening's final episode) in which her clowning achieves an adorably grotesque poignancy. There is also a second and thoroughly futile number called The Lady or the Tiger in which we are permitted to espy Miss Harris' fetching anatomy, in the display of which she appears to be needlessly shy.

None of this however struck me as forcibly as the realization that Miss Harris' allure—and though no "beauty" Miss Harris has a positive allure—is due to the hurt underlying the wit of her mimicry. Miss Harris, unknowingly no doubt, covers some inner uneasiness by a perfectly adjusted comic mask. She finds salvation in the irony of her disguise. Constrained to play-act, she assumes divers theatrical false faces because if she didn't she would be unable to recognize herself. This fortunate escape, this covered and well-concealed wound, gives her a lyric pathos that moves us even though we imagine that all she does is amuse us. The great comedian is always more than just funny.

Though they differ widely one from another, I observed similar pathos (the "nervousness" I have alluded to) in Jeanne Eagels, in Pauline Lord, in Laurette Taylor, in Judy Holliday, and I discern it today not only in Maureen Stapleton and Barbara Harris but in Barbra Streisand, Kim Stanley, Julie Harris, Geraldine Page and several others. English actresses of equal abilities, no matter what their subjective state, make steadier professional and social adjustments. They rise to a realm somewhere outside themselves as private persons. They have accepted their roles on the stage and in society as their true fulfillment. The actresses I have named seem to tremble, sob or bleed under the composure of their art. It gives them a special vibration which generally affects me more than the admirable iron of the English actresses' competence. What it is in our theatre and in our civilization which causes the difference is an interesting question.

The freeze of feeling needed for the proper articulation of modern madcap comedy is present in Henry Livings' Eh? but not sufficiently so in its production at the Circle in the Square.

Livings is one of the English playwrights who resolve the recent British confusion in coldly wild farce. Nearly all his plays point to one source of the insanity by being placed in some industrial environment: a factory lavatory, an electric appliance shop, an army kitchen. Eh? takes place in the boiler room of a dye works. (Haven't the English yet accommodated themselves to the industrial age?)

We are introduced to a foreman whose main concern is keeping the surrounding street air clear of the black smoke from the electric heaters, a minister who acts as censor to punish such contamination, a spinster secretary whose brain is cracked by Freudian terminology, not to speak of suppressed desires. Into this triangular establishment (where also a Hindu assistant hovers in grimy gnomic mystification) comes a zany workman who abhors work but requires employment. His real preoccupation is the growing of mushrooms which come to glorious fruition even in the midst of the industrial inferno. (All this, one sees, is symbolic of contemporary England.) The fumbling, bumbling employee is later joined by a lusty little wench of a fiancée who clamors for the final rites of wedlock. The presence of these two, particularly that of the little man bedeviled by all the tics and tremors of our total latter-day disaffection, makes for a topsy-turvy scene in which the guiding principle is discontinuity taken more or less as a norm.

Livings makes no overt comment: poker faced and dry, he writes as if bent on nothing more than the recording of a routine process temporarily unhinged by odd accidents. The effect is bewilderingly comic though the proceedings would gain much if they were cut by at least half an hour. They would also be more telling if the actors' speech were more authentically regional. Such speech even in London serves as a species of "alienation" which is required for these farces just as traditionally stylized make-up and costumes were necessary for the old Italian comedy.

Both in speech and manner most of the cast are too close to "life," though Dustin Hoffman, with his absent air and a faint smile on his face, as if something were going on inside himself he couldn't identify, manages to catch something of the play's style: personified automation gone haywire. Elizabeth Wilson as the secretary has a quietly dislocated humor, and Alexandra Berlin adds a touch of attractively grubby folksiness like an intrusion from a now almost forgotten world to the quirks and wrenches of this wry entertainment.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

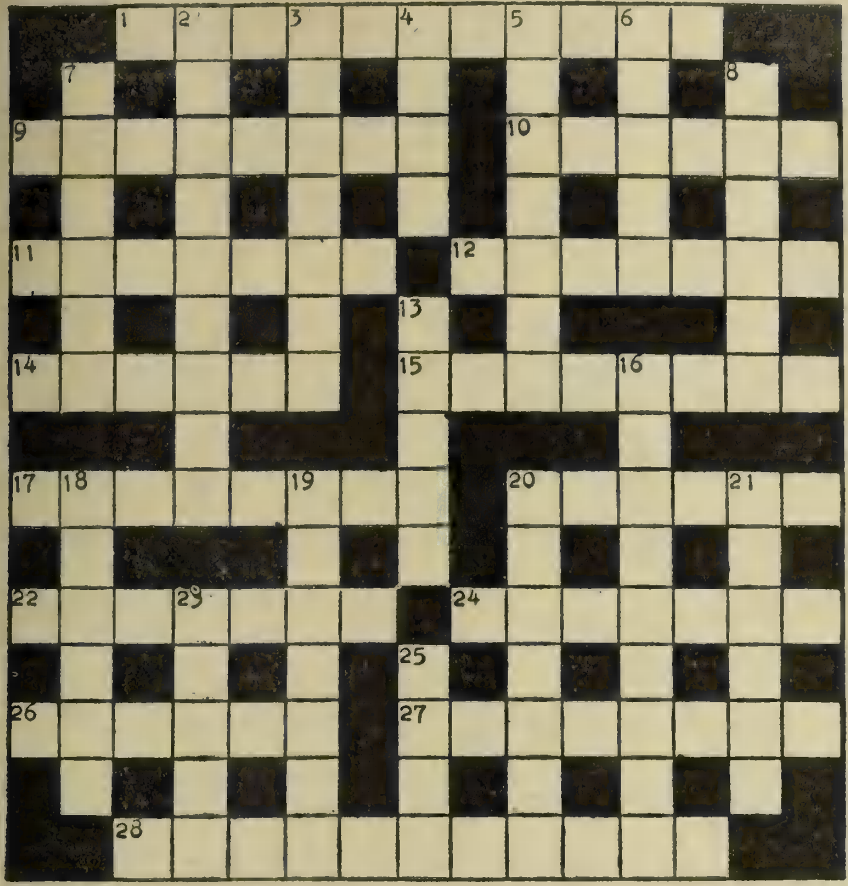
They've launched Lynn Redgrave, younger daughter of Sir Michael, with the force of a man being shot from a cannon, and it is a good thing she has talent or the eruption into eminence would have stunned her. As it is, one wonders where she will go from instant stardom. Georgy Girl, a sick Cinderella story, was tailored for her style and gifts—a big girl whose baby fat is holding on rather tenaciously, who nevertheless moves like a dancer, has mastered a formidable repertory of emotional quick changes and can mug ferociously. It remains to be seen whether she is to become another of those lady clowns who, at what personal cost one never knows, capitalize on their native ineptitude, or whether she can trim her person and temper her manual of stage exercises to the dimensions of dramatic performance. Right now, she is a tough kitten on a romp; it is accomplished extravagance, but it can't very well be repeated.

And Georgy Girl is a tough comedy; as fierce as it is hilarious. The English these days have a matter-of-fact way of slugging one another in the ego that is not paralleled over here. We're killers, too, but we are also justifiers and guilt collectors: unadorned domestic karate, with no backward glance, catches us in our breath. It may be that the implacability with which England built its empire has been redirected by the post-Suez generation to personal relations. Or perhaps the British have always treated one another this way (Jane Austen threw a very quick punch), and it now only seems more ruthless because they are no longer training themselves to drill the sepoys.

In Georgy Girl, Miss Redgrave plays odd girl out (temporarily in) to the cool of Alan Bates and Charlotte Rampling, and nymphet to the middle-aged gush of James Mason. In the first guise she is a campfire girl tenting in a very hip pad; in the second she is as professional as any of her sisters along Piccadilly. The fun, sometimes spiced and sometimes blurred by the Keystone gymnastics which director Silvio Narizzano has injected to keep his cast in somersaults and his audience in stitches, is to watch her shift from neophyte to technician. Georgy has had an odd upbringing (too complicated to document here); she understands men, but what she doesn't dig is boys. She also understands how to get the show rolling (as why wouldn't she?); if she has learned more than that, a second film should show it.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1174

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Sagging, like some pillows, perhaps. (11)

9 Make it sit the hard way for such people. (8)

10 and 3 down What the states are to countries might be un-abbreviated. (6, 7)

11 Look carefully about the edges of the lake, perhaps. (7)

12 Obviously a foreign body! (7)

14 They might be lucky when one stands in line for coffee! (6)

15 and 23 down Suggests a southern playboy, but supposed to be harmless in play. (8, 5)

17 Bookish, but what does one expect after losing at 25! (8)

20 See 28 across

22 Wagered some change? It's a darn nuisance! (7)

24 Peace classically broken, seen about the same way in broad vista. (7)

26 A couple of play-fellows from here, in the river on a yacht. (7)

27 See 2 down

28 and 20 across People are not likely to have toast on an empty stomach with it. (5-6, 6)

DOWN:

2 and 27 The sound of 23 was responsible, concerning what might come from the watch and the Rhine, perhaps. (2, 4, 3, 3, 5)

3 See 10 across

4 With Wagner, did she have a dream for sale? (4)

5 Not so much of a smoothie, but sounds as though one might take a trick. (7)

6 Players have them—specifically Shakespearean players. (5)

7 Wall-speaker, if hopefully good-looking. (6)

8 Did this family start out with the doctoring business? (6)

13 A large order? (5)

16 Echo-like? (9)

18 Winds and deals? (6)

19 Some extra money in the till, but perhaps can't be used to good effect! (7)

20 The second and third letter are too little by 7. (7)

21 One who might decide the parts of a wheel? (6)

23 See 15 across

25 When the dust settles, still the boss! (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1173

ACROSS: 1 and 6 Washington Post; 10 Stand-in; 11 Toccata; 12 Rissoles; 13 Units; 15 and 1 down Otherwise; 17 Mineshaft; 19 Starlings; 21 and 23 Determines; 24 Confound; 27 Illness; 28 Opinion; 29 Surd; 30 Continence. DOWN: 2 and 25 Spanish onion; 3 Indus; 4 Gentleman; 5 Oaths; 7 Ocarina; 8 Transitory; 9 Accursed; 14 and 26 Housemaid's knee; 16 Relishes; 18 Nosing out; 20 Annular; 22 Tension; 24 Cisco.

EDUCATIONAL

THE THOREAU SCHOOL. Five day boarding, grades five through eight. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of country living. School bus brings your children home weekends to New York City. Now enrolling for opening September, 1967. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. Phone: 914-895-5523.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

PUBLICATIONS

HISTORY IN THE RAW: LBJ's WAR

The lessons of Korea (30,000 U. S. dead for a stalemate truce), versus "Can't shove us out." Flea guerrillas versus The Gorillas. For good deeds done, today's body-count. Presidents can be recalled. Andrew Johnson got it for less? Too much LBJ? If party repudiated mid-term, why not resign? For this, much more see HISTORY IN THE RAW, cloth, postpaid $6.

GEORGE CLURG
Box 2306, San Diego, Calif. 92112

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

FREE LITERATURE on Buddhist philosophy. Write to: Buddhist Publication Society, Kandy, Ceylon.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime. anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

PUBLISHER'S EDITORIAL ADVISOR. Well-known writer, analyses and aids in revising manuscripts. French-English. Box 596, c/o The Nation.

COOPERATIVE LIVING aimed at a permanent community patterned after B. F. Skinner's Walden Two. Write: Walden House, Box 8971, Washington, D.C.

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

"The war in Vietnam is one of the most barbarous wars in history" — U Thant

SICK OF THE WAR?

Every day brings new evidence that Washington is preparing another massive escalation of the war in Vietnam after the November 8 elections. But during Secretary McNamara's recent visit to Vietnam, Sgt. Henry Pott told a New York Post reporter (Oct. 15, 1966, dispatch) of the "sadistic" position in which our escalation places our soldiers. He ended up saying: "The only way we'll get all the Viet Cong is to take every man between 10 and 60 and line them up and shoot every one."

This period may mark a major turning point in the Vietnam war and in American history. Discussion, criticism and protest must not be silenced during this election time — or afterward. We must let Washington know that opposition to the war by Americans will continue to mount.

Join us in a NATIONAL MOBILIZATION NOVEMBER 5 through 8 for Peace in Vietnam, for Economic Justice and for Human Rights

There will be protests, leafleting, and other anti-war activity in the following cities or areas (list in formation):

New Orleans, La.
Atlanta, Ga.
San Francisco and Bay Area, Calif.
Cleveland, Ohio
Albuquerque, New Mex.
Eugene, Ore.
Madison, Wisc.
Harrisburg, Pa.
Philadelphia, Pa.
Yellow Springs, Ohio
Baton Rouge, La.
Washington, D. C.
Boston, Mass.
New York, N. Y.
Pittsburgh, Pa.
Pullman, Wash.
Portland, Ore.
Amherst, Mass.
Los Angeles, Calif.
Ithaca, N. Y.
Gainesville, Fla.
Baltimore, Md.
Detroit, Mich.
Chicago, Ill.
Nashville, Tenn.
Spokane, Wash.
Providence, R. I.
Hartford, Conn.
Ann Arbor, Mich.
Minneapolis, Minn.
Houston, Texas

NOVEMBER 8 MOBILIZATION COMMITTEE

107 Dryden Road Ithaca, New York 14850 Tel.: 607-273-7158

Barbara Bick
Robert Greenblatt
Sidney Peck
Ed Keating
Otto Nathan
Gordon Christiansen
Jerry Grossman
Sumner Rosen
Carl Oglesby
Sandy Leigh
Simon Casady
Jack Spiegel
Donald Duncan
Herbert Aptheker
Sidney Lens
Franklin Alexander
Fred Halstead
Lew Jones
Floyd McKissick
Gus Horowitz
Father Philip Berrigan, S.S.J.
Mrs. Coretta (Martin Luther) King, Jr.
Glenn Smiley
Stanley Sheinbaum
W. H. Ferry
Marvin Gettleman
Deidre Griswold
Ivanhoe Donaldson
Bradford Lyttle
Bronson Clark
Paul Olynyk
Harrop Freeman
Howard Zinn
Staughton Lynd
Robert Browne
Kay Boyle

Please clip and mail — FUNDS URGENTLY NEEDED

NOVEMBER 8 MOBILIZATION COMMITTEE
107 Dryden Road, Ithaca, N. Y. 14850

I enclose .... to help pay the costs of this mobilization.

Name ....

Address ....

City............... State........ Zip......

A. J. MUSTE, Chairman
5 Beekman Street, New York, N. Y.
212-CO 7-3261

PATRICIA J. GRIFFITH
Administrative Secretary

FRANK EMSPAK, Field Secretary

'WHISKY-PRIEST' POETS PAUL ZWEIG

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 14, 1966 35 cents

NOV 12

BURLINGAME
PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.

THE BOBBY PHENOMENON

JACK NEWFIELD

AMERICANS VIEW THE WAR

'To Get the Truth . . . I Just Don't Know'

ROBERT S. JOHNSON

The Children

MAURICE R. BERUBE   KENNELL JACKSON, Jr.   MURRAY POLNER

•

Poems by Children

ER NEW
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

peace or prosperity

Beaver Falls, Pa.

Dear Sirs: Peace candidates are weak in part because they offer no alternative to military means to insure a prosperous society in an age where new industries are shrinking. Johnson and Kennedy both failed to develop any plans for peacetime prosperity beyond the creation of a large white-collar class and filling up the colleges. The blueprint for such a plan has often been stated in your columns: increased trade with the Communist states, and great public works. I am waiting for an imaginative peace candidate who will accompany his hopes for peace with such a blueprint, and I believe he will go places when he appears. . . .

Theodore A. Tenor

something out there

Clinton, Mass.

Dear Sirs: I do not think your attitude as revealed in the editorial [Oct. 31] "Can Dr. Condon See It Through?" is either honest or even worthy of The Nation. . . . Clearly, you feel that the whole UFO subject is the product of "the times" and can and will be explained by proper psychological study. I, personally, cannot believe you would take this stance, if you had really given this subject the careful looking into it deserves.

I believe something very strange is "out there," because some twelve years ago I just happened to get a good, clear look at three of them. In broad daylight, too. But, more important, I believe that something is there because not a few scientists of reputation also believe this. Some of them have also seen the "things."

Personally, I don't give a damn whether these "things" are from Mars or China! But I do give a damn that a magazine dedicated to the truth should so obviously go off the deep end on this subject. . . .

Albert H. Baller stays with us

Melrose Park, Pa.

Dear Sirs: I was actually going to let my subscription expire! You know: so many things to read, these days. But the last few issues, with the articles, etc., on China and the one on Johnson—The Nation stays.

Sylvia R. Freedland

correction

A regrettable typographical error occurred in the review by Frederick H. Gardner of Dashiell Hammett's The Big Knockover [The Nation, Oct. 31]. Mr. Gardner had stated correctly that Hammett died in January, 1961; the printed version gave the year of his death as 1960.—Editor hard words

New York City

Dear Sirs: It was generous of Harvey Swados to write in your issue of Oct. 10 ["Marx and Shame: Socialism Today"] that "old-time contributors to Communist publications like Victor Perlo and Herbert Aptheker do have something to contribute" in a Socialist Scholars Conference. This lavish admission is immediately followed, however, by the remark that Mr. Swados seems to fear the conference kowtowed "to those whose contributions to socialism have consisted primarily in character assassination."

(Continued on page 516)

EDITORIALS

The Elephant Is Tempted

The place was Boise, Ida., the scene a hotel room; the time a week before the election; the hour 4:29 A.M. The restless former Vice President, out campaigning for Republican nominees, awakens with a start and summons his traveling staff to an immediate conference. According to The Wall Street Journal, the purpose of Mr. Nixon's predawn conference was to plan "a counterattack against the claims of accomplishment" President Johnson was certain to advance on returning from his seventeen-day election swing through the Pacific. A day or two later in Philadelphia, Mr. Nixon announced that the leaders of both parties should meet with the President, in a bipartisan cold-war summit, as soon after the election as possible to plan "a strategy for victory." If some such conference is not held, and if the war in Vietnam drags on, then the Republican Party might be "grievously tempted" to run a candidate on a peace platform in 1968.

Just think of that! The opposition party forced by circumstances to function as an opposition party—grievously tempted to adopt the position which in 1952 enabled it to walk away with the Presidential election! To be shocked from bed at 4:29 A.M. by the thought that Lyndon Baines Johnson intended, in the final weeks of the campaign, to protect his exposed "peace" flank, is a measure of the bemused state of GOP leadership. As Time pointed out some weeks back, the Republicans, in trying to sound like hawks and doves, have managed only to sound like "dawks."

A similar befuddlement is shown in the shocked reactions of the Republican leadership to the extraordinary spread of the "housewives' rebellion" against rising food prices in the final weeks of the campaign. Caught off balance by the success of this movement, Republican spokesmen have expressed concern that those impetuous housewives were directing their fire at the wrong target—namely, the food processors and chains—and not at the Administration! But have these same spokesmen forgotten the effective use that Republican nominee Dwight Eisenhower made of high food prices in 1952? The Republicans may pick up twenty seats or sixty in this election, but any gains they make will be richly undeserved. A more striking example of the failure of an opposition party to oppose could hardly be imagined than the GOP's performance in this year's election. "To say where the government leaves off," writes Robert A. Dahl (Political Oppositions in Western Democracies, 1966) "and the opposition begins is (today) an exercise in metaphysics." If we were frank with ourselves, as an electorate, we would be forced to concede that this year's campaign was conducted without benefit of an opposition.

The Boycotts

One point may be raised to mitigate the sins of the food industry. It does not gouge the public as unconscionably as does the residential fuel oil industry. All over the United States the price of light fuel oil is regionally the same at retail outlets, down to the last tenth of a cent per gallon.

JAN

Moreover, as the volume of sales increases with the coming of cold weather, the price does not go down: it is jacked up. Obviously the local dealers do not fix prices all by themselves. The great oil combines not only furnish the oil but also the price guidance. In such a situation, without government help the consumer is impotent. He can boycott—if he doesn't mind getting pneumonia in the process.

Unable to engage in daylight robbery on this pattern, the food industry has relied on the supposed sheeplike acquiescence of the unorganized consumer to retain control. Especially the woman consumer, who has been pictured as wandering in a trance along the supermarket aisles, filling her cart with goodies and God-blessing America at every step. She has surprised everyone, most of all the officials at the chain headquarters, who have reacted as if a python had suddenly come out of the air conditioning and wound itself around their necks. Who, us? Why, we make only a cent, or a cent and a half, on the dollar. As far as the women on the picket lines are concerned, that only proves that a business can be highly profitable on small margin when the volume is high enough. Or, in the words of Business Week, "when the housewife provides enough will, the store owner finds a way"—to reduce prices.

The retailers may, as they assert, be getting more than their share of the blame. The Federal Trade Commission has found that the processors are as responsible as the retailers for high food prices. But the housewife cannot hit back at anyone but the grocer and butcher. She doesn't deal with the distributor, the processor or the farmer. The unhappy store manager may not be acquainted with these people either, but his boss knows them. Quite often the corporation is the processor as well as the retailer; sometimes it is even the farmer.

It may be that the revolt now in progress is only a palliative, but the short-term effects are startling. It seems we had lost the concept of political economy, which in John Stuart Mill's day was a duality taught in all the schools. The housewives have rediscovered the connection. They are engaged in political action to curb inflation where it hits them personally. It works. Prices are not a great immovable fact of nature. Men make prices, and women can unmake them.

The Republicans see price escalation as a useful campaign topic, but deplore the boycotts because they are directed at business instead of at the Democratic candidates. The connection between the price of food and the cost of the war in Vietnam is real enough (it is another aspect of political economy), but the Republicans do not find it convenient to establish that relationship. They would keep to the vague premise that Democrats are fiscal incompetents.

Barry Goldwater, however, is able to see the international implications; he has offered to lay odds that the rebellious housewives "are being led by left-wing groups," recruited by—guess who. La Pasionaria? No: Mrs. Esther Peterson, special assistant to President Johnson for consumer affairs. Her reply was that Mr. Goldwater's statement demonstrated "again the insensitivity of the Republican Party to the needs and problems of American citizens." Insensitivity? It is the understatement of the campaign.

IN THIS ISSUE

November 14, 1966

EDITORIALS

498

ARTICLES

502 Americans View the War:
'To Get the Truth . . . I Just Don't Know' — Robert S. Johnson
505 The Bobby Phenomenon — Jack Newfield
508 As Many as God Sends?
Family Planning in Mexico — Margaret Larkin
512 Letter from Australia — Hugh Weston
513 The Medicare Bonanza — Selig Greenberg

BOOKS & THE ARTS

517 The American Outsider — Paul Zweig
519 Austrian Empire World — Michael Hamburger
520 Death in the Schools — Maurice R. Berube
520 I Don't Mind (poem) — Carolyn Jackson
521 Reducing Kids to Dust — Kennell Jackson, Jr.
522 War (poem) — Sarah Mason
522 I Am Mississippi Fed (poem) — Ida Ruth Griffin
523 How To Survive Childhood — Murray Polner
523 Theatre — Harold Clurman
524 Art — Max Kozloff
526 Films — Robert Hatch
526 The Cowgirl Ball (poem) — Michael Silverton
527 Crossword Puzzle — Frank W. Lewis

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON
Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher
ANNE C. ABRAMOVITZ Assistant

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 16

Those Missing Exhibits

The photographs and X-rays taken of President Kennedy's body at the autopsy after the assassination have been turned over to National Archives by the Kennedy family—fourteen X-rays, twenty-five black-and-white negatives and twenty-six 4-by-5-inch color transparencies. The mystery of the missing exhibits, first brought to public notice with careful attention to detail by Jacob Cohen in these pages ("The Vital Documents," The Nation, July 11), has now been cleared up. The photographic material turned up, as Mr. Cohen suggested it might, in the possession of the Kennedy family.

Much of the wild speculation about the assassination, and the controversy over the Warren Commission Report, might have been obviated if these exhibits (which would clearly have been offered in evidence if Oswald had been placed on trial) had been turned over to the Warren Commission. Chief Justice Warren did see them, but neither the staff nor the other members of the commission had a chance to study them. Close restrictions have been placed on the availability of the exhibits; they will be open to federal law-enforcement agencies (the FBI) but scholars and other unofficial investigators will have to secure permission before inspecting the exhibits, and first indications are that such permissions will not be granted for a period of five years. News media representatives may have to wait even longer before gaining access to the exhibits. This would seem to repeat the mistake that was made in the first instance; the restrictions will simply invite further speculation and controversy. Eventually the public may learn what if any light the exhibits shed on controversial aspects of the Warren Report but the sooner they can be inspected by responsible scholars and investigators—and the news media—the better it will be for all concerned.

Duty To Say 'No'

Charles de Gaulle, if fate had not called him to be a world statesman, could have been a schoolmaster of formidable gifts. As it is, he loses few opportunities to instruct the world community, and he devises ingenious lessons for the purpose.

The most recent case in point is the revised French military code of discipline which will go into effect on January 1. Ordinarily, such a document would have only domestic significance, and some of the articles in the revised code—a man in uniform may now smoke a pipe, wear a beard and mustache, need not salute his superior officers in public places, may carry a package, but is still forbidden (this odd denial of gallantry) to give a lady his arm or kiss his parents in public—are of concern only to Frenchmen called to the colors.

But these are details of amendment; the revolution in this new code of discipline lies in the area of obedience. A French soldier is no longer enjoined to carry out his orders "literally and without hesitation or murmur." Henceforth he may refuse—indeed, he must refuse—to obey any illegal command. What is an illegal command? It is one that violates the Geneva Convention. And does the Geneva Convention cover guerrilla forces or only regular troops? Guerrillas, says the new code very precisely, are on exactly the same footing as the fighting men of a national army, "provided they have a program, an organization and a leader." From now on, says the code, a soldier must subscribe not to a "passive obedience" but to an "active obedience"; henceforth, "the duty of obedience does not relieve the subordinate of the responsibilities that the law places upon him."

President de Gaulle took the rough draft of the revised code with him on vacation at Colombey and there edited the stipulations and polished the phrasing with his own hand. It is a subject understandably close to his heart, for twice in his career—once when the troops of Hitler held his country and once when the troops of his country were ravaging Algeria—he called on the soldiers of France to defy their commanders in the name of higher principle. But just at this moment, the matter is not urgent: no French troops today are extracting information from enemy prisoners, burning noncombatant villages to flush out alleged partisans, or bombing indiscriminately in the cause of pacification. De Gaulle is clearly encouraging an entirely different set of men to face their responsibilities as human beings. It is not likely that Stars and Stripes will carry the new French code of military discipline, but news of this sort gets from army to army, and there are still Frenchmen in Saigon.

Neither Snow, Nor Rain . . .

In the three years since The Nation ran Stanley E. Cohen's "What Ails the Post Office?" (November 30, 1963) the service has continued to deteriorate. An equally poor showing in any other government department would result in a hue and cry from coast to coast, but the nation is so accustomed to a decrepit post office that only a murmur of complaint comes from the multitude of inconvenienced and injured users. To death and taxes should be added the certainty of bad service from the post office.

Recently the Chicago office suffered a kind of blackout, with millions of pieces of mail, mostly third and fourth class, tied up for periods ranging to more than two weeks. In numerous instances truckers could not get near an unloading dock and finally brought the mail back to the sender. Much of this burden was "junk" mail, but what will happen at Christmas, when the mountains of personal "junk" mail will be added to the sales messages?

Advertising Age was naturally exercised by the Chicago breakdown, but taking a broader view put its finger on the underlying cause. Americans are indebted to James A. Farley (now flooding the world with Coca Cola) for making dogma of the notion that the post office should be operated as a business, services being tailored to profit without concern for the users. The acceptance of this foolish doctrine by successive Presidents has resulted in a steady degradation of the service, despite the struggle of many postmasters and employees to do a decent job.

What other department of the government is told to make a profit and let the service go hang? Agriculture? The Secretary would be in physical danger if he appeared before a gathering of farmers in defense of the kind of service the post office routinely provides. Are the armed services making a profit? Or the Civil Aeronautics Board? Or the judiciary? Yet the average citizen has little to do directly with most departments of the government, while the post office affects his life every day.

No organization can be much better in morale and efficiency than the people who set the tone at the top. In addition to the make-money concept, the post office suffers from the tradition that the Postmaster General must be a political errand boy for the President. Lawrence O'Brien is no worse than his predecessors, but while the service limps along he is out hustling votes for the Democratic Party. The Postmaster General is a member of the Cabinet and should not be treated as the President's majordomo. For their part, Congressmen should stop shortchanging their constituents by acquiescing in the principle that the post office is to be run like a candy store.

Crazy, Man

Something called Autoart, a press agent's gimmick out of Chicago, is about to strike a bizarre blow against the current drive for safety on the road. A young artist named Tom Strobel, abetted by a Chicago Chrysler-Plymouth dealer named Mel Wolff, is now engaged in turning out for public sale a line of cars guaranteed to be aesthetic treats. The paint jobs vary from geometric Op art patterns ("red and blue checks cause a startling optical after-image") to overall floral designs reminiscent of World War I camouflage.

Any motorist who has driven the turnpikes with the sun in his eyes or struggled with the dappled light thrown by bordering trees will receive the news of Mr. Wolff's art patronage with mixed feelings. Selling cars is a dog-eat-dog business and no one can blame a dealer for getting publicity where he can, but if Chryslers and Plymouths painted to look like fields of daisies or eye-twisters out of the avant galleries are now to wheel into the hellbent traffic, Ralph Nader will have to be recalled to action. The campaign to beautify the roadside must stop at the roadside.

Children and Politics

Project Head Start is a preschool program for 4 to 5 year olds. In "Head Start to What?" (The Nation, September 5) Ivor Kraft wrote that Head Start should not be conducted as "a cheap, massive, harum-scarum program buttressed by false claims, publicity stunts, IQ gimmickry, and the pretense of nine-week short courses for 4 year olds as a major means of salvaging Americans from poverty." Mr. Kraft's article drew some sharp retorts from readers, but a full-scale study is in general conformity with his thesis. The study was directed by Dr. Max Wolff of the Center for Urban Education in New York, sponsored by the Ferkauf Graduate School of Education of Yeshiva University, and supported by funds from the Office of Economic Opportunity. Some of the conclusions were favorable: Head Start was found to provide the preschool child with desire for further knowledge. But this gain was rapidly dissipated by poor teaching and uninspiring curriculums in subsequent schooling. "Head Start," Dr. Wolff concluded, "cannot substitute for the long overdue improvement of education in the elementary schools which have failed the Negro and Puerto Rican children."

Under present conditions, the children of the poor are denied both preschool and elementary school education that could give them a fair chance in later life. Oligarchies in the South and elsewhere would prefer to keep them as they are. But whatever their failings, programs of the Head Start type should not be surrendered to reactionary politicians. A tendency in that direction is quite obvious. Writing on "The New Plantations" in the October 24 Nation, Marvin Hoffman and John Mudd described the Child Development Group of Mississippi (CDGM), a virtually all-Negro organization, as "the only poor-controlled and anti-poverty project in the state that has the resources and the orientation to develop into an effective, creative force in the society"—provided Senators John Stennis and James O. Eastland, and their colleagues in the white power structure, North and South, do not have their way.

Like other Head Start programs, CDGM was a project of the Office of Economic Opportunity, headed by Sargent Shriver. For the past two years it had been conducting programs for some 12,000 children in twenty-eight Mississippi counties. Mr. Shriver praised it as an innovative program vitalized by participation of the poor. Last August, however, he changed his mind. Some reports trace Mr. Shriver's turnabout to pressure exerted on the White House by segregationists. This Mr. Shriver indignantly denies. He says he cut off funds after his inspectors had uncovered nepotism, payroll padding, excessive salaries, misuse of cars for civil rights activities, and other irregularities. As a substitute for CDGM, he instituted a new program, Mississippi Action for Progress (MAP). The directors of MAP include two members of the $1,000-a-head President's Club; Aaron Henry, president of the Mississippi branch of the NAACP; and Hodding Carter, editor of the Delta Democratic Times, and a moderate in racial matters.

Some of the asserted irregularities probably existed. What is firmly established, however, is that the charges against CDGM were brought after a decision had been reached to replace it with an organization less objectionable to the white power structure in Mississippi. This would seem to be a clear denial of due process. CDGM should have been given a chance to answer the charges before action was taken, one way or the other.

Walter Reuther, James Farmer, Dr. Martin Luther King, Dr. Joachim Prinz and many other liberal leaders have protested Shriver's procedure. Underlying it there appears to be what Roy Reed, writing for The New York Times (October 23) from Mississippi, described as a feeling among both friends and enemies of CDGM that "a wider issue was whether Federal money should be used to organize blocs of the poor that threaten the traditional control of communities." Mr. Reed says further that "Mr. Carter and other liberals contended that the group went beyond that and had begun teaching a separatist, 'apartheid' philosophy among Negroes, brainwashing them against rising into the middle class and thus making it easier for radical leaders to control them."

The issue is thus one of national scope. If the decision was motivated as its critics assert, and if this is to be the policy henceforth, all the programs of the Office of Economic Opportunity may become outposts of the status quo. Nothing would better please the Stennises and Eastlands and their counterparts all over the country.

AMERICANS VIEW THE WAR

'To Get the Truth . . . I Just Don't Know'

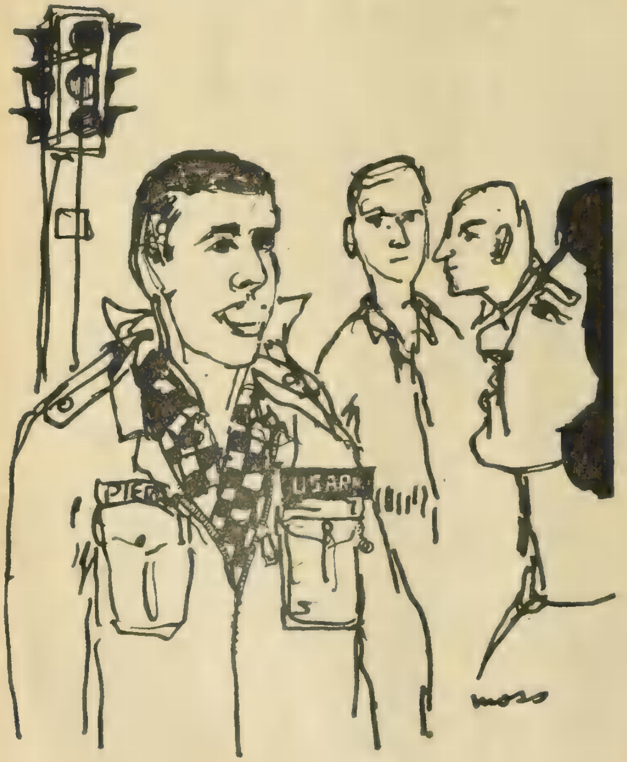
ROBERT S. JOHNSON

Mr. Johnson is publisher of the Auburn (Wash.) Citizen.

Auburn, Wash., is only thirty minutes from the Seattle-Tacoma International Airport, where the Marines enplane for the ten-and-a-half-hour trip to Vietnam. And nearby also is Madigan General Hospital, where casualties from Vietnam are brought home. This geography produces in Auburn an urgency about the war that few towns in America have had thrust upon them.

However, the reaction pattern of the community, tested in six weeks of interviews, is still one of adherence to official propaganda as handled by the Seattle and Tacoma newspapers that circulate in the area.

The Auburn Citizen, a weekly newspaper, has taken a forthright anti-Vietnamese War stand, and the reaction has been full of surprises. The town's power structure in terms of advertising retailers is made up of about 50 per cent of businesses inherited from fathers who fought in the First World War. The sons, when they are not outright Goldwater supporters, fall into line behind President Johnson's war policies, while cursing him for medicare, minimum-wage legislation, civil rights and housing reforms. The city council, comprised preponderantly of businessmen who inveigh against government spending, devotes much of its time to devising applications for federal supports of city projects, among which is the extension of city utilities to a $70 million Boeing plant that is being built near the town.



Responses from even the most pro-war reactionaries have been couched in variations of "I don't know, but it seems. . . ." They feel almost to a man that the news is being managed, and that this government and the Chinese are artificially inflaming the minds of their people with half-truths and angled reports.

Comments from Auburn's citizens indicate that they think the news is being managed to retain popular backing for our participation in Vietnam's struggles, despite the fact that LBJ's criterion for this participation—a stable Vietnamese government—is obviously impossible.

Robert Eskew, employed by a water district association, says in a neighborhood bar: "The only difference between LBJ's Vietnamese policy and Batman is purely semantic."

"I accept the way LBJ's running things—to a certain extent," says Ray Stebner, a speech therapist in the area's schools. That "to a certain extent" is a key proviso. In those random cases where confidence in LBJ is expressed, it is usually qualified by such phrases as "up until lately" or "the last few days I've been thinking it over." To these observers, the Administration is beginning to look increasingly like the surgeon who, in order to operate successfully, must avoid human involvement with the patient. That such a policy goes against the traditions of many Americans is obvious in their troubled comments.

Most of these men are convinced that the news they receive about battles, casualties, victories and retreats is a tissue of P.R. images. Yet they continue to hold opinions which, by their own admissions, are based solely on this tainted information.

"They're covering up," said George Pain, a school counselor and veteran of World War II. "I think we're waging a much deeper war than they're telling us about. If I were the type who ate up this John Birch crap, I'd most likely say the North Vietnamese have no rights. But they do. We should withdraw if the Communists win in a free election. We should retain a little honor. Who are we? How can we play God?"

On the other hand, Pain, the father of five children, active in church work, a bright and alert participant in many local projects, says: "Let's bomb Hanoi. We're justified by stopping communism. We're on the horns of a dilemma; either way we're going to be hurt."

James Rice, Sr., a dairyman who served in France during World War I, is also troubled by the handling of the news: "You read the news and listen to the Fulbright Committee, and you just have to read between the lines. I don't know whether we've been given the exact truth or not. Correspondents seem to talk quite freely. The underlying principle must be a delicate thing, and you can't help but admire the President for keeping our commitment.

"To get the real truth, I don't know. It's such a complex thing, I just don't know. I don't like to see our boys get shot over there unless we can do some good, and I'm beginning to doubt we can. Those people don't think the way we do. The Communists are going to win in the long run—even if we have an election—they will just bide their time and take over in the long run."

The question of an election in Vietnam sticks in the minds as either a ludicrous or a profoundly serious matter. There is little middle ground.

"It looks to me," says Auburn Mayor Gaines, who runs a refrigeration business on the side, "like a free election over there is an impossibility, an insurmountable task. We would really lose face all over the world if we pulled out, though. Yet I have a hard time defining who the Vietnamese people are, and I can see how the newspapers distort things after my small experience in politics."

One of the Mayor's best customers, in case he is having a hard time identifying a Vietnamese, is a woman named Jean Wong who was born in Saigon and now operates a restaurant in Auburn.

"Vietnam is a very rich country," she explains excitedly. "Japan fight for it. China fight for it. French fight for it. Grow everything there. They all want it. I think Vietnam should be independent of the Chinese and the United States—free!"

Mrs. Wong, who is no fool, tried to do business in Saigon, and ended up emigrating. Asked what she liked best about America's Constitution, she unhesitatingly said, "the Fifth Amendment. You can have your own lawyer. You don't have to testify against yourself. You can have bail. It gives you real protection, real freedom."

Two salesmen working on identical jobs, one of them the father of five children, the other father of three, take militantly opposite stands:

H. Don Kupfer, 32, a former printer with one year of college, says: "I think it's a good thing. If I wasn't married and had three kids, I'd join the Army and volunteer. I can't think of a better place to protect the American people."

Sam Williamson, 31, who served in Korea, says: "I don't think there's been enough facts put out for anyone to decide whether we should be there or not. The best years of my life were spent in the Army, and I wish I'd spent 'em somewhere else. Our leaders know what they're doing, but they must have some reason other than fighting communism. We didn't do anything about Hungary and several other small countries. Then all of a sudden we just jump into Vietnam."

The reactivation of the programs to confine conscientious objectors in civilian public service camps, the extension of the draft, and the discussion about drafting college candidates, have stirred a heated exchange in Auburn, where a junior college has recently opened its doors.

"I'm absolutely sick about this college business, not exempting them," said Mrs. Joan Finnigan, president of the State Psychological Association, Division of School Psychology, and a vigorous participant in numerous civic and school efforts. "The army won't take the high school drop-outs if their IQ is below average. Yet many of these boys are clamoring to get in. They come to school and beg for help to get in the Army, not realizing that their IQ is keeping them out. In the meantime they are drafting our college-potential young men.

"This could kill off all our intelligent young people, and pretty soon the country will be run by the less able. There is a future for the mentally retarded and slow learner after all—they'll be the statesmen of the future.

"And I resent being the pawn of a political machine. If the United States really feels democracy is all this important, it would be refreshing if we would really wait for the underprivileged to ask our help. They obviously aren't getting enough volunteers. They've had to up the draft, which is a good indication of how young Americans feel about it.

"This whole issue involves whether there is a justification for war and whether we have the right to impose our philosophy on other people, and whether our philosophy is any better than that of other people. We pride ourselves on not being an imperialistic nation, but time after time we set out to make democratic satellites."

One man deeply upset by the effect of this war on young Americans is Judge George Fiori, a justice of the peace who serves a district with 67,000 population. The judge is also a farmer, the father of five children, and was with the Army in France from 1950 to 1953. Despite his eminence in the community, the judge is only 35.

"I only know what I deduce from the newspapers on Vietnam," he explains. "The way they censor the news nowadays, how'n hell can you know anything? It's an insult to our intelligence to believe in our position in Vietnam. How can we know whether LBJ, Rusk and McNamara are telling us the truth? Truth has to be predicated on trust today, and who can trust them?"

The judge, who this year gave the Memorial Day speech in the city park for the American Legion, is also president of the local mental health clinic, active in many clubs, an ardent Democrat, and always willing to interpret the law humanely for young people.

"Adults ask youths to sacrifice this way in Vietnam," he points out, "and this creates tremendous conflict with youths who look for stability from adults. A youth looks for his norms from adult society, and finds it in great conflict with itself and asking him to risk his life for them. Personally, I feel that this state of affairs is horrifying. It will lead to the destruction of individual judgment and when it does it will destroy the essence of our republic. This is totally unacceptable to anyone who uses logic or common sense. Who knows North from South? It won't meet the test of any thinking person, this Vietnam business. This whole thing is a snow job."

Judge Fiori, questioning the legal position of LBJ in this undeclared war, maintained that the intent of Congress in giving Harry Truman emergency powers in the Korean conflict was limited to Korea. He pointed out that there is no way now of checking a President, and that our forefathers would never have approved of such license.

"But how do you unring the bell?" he asks. "The President is moving with the power of a dictator this way."

Meanwhile, the people discuss with less than enthusiasm the latest commercialized Bob Hope junket to war fronts, and are beginning to realize that the TV make-believe world of Gomer Pyle and McHale's Navy are commercializations as suspect as Buz Sawyer and Steve Canyon in the funny papers. The Madison Avenue retailing of patriotism has become, as Thoreau said about politicians in another time, "a maggot in their heads."

On those few occasions when reality breaks through, as notably in the case of a recently returned Auburn veteran, public reaction is as contradictory as the many opinions already quoted.

Dave St. Pierre, 24, a discharged Army vet, says Vietnam was "organized madness. There's so much politics involved over there, you just don't know what to believe. The men don't know what they're doing over there. They tried to convince us that it was right and honorable, but I'm not convinced. They aren't accomplishing what they set out to do. They'd have done it by now if they knew what they were doing."

Asked why he was revealing his feelings when so many servicemen remain mute, St. Pierre said: "I'm all right now because I'm out of the Army. I couldn't say anything before. People are scared to say whether they're for or against this war. If they don't say, what're you going to do? Who'll ever know?"

Reactions to St. Pierre's remarks, which were published in The Auburn Citizen, ran the range from outraged patriots to perplexed taxpayers. Many tried to discredit St. Pierre on the basis that he was a mere soldier and couldn't understand the grand design of this undeclared war.

The confusion and lack of agreement in the opinions expressed regarding this nation's involvement in Vietnam indicate in Auburn an instability and lack of coherence as great as that which presumably afflicts South Vietnam itself. The few coherent critics are lost in the welter of ignorance and confusion, and the lack of solid facts with which to develop an understanding of the problem runs like a drumbeat through all the discussions.

The state's two Senators, Warren Magnuson and Henry Jackson, are LBJ men down to their shoelaces. Jackson is known as "the Senator from Boeing" because of his vociferous support of defense spending in the aircraft industry, and he is much stronger at election time locally than is Magnuson who was nearly beaten by a right-wing Republican in the last election. On the other hand, Magnuson is stronger in Washington, D.C. But both men have been coming in for some heavy criticism for going mechanically along with the Administration, and admiration for Oregon's Wayne Morse seems to be growing among the local citizens.

One comes from talking to this cross-section of Americans with the impression that, without our prosperity to provide a point of common interest, there would be little or no political agreement about our foreign involvements. What seems to unite Americans, in fact or fancy, is their vision that they hold an impregnably strong economic position in a world plagued with political dilemmas generated by the economic frailties of smaller nations.

Possessing this assurance of our economic and political superiority, Americans do not profoundly question the decisions of Congress or LBJ and his Cabinet. Contradictions are ignored, logic warped to fit a justification for continued prosperity, and personal morality is viewed with disdain as being faintly tainted with mental instability.

It is appalling that so few Americans will discuss the war in Vietnam as a moral problem. Talk inevitably turns to strategy and tactics, of which Americans know nothing. That no man, as Shelley pointed out, has the "right to kill his brother," is scarcely considered. "It is no excuse," Shelley added, "that he does so in uniform; he only adds the infamy of servitude to the crime of murder." The reality of social values seems to have been in Auburn the chief casualty of the war in Vietnam.

Each day recently about 180 Marines have been flown in to Sea-Tac Airport for an hour and a half layover before taking off for Vietnam. They arrive after midnight to minimize contact with the public. These boys come from California, talk about home in the Midwest, discuss their girl friends, or stare morosely into a cup of coffee in the airport café.

"I'll save money over there," said one recently. "I get food, clothing, $65 a month and battle pay." He added that his brother had been in Vietnam two and a half years and volunteered for another hitch. "He's a kook of some kind."

"The one I feel sorry for is Johnson," said another young Marine too young to have voted in 1964. "So he pulls us out and the Communists take over. People won't like him for that. If he leaves us there, some of us'll get killed. He can't win either way."

One young Marine, who looked as though he belonged in junior high, turned to his side-kick and said: "Have you ever wondered what you're doing here?"

Too young to vote but old enough to die, they are dressed in fatigues so they can go right to work when they arrive in Vietnam in ten and a half hours. If they are under 18, they are sent to Okinawa or some other Pacific base, presumably to incubate until they are old enough to be killed in Vietnam without raising an outcry at home.

People in Auburn, like many other grass-roots Americans, are questioning without any facts on which to formulate questions—and most of them distrust even those "facts" they get.

THE BOBBY PHENOMENON

JACK NEWFIELD

Mr. Newfield is an assistant editor of The Village Voice, New York. His first book, A Prophetic Minority, has just been published by New American Library.

The Saturday Evening Post. Time. Newsweek. Atlantic Monthly. Harper's. The New Republic. One by one, this election autumn, they have all published cover stories on a junior Senator, ninety-sixth in seniority, 41 years old, who sits hunched and dreamy in the last row of the great chamber. His name is Robert Kennedy and his political fate has became an obsession to multitudes, from Georgetown to Capetown.

Two years ago Kennedy was anathema to the rebellious young and intellectual middle aged of America. They said he had a cop's mentality, a mugger's instincts and an emperor's ambition. In the wake of Dallas, the inside dopesters prophesied that the more genial, less combative Edward Kennedy was the real family entry in the Presidential sweepstakes. In the 1964 Congressional elections, James Baldwin, I. F. Stone and Gore Vidal [and the editor of The Nation—The Editor] endorsed Kenneth Keating over Robert Kennedy.

During 1965, Kennedy cautiously took his stand one centimeter to the left of Lyndon Johnson on Vietnam, on Latin America, on nuclear proliferation, on urban poverty. Most people mocked his motives. Then suddenly, this year, antagonism to the man liberals had been deriding as the "Irish Roy Cohn," turned to respect and then, among younger voters, flamed into passion.

In January, he criticized the Justice Department for denying an Arlington Cemetery burial to war hero and Communist Robert Thompson. In February, he broke with the President on Vietnam and urged direct negotiations with the National Liberation Front. In March, he visited Delano, Calif., to lend his prestige to the dignity of the grape strikers' cause. In May, peace marchers picketed the White House with placards bearing quotations from Kennedy and Fulbright. In June, he journeyed to South Africa to denounce apartheid as an evil as monumental as fascism's gas ovens. Then he came back to New York to energize the city's fatigued and faction-split Reform movement for a winning primary war in behalf of a good-government judicial candidate. In August, he hectored Administration bureaucrats on national television for allowing the war on poverty to falter.

Thus, on Labor Day, 10,000 impoverished Texas farm workers chanted "Viva Kennedy" at the steps of the capitol in LBJ's home state. In October, anti-war protesters greeted President Johnson in New Zealand with signs reading, "Robert Kennedy for President." By November, dreamers and fringe liberals were pasting "Kennedy and Fulbright in '68" bumper stickers on their cars. And tough-minded pros, who read all the polls, were saying it wasn't wholly impossible. Hippy intellectuals labeled it all "a happening"; the alliteration-oriented editors of Time proclaimed it a "Bobby Boom." The bemused Senator himself just refers to it as "this thing."

This sketch attempts to wrestle with only two dimensions of "the thing." Does Kennedy deserve the mantle of liberal leadership that has been bestowed on his Beatle brow? And what will he do with that leadership in the pit of Presidential politics?

To begin with, Kennedy's complex liberalism is cut from a cloth other than the traditional welfare-good government patterns of the 1940s. It has a philosophical base to it, not unlike the notions expressed by Albert Camus in the Myth of Sisyphus. Fate is cruel and often absurd, but vulnerable man must make the effort to push his heavy burden up the slope of history. Man must combat the plague, even if he knows it is hopeless. Kennedy is a pessimist and a fatalist, but also an activist. He has no taste for emotionalism rooted in simplistic slogans, and is, therefore, an impossible leader for the anti-war movement. He respects reflective iconoclasts like Murray Kempton and Senators Fulbright and McGovern more than he does aggressive dogmatists like Senator Wayne Morse or the ADA's Joseph Rauh.

Arthur Waskow, author of five books and resident fellow at the Institute for Policy Studies, acutely describes Kennedy as "a new kind of liberal, in the same way the SDS and SNCC are new kinds of radicals." Waskow adds: "Bobby is a post-cold-war liberal, more oriented toward peace than collective security, more concerned with the nonworking poor than the labor unions, not so mechanistically anti-Communist, tuned in on the new generation's emphasis on individual acts of conscience, the existential act."

Kennedy's carefully crafted major speeches go beyond —or, more exactly, dig deeper than—the "more, better, quicker" clichés of the old liberals, who remain tuned to a paternalistic federal bureaucracy. Kennedy understands—or intuits—that the poor need dignity and a sense of participation, or that the coming convulsions of the Third World will be spawned by squalor and frustration, not the cadres of Mao or Fidel. The following are quotations from two speeches the Senator delivered earlier this year:

> The deeper part . . . is in the gulf which separates the Negro from the white power structure which governs him, and, in the failure of the Establishment to afford him full participation in shaping the governmental services he receives. For 300 years the Negro has been a nation apart, a people governed by a repression that has been softened to the point when it is now only massive indifference. The Watts riots were as much a revolt against official indifference, an explosion of frustration at the inability to communicate and participate, as they were an uprising about inferior jobs, education and housing.

And if that sounds New Leftish, listen to Kennedy on Latin America:

> In every nation of this hemisphere—certainly in the five I visited in November—we will find strong allies in our battle for social justice. We will find young men and women, proud of their country, but also aware that a century of progress must now come in a decade. . . . They will welcome—we must welcome—the revolution of our time. . . .

There seem to be only two legitimate criticisms to make of Kennedy since he was elected to the Senate. One would be that he has not been insistent or visionary enough in his dissents from the Administration's Southeast Asia policy. But, as I have already suggested, rhetoric and appeals to passion run against the grain of his personality; by nature he is a loner, a needler and a critic. In a recent interview he explained his season of quietude on Vietnam:

> I stated my feelings on negotiations in my speech of February 19. After that point I made a decision to let President Johnson implement his policy, to give him time to try it, because these are all hard problems. . . . Also, I sometimes get the feeling that things I say provoke the opposite response from the White House. . . . But should there be further escalation of the war, I will feel free to state my ideas about it.

The other point that might be made against Kennedy is his enduring puritanism (more accurately, perhaps, Manicheism). Before the Senate hearings on LSD last spring, his office put out a press release against the hallucinatory drug, warning of its growing use in the ghettos. Friends quickly pointed out to Kennedy that the drug was alien to most Negro slums and was used mostly on college campuses and in bohemian subcultures like Berkeley and Greenwich Village. During the hearings the Senator was less tough on the pro-LSD witnesses than was his younger brother; if he is not an advocate of reforming our repressive narcotics and abortion laws, he is not a headline-hunting crusader against the beards and beats.

Robert Kennedy may not be as scholarly as Fulbright, as hot for Congressional reform as Clark, as diligent a day-to-day legislator as Mondale or Muskie or as vigilant on civil liberties as Gruening, but he is close to being the most solid all-around liberal in the Senate. And how many people said that about John Kennedy or Lyndon Johnson?

Speculation about Kennedy's political future must distinguish sharply between 1968 and 1972. As far as '68 goes, Kennedy thinks it impossible to dislodge the President from the head of the ticket. A consummate politician, he knows that, regardless of what the polls might say and no matter how many primaries he might win (only fifteen states hold them), no incumbent President of Johnson's political dexterity is likely to lose control of such a manipulative situation as a national nominating convention. And almost no one in the Kennedy inner circle takes seriously the prediction of William Shannon in Harper's, that Kennedy's real objective is the Vice Presidential nomination in '68. My own guess is that, given the glandular antagonism between the two men, Johnson would rather lose to a Republican than have history record that he won re-election only because a Kennedy was his running mate.

Although Kennedy's circle thinks a '68 run is "not feasible," they are irrevocably closing the door on the option. Should the Johnson consensus continue to crumble, should his popularity continue to plummet, should the war become wider, then the Senator would probably review the situation early in 1968. Until then he can do nothing except be a good Senator, gain exposure and continue to point a gently scolding finger at the Great Society's warts. The crisis-in-the-cities hearings will probably pick up again in February, and Kennedy will be there, alternately melancholy and angry, pummeling some more double-talking bureaucrats. In February, the President will offer a bill increasing social security benefits by 10 per cent; Kennedy has already introduced a countermeasure to boost benefits by 50 per cent, co-sponsored by nine other Senators, from Prouty of Vermont, to Morse of Oregon.

Meanwhile, a band of peaceniks and disaffected Democrats have launched a seemingly quixotic committee to draft Kennedy and Fulbright in 1968. Bereft of top-level political brains, money or publicity, the shoestring guerrillas have ignited grouplets in sixteen states so far. They plan, without Kennedy's permission, to enter slates of delegates pledged to him in the District of Columbia and the winner-take-all California primaries. They also plan a write-in drive in the first-in-the-nation New Hampshire primary, recalling how another New England favorite son, Henry Cabot Lodge, won that state's primary on write-ins in 1964.

If the war is settled, these gestures will quickly seem absurd. But if instead we become more deeply mired in Vietnam, Kennedy would be forced against his judgment to reconsider, and the whole thing, nourished by our national guilt over Dallas, could get out of control. It is improbable, but hardly impossible.

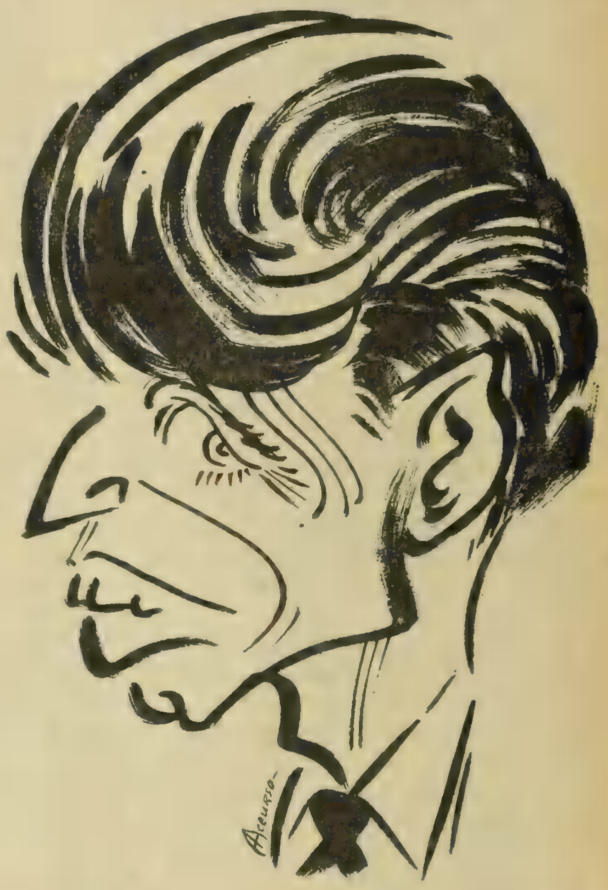
The prospect for 1972 is another story. Kennedy will be 47 then, Humphrey 61. As of today, the Vice President seems like a paper tiger; he has lost almost all his old union-minority-academic constituency to Kennedy, without really gaining the business community or the big-city machines. And the Senator has gained almost all the young with his wit, rebelliousness, candor, glamour, activism and odd combination of tough-mindedness and compassion which the young find so attractive in other culture heroes like Bogart, Goddard and Bob Dylan.

Kennedy likes Humphrey personally, while he has little personal affection for Johnson or his own generational rival, John Lindsay. He thinks the liberals have been too fickle in deserting the Vice President on the single issue of Vietnam. But I suspect myself that the defections have been so massive precisely because they have roots more fundamental than just the war issue. On a spectrum of issues, Humphrey's response became fixed in 1948, and he seems today unable to deal with the post-1960 issues of urban poverty, technology, bureaucracy, the Third World insurgencies, the breakup of the Communist camp. The urban crisis? Humphrey is against the Civilian Review Board. China? Humphrey is for containment. Latin America? Humphrey is for intervention.

In addition, the Vice-President is burdened with an unimaginative, feud-poisoned staff; his recent urgent efforts to recruit a few anti-Kennedy Stevensonians to his entourage have fallen flat. Kennedy, in contrast, is building a young, brilliant staff that includes 29-year-old Adam Walinsky and former Peace Corps maverick Frank Mankiwicz. Also, he works closely with such ex-New Frontiersmen as Richard Goodwin, Pierre Salinger and Burke Marshall, which occasionally provokes wholly exaggerated dispatches revealing a government-in-exile plotting a restoration.

Robert Kennedy's biggest barrier to the Presidency seems to be not the endlessly scenarioed 1972 Democratic Convention but his nameless 1972 GOP rival. Polls continually show such a polar split on Kennedy and the Kennedy name that no matter how decisively he beats other Democrats, he is at best a standoff against Republicans. The Harris poll of September 26, which reveals him outrunning the President 39 per cent to 37, rates RFK only 50-50 with shopworn Richard Nixon, and gives him only 49 per cent against George Romney. And should Kennedy run in 1972, after twelve years of Democratic rule, the "time for a change" slogan would be hard to blunt.

Also, Kennedy is unlikely to lead a united party in 1972. Johnson, not known for Christian charity, might try to sabotage him, or at least fight him at the convention, if not directly with Humphrey, then with a symbolic rival, like John Connally or Russell Long. Kennedy is bitterly unpopular with the segregationists in the South, with the business and banking communities, in the anti-clerical Bible Belt and, almost irrationally, among conservative anti-Catholic older Jews. Against Nixon, the Harris poll gives Kennedy only 42 per cent of the Protestant vote; he gets only 43 per cent of the vote of those over 50. When William F. Buckley, Jr., speaks of the "inevitability of Bobby," or when Gore Vidal says, "America now has a three-party system: the Republicans, the Democrats and the Kennedys," they are letting their dislike and envy cloud their perceptions.



Kennedy, of course, can still change in a variety of directions; there is no assurance that he will hold to the course he is pursuing in 1966. He will respond to events. The future is inscrutable, fate is capricious, facile prophecies are arrogant. But some day Robert Kennedy will lead his legions—the young, the black, the alienated, the romantic, the educated—to Armageddon.

AS MANY AS GOD SENDS?

FAMILY PLANNING IN MEXICO

MARGARET LARKIN

A journalist who has lived in Mexico for the past fifteen years, Margaret Larkin is the author of Seven Shares in a Gold Mine (Simon & Schuster).

"As many as God sends."

If you were to ask almost any young Mexican woman how many children she wanted, that would even today probably be her answer. Two months after her marriage, her friends would begin to question, "Are you 'carrying' yet?" To admit that she was not yet pregnant would cast doubt on the potency of her husband or on her duties as a wife and a Catholic.

In Mexico, as in all Latin American countries, large families have been the custom and the ideal. Among the peasants, sons meant helpers on the land and support in old age. In the upper classes, a large family was a symbol of success. It proved not only that the man was a real "macho"—a he-man—but also that he could afford to maintain eight or ten children, to clothe them, to feed them (and even overfeed them), to educate his sons, and to marry his daughters to men in like positions. [See "Mexico Resists the Pill" by Arthur F. Corwin, The Nation, May 11, 1964.]

Today, however, one can sense the beginning of a new attitude, as the population explosion bears down on individual families. Perhaps Mrs. C. R. de M. said, "as many as God sends" when she was married at 13. Now at 35, having borne eight children, she has come to Mexico's pioneer birth control clinic for help. "My husband gives me seven pesos a day [56c] and with that I have to feed and clothe my children. Some have no clothes at all, the rest are poorly dressed. I have barely enough to feed them beans. We live in a wooden hut and pay 30 pesos in rent, but who knows how long we can stay there because in the center of the city they no longer want wooden huts."

A generation ago many of those whom God sent He took away again. Infant diarrhea, pneumonia, measles and whooping cough carried them off. Mexican artists have loved to paint "the little angels," decked out with flowers and a gilt crown, as they were carried to their tiny graves and straight on to Paradise. Today, while the birth rate remains almost unchanged, the death rate has dropped dramatically. Between 1930 and 1964, it was more than cut in half. Out of every 1,000 babies born in 1930, 135 died before their first birthdays; in 1964, the figure was 69.5. Today's bride of 18 may expect to have eight or ten living children by the time she is 35—with some years of childbearing still ahead of her. Mexico has one of the world's fastest growing populations. There are now more than 40 million Mexicans; the demographers say that in twenty-three years there will be 80 million if the rate of increase is maintained.

Until recently, little concern was expressed about population. Leaders of the country, like those of the Church, adjured the people to be fruitful and multiply. Although deploring the lack of buying power among the impoverished masses, economists insisted that more people would create more wealth — despite the fact that unemployment and underemployment constitute a major problem in Mexico. (The man who sits all day in front of a dozen little piles of peanuts is counted as "self-employed.")

In the past few decades, Mexican industries, roads, dams, schools and health services have increased at an astounding rate. Yet in real terms the country is standing still as the proliferating population swamps these advances.

The problem has not gone unnoticed by Mexico's planners. The solutions offered have been more irrigation, higher production from the land, new industries and justicia social. Until recently there has been no suggestion, in public at least, that population limitation might be a way out. But in 1965, the "delicate subject" of birth control burst into the open. No doubt the fact that the Vatican was willing at least to consider possible changes in the Catholic attitude had something to do with this new frankness.

The discussion began with circumspect "debates" in which the question was examined from various points of view. In an eight-part series in Mexico City's leading newspaper, Excelsior, a Senator, and a university professor who was described as a lawyer, economist, biologist and geographer, deplored any movement toward control of birth. An economist, also from the National University, cautiously advised "careful study" of population control. Two eminent women came out strongly in favor of making contraceptive information and help available. They were Diego Rivera's elder daughter, a lawyer and formerly a Congresswoman, and Dr. Matilde Rodriguez Cabo who has held important posts in the government health services.

Other publications were more forthright. Tiempo, a magazine patterned on Time, published a special 6-page section in November, 1965, entitled "Population—Control or Catastrophe." It was a serious, well-documented statement of the problem, and it boldly went so far as to explain all known methods of contraception, including the pill, giving brand names and prices. It also listed the name and address of the Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal, the first birth control center in Mexico.

Perhaps the most significant feature of the article was a frank appeal to the government to take over the problem. This was not made by the magazine itself; the climate of opinion is not yet ready for such editorial directness. It came from the mouths of two of the three poor people whom Tiempo had interviewed on the subject.

Pedro Martinez, who earns less than $1 a day, has fathered eleven children in twenty-six years of marriage. The eldest is 25, the youngest 3 months. "So many children are a misery for the family and they grow up without proper education or preparation for life," he was quoted as saying. "But what shall we do? We are Catholics and we don't want to fall into mortal sin. Neither do we want to see our children dying of hunger." Then, obviously without much hope, he added: "I have heard that in some countries the government not only helps families with many children but also shows them how to have fewer children. But there is nothing like that in Mexico."

Margarita Gutierrez de Trejo, aged 39, and the mother of nine (including quadruplets), said to the reporter: "May God forgive me, but I think that the government ought to send doctors and nurses to teach us how to avoid having children without it being a sin."

From the number and variety of articles on the subject, it would seem that a campaign is under way to prepare the Mexican people for some kind of public action, even government action. It would not be quite fair to say that Mexico has a controlled press. Dissident opinion is tolerated up to a certain point and "Freedom of the Press Day" is celebrated with great fanfare. Nevertheless, such widespread discussion of a hitherto unmentionable subject could not have taken place in Mexico without the tacit approval of the authorities. With an appearance of probing for public reaction, conflicting statements by officials have appeared, often within the same week.

Sen. Antonio Flores Mazori and two Congresswomen, Martha Andrade de Rosal and Aurora Nadia Millan, associated themselves in the following public statement: "The Mexican Government respects the parents' right to determine the size of their families and in the case of poor families with many children, makes available through its Health Ministry the best advice in each case." Ovaciones, one of the "popular" papers wrote: "In spite of the fact that official medical institutions are reserved in respect to the problem [of population limitation] preoccupation with the fact has been notable. For some time contraceptives have been a part of the basic pharmacology of Social Security, and the Ministry of Health permits the sale of pills in drugstores without a prescription." (A month's supply can be obtained for less than a dollar.)

In another article, a functionary of the same Ministry of Health declared that the manufacture of contraceptive pills in Mexico was illegal!

As the falling death rate has increased family size, many Mexican women have tried in their own ways to limit their families. Prolonged nursing is an ancient method, based on the belief that a nursing mother cannot conceive. This custom is one factor in infant deaths. Whereas in a country like the United States most deaths before the age of 1 year occur in the first months of life, often from congenital defects, in Mexico most occur in the last third of the first year. Mothers' milk alone does not supply enough nourishment in these latter months and poor mothers cannot provide the additives that American mothers give as a matter of course. This primitive resort to prolonged nursing (often up to two years) results in malnutrition or in infections and diseases which the starved little body cannot resist.

"Giving" a child to a grandmother, a godmother, or a willing relative, is another not uncommon way of solving the problem. Some women adopt more desperate measures. "Babies are sold for 20 pesos in the General Hospital," Marie Guadalupe H. Mitchell, director of Orientation and Defense of Women, was quoted as saying in La Prensa (February 15). As I was writing this article, the newspapers reported the case of a woman who had given birth at a public hospital, only to slip away twelve hours later leaving her infant behind!

The rhythm method, sponsored by the Catholic Church as the only acceptable means of limiting family size, is rejected almost universally in this Catholic country. Poor women, especially, complain that it is too complicated, that it is unsure, and that husbands refuse to cooperate. A rhythm clinic set up near the Shrine of the Virgin of Guadalupe last year had to close for lack of patients. At the end of six months it had attracted only forty-four women. The most common method of limiting family size is abortion. Women try to abort themselves by using herbs or other primitive methods, or they go to midwives.

Absolute statistics are impossible to obtain, of course, but some notion of the size of the problem may be gathered from the number of women bleeding from incomplete abortions who are admitted to hospitals. In the first quarter of 1965 the three main government hospitals in Mexico City reported 4,014 births and 1,316 abortion cases—a relationship between births and unsuccessful abortions of 32.95 per cent. It is notable that at the General Hospital, where the poorest go, the relationship was 53.5 per cent!

A study of the abortion rate was made by the Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal, referred to above. Among the 1,000 women interviewed, 307 admitted to from one to twenty-four abortions. The total number was 6,118! One of the women expressed her feelings as follows: "May God forgive me for those abortions, but I simply could not go on. I think that it is better to take the pills than to have abortions; that is why I have come here."

The Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal was founded in 1958 by Dr. Edris Rice-Wray, graduate of Vassar and the School of Medicine of Northwestern University. She also holds a degree in Public Health from the University of Michigan and was the director of the first field study of Enovid, in Puerto Rico. Working for two years in Mexico for the World Health Organization, Dr. Rice-Wray perceived an "unfulfilled need" to bring the birth and death rates into balance:

> We had to organize privately because at that time, in 1958, neither government nor educational institutions were willing to enter the field. We began with the aid of a research grant and a private donation and with the assistance of a small group of Mexican people. The staff included a social worker, a nurse and myself. In the first month our social worker found sixteen women who were willing to come for information about family limitation. In the first year I treated only 286 women. It was impossible to publicize the work; the Mexican Health Code forbade this. But one woman told another and out of their need, more and more began to come. By the end of the second year I was thrilled that we had received more than a thousand patients.

Eight years later, in 1965, monthly patient visits numbered 3,900 a month in the main clinic and five subsidiary clinics that have been established in proletarian districts. The number of new patients received in 1965 was almost double the figure for 1964. Whether she can afford to pay 10c or $2, every woman is given a thorough gynecological examination and a cancer test. A social worker helps her determine what she can afford to pay for her monthly supply of pills or the insertion of an intrauterine device.

Although the clinic is concerned with helping the people who come to it, basically it is a research center. Between 1959 and 1966 it completed twenty-eight research projects on thirty-one compounds and dosages. Dr. Rice-Wray was a member of a scientific group of fourteen invited by WHO to Geneva in 1965 to sum up world experiences with oral gestagens. Along with many investigations in other parts of the world, her studies of long-term users of these compounds have contributed to the recent decision by the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to remove the previous four-year limitation on use of the pill.

The clinic initiated a professional training program in 1965, and in that year forty-seven doctors and six nurses from eight countries completed the two-week course. Besides studying the population problem in Latin America and the world, they were instructed in all available contraceptive methods. They received practical advice on how to go about setting up a family-planning clinic in a Latin American Catholic country. With the exception of the University of Chile, no medical school on the continent includes such material in its curriculum.

Mexican physicians and sociologists have for long assumed that their people would refuse, for religious and cultural reasons, to accept family planning. The thirteen doctors and seventeen social workers and nurse-interviewers now working with the Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal have learned a great deal about their patients, almost all Catholics. Some of the things they have discovered are in direct contradiction to accepted ideas.

"In Mexico, as in other Latin American countries, there is a gap of understanding between intellectuals and the masses," Dr. Rice-Wray explained. "Among traditional beliefs held by intellectuals is that Mexican men want large families as one proof that they are machos. We find here that the men are realistic, too, when it comes to facing the problems of a large family. You see them here in the clinic every day, holding young children while their wives are being attended. Ninety-eight per cent of our women come with their husbands' consent.

"The women try to obey the Church and they pray to the Virgin that they won't get pregnant again. When they do they are apt to feel that they have fulfilled their duty to the Church. Since they can't take care of another child, they have an abortion. Naturally, because of the conflict engendered, many simply stop going to Church altogether. The realistic liberal Catholic leaders know this and that is why they are fighting for change in the matter of contraception."

As many as God sends? How will the Catholic conscience absorb the totally new concept of spaced children and family limitation? The Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal is fortunate in having as consultant a Catholic priest trained in psychology as well as in the tenets of his Church. Father Alfonso Orozco works at the clinic with the permission of the Archbishop of Mexico. From his private interviews with the patients, he is in an excellent position to assess their life situations, their spiritual conflicts and their motives for seeking birth control information. In an article summing up interviews with 150 women he points out that many of them feel justified in taking their destiny into their own hands after they have borne a number of children. He quotes Mrs. S. Z. de G., 28 years old, married for thirteen years and the mother of five. "I am a Catholic because I pray to whom I should pray," she asserted. "As far as the pills go, I know that the priests are right in many things but they can't help my situation of having children I can't care for or educate. Anyway, I have done my duty. I have five children and my health does not permit more."

Mrs. R. E. de P. presented another aspect of the problem. She is 31 years old and and in twelve years of marriage has had nine children, all of whom are alive. "I came here because I no longer want to 'buy' more children," she told the priest, using a common euphemism for conception. "I am a Catholic and I believe I am doing right to use the pills because in this way God will give me life to watch my children grow up. If I continue to 'buy' more children I will probably die and my children need me. Children are beautiful and I love them very much but now I don't want to have any more so that I can take care of those I have."

Mexican women are reticent, but to the sympathetic priest one woman said: "Some have told me that I am excommunicated and maybe they are right, but I follow my conscience. Now I am afraid to go to church. But on the other hand, since I use the pills and am freed of the fear and constant anguish of a new pregnancy, there is greater love between my husband and myself and our children. We always discover new things in our love."

Perhaps the most encouraging sign of change is the recent establishment of a parallel all-Mexican organization which is beginning work with funds from the International Planned Parenthood Association and with the support of a distinguished board of directors. Señor Gerardo Cornejo, its executive director, represents in his own person the problem of the population explosion. He is one of fifteen children, ten of whom survived to adulthood. His father was a peasant who received land after the Mexican revolution. Two of his brothers have remained farmers; other brothers and sisters live modestly; he is the only member of his family to become a professional, although he is now educating a younger brother.

"The Fundación para Estudios de la Población enjoys the moral but unofficial support of the government," Señor Cornejo stated when I talked with him, and he went on to give me convincing evidence. The medical director of the organization is also medical director for the Maternal and Child Health Service in the Ministry of Health, certainly a close enough tie to indicate government interest. The president of the board of directors, which includes doctors, professors, demographers and engineers, is a prominent banker; the vice president is a former minister of government. In discussing the six urban and two rural clinics which his organization is opening this year, Señor Cornejo mentioned that the physician in charge of a clinic at Piedras Negras in Coahuila is also in charge of maternal and child health services in that state.

"The government must proceed very slowly and cautiously," he told me. "It does not want to risk an explosion of popular feeling such as took place in Brazil recently when it was announced that funds for family planning had been made available to the country. But I can tell you that in one government hospital here in Mexico City all of the women who come in bleeding from incomplete abortions receive birth control information when they leave, and if they want the pills, arrangements are made to supply them at whatever price they can pay." The whole purpose of the Fundación, Señor Cornejo said frankly, is to prepare the basis for government action to control the population. The machinery for doing this already exists in the thousands of clinics, health centers and hospitals of Mexico's three health plans. These are only beginning to reach into the countryside, but Señor Cornejo suggested that the family-planning idea might be introduced into the Rural Community Development Program which includes 7,000 villages.

The education of the public is an important part of the work of the Fundación. A women's committee, composed of five Congresswomen and a woman Senator and headed by Guadalupe Rivera Marín (Diego Rivera's daughter), arranges for lectures throughout the country and is making contacts with unions. Various industrial firms are participating in the program. The Fundación's clinic in Monterrey receives 90 per cent of its financial support from industry, Señor Cornejo said.

He gives full and enthusiastic credit to the work of Dr. Edris Rice-Wray and the Asociación Pro-Salud Maternal, "which has set us ahead of most other Latin American countries in preparing to tackle this crucial problem." The medical sub-director, Dr. Sergio Correu, is attached also to the Asociación where he is head of the training program.

Many Mexicans can of course be expected to oppose a program of population limitation on religious or nationalistic grounds, or from a sincere belief that science will find the way to increase productivity, or that a fairer distribution of wealth can be achieved. Those who work with the desperate poor may be too optimistic in their idea that the mass of the people will accept such a program with relief. In what seemed to me a sober estimate of the situation, Dr. Rice-Wray spoke as follows:

> Although there is separation between the state and religion since the Juarez Reform laws, it is an outward separation only. Catholicism is in the bone and blood of these people and it affects the manner of their thinking. If the Catholic Church takes a positive stand, action will come more quickly. If it doesn't, I believe that the government won't wait. The pressure being generated by the population growth grows stronger every day and the problem can be solved only by the government. I am sure that those in power are waiting only for an opportune moment when they won't risk a public reaction against a fertility control program. This moment of decision could come anytime.

A few weeks after she made this prediction, the government did indeed take a giant step forward. The Ford Foundation announced on October 18 that it had granted more than a half million dollars to three important Mexican government institutions for research into various aspects of population control, and for training of doctors, nurses and social workers. The largest of the three grants was given specifically for research in oral contraceptives. Since it obviously is impossible to study these matters without patients, many thousands of Mexicans who wish to control the size of their families will now be given the means to do so.

LETTER FROM AUSTRALIA

HUGH WESTON

Mr. Weston, an American, has for the past four years been minister of the Unitarian Church in Adelaide, Australia, and a lecturer on the educational programs of the Australian Broadcasting System.

Adelaide

Ever since the early white convicts and settlers in the 19th century got rid of the troublesome 300,000 aborigines by killing them off or starving them to death (today only about 40,000 "full-bloods" are left alive), Australians have with some justification considered their subcontinent a paradisiacal "island in the sun." They are fond of describing themselves as "content with our lot" (they often say this in contrasting themselves with Americans) and the favorite Australian expression is "She'll be right."

Aussies are proud to note that "beer and smokes" take first place in the family budget, ahead of new cars, television sets or washing machines. They are a bit ashamed that West Germany has slightly surpassed them in per capita beer consumption, but, perhaps as a result of their own achievements in this area, Australia holds an unchallenged first place in the number of traffic deaths per vehicle. Australians tell of the speaker in a public park who was asking: "What is an Australian? Just what is an Australian?" And a voice came in reply: "An Australian is a lazy boozer." All Australians present laughed knowingly.

Everything seems geared to make life easy in this sun-drenched subtropical land, where an annual rainfall of only 16 inches makes it the driest major land mass on the earth. Outdoor sports, practiced unflaggingly in the shadows of the palm trees, make Australia, in proportion to its population, the world's foremost nation of athletes. The country enforces compulsory arbitration of labor disputes, and the American unionist is always a bit shocked to find that both sides want it that way—strikes are a lot of hard work and cause too much nervous tension. Despite the law, there was a very fierce strike at the Mt. Isa Copper Mines last year, but Australians point out that the mines are American-owned, and that the strike leader, who defied most of the unions, was an American. Australians, we are told, would never behave like that, left to their own devices.

Australians cherish a myth of male dominance, and were astonished to learn, from a recent survey, that in the opinion of their children Australian women make a higher proportion of the decisions, even on matters of recreation and family budget, than do the notoriously assertive American women. In skillful rebuttal, Australian men argued that they do not feel dominated—they are, they say, just lazier than American men, and a good deal lazier than Australian women, and so they force their wives to make most of the decisions.

Sheltered in their subtropical paradise behind the protecting barriers of a "white Australia" policy, Australians have also been spared the tension of racial strife now perplexing large parts of the world. All polls and surveys indicate that "white Australia" is favored by the overwhelming majority, although certain modifications would be sought by the young. Only a very few hundred "non-Europeans" are admitted to more or less permanent residence each year and, at least until recently, Australia has been steadily getting whiter and whiter, as white immigrants to the number of 100,000 pour in every year.

But recently some disturbing clouds have appeared in this corner of the sunny sky. For one thing, the unaccommodating aborigines have stopped dying out and are beginning to increase—much in the manner of the "vanishing Americans," who refused to vanish. Early this September, there occurred in Adelaide the first civil rights demonstration ever staged by aborigines in Australia's history. Nearly 200 natives marched through the streets, demanding a voice in the running of the tribal reservations. Aborigines are not citizens, and in the Northern Territory they are, by law, paid minimum wages far below those set for whites. The white man's paradise is still well protected against alien breeds coming in from without, but what about this "enemy" within? To be fair in this matter, the attorney general of the state of South Australia (who has charge of aboriginal affairs) and many others are doing all in their power to help the cause of the aborigine—that is one reason why his numbers are beginning rapidly to increase. But aborigine is still spelled with a small a.

Culture often follows the trends of trade, and Japan is taking England's place, this year, for the first time, as the top customer for Australian goods. England is safe in second place for the moment, but the United States is third and coming up fast, while, of all people, the Chinese Communists rank among the top five. The decline of Britain as the once dominant trading partner has, supposedly, led to a loosening of ties with Great Britain, and the largest club on the campus at the University of Adelaide is the Republican Club, which wants to make a republic out of Australia.

With the emergence of Japan as Australia's best customer, and the concomitant growth of other Asian trade, there is increasing pressure to modify the "white Australia" barriers.

Something else that may eventually upset Australian tranquillity is the coming of the Americans. Wherever the British retreat these days, the Americans step in. American capital has become so dominant that Australians have taken to calling their country "the fifty-first state." Almost the entire motor car and tobacco industries are American held, and the excellent new national daily newspaper, The Australian, has published a survey indicating that perhaps a third of the biggest Australian enterprises are American controlled. American business methods are copied to the finest detail.

But the overwhelming majority of the immigrants still come from England. Although the American tourist, seeing the shiny, Yankee-style used-car lots, thinks America has taken over the place, down deep there is a basic British attitude that any American who lives here for several years cannot fail to note. Indeed, it is said to be more a 19th-century British attitude than one of the current century. No one more epitomized it than the former Prime Minister, Robert Menzies, also now Lord Mayor of the Cinque Ports in Britain, who demanded, when the currency was changed to the decimal system, that if Australia dropped the sacred word, "pound," at least the monetary unit should be called the "Royal." This idea was received enthusiastically by the upper classes, but was too much for the younger people and lower-class Australians, who consider themselves American at least in business methods, so a gigantic protest movement succeeded in naming the new monetary unit the "dollar."

Old-fashioned British traditions are illustrated in the fact that the pubs have until recently closed at six o'clock (they are now to be permitted to stay open until ten). Even new British arrivals are amazed by the Victorian censorship. Playboy and similar magazines are banned. Conformity is carried to a point that bemuses even the British. I have been politely removed from the tennis court for not wearing proper tennis attire which, in Adelaide at least, must be all white from top to bottom. Women must wear a tennis dress, not tennis shorts. Yet, paradox, go to the beach, and the bikinis are so brief as to be almost symbolic! Is Australia puritan? Hardly. Even the very severe censorship is a matter of propriety rather than purity.

At every basic cultural point, the Australian remarks how similiar he is to the Americans, and at every point the seasoned American notes how similar he really is to the British. The British don't go to church; neither does the Australian. British school children wear uniforms to school; so do the Australian children. Many Australian schools, even public schools, segregate by sex. The pupils all stand to attention when the teacher enters the room. Learning is by drill, not by "new-fangled" Dewey-ite methods of letting the students creatively find their own interests, let alone by the Kilpatrick methods of seeking even to abolish discipline in the classroom. Dewey, Kilpatrick, Patri—they are not even taught to the students training to be teachers. Americans live by Freud as by the Bible; Australians pay no attention to either. The favorite psychologist hereabouts is a man named Eysenck, who wrote a book called The Uses and Abuses of Psychology, Freud falling into the latter category. The philosophy departments of all universities, like other departments, are staffed by Australian and British teachers, not Americans, and all philosophy in Australia is British logical analysis, not Continental existentialism or American process philosophies. I am invited to give a lecture to the Philosophy Club of the University of Adelaide shortly, and this will be, as far as I can learn, the first time in the history of any Australian university that an existentialist thinker has been asked to lecture.

But some will say: look how Australia supports American policy in Vietnam. Is this not an indication of pro-Americanism? The answer is that on any ideological basis it is not. The Australian attitude toward the war is entirely cynical. The polls show that about 70 per cent of the people support the American-Australian intervention in the Vietnamese civil war, but they do so because they feel that they could be hurt financially if they failed to support the United States. Also, they say that while America is probably wrong in this case, "we Australians have to support it, because some day, if a rampaging Indonesia, either Communist or even rightist, should endanger us, we would need the United States." Britain, they point out, is withdrawing from these parts. But the absence of any conviction is shown by the fact that the polls also indicate an overwhelming opposition to sending any except volunteers to Vietnam. A tiny few think Australia might be menaced by Communist aggression, but most are happily reaping profits from the growing China trade (down somewhat in 1965-66) and think the United States is quite mad, but "we have to support them, anyway."

Meanwhile, the sun shines, and the tennis players continue training. But the government has rammed through a tough conscription law despite overwhelming popular protest. If the Vietnamese War continues for many years, if the Asians keep clamoring for the right to enter Australia, and if the aborigines keep increasing, sunny Australia may be in for some storms.

THE MEDICARE BONANZA

SELIG GREENBERG

Mr. Greenberg is the author of The Troubled Calling: Crisis in the Medical Establishment (Macmillan). He is the winner of two Lasker medical journalism awards.

It is doubtful that any easy remedies will be suggested by the "very hard and very quick look" at climbing medical costs to be taken at President Johnson's direction by the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, the Council of Economic Advisers and the Labor Department. More than anything else, this study is probably an attempt to forestall a threatened Congressional investigation of what many competent observers feel is HEW's excessive generosity in setting up—under medicare—payment schedules for hospitals and doctors. If so, the White House move is not apt to delay for long a legislative scrutiny of the reimbursement formulas and of some of the other factors responsible for the uncontrolled inflation in our health-care economy.

The threatened hospital bed shortages and other complications feared by top HEW officials have failed to materialize during the first few months of medicare's operation, and the jubilant word from Social Security Administration headquarters in Baltimore has been that all concerned are fully cooperating and the program is running smoothly. But the bills for services to medicare patients are just starting to come in, and in the light of what has lately been happening to hospital rates and doctors' fees, these bills are likely to be substantially higher than anticipated. A medicare program that costs materially more than estimates indicated will soon oblige the Administration and Congress to make a painful choice between raising still further the steep schedule of social security withholding taxes or dipping deeper into general revenue.

The costs of medical services, and particularly of hospital care, have for several years been rising at a pace faster than the overall cost of living. But what causes particular concern in Washington, and has been given as the reason for Mr. Johnson's order, is the steady acceleration of this rise, which appears to be at least partly related to the advent of medicare.

The end, moreover, is not in sight, especially in the hospital sector. The average expense per patient day in the nation's short-term hospitals rose last year by a record 9 per cent to $44.48. But this rate of increase has already been exceeded so far this year under mounting pressure by nurses and other employees for higher pay; many hospitals have been forced to raise their room charges above the $50-a-day mark, excluding ancillary services. Dr. Edwin L. Crosby, executive vice president of the American Hospital Association, predicted recently that hospital costs will jump during next year by at least 20 and possibly 30 per cent. The average yearly increase since 1960 has been 7 per cent. Some authorities have been predicting hospital costs of $100 a day by 1975, but if the present trend continues, this prohibitive level may be reached by the end of the 1960s.

The effect on medicare is obvious. While no great rush of aged patients into hospitals developed when medicare went into effect last July 1, hospital admissions covered by the program are now estimated to run at about 100,000 a week, which is close to 20 per cent of all admissions. Furthermore, the demand is certain to rise. The program came in during the low-occupancy months, and pressure on hospital beds will grow with the approach of winter and with the inauguration on January 1 of the nursing home part of medicare, which requires that its beneficiaries receive at least three days of prior hospitalization.

The costs of physicians' services are also certain to exceed expectations. Doctors across the country have been boosting their charges in anticipation of the establishment of medicare fee schedules; there are reliable reports that in some places fees for the elderly have been hiked by as much as 300 per cent.

Some of the continued rise in medical costs is unavoidable, particularly in the hospital field. Hospitals have still to close the gap between their pay scales and those prevailing in industry. To keep up with scientific advances, they must also continue to recruit more and better-trained personnel and provide additional costly equipment.

But the medical profession and the voluntary hospital system have long neglected the economies as well as the improved services that could be effected through more rational organization of medical practice and coordination of hospital facilities. When it underwrote a substantial portion of the nation's health-care costs, the federal government had a unique chance to insist on the adoption of some of these measures. By failing to do so, or to establish controls on the components which make up the costs of health services, the medicare law itself and the administrative regulations promulgated by HEW tend to freeze into the existing structure all the inefficiencies of the medical profession. The price of this omission may be high, not only in the threat it poses to the fiscal integrity of the medicare program itself but in its effects on our entire medical economy.

Some of medicare's original backers have become increasingly disenchanted with the program for two main reasons: the benefits are so enmeshed in limitations, deductibles and co-pay provisions that they cover only about half of the average medical costs of the aged; and the law and its implementation by HEW have, in effect, given the medical profession and the hospitals an administrative hammer lock on the program.

The eagerness of those who framed the medicare act to avoid a confrontation with the medical profession has created many openings for domination by physicians. The law establishes all-medical or mixed medical-lay advisory committees in several key areas of decision making, such as the approval of participating hospitals, the definition of reasonable charges and the review of hospital utilization. The statute requires HEW to consult associations representing physicians and hospitals and to administer the medicare program through existing insurance carriers which are vested with considerable latitude.

In most places Blue Cross and Blue Shield have been designated as administrative agents for medicare. Many Blue Cross plans are still dominated by hospital representatives. Blue Shield, which is playing a crucial role in determining the level of doctors' charges under medicare, is almost completely controlled by the medical profession. To some extent, at any rate, the doctors have thus been negotiating with themselves in setting the medicare fee schedule.

The medicare law specifically forbids the government from making any attempt to regulate the quality of medical care. This prohibition, and the Johnson Administration's predilection for trying to achieve a consensus by pleasing everybody, appear to mean that the government will merely underwrite the manner in which hospitals and doctors now operate, and that the only change will be in the way they are paid. The trouble with the policy of consensus in the health-care field is that while the doctors and the hospitals are tightly organized and represented by vigorous lobbyists, there are no effective spokesmen for the sick and aged.

The reimbursement formula gives hospitals about everything they had asked for. It guarantees payment of costs, plus allowances for depreciation and an additional 2 per cent for improvement of services. This arrangement has all the defects of cost-plus contracts and encourages the removal of all restraint on costs. Except for providing staff utilization committees to cut down excessively long stays, neither the medicare law nor the reimbursement formula imposes any controls on hospital expenditures. There are no provisions for eliminating duplicated plant and equipment, for more precise tailoring of facilities and services to the needs of patients, or for the development of less costly alternative services. The hospitals are guaranteed payment upon showing that they have spent the money; it makes no difference that they may have wasted it.

Much the same situation prevails with doctors' fees. Under the regulations, physicians must be paid "reasonable charges" for treating medicare patients. The criteria to be considered, the Social Security Administration has ruled, are "the customary charges for similar services generally made by the physician and the prevailing charges in the locality for similar services." Here again the level of charges is, in substance, left up to the doctors themselves, and the conditions under which they work, which are often a cause of unnecessarily high costs, are left untouched.

At the height of the controversy over the medicare legislation the American Medical Association proposed an expanded voluntary health insurance program for the aged and said that its members stood ready to charge elderly patients less than the prevailing fees. But it now develops that in my own state of Rhode Island, for instance, doctors are allowed under the medicare formula to charge more for surgical services to medicare patients than they are charging low-income patients who are Blue Shield subscribers. Under Blue Shield, participating surgeons, assistant surgeons and anesthetists agree to accept the insurance program's fee schedule, which is below the customary charges, for patients falling within certain income limits. These limits are $2,800 for single persons and $4,000 for a family under Blue Shield Plan A, and $4,000 for a single person and $6,000 for a family under Plan B. But although the great majority of the aged fall within these limits, the patient's income is not a factor under medicare regulations, and doctors are allowed to bill at their full private-practice rates.

Social Security regulations provide two methods of paying doctors for treating medicare patients and leave it up to the physicians to pick the one they prefer. Under the direct-billing method, the patient pays the doctor and is then reimbursed for 80 per cent of established "reasonable charges." This permits the doctor to charge whatever he wants. The alternative is the assignment method, whereby the physician collects the allowable benefits on the basis of "reasonable charges" from the medicare fiscal agent, Blue Shield in most cases.

The government's definition of "reasonable charges" assures doctors of receiving their customary fees for patients whom they formerly treated free or at reduced rates. Nevertheless, at the AMA's convention a few days before medicare went into effect, the House of Delegates brushed aside the more moderate advice of its retiring and incoming presidents and adopted a resolution recommending that doctors charge their medicare patients directly. Behind the gobbledygook that direct billing preserves "individual responsibility" on the part of the patient and protects the doctor-patient relationship is the profession's desire to have its cake and eat it. It wants to collect from former charity patients while at the same time continuing its Robin Hood method of charging more affluent clients still fatter fees.

Among the most outspoken critics of HEW's generosity toward the hospitals have been Senators Russell B. Long of Louisiana, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, and Clinton P. Anderson of New Mexico, another key member of that committee and one of the earliest advocates of medicare. Both Senators have objected to the allowances for depreciation of hospital buildings and equipment and for improvement of services, and Senator Anderson has drafted a bill which would give control of such funds to federally aided state planning agencies which would be charged with preventing their use for unnecessary duplication of plant and equipment. Senator Long threatens to inject an investigation of drug prices into the consideration of medicare costs. His aim is to require greater use by hospitals of drugs sold by their scientific or generic names rather than by advertised brand names. Legislation to that effect is pending in the Senate.

Congress is reported reluctant to start tinkering with the new medicare law at the current session, but high medicare costs and the need for tighter controls on the providers of services are likely to become the subject of heated debate at the next session.

Profit is not a major issue in medicare's relations with the voluntary short-term hospitals, the great majority of which are nonprofit institutions. With them, the trouble arises from traditions of autonomy, the ambitions of trustees and medical staffs, and a dislike of outside controls. But 80 per cent of nursing homes are run to make money, and profit is already complicating HEW's negotiations for the medicare nursing home benefits that start next year.

The government has offered nursing home proprietors the same reimbursement formula of 2 per cent above costs that hospitals are getting, with the additional proviso that payments cannot exceed a return of 4¾ per cent on investment. The representatives of nursing home associations have rejected this offer as inadequate and are now dickering for more.

Despite protests of the operators that they stand to lose money under the proffered formula, a boom is developing in the construction of such homes, and private investing groups are forming all over the country to back ventures in this field. The trend is toward chain operations, which hold out the promise of big savings on volume purchases and centralized controls.

A most ambitious enterprise for building nursing homes and operating them on a franchise basis has been launched by Medicenters of America, a Tennessee corporation backed by the principal owners of the Holiday Inn motel chain. Within less than a year of operations, the corporation has received applications for franchises from fifty-five persons or groups. Its first offering of 150,000 shares at $10 was snapped up a few months ago, and shortly thereafter the stock was selling for $16.

Two major difficulties which medicare will face when it initiates nursing home benefits are the shortage of such facilities and the fact that a sizable proportion of those now operating are expected to fail the program's standards. The principal requirements are that a nursing home have an agreement with at least one hospital participating in the medicare program for the transfer of patients and their medical records; that it have at least one registered nurse employed full time, and adequate nursing services around the clock; that it have a doctor always available for emergencies and that each patient be under a physician's supervision; that it keep medical records for all patients and have appropriate rules for dispensing drugs, and that it maintain a review committee with physician participation to make sure that patients are not admitted unnecessarily and do not stay longer than necessary.

Competent opinion is that the government will be forced to suspend some of these rules in order to meet the demand for convalescent care. But overshadowing this immediate problem is the key question of whether an important segment of health care should be entrusted to facilities operated for profit.

LETTERS

(continued from page 498)

There is some ambiguity in this writing—unusual in a professional like Swados—but he seems to be saying that such character assassination has been the main contribution of the two men he names. If this is what he means he should say so more clearly; if it is what he means he is a vicious slanderer and an ignoramus. If it is not what he means, what did he mean and whom did he have in mind? Herbert Aptheker

Valley Cottage, N.Y.

Dear Sirs: The last time I contributed a piece to The Nation I was rewarded by being classified as a pro-Communist "rogue" by the organ of the Socialist Labor Party. Now I am classified as "a vicious slanderer and an ignoramus" by Dr. Aptheker—conditional, however, on my assuring him that I did not intend to refer to him as one "whose contributions to socialism have consisted primarily in character assassination." I am happy to assure him that such was not my intention, that in fact I intended to contrast—as should be quite clear to any reader with a good conscience—Dr. Aptheker's scholarly attainment as one who has "something to contribute" with those whose lack of such attainment is coupled with venomous hatred for those Socialists with whom they disagree. As for identifying the character assassins, the paragraphs immediately preceding that to which Dr. Aptheker takes exception reported on their behavior, e.g., speaking of Isaac Deutscher as a Birchite. If Dr. Aptheker cannot bring himself to believe that such behavior has been characteristic of many Communists for the last forty years, I shall be happy to refer him to the appropriate citations from the files of the Daily Worker. . . . Harvey Swados new stage for man

Lynn, Mass.

Dear Sirs: Isaac Deutscher said in his address on "Socialist Man" to the Second Annual Socialist Scholars Conference that the founders of presently existing "scientific Socialist" ideology, Marx, Engels, and Lenin, laid no blueprint for the future "Socialist man." To do so before a Socialist society existed seemed premature, utopian, and thus wrong to them. As you pointed out [The Nation, Oct. 3] the Chinese revolution is now preoccupied with and heavily committed to the construction of the "new man."

This indicates clearly that the guiding ideology of the Chinese revolution is going far beyond pre-existing Marxist-Leninist ideology. It seems that the first great impetus of modern Communist ideology came from Marx and Engels in the 1860s and 1870s. Then the next great input of ideological energy came from Lenin in the 'teens of the present century, about fifty years later. Another fifty years has now passed. Is the stage now set and prepared for another great surge of ideological energy? Bernard Edwin Galitz at least a start

Cambridge, Mass.

Dear Sirs: I-Kua Chou's article on Communist China ["Between Goals and Dogma," The Nation, Oct. 3] presents an astute analysis of Peking's world view. . . . Normally statements of joint intent to settle disputes peacefully can even be harmful as they gloss over basic differences and allow nations to falsely believe peace is achieved, as witness the Kellogg-Briand Pact. However, here such a declaration has merit as it would mark a successful negotiation with Peking. Each nation believing that tensions have been reduced might find it profitable to institutionalize its communications with the other.
Mark Ginsburg

Nation file offered

Dear Sirs: I have an almost complete file of The Nation from mid-1960 to the present, which I want to dispose of. If a library or any of your individual readers would like them, please let me know.

Robert I. Cammer
4109 Pine Street, Philadelphia, Pa. 19104

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The American Outsider

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig is a poet who teaches at Columbia University.

Poetry in America has long been a dangerous enterprise, for those poets, at least, like Whitman, Hart Crane or Theodore Roethke, who needed to follow their imagination into whatever hard country it would lead them. Such poets have seemed often to be clumsy explorers, paying a great price for every scrap of poetic certainty they managed to secure. Their work, as well as their lives, have had a curiously unfinished aspect, as if the effort of discovery had allowed them no time to smooth over their awkwardness and hesitation of first encounters. Because they have been, to all appearances, only half-skillful, they have been called the "low-brows" of American poetry, the "whisky-priests."

Critics have in fact always recognized two kinds of pleasure which the poet may take with his language. There is first the elaborate, almost playful skill with words; the love of their plasticity, and pride at mastering the complicated rhythms one can impose on them. But there is also the second, more unruly pleasure: the poet's surprise at the unnamed shapes he has entangled in his net, the dark language, the unmanageable love he dredges up from that part of his experience where opposites coincide, and where his word and some higher Word may be the same; that strangely "impersonal" mood, of which Lorca wrote:

> They come to me, my essential things.
> They are refrains of refrains.
> Here in the reeds of the late afternoon
> How strange to be named Federico.

In England and America, it is the first of these pleasures that has, on the whole, won out. The joy of great rhetoric has always stood close to the center of our poetic traditions; verbal skill like Milton's or Tennyson's, like Eliot's, Pound's or Stevens' has been, like frock coat and tails, a ticket into all the best homes. This has given rise to a poetry of argument, in which the skill with words is not unlike a lawyer's skill which marshals evidence, weighs emotional appeal, plots distinctions that unfold toward a crisp, final point which can no longer be refuted. The other poets, the "children of nature," like Blake or Whitman, fought so hard against the frock coat and tails that in the end they were locked outside the gates, imprisoned among the shapes of their imagination.

Van Wyck Brooks's distinction between low-brow and high-brow in America makes roughly the same point as earlier distinctions between Yankee and Englishman, New York and New England, East and West; but it also seems to cover this curious dissociation between the pleasures of rhetoric and the pleasures of discovery, which has made our poetic traditions in England and America so different from those of France, Germany or Spain. The "low-brows," the half-respectable wanderers, the visionaries, have also been the most "American" of our poets; they have chosen not to appeal to Europe or to the Academy, and have paid for their isolation—Crane with his life, Whitman and Roethke with their "respectability," and the recognition they never really obtained while alive.

During the past half dozen years, however, as the New Criticism has loosened its paralyzing hold, and the overdone "skills" of our poetry in the 1940s and '50s have begun to appear as faded as they, in fact, always were, a new mood has crept into the world of American poetry. Active and gifted poets have discovered a need to forsake the pleasures of rhetoric, or at least to allow their formal skills to be shaped by the wayward pressures of an imagination which has led them, as it did the surrealists, to recompose the very elements of their experience. Thus James Dickey can write, with the simplicity of vision: "My green, graceful bones fill the air/ With sleeping birds"; and John Logan can describe a death, as "His soft old flesh slipped/ Inside its great/ Trunk with a sound he held/ Too long inside his skull."

A thread of continuity in this changing mood has been Robert Bly's erratic, single-handed experiment with the Sixties Press, and with the controversial magazine he has published since 1958, The Sixties (formerly The Fifties). For more than half a dozen years, Bly has explored the impact and the delicacy of that transfiguration which may happen in language, and which has always been the concern of poets like Rimbaud and Baudelaire in France, Rilke and Trakl in Germany, and many Spanish poets.

From his farm in western Minnesota, Bly has kept up a steady stream of translations, articles, poems and criticism which have filled eight issues of The Sixties magazine, and a variety of books under the head of the Sixties Press. Although neither the books nor the magazine are distributed on the same professional scale as the sleek literary quarterlies, they have gained a large audience among poets and students, and have had an influence far beyond the numbers distributed. From the first, the Sixties Press has been a labor of artisans, with Bly himself taking charge of all stages of production, excluding the actual printing. He and several friends have done the selection, the writing, the translating, the book designing; and his wife has been in charge of distribution to subscribers and booksellers.

Robert Bly's work has been as much a symptom as a cause. Among the poets of his generation who were but uneasily rooted in the poetic mood of the 1950s, men like Louis Simpson, James Dickey, Galway Kinnell, James Wright and Donald Hall, responded to Bly's formulations. Their own need for a renewed lyricism, and their own experiments with imagery were confirmed by the articles and translations which appeared in the magazine. The effect was to open an exchange of ideas and influences between these and other poets, who remain, nevertheless, so different from one another. The bond between them, which has been catalyzed by the Sixties Press, has been less one of mutual influence than of a common resistance to the orthodoxies of American poetry since the Second World War.

Bly's effort with the press has been a double-pronged one. On the one hand, it has sought to make available to Americans, in good English translations, the work of some great European and South American writers, poets whose imagination reaches down again and again into its own depths to bring up landscapes of self-exploration. As Bly himself has written:

> The fundamental world of poetry . . . is the inward world. The poem expresses what we are just beginning to think, thoughts we have not yet thought. The poem must catch these thoughts alive, holding them in language that is also alive, flexible and animal-like as they.

To date, volumes on Georg Trakl, Blas de Otero and Cesar Vallejo have appeared, while others on Pablo Neruda, Jiminez and Rilke are still in preparation. In pursuing this program of translation, Bly has tried to knit up the loose ends of a paradox which has so painfully isolated the American poets of the "Whitman tradition," who have wandered for so long at the edge of the well-dressed world of "literature." In a note, introducing the Twenty Poems of Georg Trakl, James Wright says:

> We are used to reading poems whose rules of traditional construction we can memorize and quickly apply. Trakl's poems, on the other hand, though they are shaped with the most beautiful delicacy and care, are molded from within. He did not write according to any rules of construction, traditional or otherwise, but rather waited patiently and silently for the worlds of his poems to reveal their own natural laws. The result, in my experience at least, is a poetry from which all shrillness and clutter have been banished.

How closely this resembles Whitman, and his attempt to blend into a single lifelong effort the art of words, and a spiritual attentiveness to those "natural" laws that governed their use, as he tells us in his famous preface to the Leaves of Grass: "The rhyme and uniformity of perfect poems show the free growth of metrical laws and bud from them as unerringly and loosely as lilacs or roses on a bush, and take shapes as compact as the shapes of chestnuts and oranges and melons and pears, and shed the perfume impalpable to form."

In issue after issue of his magazine, Bly has argued for a new sense of the imagination; a use, in particular, of that kind of poetic energy which is entirely self-expressive as it reinvents the objects of the world, and transforms them into imagery: not "pictures," or descriptions, but a layer of invented figures which have a root in the unconscious, and a blossoming in the clearly seen, delicately loved objects of the world. Not Pound's "petals on a wet black bough," writes Bly, but Yves Bonnefoy's "An interior sea lighted by turning eagles." That is an image.

Behind the Sixties Press is a desire to test the limits of our American poetic traditions; to weed out the dry exercises which have often, in the past twenty years, passed for poetry, simply because they followed a scheme of imagination familiar to all. This has led Bly to half-provocative gestures, like the recent publication of a volume entitled The Sea and the Honeycomb, containing a collection of four-line poems, drawn from the most varied sources. Because the pleasures of argument have always been uppermost in the English and American traditions, Bly writes, poets have tended to neglect a range of emotional material that moves in and out of their lives too rapidly to allow a hold for argument and elaboration. "The strength of a new form," he writes in his introduction, "is that it makes both poet and reader aware of feelings they'd hardly noticed before." The short poem, never a true member of our arsenal of forms, can do just that; it can extend the life of the intelligence into poetry in a way we have rarely tried before:

> The poet who succeeds in writing short poems is like a man who has found his way through a stone wall into a valley miles long where he lives. He walks back up the valley, and opens a door in the wall for an instant to show you where the entrance is. . . . Those who expect the poet to give them ideas see only a vague movement on the side of the mountain. Before they have turned around to face the poem, the door is closed.

The second prong of Bly's effort has been in the direction of literary criticism. He has written many articles whose aim has been to disengage the kernel of imaginative insight a poem may contain, although it may be obscured by an accumulation of rhetorical devices and half-thought-out literary effects. Every issue of The Sixties has contained, so far, a long essay signed by Crunk (usually Bly himself) on a young American poet whose work Bly feels touches in some way on the live energies of discovery. To date, essays have appeared on John Logan, James Wright, W. S. Merwin, Gary Snider, Louis Simpson, Donald Hall; others have been announced on Denise Levertov and William Stafford. In addition, the Press has published a volume of criticism by James Dickey, entitled The Suspect in Poetry, in which Dickey gracefully though bitterly dismembers much of what has been written in America in the past fifteen years. Dickey has a fine critical verve, and his volume is indeed hygienic for the cluttered "literary" mind. It is a pity, however, that those few poets Dickey admires rarely awaken his response as entirely as do those he "destroys" with such intelligence.

The whole idea defended by the Sixties Press (one which has given rise to such great poetry outside our country) depends on a sense of moral engagement of which poetry is only the purest expression in language. Whitman wrote in his preface: "The fluency and ornaments of the finest poems . . . are not independent but dependent. All beauty comes from beautiful blood and a beautiful brain."

Thus from this point of view, the effort of poetry becomes a kind of moral alchemy; to make great words, Whitman wrote, we must make ourselves. It is not accidental, therefore, that the most recent book distributed by the Sixties Press is entitled A Poetry Reading Against The War In Vietnam, edited by Bly and David Ray. It has been too easy for poets in America to consecrate a divorce between poetry and politics, which is usually justified by pointing to all the bad political poetry that has been written. Neruda, in particular, has been accused of selling out his imaginative genius by writing mediocre political verse, but one must not forget that some of Neruda's political poems are as great as anything he has written. In the past year much very ordinary poetry has been published expressing the almost visceral shock of the war in Vietnam. But some of these poems are very moving. What's more, others will be written, as the language of war and ideology and political conflict is transformed into that powerful language of tragedy and emotion out of which great political poetry must come.

The Sixties Press has shown, on the

FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave., N.Y. 3, Dept. [illegible]

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?

SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00

COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address...............
Zip...................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF (YOUR PUBLICATION)

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

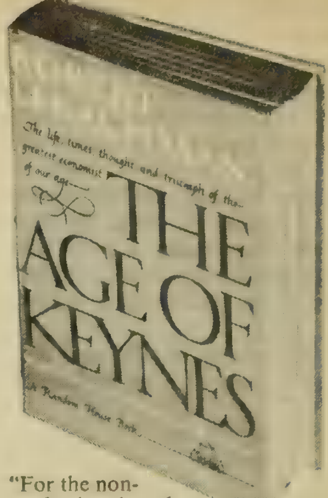
3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

whole, the peculiar strengths and weaknesses of a very American enterprise. With an almost quixotic energy, Bly has singlehandedly turned out issue after issue of his magazine, in addition to more than half a dozen books, with more to come. He has translated, or seen to translations, from languages he has scarcely known. He has thought out the problems of his argument in the widest terms; though from a dryly scholarly point of view his information on literary history can turn out, at times, to be somewhat fanciful. This has led to errors, some misstatements, occasional wrong-headed translations—I am thinking, in particular, of the French issue of The Sixties—which have been held against his whole enterprise by many who have been offended anyway by the overturned idols. His magazine has veered in the most unexpected ways, and often within a single issue, from serious and carefully argued statements, to rambunctious satire, and at times unreasonable polemics. Yet, in the end, the weaknesses of the Sixties Press are only the reverse side of its strengths. Both bear the mark of the right- and wrong-headed activist who, like Whitman in the preface and Democratic Vistas, has discovered that the only way he could think was to think for himself.



"For the non-professional reader to get a good view of John Maynard Keynes and his ideas has not been easy . . . For this reason, this book will be greatly welcomed."
—JOHN KENNETH GALBRAITH, front page, N.Y. Times Book Review

"Lekachman does three things and does them well. First, he presents an interesting biography of John Maynard Keynes, one of the few scholars who led an interesting life. Second, he explains, in terms that any intelligent reader can understand, the essence of Lord Keynes' scientific contribution to modern economics. Third, he provides an instructive and useful survey of the economic problems facing America in the postwar period." —PAUL SAMUELSON, Book Week

THE AGE OF KEYNES
By ROBERT LEKACHMAN
Chairman, Dept. of Economics, State Univ. of N.Y. (Stony Brook)
$6.00, now at your bookstore
RANDOM HOUSE

Austrian Empire World

THE WATERFALLS OF SLUNJ. By Heimito von Doderer. Translated by Eithne Wilkins and Ernst Kaiser. Harcourt, Brace & World. 375 pp. $6.95.

MICHAEL HAMBURGER

Mr. Hamburger, poet, critic and translator of German poetry, has published many books here and in England, including Modern German Poetry (Grove Press) and Günter Grass: Selected Poems (Harcourt, Brace). He is currently Purington Lecturer at Mt. Holyoke College.

Heimito von Doderer, who celebrated his 70th birthday this year, was introduced to American readers in 1961 with the publication of his longest and weightiest novel, The Demons. Even before the German publication of this magnum opus, preceded in 1951 by Die Strudlhofstiege, an only slightly shorter novel quite as remarkable as the other and closely related to it in setting and theme, Doderer was one of the very few living Austrian novelists of a stature comparable to that of Musil and Broch. No English translation of Die Strudlhofstiege has yet appeared. The Demons was followed here by an earlier and less ambitious novel, Every Man a Murderer, originally published in 1938.

The Waterfalls of Slunj, Doderer's latest novel, is the first part of a projected tetralogy. It is complete in itself, but the four parts together promise to be as large in scope and scale as The Demons. Unlike Die Strudlhofstiege and the The Demons, The Waterfalls of Slunj reaches back in time to the 1880s. Like them, it is a "total novel," designed to render and interpret a whole society, a whole way of life, a whole geographical area; that covered by the Austrian Empire; and something more, in this case, since several of the principal characters are English, and the "world" of this novel is an Anglo-Austrian one.

Doderer is also an eminent historian; and whether he deals with recent events or with past centuries, he combines the historian's concerns with the novelist's. Yet he does not produce the totality of his novels in a synthetic way, by creating characters who are embodiments of ideas or tendencies. Here he differs radically from Thomas Mann, whose long novels might otherwise present an analogous totality. Doderer, who regards ideologies as the root of all evil in the modern world, subordinates ideas to another totality, that of an individual's perceptions and memories. In that he is closer to Proust than to Mann. The naturalistic breadth of his novels is inseparable from his psychological range—by which I mean the range of his sympathies and empathies—and this range is greater than either Mann's or Proust's. He excels at the portrayal of characters who are neither sophisticated nor highly articulate. Doderer knows that their inner life is intense, rich and interesting; also, that it is threatened by disturbances and obsessions akin to those of intellectuals, but exacerbated by the incapacity of the semi-articulate, the semi-aware, to understand their own thoughts and feelings. Mann's Hans Castorp was a character of this kind; but Mann could sustain his own interest in such a character only by overlaying Castorp's experiences with a superstructure of general, symbolic or exemplary implications. Doderer's engineers, executives and businessmen may be "dumb oxen," but their sensibilities are rendered without patronage or caricature.

One instance of this in The Waterfalls of Slunj is the dilemma of the younger Clayton, Donald, whose failures and frustrations culminate in his premature death by the waterfalls. This dilemma is not analyzed and explained, as it would be in a novel by Thomas Mann, but enacted in terms of the character's own experience and sensibility. Donald Clayton's failure as a lover becomes part of a complex that includes all his other failures; yet, in Doderer, such complexes are not traced to a single cause, which must invariably be sexual. The contrast between Robert and Donald Clayton crystallizes in two seemingly trivial incidents, both involving crayfish, the fascination of these animals for the two men, and the very different responses to this fascination of Harriet and Monica. A related key incident is that in which Clayton's business associate, Chwostik, returns to the toy train set with which he had not played since his childhood; and another is that in which the schoolboy Zdenko is carried over from his experiment with electricity to an experiment with his friend's beautiful and electric mother. Like the waterfalls at Slunj, the scene of Robert's honeymoon and Donald's death, these incidents have a unifying function in the novel, without being blatantly symbolic.

Doderer's historical breadth and stylistic decorum make him a traditionalist among contemporary novelists. His originality, though indisputable, is discreet; and his experiments are conducted not in the reader's presence but in private, before and after the writing of his final drafts. His power to re-create environments and evoke their scenery, whether urban or rural, is self-evident, and scarcely surpassed by any other living novelist. Yet all the realistic detail also serves to enlarge our experience and sharpen our self-knowledge. The interaction between character and environment has been beautifully rendered in the English version by the Kaisers, who are also translators of Musil's works.

Death in the Schools

OUR CHILDREN ARE DYING. By Nat Hentoff. Viking Press. 141 pp. $4.50.

MAURICE R. BERUBE

Mr. Berube is assistant editor of The United Teacher. His reviews and articles have appeared in The Nation, The New Leader, Commonweal and New Politics.

Nothing so emphasizes the cruel disparity between the rhetoric and the reality of American life as the failure to educate the urban Negro poor. George Bernard Shaw expressed our national scandal in a famous indictment of the racial guilt of America: We turn Negroes into bootblacks and then claim the Negro is inferior because he is a bootblack. We add to the initial handicap of racial poverty, de facto segregated schools, badly trained teachers and deteriorating learning conditions. For the first time in our national history the school, instead of affording the means to transcend the ghetto slum, has become itself an oppressive force.

There is a growing literature documenting our failures. Nat Hentoff presents us with a fresh and valuable treatment in his expanded New Yorker profile of Dr. Elliott Shapiro, former principal of P.S. 119 in Harlem: a radical educator dedicated to the idea that compassion is an integral part of education in the slums.

Let it be said immediately of this admiring portrait that Hentoff does not shrink from challenging the assumption: is compassion enough? "But there's still something wrong there," Hentoff honestly elicits from a Shapiro admirer. "Those kids are not scoring as high as they should in the tests. It may be that all the understanding they get in that school, while it does help them develop a better self-image, doesn't help them to achieve. . . . Are his kids going to have enough competitive drive to do more than survive?" That, of course, is the heart of the matter.

Nat Hentoff intended this revised version as a microcosm of the educational macrocosm in Northern ghettos—a "book about some of these children" which is "relevant to all schools." However, the figure of Shapiro looms so large—even when he is not on stage—that nearly everyone and everything else seem to be props in the cult of Shapiro's personality. Perhaps this was conditioned by the needs of the profile genre of New Yorker journalism. But in rereading this book version, one becomes aware that the concentration on Shapiro creates an unnatural tilt separating him from his intricate milieu. Where one feels that the pupils and the environment should dominate, it is the father figure of Shapiro, his "life work and life style," that prevail.

For what we have here is the portrait of an extraordinary man in extraordinary circumstances, among quite ordinary peers (there are only two living legends in the New York City educational establishment among nearly 900 principals, Shapiro and the radical pacifist integrationist, Dr. Edward Gottlieb). Shapiro is a practicing psychoanalyst specializing in the young, a former teacher-union organizer, an adept administrator whose unique school encourages experiments and initiative, a visionary who believes that the schools' task is to alter the very fabric of society, a beloved figure in the black community ("You ain't just the principal of the school," one man tells him, "you're the principal of this neighborhood"), and a believer in direct action. (His mobilization of the parents and teachers around the drive for a new school is remembered in the now famous "rat incident." A newspaper advertisement brought dignitaries and television cameras to the old school. While the cameras were rolling and a horrified Mayor of New York watched, Shapiro chased a rat around the auditorium, swatting it with a broom. If Shapiro had staged it, the happening could not have been more effective. Of course, he got his new school.)

He is, then, an exceptional man. But as one educator put it, you can't build systems on Elliott Shapiros. But Shapiro's efforts for the children (who in his phrase

I DON'T MIND

I Carolyn Jackson am a pure-blooded Negro in soul and mind.
My mother's from North Carolina and my father's from Florida.
I know when I go to that old wooden bed,
Somewhere on the other side of town, there is a child being put to bed in a soft cuddly nest.
But being a Negro isn't so bad (if you know what's going on) Down South my cousin is being beat up—
And Look There . . . My aunt got put in jail for drinking from a white fountain.
But here I feel better because I have more freedom.
When I ride the train and sit next to a person of the opposite race
I feel like a crow in a robin's nest
And I feel dirty.
I'm not prejudiced or anything . . .
If we go on a trip and they call me names,
I Don't Mind.

CAROLYN JACKSON
(Age 11, United States)

From Miracles, Poems by children of the English-speaking world. Collected by Richard Lewis. Simon & Schuster. 214 pp. $4.95.

"are dying" because they fail to read and achieve) has effect: in the twelve years while he has been principal of the school, dismal statistics of the failure of 99 per cent of the children have been slashed to two-thirds.

And in Shapiro's special handling of a violent pupil, John, over the protests of his teaching staff that his method sacrificed the welfare of other children for just one, we have the distillation of what is best in education. For without concern over a John, the one among the many, the schools lose an integral part of their humanity.

Nat Hentoff not only knows which questions to ask, he sees the right things. Here are the many faces of poverty. The brilliant boy who reads twice his grade level, appropriated by various "families," is haunted by an attachment to the dead quasi-prostitute who assumed the role of his mother; they had often been seen "hanging on to each other, almost crying on each other." And there is the terrible world weariness of slum children exemplified by the pupil watching a fire who announced in a matter-of-fact tone to her excited teacher: "That's my house that's burning."

And beyond compassion, it is Shapiro's prescription for change which Hentoff finds relevant. Cut against the grain of conventional educational wisdom, his ideas, some dated, are an amalgam of progressive education, together with radical politics.

He proposes drastically reduced class sizes, and drastically increased educational services; but he does not stop here. Shapiro hopes that the schools will become real catalysts for social change in the community. "Suppose, for example, in a social science lesson, the teacher is talking about this being a democratic society," Shapiro tells Hentoff. "And a kid says, 'Teach, we have no heat at home. What do we do in this democratic society to get heat?' If the teacher doesn't formulate some plan in which the children can participate—picketing or other ways that might change the situation—the children won't buy the lesson." For Shapiro the world as a classroom is no euphemistic phrase.

Both subject and author are very special representatives of their breeds. The white compassionate radical educator in the ghetto school may one day be replaced by a more driving Negro counterpart. And creative journalists like Hentoff may give way to the specialized reporter. But should this come to pass, our lives will be less richly textured.

Reducing Kids to Dust

THEY CLOSED THEIR SCHOOLS: Prince Edward County, Virginia, 1951-1964. By Bob Smith. University of North Carolina Press. 281 pp. $5.95.

KENNELL JACKSON, Jr.

Mr. Jackson, a native of Prince Edward County, is currently a Foreign Areas Program Fellow and a doctoral candidate in history at the University of California (Los Angeles).

Benevolence and despotism are the most prominent, most contradictory features of the Southern political mind, indicating that an oppressive white elite can lay claim to impressive ideals and poetic vision, while courting intellectual impoverishment and truculence. Of this, Alexis de Tocqueville ventured a shrewd explanation: "In the South, the master is not afraid to raise his slave to his own standing, because he knows that he can in a moment reduce him to the dust, at pleasure."

At this moment, with an increasing number of interventionists in the South's affairs, Tocqueville's judgment is simply wrong. Mediá of conscience, the organs of news and law, harass and embarrass the Master, and have made a more hidden delight of his sport. If, however, we shift Tocqueville's description to an earlier period in the civil rights movement—when national indifference and inept leadership were more the rule—it is found to be uncannily true. Prince Edward County, Va., between 1959 and 1964, when the county's whites closed the entire public school system rather than integrate, is just one case that bears out his description.

The history of race relations in Prince Edward County had been distinguished by its reasonableness toward Negroes. There is no record of violent harassment or lynching, even when such events were widespread in other parts of the South. There appears to have been no systematic exclusion of Negroes from the voting rolls or gerrymandering of election districts within the county. While surrounding Virginia counties showed a marked tendency toward Negro migration to the cities, no exodus took place from Prince Edward County until the early 1960s. In 1961, there was a greater percentage of Negro landholders in the county than in any other rural area of the state. Finally, after the Second World War, a class of well-educated professionals, coming from

(Advertisement)

It is not entirely clear to us that a scholarly journal should be buying an ad in a commercial (albeit not very commercial) magazine, but the Nation said such very good things about us recently (in its Sept. 26 number) that it occurs to us that perhaps our writers deserve a wider hearing.

MASJ exists to keep American Studies people briefed on the best new thinking about US culture. We cover literature, art, history and the social sciences. Our contributors are specialists, engaged in active research. They write for us when they have something to say which transcends their own fields. When, for instance, the American historian has something to say which he feels the literary critic or sociologist should know about, he writes not for a history journal, but for us. Recently, a clutch of anthropologists gave the rest of us an eye-opening on what they now know about the American Indian (that was the issue the Nation praised).

So, though we're a scholar's magazine, university-sponsored, non-profit, small in circulation and inexpensively (but handsomely!) printed, what we print may well be what you want if you're actively interested in American history, literature, society, culture.

By way of comparison: we're rather less "popular" than American Heritage (more emphasis on recent scholarship and research) but written for a far less specialized audience than the technical journals. One reader says that we're a sort of Scientific American for the humanities and social sciences.

Another paid us a nice compliment: "I should tell you that yours is the only scholarly journal I regularly read from cover to cover."

The current issue is typical: It starts with an illustrated special section on the early political career of Harry S. Truman. The historians who wrote it say surprising things about HST's famous dealings with the Pendergast machine. There are a number of other good articles and a pile of reviews.

MASJ is frequently illustrated. And the editor makes a game effort to translate jargon, when it appears, into English. So MASJ is attractive and lively.

MASJ is edited by Stuart Levine at the University of Kansas, Lawrence, 66044. Subscriptions are handled by Professor J. Hauptmann, Park College, Parkville, Missouri, 64152. A copy costs $1.25; a year, $2.50; back issues, $1.50 (except for that Indian issue, with its un-scholarly 4-color cover: it costs $2.00). Make checks to MASJ. MASJ carries staid ads; rate card available.

Midcontinent
AMERICAN STUDIES
Journal

a wide range of economic groups, was developed; and by the early 1950s, Negro students from local high schools were achieving impressive academic standing in state and Northern colleges. Fifty years, from 1900 to 1950, had been shrewdly used by Negroes to build the structure of a viable economic and political community. During this time, the whites watched, even occasionally encouraging the efforts. But when the Negroes demanded integration in the public schools, this muted attentiveness took on all the elements of a ritual game. It was a segregationist rite de passage—instead of initiating the Negro into the political community, the whites leveled him to the status of the tolerated and the kept.

Bob Smith's They Closed Their Schools, a book of excellent reportage, chronicles this process of reduction, and lays open for clinical examination the machinery that did the job.

When the Supreme Court issued its original desegregation decision in 1954, the county's whites seized on the imprecisions and sketchiness of the decree. For the next five years, while whites collected funds for a private, segregated school system, the Court was led to believe that once the timetable and the conditions for integration were spelled out, the county would comply. But when clarification seemed possible, the county opted out of the area of public education—the only sphere to which the original Court decision applied. The courts were thus forced by the county's lawyers to analyze each of the traditional issues surrounding public education: whether the community could be compelled to levy school taxes and to operate public schools; whether a state had the right to public funds for use in the support of private education; and, most important, whether schools in other areas could be run by a state which had allowed a county to reject this function. Changing the legal situation, keeping the issues in a state of turmoil made the Court divert its energy to redefining the case. At the same time, the Court had to uproot the entangling state legislation which had permitted Prince Edward County's radical solution to the Negroes' demands. By the end of the lengthy exercise, integration had become a moot point. The schools finally opened with token mingling: an irritating reminder of the Negroes' failure in the arena of law.

WORLD'S BEST ?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)
COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 11-14-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)
NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

WAR

Not bad, but miserable
Drenched in gray sadness
Lonely grief handed out to all.

SARAH MASON
(Age 10, United States)

From Miracles, Poems by children of the English-speaking world. Collected by Richard Lewis. Simon & Schuster. 214 pp. $4.95

The catastrophe also throws interesting light on the policy and strategy of the state NAACP, which seriously misjudged its potential in Prince Edward County. The NAACP never comprehended fully the close connection between Byrd machine politics and the plight of the Southside whites, and was constantly embarrassed at the skillfulness with which the state machine and the local defendants meshed their case of legal traps. Only rarely did it understand that the whites were almost uniformly segregationists, that there did not exist a group of white moderates who could have stopped the school closure. But the great failure of the NAACP was to provide a program for an agrarian community—which needed intensive cadre work in voting, farming and collective economic efforts. It believed that the struggle was a moral one. It sought the law, the courts, as vindication of the Negroes' moral stand, rather than economic or political persuasion. It simply did not have a concept or a plan for a secular political community.

Rhetoric, moral ideals and historical optimism: all these scuttled the Negroes' demands. When Negroes appeared weary of the interminable legal process, Roy Wilkins of the NAACP asked the local parents: "What are a few years of education in the name of freedom?" A Negro teacher, who advocated direct action, replied: "They are buying your minds with words, your politics, with speeches."

Prince Edward County Negroes, today, live in an unrewarding present and stoically accept their leveling. (In 1963, there were 2,000 illiterate youth, a refugee professional class, and many landless migratory farmers.) Ironically, because of their faith in the revolutionary slogans of American democracy, and because of their willingness to follow due process of law, the Negroes were reduced, as Smith puts it, by a battle which was "merely a clash of abstract ideology."

There is a serviceable end to which this lesson can be put, and Mr. Smith's book is valuable as an exercise in dissecting the fictions that encumber and vitiate our understanding of American political realities. The masquerade of the courts in Prince Edward County is a perfect example of the use of political fictions. The whites assumed that the courts were largely irrelevant to their objectives. They also understood that they stood to profit as long as the legal charades could be continued; this game gave the impression of dramatic action when there was none. The county's Negroes labored under the powerful fictions of judicial redress and legal triumph. The whites prescribed their fate, and the Negro leadership sealed it.

The Protestant ethic, the concept of groups owning neighborhoods, the notion of a majority granting legally assumed rights—these are fictions, too, operating as filters between American political and economic life and the Negro American. Not to discern this is to make a serious misconception as to our plight and struggle. Without this knowledge, the Negro could easily fail to become the formidable political force—in America and the world—that his past history promises.

I AM MISSISSIPPI FED

I am Mississippi fed,
I am Mississippi bred,
Nothing but a poor, black boy.

I am a Mississippi slave,
I shall be buried in a Mississippi grave,
Nothing but a poor, dead boy.

IDA RUTH GRIFFIN
(Age 12, Harmony, Carthage)

From Freedom School Poetry. Foreword by Langston Hughes. Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee. Atlanta, Ga. 47 pp. $1.50.

How To Survive Childhood

THE CHILDREN. By Charity Blackstock. Little, Brown & Co. 240 pp. $4.95.

THE CHILDREN OF THE SOUTH. By Margaret Anderson. Farrar, Straus and Giroux. 208 pp. $4.95.

MURRAY POLNER

Mr. Polner teaches contemporary civilization at Queens College of New York.

At first glance both of these sympathetic books deal with similar themes: the strains and stresses to which children under attack are subject, the immediate impact and the long-run emotional dangers. The Children is concerned with adolescent survivors of German concentration camps, while The Children of the South tells the story of Negro youngsters in a newly desegregated high school, a story which is, potentially, filled with hope.

Charity Blackstock's subjects were between 14 and 19 years old. She had become involved with them soon after the war when she joined a small group interested in helping survivors reach England for brief stays with Anglo-Jewish families. By profession a writer of suspense novels, an Englishwoman and a Gentile, and totally unfamiliar with the problems of the work for which she had volunteered, she nevertheless hung on for five years.

At first she sensed the futility of trying to surround the shattered children with a "normal" family; later she recognized the limits of mere compassion. The Jewish youngsters were filled with hate and cynicism, or were simply broken, "wild, tortured young animals." Suburban English families could not possibly "understand the state of mind of a boy who had, six years back, been dragged out of the gas chamber by his hair and flung into a mountain of corpses, where he lay for a day and a half until it was safe for him to crawl away." How, indeed, identify with the victims of "so stinking and evil an experience"? Most of the host families could not, and they complained constantly about the incorrigibly ungrateful youngsters whom Miss Blackstock had sent to them.

Charity Blackstock also found the past too much to overcome for the survivors. One of her favorite boys classified everyone he met as murderer or anti-Nazi. Two Parisian brothers patiently explained their post-camp philosophy: it was a rotten world, you had to keep on top, and only fellow survivors who were Jews as well could ever really understand what they were talking about. Years after the end of the war there was a mysterious outbreak of delirium and violent fever in the French Jewish children's home where Miss Blackstock then worked. The illness was never connected to a physical cause and she concludes by suggesting that perhaps "it was the final expulsion of the poison."

In her seven years' work with these youngsters she witnessed no dramatic psychological breakthroughs, no vindications of man's capacity for gentleness and greatness, and no sudden transformations. A few married. Others drifted. Nearly all the youngsters, however, had been hopelessly crushed.

Margaret Anderson's book describes a segment of our most beleaguered youngsters, the Negro students who had to run a gauntlet daily in Clinton, Tenn., in 1956, to attend their newly desegregated high school. Mrs. Anderson was both a teacher and guidance counselor in Clinton High School at that time. She recalls the mobs, segregationist John Kasper's activities, and the dynamiting of the school.

But she never loses sight of what it all meant to the Negro students. There was first of all the physical danger. 'Mothers with babies in their arms heaped incredible abuse on the Negro children and men threatened murder as they walked to their classes. Once inside, the normal security of the school day was denied them. Obscenities were whispered to girls, and boys were terrorized.

Nearly every Negro child she met while acting as guidance counselor found it impossible to cope with the widespread castigation of themselves as intruders responsible for the chaos and tensions in town. One Negro child had to return to her segregated school because of a renewal of asthma attacks. Another kept jumping up from her seat and running out the door because she thought pencils were aimed at her. A boy's speech difficulties returned years after they were thought to be under control. It will be of more than academic interest to learn what consequences our years of racial turmoil are having on all the children of all our people. Does anyone still think that education and time will automatically bring greater tolerance in its wake?

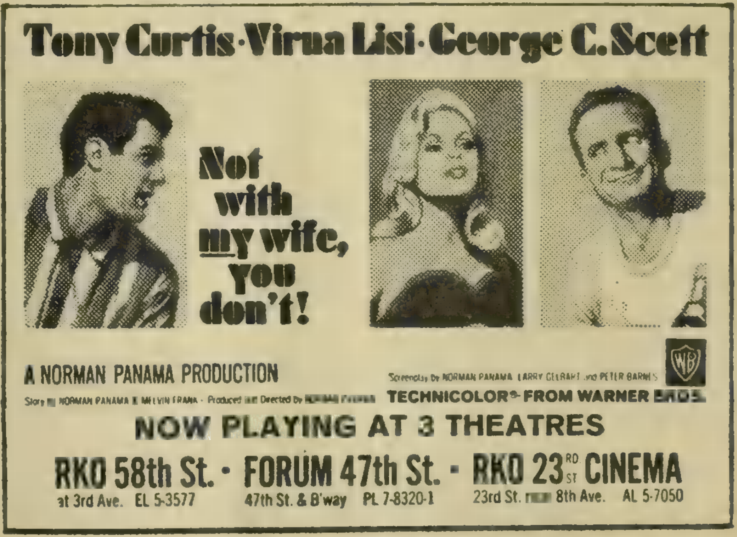
Someone recently suggested that we forget the anguish of the past and "start from now." Both these important books think it an impossible prescription—at least for those who lived through the pain of those times. Perhaps their children or grandchildren may be more dispassionate and forgiving.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

It appears that Saul Bellow is now determined to devote himself to writing for the stage. We congratulate him on this resolve, not so much for his sake as for ours. He is a real writer; such men are sorely needed in our theatre. In his "evening of comedies," three one-act plays collectively entitled Under the Weather (Cort Theatre), he has chosen to give us something from the lighter side of his talent: the sportive, the odd, the eccentric.

Bellow's Herzog wrote many letters. Some were pathetic or painful, others seriously ideologic. Still others revealed Herzog as a bit of a nut. Under the Weather is conceived in the latter vein. The three one-act plays are farces through which Bellow seems to be relieving himself of impulses and anxieties that oppress his spirit. When objectified as "stories" they become laughably "far out." They



Tony Curtis · Virna Lisi · George C. Scott

Not with my wife, you don't!

A NORMAN PANAMA PRODUCTION

Screenplay by NORMAN PANAMA, LARRY GELBART and PETER BARNES

Story by NORMAN PANAMA & MELVIN FRANK · Produced and Directed by NORMAN PANAMA

TECHNICOLOR® FROM WARNER BROS.

NOW PLAYING AT 3 THEATRES

RKO 58th St. · FORUM 47th St. · RKO 23rd ST CINEMA

at 3rd Ave. EL 5-3577 47th St. & B'way PL 7-8320-1 23rd St. near 8th Ave. AL 5-7050 are like those wild dreams which seem utterly ridiculous when recalled in the light of the morning. Still, they are unaccountably depressing. Under the Weather is comic and disturbing.

Part 1, "the weather picture in the Northeast," is about a middle-aged drug salesman—he has a Bachelor of Science degree—who induces a heart attack in himself to avoid marrying his old sweetheart, now widowed. We are uncertain that this is truly his motive, but it would seem so. Though overabundantly fleshed and no longer young, Flora Sharkey makes the impression of an eminently suitable mate for the complacently ailing (or hypochondriac) Harry Faufill. She is eager, enthusiastic, energetic and hysterically helpful. Despite all this, Faufill wants out and so arranges for his collapse. Laughter and puzzlement!

Part 2, "the weather in the Southeast," presents Solomon Ithimar, a top-secret atomic scientist on his way to a cosmically significant conference in Geneva. He stops off at a third-rate Miami hotel to see a childhood flame with whom he has since had no contact; she is a respectably married Jewish matron, Marcella Vankuchen. To what end? The memory which has sustained him through his rise from butcher's son to nuclear eminence was the sight vouchsafed him by Marcella during their pre-adolescent sex games of a tiny wen located in the region of her genitals. Nothing since that first intimacy has ever so stirred him. The great man pleads in an ecstasy of anticipation and in fear of rejection for permission to behold the magic spot once again and thus regain his capacity for pure elation.

If I am circuitous in stating this circumstance it is probably because Ithimar, like so many mental giants, is given to protracted verbal ejaculations. One is not sure if this logorrhea is simply a form of humor cultivated by Bellow to mock intellectuals whose tensions manifest themselves through an enormous spill of words (he uses the device in several of his novels), or if it is a kind of artful padding—the rhetoric of comedy—to compensate for a lack of characterization through developed action. In any case, what makes this episode memorable is the dry nervous squiggle of the impotent Big Brain whom Bellow, very ably abetted by Harry Towb as Ithimar, caricatures. I should add that the type has become familiar to me through much frequentation of literary parties. On that account alone these events are seldom pleasant experiences. Some of their uneasiness rubs off on this part of Under the Weather.

Part 3, "the weather picture for the Midwest," is the most telling. Hilda, a prostitute of Polish origin, begs Pennington, an octogenarian millionaire whom she has been serving in monthly installments over the years, to set her sister up in a dress shop. This skit is notable for its exposure of a not uncommon male attitude toward sex. It is crudely functional. Hilda is a domestic personality: she is patient, understanding and in her own way faithful. Pennington pays for her services but resents the intrusion of sentiment or any recognition of her except as an instrument of his need.

Do the three parts of the evening purport to be pencil sketches of grotesque aspects of American masculinity? The gamut runs from fear through employment of neurotic surrogates to cold and unfeeling possession as a touchstone of power. Since the plays on the whole are unpretentious, one cannot be sure that this is the plan. The effect is of a writer of complex talent still insecure in handling a medium to which he is not accustomed. He appears to be expressing fringe facets of his moral and psychosomatic self. We might describe the process metaphorically as that of an artist who took to depicting special portions of his anatomy—the tips of his fingers, the points of his elbows, the space between his toes—rather than his essential being. The result stimulates curiosity without being gratifying.

While Harry Towb in the three roles is offered the opportunity of altering his mask from asinine burgher, to jittery genius, to ludicrously superannuated powerhouse, Shelley Winters is for the most part effectively consigned to the role of feminine victim. It is her most satisfying stage performance to date. She gasps, sighs and moans in a mellifluous monotone which is at once humorous and touching.

The line of Arthur Storch's direction seems too close to "realism" and thus fails to capture the peculiar elements of "fantasy" which are woven into Bellow's writing. But his task has not been an easy one. I believe Under the Weather might fare better, commercially as well as artistically, somewhere or anywhere off Broadway. The New York midtown framework is damaging to such enterprises.

It so happens that goon writing, acting and direction are immediately available for observation in How's the World Treating You? by Roger Milner at the Music Box. Peter Bayliss and, much more startlingly as well as brilliantly, Patricia Routledge, are there on display in a variety of madly eccentric patterns and postures. Hardly any of our American actresses are capable of the kind of virtuosity in comic distortion of which Miss Routledge is a master. The mode seems to be an English specialty.

The trouble is that the evening is much too long for its special attraction: each act alone would be sufficient. Then, too, the quips and images are so thoroughly British (Punch to the nth degree) that most of our playgoers probably find them as weirdly foreign as an "in" joke of the Hottentot social register. The coin has no currency here.

ART / Max Kozloff

It occasionally happens that one is reluctantly forced to describe an intriguing work of art by what it is not. Similarities that it may have with other art, or simply the already known, have to be stripped away because they ring false. Confusing this issue, a pictorial apparatus may not altogether account for an effect. Or a formal element may not do what it had previously, in other circumstances, not hesitated to do. Parts, in this instance, resist adding up to a whole, although a whole there certainly is. And all this can grow under the aegis of some obscure negation that has yet the peculiar grace not to be malign. Such, I would say, is roughly the situation with the current pictures of Agnes Martin, at the Robert Elkon Gallery.

For example, they are ostensibly field paintings, worked all over, which nevertheless ask to be "read" as is type face. In addition, their oyster or buff white façades, each 6 x 6 feet, somehow suggest an errant tonality, and an induced colorism. They are flat pictures, too, that still get back rapidly into space without so much as even a token value change. Martin's work, then, is not geometric; it is not reductionist in the usual sense; neither does it purvey a serial or a single image. So far, this is easily enough observed. But it still leaves unexplained those diverse presences on the walls which finally bow out from being even paintings—since paintings are materialized by pigment, rather than as here given face mostly by pencil.

Large canvases drawn upon as if to resemble magnified graphs are what physically meet the eye. Uninflected, incessant horizontal rulings are met by somewhat weaker or less frequent vertical ones, evenly spaced. On certain canvases, a mid-key ground relieves white tracings, like a solarized print. Mechanistically straight, the lines, fine tipped as they are, flake or granulate minutely over the acrylic primed cotton. Further, the micro-intervals of these works seem to contract upon examination. They hover on the verge of becoming tone, but never lose their porosity. Moreover, one sees through variously regulated meshes that are translucent without being luminous, gridded without being discretely structured. Less noticeably, these pictures conceptually pair with one another, in the manner of alter egos. The same checker pattern is grounded by gray and eggshell in two separate instances; and a channel sequence whitens where it remains bare in the pendant. It is like stepping in and out of the shade, or better, half-light.

One might be tempted to dismiss this self-contained display as "sensitive," were it not uttered in deliberately matter-of-fact language. Still less should it be called monotonous, since it yields the most differentiated sensations. In the quietest way, the pictures invoke a kind of visual raveling that tautens their unstressed webbing. Largely this is because, as energy flows everywhere and nowhere at the same time, the eye requires, or plucks at, a focus, just as an organism exhibits a tropism. But this is no primitive experience. I was aware not merely of the impoverished materials but of their diffident, and elegant, seizure of my attention. It is an indication of how ramified is this art that its sensuality exists more richly and vividly as a psychological state than as physical fact. One is beguiled into unforeseen expectancies, of landscape, for example, or sky, because there is no alternative to viewing Agnes Martin's canvases as screens for unfigurated seeing. Here emerges the crux of her work for, without giving the beholder the faintest nuance or pictorial transition, it conjures an atmosphere and a rather airy one at that. This is all the more startling because the tactility of each work arises from nothing more than the physically even-pressured meeting of pencil and canvas. All other shaping or activity is banished to the choice of framework which remains ultimately an intellectual conception. The show stands midpoint, therefore, between the sensibility of the early fifties, with its loosely structured and empathetic recall of the outer world, and the "computerized" pictorial systems of today. It is a condition perhaps emphasized by the fact that the artist herself is of the middle generation. I am reminded by this exhibition of Valéry's remarks on the paintings of Berthe Morisot: "Made up of nothing, they multiply that nothing, a suspicion of mist or swans, with a supreme tactile art, the skill of a brush that scarcely feathers the surface. But that featheriness conveys all . . . the great gift . . . for reducing matter to a minimum and thus giving the strongest possible impression of an act of mind. . . ."

The Lucas Samaras exhibition at the Pace Gallery delights me with the knowledge that art can be a proper receptacle for all those impulses which in social life would be abashing or atrocious. The work simultaneously represents the degree to which the artist can purge himself of his fantasies (or outright sublimate them), and creates the distance necessary for his public to see them as in a sense ordered, and unthreatening. How gentle, in fact, it all seems, now that it is possible to view these images in the light of artistic metaphor.

It has already been noted that his prickly objects enact some aboriginal defense which may also maim, puncture or slice. They are the porcupines of modern art. Yet Samaras hardly considers himself a practitioner of standoffishness: "the manner in which art objects are made are [sic] erotic gestures. The Greek word lick and sculpt is the same. Artistic-creation-eroticism may be a substitute for genital-biological-creation-eroticism, however the eroticism is experienced in the brain in either case. . . . The erotic isn't connected with life and death . . . it is continuous. . . . Narcissism is making one's body into art." It apparently also means making one's house into art, and each of its furnishing or articles into reliquaries of one's own eroticism. From his words, one would never guess that Samaras has a St. Sebastian complex, and that he equates the erotic with the enthralling nightmare of self-impalement. But it hardly ends even here: "To be an artist is to be god (an ambi-sexual one, no doubt), and I don't know anything more erotic than that." The Pace show is a veritable cosmos of open nerve ends, of touchy, tacky, tingly glamour germinating everywhere from the inanimate. Indeed, one of his typical fancies is to figuratively X-ray himself (in drawings), preferably his colon and spine, seen under a spangled, celestial milky way.

This iconography is paraphiliac and callow in about equal measure. Many would even consider it juvenile, which hardly invalidates it as a basis for creating art. Perhaps the most remarkable illustration of the effect to which Samaras can put it is his new 8-foot-high room, its walls, floors and ceilings completely covered with mirrored panels. It will most literally expand the consciousness of any who enters it, repeating or showing him off from "impossible" worm's eye, or overhead multiple views in a gaudy display of omniscience. In terms of creative process, the artist can be imagined giddily incarcerating himself in such a chamber—of the mind.

If solipsism is the watchword that unites his boxes with their hypodermics, his pin-covered leaning chairs, his colored yarn whorls, bent forks, and razor-blade cocktails, Samaras also joins an eccentric tradition in American art. His work stands, it seems to me, between the nostalgic jewel cases of Joseph Cornell, and the bone-chain-glass-eye aggregations of Alfonso Ossorio. But he is not as poetic as the first, nor anywhere near as brutish as the second. There is a rather calculated effeminacy about his effects that allies him, at times, with the chiffon-swathed, yet ghastly ashes and pearl concoctions of Bruce Conner.

But such a comparison, oddly enough, makes him look only the more detached. The further one studies a Samaras assemblage, the more convincing does it appear as an abstract, even decorative, object. But I hasten to add that this abstraction seems to arise out of its own obsessive elaboration of patterns, opposed to any liaison with the current repeating formats of abstract art. Then too, Samaras' horror vacuii has pointillist connotations:

WFF'N PROOF
The GAME for THINKERS

Can you solve this problem?

1. There are three numbered statements in this box.
2. Two of these numbered statements are not true.
3. The average increase in I.Q. scores of those who learn to play WFF 'N PROOF is more than 20 points.

Is statement No. 3 true?

A NEW DIMENSION IN EDUCATIONAL GAMES

WFF 'N PROOF: The GAME of MODERN LOGIC $6.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

EQUATIONS: The GAME of CREATIVE MATHEMATICS $3.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

ON-SETS: The GAME of SET THEORY $4.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

By Professor Layman E. Allen

WFF'N PROOF
Box 71-MY
New Haven, Conn.

Please send me .... WFF 'N PROOF
.... ON-SETS .... EQUATIONS
I enclose $ .... and understand that if I am not completely satisfied, I can return the games in 10 days for a full refund of the purchase price.
Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....

Refund and return privileges guaranteed!
Dealer Inquiries Invited

WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF
WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF
WFF'N PROOF

pinheads serve as color molecules or breakups of chromatic grounds—all delicately reiterated. His earlier fascination with the optical changes made by overlaps of colored plastics is another aspect of that decorative instinct which is yet tinged with a slightly panic groping toward infinity.

In the end, Samaras accomplishes with ease the transfer of banal and repulsive materials into an uncanny glitter. It is a situation for which the Surrealist derivations of his works do not, in themselves, give account. Some larger impulse within seems to have carried him past preciosity: a creative principle to which all motifs are subsumed. Whether it be in the dainty homeliness of his execution, his capacity to change scale from very small to grand, or in the menagerie of his sensations, one perceives a prodigal imagination. It feeds upon itself, but in doing so, grinds up, or rather pulverizes, the psycho-sexual alarms that can also be found within ourselves.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

Chusingura is the finest movie spectacle I have ever seen. These gargantuan epics are not my idea of how best to use the screen, but this tale of Japan's forty-seven samurai martyrs to honor is the only picture of the sort that I have ever sat through in willing captivity or could contemplate seeing again.

Partly, the acceptance stems from the exoticism of the work. A legend of 18th-century Japan inevitably contains more novelty and pleasant surprise than can be expected in accounts of Genesis, Lawrence of Arabia, or the Winning of the West, as imagined by our commercial film makers. But partly the film's lure is intrinsic. It is in the first place extraordinarily and unfailingly beautiful in its sites and settings. Hiroshi Inagaki, the directors, does not fall into the frequent Western fallacy of bringing legend down to earth; he sets his tale against a background painstakingly designed to ravish the eyes. Beyond that, the film is performed in a mannered and polished style that maintains an edge of elegance and control in the sprawl of plot. Chusingura is pageantry and dance, ceremony and tourney; it is never happenstance.

For a Japanese, the film may be an occasion of patriotism, even of piety, but Western viewers do best, I think, to sink into it passively, as into a reverie. It is so long (three and a half hours) and moves with such deliberation from one fist of violence to the next, that if you try to participate in its narrative you will find yourself stumbling ahead of the action. Moreover, the motivations of the work make to Western minds a kind of dream sense. The emotions—pride, loyalty, greed, vengeance—are familiar enough, but with us they are balanced, negotiated and transposed according to different formulas. Not even in feudalism or the code of chivalry can one find satisfying parallels to the behavior of these warrior lords and their ladies. What the protagonists do is clear and consistent enough, but I think it would be impossible except in a dream for an Occidental to "feel" them doing it.

So for us Chusingura is inevitably a partial experience. It offers visual pleasure at a superb level of restrained taste and provides teasing insights into the springs of a complex and remote psychology. But for all its redundant and implacable violence, it does not offer us the satisfying resolution of tragedy or the exhilaration of participation in heroic affairs that presumably its countrymen can derive from it. It becomes clearer all the time, I think, that world brotherhood, if it ever comes, will rest on mutual trust and tolerance at least as much as on shared understanding.

The Czech film, Loves of a Blonde, was apparently the darling of the New York Film Festival, and it is indisputably an endearing film. The trouble with it is that it is easier to like than to admire; less art than artless.

For one thing, it is curiously ill-constructed. The first third at least of its running time is devoted to the attempts of three middle-aged soldiers to pick up a trio of factory girls in a provincial dance hall. This provides a certain amount of feckless merriment, but it goes on much too long for patience or plausibility, and it has only the most tenuous connection with the main story, which is of a love affair between one of the girls and the piano player from Prague who is on the platform that evening.

The heart of this tale, which amounts to little more than a short, is that the heroine is as direct in action as she is naive in spirit. Some time during the night, her musical seducer (he employs the "I can feel you don't trust me" technique, which is still apparently new to the girls of the Czech hinterland) says she must come to Prague some day, and advances his purpose still further by giving her the address of the flat he shares with his parents. So a quick hitchhike later, the parents are confronted late in the night with what looks to them very much like a stray cat. When the boy comes home after being outwitted by a Prague girl who understands piano players, the family goes into a slapstick round of mutual recriminations that ends with the three of them thrashing about in one bed and the girl weeping her eyes out on the other side of the door. We are told in a sequel that everything works out splendidly, a prognosis I didn't for a moment believe after catching a glimpse of the hero's taste in Prague girls.

This is life, defined and performed at the level of television romance (and photographed with the camera 6 inches from everyone's nose). I like it well enough, but I'm surprised that we need to import it.

THE COWGIRL BALL

for Gene Autry

When you jumped into the snowy wagon headed for the Cowgirl Ball your mommy pinched herself and spoke in measured syllables:
"Yas yas, I regonice you by your farmer cheese smell, Yas, I regonice you by your tacky nose."
Guessing her mind, you offered up a pail of blue eats to make her sick and you gave her an "aeroplane surprise."
A daisy mugging by the roadside got a coat of old dust for its trouble. You had no time for nature studies, you were off to the Cowgirl Ball!
The opening ceremony was me
Firing a raft cannon to provide the merrymakers with a chance to speculate on how fast I would leave the lake backwards.

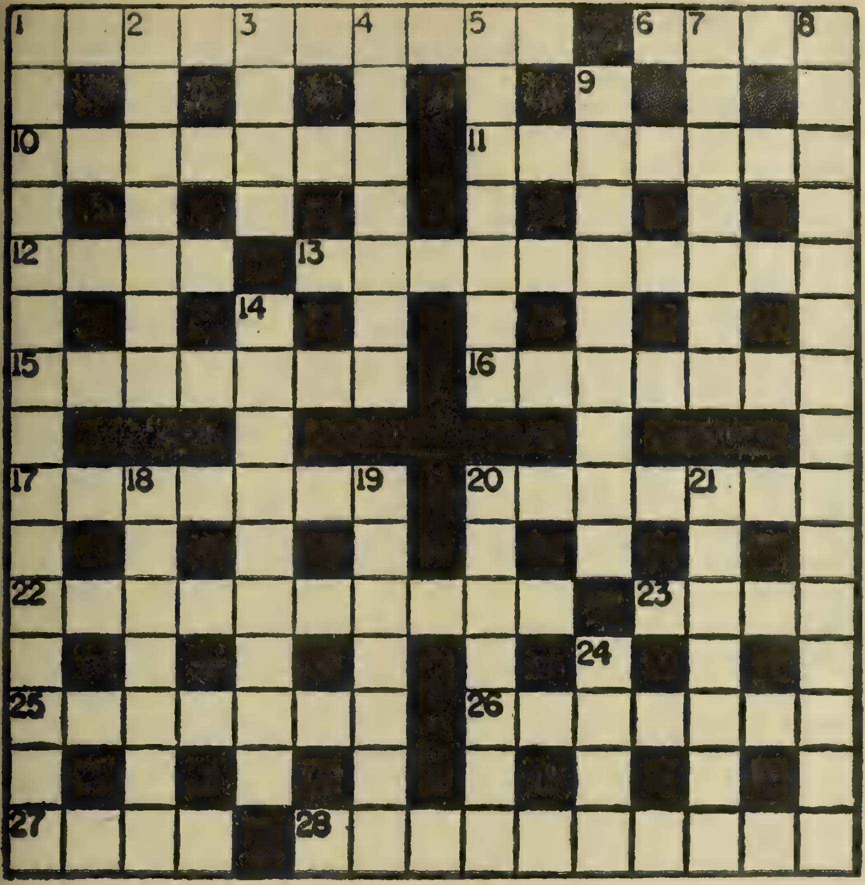
MICHAEL SILVERTON

Crossword Puzzle No. 1175

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Mat finishes seem to, being dull. (10)
6 and 24 down How to grab a bellhop implies no effort. (8)
10 One way to write a few bars — in Holst's "Planets" at last! (7)
11 You might find his position fits you, if you're a real performer. (7)
12 A bird might be one, twice. (4)
13 A spirit on the mountain can prove intangible. (10)
15 The end lies broken in a flax producer. (7)
16 A body in the rear? (7)
17 Just delivered? (7)
20 Yield? It starts to sound this way, phonetically. (7)
22 One doesn't coil the spring in front or back, evidently, like a little one with a rattle. (10)
23 Might be a composition, or it might compose it. (4)
25 The result has nothing in it but an offering from the mound. (7)
26 Lingua franca of Africa. (7)
27 Is it a job to pay it when things come in? (4)
28 The sort of inane press some poetry gets? (10)

DOWN:

1 To a great extent, is earth solid, or is it just water? (4, 6, 5)
2 It turns on after the top title. (7)
3 All-out boor? Not little Albert! (4)
4 The traditional American beauty was long this. (7)
5 Pull out of the passage? (7)
7 Not like the novice's liquor? (7)
8 One of those parliamentary procedures continually turning up in Strauss's works. (9, 6)
9 Is the man who works in one likely to be a ringer? (9)
14 Do wool men make proper bows with it? (9)
18 Descriptive of seers on the far left and right, in a rather broad circle of acquaintances. (4-3)
19 Such trains are not, at 21. (7)
20 Keep moving the decal's directions. (5, 2)
21 At both ends of the line? (7)
24 See 6 across.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE No. 1174

ACROSS: 1 Downhearted; 9 Hittites; 10 and 3 down United Nations; 11 Crimson; 12 Chassis; 14 Breaks; 15 and 23 Virginia Woolf; 17 Studious; 22 Ragweed; 24 Expanse; 26 Verona; 28 and 20 across After-dinner speech. DOWN: 2 and 27 Of Time and the River; 4 Elsa; 5 Rougher; 6 Exits; 7 Mirror; 8 Medici; 13 Avast; 16 Iterative; 18 Trades; 19 Overage; 20 Sixteen; 21 Caster; 25 Stud.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), [illegible] Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EDUCATIONAL

THE THOREAU SCHOOL. Five day boarding, grades five through eight. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of country living. School bus brings your children home weekends to New York City. Now enrolling for opening September, 1967. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. Phone: 914-895-5523.

CAN YOUR CHILD READ?

Teach him fast yourself with dramatic new method.

Children 4½ easily learn to read fluently almost anything in English long before they go to school. Rapid results with remedial, adults. Make money tutoring other people's children.

Complete instructions, all necessary reading material, etc. Send $8.00 plus 25 cents postage to:

PHONIC LANGUAGE ARTS
Post Office Box 4321
Stockton, California

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.

Please address your orders to

THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

FREE with every new subscription

THE NATION
EDITED BY HENRY M. CHRISTMAN
INTRODUCTION BY CAREY McWILLIAMS

A View of The Nation

An anthology edited by Henry M. Christman, introduction by Carey McWilliams, 269 pages

This handsome book, published by Grove Press, collects some of the best articles that have appeared in The Nation. Among the thirty-seven contributors: C. Vann Woodward, Kenneth Rexroth, David Cort, Harry Golden, Kenneth Burke, George P. Elliott, Fred J. Cook, Harvey Swados, Dan Wakefield, Eve Merriam, Walter Goodman, Josephine Herbst, J. Bronowski, Walter Millis. Robert Fulford, book editor of the Toronto Daily Star, refers to the contents as "The Nation's fresh voice" and adds: "A View of The Nation serves as a reminder that The Nation, at its best, is a very good magazine indeed."

For your FREE copy of A View of The Nation, fill out the subscription coupon at right, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION, 333 6th Avenue, New York 10014

Herewith my order for a new subscription (not a renewal) to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of A View of The Nation.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ Six Months, $6

☐ Payment Enclosed ☐ Bill Me

(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 a year extra)

Name ____________

Address ____________

City ____________ State ____________ Zip No. ____________

11-14-66

NOV 29 1966

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Cal.

PRESSURES ON LABOR B. J. WIDICK

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 21, 1966 35 cents

OUT TO GET SNCC

A TALE OF TWO CITIES

PAUL GOOD

HISPANIOLA '66

HAITI

Chaotic and Corrupt GERARD R. LATORTUE

•

DOMINICAN REPUBLIC

Burden of the Past KAL WAGENHEIM

RUSSIA'S REBEL ARTISTS

Yevtushenko & the New Poetry / SIMON KARLINSKY

Neizvestny & the New Art / JOHN BERGER

12-67 FLS-801 BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY

LETTERS

too much to lose?

Cuernavaca, Mexico
Dear Sirs: I find Charles Roberts' article ["The Press Views LBJ: Fearsome Antagonist," The Nation, Oct. 24] somewhat naive. How can he hope that Johnson could ever be "convinced that Presidents of the United States must tell the truth, and nothing but the whole, unvarnished truth" when he has so much to hide?
Robert S. Hartman

angry encounter

Lima, Peru
Dear Sirs: I have read the article by Clayton Eshleman ["Explorations in the Apolitical," The Nation, Sept. 26] in which he refers to me, among others. Since the phrases attributed to me are partly false and might lead to mistaken and harmful judgments about myself, I request publication of the following clarification:

> I did not say that the students of the Universidad Agraria are in great part Communist. Neither did I say that two professors lost their positions due to the reasons Mr. Eshleman stated nor for any other. Contrary to what he states, it was he who came to my house.

Such inaccuracies, to say the least, are probably due on the one hand to Mr. Eshleman's beginner's Spanish, and on the other, to his temperament, in this case strongly heightened by anger. It is easy to understand that both these conditions should impede or disturb normal communications.
Javier Sologuren

New York City
Dear Sirs: Mr. Sologuren's letter answers itself. I was furious, as he says, because he had just copped out on me and on Quena, giving the very reasons he now disclaims. I asked him, can't I talk with those students, can't I tell them what I am trying to do, and if they accept it, wouldn't it take the pressure off you? Sologuren refused to have anything else to do with Quena that would involve his name. The matter was closed. It is, however, true that this took place in his house.
Clayton Eshleman

correction

Albany, N. Y.
Dear Sirs: In reference to my recent article on state legislatures ["Legislation: The 100-Year Lag," The Nation, Nov. 7], I would like to make it clear that the National Conference of State Legislative Leaders did not meet in Nevada and Louisiana the same year but in different years.
David H. Beetle

no racist

Hagerstown, Md.
Dear Sirs: There are many thousands of whites like myself who supported the August, 1963, March on Washington who are now disgusted with the violent demonstrations by Negroes. . . . We can't understand why when a policeman arrests a Negro suspect or lawbreaker a swarm of Negroes flock to the scene and often the policeman is in greater danger than his prisoner. . . .

Other minorities years ago lived and labored under worse circumstances than do the Negroes today. Unlike the Negroes, they did not terrorize a city in order to improve their lot. Nor did they go around shouting Jew Power, Italian Power, etc. Wake up. Not everyone who deplores Negro extremism is a racist.
Howard Keats

EDITORIALS

The Elections

There was less bad news in the returns than might have been anticipated. While the Republican Party has not yet overcome its internal divisions, it has made a substantial recovery from the debacle of 1964. With Republican governors in the four key states of New York, California, Michigan and Pennsylvania the party is in a strong tactical position for the battle of 1968. On balance, the liberal-moderate element in the party has been strengthened by the re-election of Governors Rockefeller, Romney and Chafee, by the election of Winthrop Rockefeller in Arkansas, Raymond P. Shafer in Pennsylvania and Spiro T. Agnew in Maryland and, most particularly, by the victories of Mark Hatfield, Charles Percy and Edward Brooke. Ronald Reagan's victory in California offsets, to some extent, these liberal-moderate gains, but the Republican convention of 1968 will not be a re-enactment of the Cow Palace Putsch of 1964. As things now stand, the Republican Party is in a position to make a strong bid for the Presidency in 1968. The "sleeper" issue in this campaign was, perhaps, the growing dislike and distrust of President Johnson; this could be a better issue in 1968 than it is today. The recent report of the Ripon Society, From Disaster to Distinction, provides an excellent blueprint for the further renovations that must now be undertaken. In essence the report argues that the Republicans must "leapfrog" the Democrats into the issues of the future; they must seize and hold "the issue initiative." To quote from the report: "They must leave behind the meaningless arguments of conservatism versus liberalism, public versus private, business versus labor, hard line versus soft line, and come to terms with the really new challenges." Under such headings as "Civil Rights," "Education," "Technological Change," "The Quality of the Environment," "The Revolution of the States and Cities" and "An Innovative Foreign Policy" the report spells out the nature of the new challenges. This is indeed the kind of strategy the Republicans should pursue in order to win in 1968.

The Escalation of Policy

Among the unpleasant facts that were only sketchily reported in the American accounts of President Johnson's trip to the Orient, the bamboo screens of Manila have particular significance. At certain points along the route from the airport to his hotel, he could have observed some of the most noisome slums in Asia, but the screens were emplaced to spare him this disagreeable sight. Once the President had left the Philippines, the screens were removed; needless to say, the slums remain. With a Philippine birth rate of about 3.5 per cent per year, the slums will get worse—there is no limit to squalor.

And there was scarcely a limit to the promises the President made to the rulers of the Asian and West Pacific countries he visited. These promises he evidently regarded as diplomatically necessary. The pomp and pageantry of such a journey are what the common people see and enjoy, but harsh realities underlie the spectacle. In countries like South Vietnam, the Philippines, Thailand, South Korea, the rich get richer and the poor get poorer. The rich also get to worrying about how long they can keep their wealth atop such mountains of misery. They would like Uncle Sam to do something to reduce the glaring contrast between affluence and destitution in their countries. It would not only ease their consciences but add to their security. Uncle Sam would feel more secure, too; poverty is not only bad in itself, but it breeds communism. So Mr. Johnson spoke of the "New Asia" and his desire to bring the good life to the teeming Asian multitudes.

These promises will not be forgotten by the prospective beneficiaries. Because the President's speeches were written for immediate effect at the places of delivery (and in the United States), they were in many cases excessively eloquent, so that more can be read into the text than may have been intended. This grandiose outpouring of good will amounts to an escalation of policy on a scale greater than the military escalation in South Vietnam, and capable of getting us into even greater trouble.

In some ways the situation resembles that of the United States vis-à-vis Western Europe after World War II. The war had relieved us of depression and added vastly to our wealth, while parts of Europe lay in ruins. The Marshall Plan, coupled with the Atlantic Alliance, was our response. It worked. But the differences between Europe in the 1940s and Asia in the '60s are immense. Europe had an industrially educated population, and considerable productive machinery survived the war. Around the fringe of Red China—our Asian bogy in a role similar to that of the Soviet Union twenty years ago—we are committed to the uplift of countries which industrially have as yet hardly entered the 19th century. Our role as the major Atlantic power has cost us something like $100 billion. The chain of buffer states which we are forging around Red China might cost us ten times that amount.

Whether this is good or bad, or even possible, one thing certain is that the American citizen is entirely unprepared for global commitments on the scale Mr. Johnson dangles before the Asians. The contours of the new policy were tossed out in offhand, evangelical fashion, adulterated by the obsession with communism as the menace to our security and with Red China as the power which manifest destiny calls on us to contain at any cost. Unless all policy is to be left in the hands of Lyndon B. Johnson and a small, tight circle of advisers, here, surely, is something for the 90th Congress to ponder and debate.

The Johnson Touch

The President's castigation of Richard Nixon at his November 4 press conference was petulant and spiteful. His reference to Nixon as a "chronic campaigner" was apt enough, but then, with a childishly aggrieved air, he went on to say that "we shouldn't have men killed because we [meaning Nixon] try to fuzz up something" and to admonish Nixon that "he doesn't serve his country well by trying to leave that kind of impression in the hope that he can pick up a precinct or two or a ward or two." Mr. Johnson himself has never been above picking up wards

IN THIS ISSUE

November 21, 1966

EDITORIALS

530

ARTICLES

534 Out To Get SNCC:
A Tale of Two Cities
Paul Good

Hispaniola '66

539 Haiti: Chaotic and Corrupt
Gerard R. Latortue

541 Dominican Republic: Burden of the Past
Kal Wagenheim

545 Pressures on Labor:
Vietnam, Race and the Unions
B. J. Widick

BOOKS & THE ARTS

549 Yevtushenko and the Underground Poets
Simon Karlinsky

553 Familiars of Death
John Berger

555 Report to the Blue Guard (poem)
Robert Hershon

557 Records
Benjamin Boretz

558 Two Departures (poem)
Edward Field

559 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 17

and precincts, using whatever arguments came to hand; and in fuzzing up the Vietnamese War for the American people he has no superior and few peers. Some 4,000 Americans will have lost their lives by the end of the year because Johnson chose to escalate the war, instead of trying to end it, as he gave the voters in 1964 the impression he would do.

With Nixon eagerly following up his advantage, Secretary McNamara was summoned to the LBJ Ranch. Though his appearance may have been planned before the Johnson-Nixon exchange, it had the earmarks of a pre-election snow job. McNamara's tranquilizing discourse may have neutralized Nixon's persuasion of some voters, but if the President thought he might thus entice the doves he must regard them as birdbrains in fact as well as in fancy.

In the face of his own admission that the Vietcong and North Vietnamese soldiers "are fighting stubbornly and from all indications will continue to fight stubbornly," McNamara promised a halving of draft calls next year, a lower rate of troop deployment, and no sharp increase in the present level of 25,000 bombing sorties a month. About the only bad news (barring unforeseen emergencies) was for the munitions manufacturers: with approximately 160,000 tons of air ordnance on the ground in Southeast Asia, and an additional 140,000 tons in transit, it might be possible to effect cutbacks. Though carefully qualified, McNamara's forecasts were calculated to reduce the level of anxiety of potential draftees and reservists subject to call-up; to some extent, also, parents and sweethearts might gain hope for the safe return of young men already fighting in Vietnam. Yet even as McNamara spoke, some of the heaviest fighting of the war was in progress. "All of a sudden the sky fell in," a West Point major told newsmen. "For eight hours it was nothing but solid lead." And that was only 40 miles from Saigon. And then, of course, on the day after the election the Pentagon conceded that the number of U.S. troops in South Vietnam might swell to 500,000 by the end of 1967.

Mr. Johnson overreached himself in his gratuitous denunciation of Nixon, in his stage management of the McNamara show, and in the pre-election announcement of his surgical operations which, from a medical standpoint, should have precluded his sweep through Asia and the Pacific. Skill in politics calls for a sense of proportion. Mr. Johnson seems to have lost his balance.

China and the Bomb

When a 20-kiloton bomb was first exploded in anger to end World War II, the world was appalled. The fires of hell had been unloosed. When, a few years later, the hydrogen bomb made its debut and explosive powers 50, 500, more than 2,000 times that of the primordial bomb became available, the Hiroshima bomb began to seem puny. Viewed factually, it was just as horrible as it had been in 1945. That the Chinese bombs so far tested are of Hiroshima magnitude or only a few times larger is no reason for taking them lightly. American reaction to nuclear explosives in the hands of unfriendly nations tends to oscillate between minimizing their importance and exaggerating their menace. Neither makes sense.

The Chinese have taken a long stride forward in nuclear technology, and the political importance of their achievement can hardly be overestimated. They have separated U-235 from U-238 to make an explosive mixture enriched to above 90 per cent U-235 content, a process no one thought they could put into operation in such a short time. A plutonium bomb would have been a considerable achievement in itself, but second rate in the nuclear scale of prowess. The Chinese wanted the best and they got it. Moreover, they have now been able to make a Hiroshima-yield bomb compact enough to be delivered by a rocket with a range of some 400 miles. They are probably ahead of France at this stage, certainly not behind.

The peril to the United States is not serious. The Chinese have submarines and some may be capable of firing nuclear warheads. It would, however, be extremely difficult for a Chinese submarine to approach within range of U.S. coastal cities without detection. The U.S. Navy has spent billions of dollars on anti-submarine warfare during the past decade. This effort was mounted against Soviet submarines, but it is equally effective against the Chinese. Aircraft operating from the decks of attack carriers can locate and, if necessary, use depth charges against intruders. Such carriers constantly patrol both the East and West coasts.

Still, at the present rate of progress, the Chinese could have nuclear weapons capable of retaliation against an American assault in a few years. They might not be able to attack the U.S. mainland, but American bases off the Asian mainland could be wiped out, and the security of U.S. allies, such as Chiang Kai-shek's forces on Taiwan, would be in jeopardy. Thus the balance of power in the Pacific is changing. It will not be an American lake much longer, at least not beyond Hawaii.

The Chinese have proceeded with their nuclear development at what, for them, is profligate expense, for reasons which seem to them sound. They are not content to allow other major powers to hold a monopoly of nuclear power. There is no hope of bringing Red China into the United Nations and of changing its mood quickly into one of sweet reasonableness. In the long run, however, the Chinese will be as amenable to reason as we are—no more, no less. They have pledged "at no time and in no circumstances" to be the first to use nuclear weapons. They are well aware of our superiority in this field. For our part, we could well afford to concede their right to possess nuclear weapons and to refrain from threatening them because they have exercised that right. Such a move would reduce international tensions and the danger that some unforeseen incident might trigger a third world war; but because it would be a wise and statesmanlike move, the Johnson Administration is unlikely to make it.

Walter Packard

A great and good man, Walter Packard was one of California's most admirable public servants, a world citizen whose claims to distinction he was notably successful in minimizing. Of his goodness there could never be any question; throughout a long lifetime (he was 82 when he died October 31 in Berkeley) he radiated an essential kindliness, a warmth and generosity of spirit and a constant concern for the happiness and well-being of others. But it is not easy to suggest wherein his greatness consisted. The familiar labels—"agricultural economist," "social planner," "reclamation and development expert"—are painfully inadequate, although he had achieved great distinction in these fields. Perhaps the best way to suggest the special quality of his eminence would be to say that he was a committed democrat, a man who understood and practiced in all relationships, and taught others to understand and practice, the principles of democratic living. With him, democracy was both means and end, a mode of living as well as a social philosophy.

Wherever his work took him—to Mexico, to Venezuela, to Puerto Rico, to Greece—people responded to his inspired personal leadership. In Greece, where he taught the villagers of Anthele how to grow rice on what they had long regarded as a sterile plain, they called him "Papou" ("grandfather") and, much to his embarrassment, erected a marble statue in his honor. The areas in which he worked were invariably the richer for his having been there. When he went to Greece, the country was importing $5 million worth of rice a year; when he left it was exporting that much or more. At his death he was carrying on, with typical energy, cheerfulness and infectious good will, a campaign to induce the residents of Berkeley to set up a city-owned power system. He had recently completed a book, The Consumer-Labor Approach to Social Organization, which embodied his deeply felt commitment to the principles of social and economic democracy. But wise and illuminating as the book will be, it will not do justice to the quality of his insight into the theory and practice of democracy. Why is it that public servants of his breed seldom win reputations commensurate with their achievements? Part of the explanation, no doubt, is that men of his kind usually have, as he had, a passion for anonymity; but it could also be because their true greatness consists not in the artifacts they leave behind them but in what they have inspired others to do for themselves.

The Opportunity

"World enlightenment will speed the day when the burdens of armaments and the fear of others will be removed from the backs and hearts of men." It was not some starry-eyed visionary who made this prediction, but Dwight D. Eisenhower, in 1962. But how? General Eisenhower proposed an international school for world understanding, staffed by a community of scholars "whose concern would be objective truth purged of national and regional bias, hatred and prejudices." A practical application, in short, of H. G. Wells's reminder that civilization is in a race between education and catastrophe.

General Eisenhower has not pursued the idea of an international university in recent years, but Dr. E. U. Condon, who needs no introduction to readers of The Nation—nor to any other group of educated persons—has not allowed the proposal to die. He revived it in the March, 1964, issue of the Bulletin of the Atomic Scientists, and commented on it early this month in connection with the twentieth anniversary of UNESCO in Paris. One of the official U.S. delegates named by President Johnson was Joseph R. Smiley, president of the University of Colorado, where Dr. Condon is currently professor of physics.

The world's annual expenditure on war preparations is now estimated at $140 billion a year—and rising. Dr. Condon proposes that the nations of the world agree to pay to the UN a tax of 1 per cent of their armament expenditures, thus providing a sum well in excess of $1 billion a year for promoting international good will along the lines proposed by President Eisenhower. Another way of looking at the financial problem is to compare $1 billion with the current cost of our war in Vietnam—about $2 billion per month. We hardly notice this drain on the national treasury, yet if the war were ended and the saving for only one year were diverted to the uses of peace, the international university could be maintained for twenty years or longer.

Suppose, says Dr. Condon, we budget $6,000 per student-year—a lavish figure. With about half of $1.2 billion we could provide total costs for 100,000 students. Assuming a four-year course, we could have an annual output of 25,000 men and women a year. These young people would be specially trained "for working on the front of promoting international good will and development of the underdeveloped parts of the world." To house and teach them in the industrialized countries would require expanded facilities in existing institutions of learning. In the underdeveloped countries, Dr. Condon proposes to use the remaining $600 million available annually to build a world-wide chain of United Nations universities. The capital investment required for the plant and facilities of a major university, offering graduate and undergraduate training in the liberal arts, the fine arts, medicine, agriculture and engineering, is about $100 million. By spreading construction over four years, about twenty-four such institutions could be built. Their capacity would be 240,000 students. Not all of these would complete their education with a one-world outlook, but inevitably many of them would be persuaded in that direction, and would in turn influence their countrymen. The odds against catastrophe would be appreciably lengthened. (Dr. Condon is not alone in attempting to give substance and meaning to the Eisenhower proposal; it is endorsed in principle in the recent report of the Ripon Society, From Disaster to Distinction, p. 111.)

Another proposal by Dr. Condon involves overseas military properties of the United States. We have been assuring the world that we are prepared to move out of South Vietnam as soon as the fighting stops. If this evacuation ever comes to pass, what will be done with the bases we have built at a cost ranging far up in the billions? A large part of these installations would be usable as dormitories, classrooms and laboratories. Dr. Condon cites our naval base at Guantanamo as a current example. At one time it was necessary for the defense of the Panama Canal, but even before World War II air power had made Guantanamo obsolete. Of course we insist on maintaining it as a thorn in Castro's side, but might it not be better politics to dedicate it as a great UN university, a significant contribution to the Alliance for Progress?

UNESCO will remain in session through the month of November. It would be a pity to let pass this opportunity for making a start on the international university project.

OUT TO GET SNCC

A TALE OF TWO CITIES

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting the progress of the civil rights movement.

The Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is fast becoming the Erich Von Stroheim of civil rights groups —the organization you love to hate. Rep. Wayne Hays (D., Ohio) spoke for many Americans when he told a cheering House: "Carmichael and his anarchistic group belong behind bars, and the quicker we get him there the better off this country is going to be."

A typical cartoon approach by Hy Rosen in the Albany (N.Y.) Times-Union showed SNCC chairman Stokely Carmichael riding one end of a two-headed hobby horse called Violence. Carmichael is shouting "Black Power" while George Lincoln Rockwell of the American Nazi Party cries "White Power" from the other end.

Recent events in two cities—Philadelphia, Pa., and Atlanta, Ga.—warn that SNCC has become the target of opportunity for attack that claims to be motivated by patriotism and fear of racial strife. More often it satisfies a growing Yahoo-ism over the Vietnamese War in a climate of repression created by the reactionary racial mood of many whites and its cautionary (scared) counterpart in some Negroes.

The danger to SNCC is immediate; the threat to other liberal establishments and concepts lurks just behind the patterns of attack in the two cities and reactions to them. First, the Philadelphia story.

Carmichael carried his message of black power there in July, seeking to mobilize the generally moribund Negro ghetto consciousness into meaningful activity not controlled by hack, black politicians. Democratic Mayor James Tate was aghast. He seriously suggested that Carmichael should be banned from speaking in Northern cities.

Philadelphia, a city of 2 million, is already 35 per cent Negro and, like most cities, growing blacker. Sullen seas of interlocking slums stretch over it, with here and there shining little islands of renewal. Renewal is most noticeable downtown, say around Independence Hall, where any morning one of the city's numerous drowsing tramps may waken to find himself in the middle of a new mall.

In the black ghettos, infant mortality is twice that of white sections. Negro unemployment—though not nearly so bad as elsewhere—is double the white. Fifty per cent of Negro high school pupils attend four of the city's twenty high schools. Philadelphia's overall dropout rate is the worst of the eighteen largest American cities; in some black high schools it reaches 80 per cent.

Housing is the dreariest fact of life for the poor, black and white. Between 1948 and 1963, 27,000 dwellings were torn down for urban renewal, but only a few thousand public housing units have been built as replacements. The city began one redevelopment plan called Eastwick which would have placed public housing in a bog between the airport and an oil refinery.

"Eastwick was conceived in sin," wrote The Greater Philadelphia Magazine for Executives. "It was believed that the project not only would siphon off the black overflow but would be a low visibility cul-de-sac into which the burgeoning Negro population could be stuffed."

Public outcry scotched Eastwick. In 1964, the License Department, unable to ignore slum horrors any longer, began stringent inspections. Many landlords chose to abandon rather than rehabilitate, and a survey turned up 14,000 abandoned units. Add these to living quarters demolished for projects never constructed, and a picture emerges of the poor being packed tighter into slums costing more as supply shortened. As always, the black ghettos were the worst and oldest. Intolerable pressures have been building in them, blowing off once in the riots of 1964.

On Saturday, August 13, nearly everybody in Philadelphia read the Bulletin lead story with the headline:

80 ARMED POLICE RAID
FOUR SNCC OFFICES HERE,
SEIZE DYNAMITE, ARREST 4
1,000 More
Deployed to Keep Order

The story quoted Acting Police Commissioner Frank Rizzo as saying that the offices were "becoming storehouses of arms, ammunition and dynamite." Rizzo charged that an informant had tipped him about the dynamite "powerful enough to remove Independence Hall," bringing in as confirmation three sticks and blasting caps. The police officer identified all four persons arrested during the night as SNCC members.

Virtually everything in the headlines, the story and Rizzo's quotations was untrue or misleading. One of the four places raided was a SNCC office. One of the four persons arrested belonged to SNCC. Two and a half sticks of dynamite were allegedly found in a private apartment not connected with SNCC. No other arms were found, but police did confiscate placards from SNCC headquarters. These included a photograph of President Johnson holding his hands apart as though indicating a measure; beneath it someone had written: "Use a bomb about this size." Finally and most curiously, the informant had not gone to Rizzo but to an FBI agent, whose call had initiated the entire action. This was never revealed publicly.

The first account received nation-wide attention and the casual reader could only conclude that SNCC was involved in a wicked bomb plot. Over the weekend, surface facts clarified. Police raiders wearing bulletproof vests and some carrying machine guns had operated under a warrant requested by FBI agent Irving R. Dean. Dean swore that his informant had given him information "on approximately 200 occasions which has led to valid arrests." The super-successful informant, said Dean, had seen the dynamite in SNCC headquarters on August 12, and members of SNCC had told him it was being deployed "for the destruction of property in connection with civil disturbances in the near future."

Raiders found nothing explosive in the SNCC headquarters on South 16th Street. But in the apartment of 26-year-old George Brower on North 16th Street, they announced finding two and a half sticks of dynamite ingeniously hidden—under a couch. Brower belonged to no civil rights group but his apartment was a gathering place for the Young Militants, a Philadelphia group that had been picketing segregated Girard College under the leadership of NAACP leader Cecil Moore, an attorney. The people at SNCC disliked Moore; they suspected him of wanting to become the only symbol of black militancy in the city.

In the apartment, police arrested Brower, another youth and a girl. Outside, they grabbed 23-year-old SNCC field secretary, Barry Dawson. By next morning, Attorney Moore had been named counsel for all four defendants, despite SNCC efforts, later successful, to get another lawyer for Dawson. And Dawson soon was talking to police under circumstances which, given the Miranda decision, were inexplicable. Here is part of the official transcript of Dawson's questioning by William Wolf, Jr., of the Philadelphia D.A.'s office.

> Q: Mr. Moore just told us he had to go out for about an hour, do you wish to make a statement even though he is not here?
>
> A: Yes.
>
> Q: Did he advise you to make a statement in his absence?
>
> A: Yes.

Without counsel to advise, Dawson rattled away. Here are the salient portions: On August 3, a friend named Winston Ealy, who had picketed with Mr. Moore's Young Militants, showed Dawson a paper bag containing about nine sticks of dynamite and two blasting caps. If Dawson was curious about where Ealy got the dynamite or why, the statement doesn't say. There is throughout a certain cavalier attitude toward dynamite:

> Dawson: I asked him what he was going to do with it, and he said that he was going to take it over to George's (George Brower's) house. So I said, Don't do that, you'll get in trouble. Give it to me and I'll throw it in the river.

Supposedly en route to the Schuylkill River, Dawson stopped at the SNCC office and told fellow member George Anderson what he was carrying. Dawson says there was a policeman outside (the SNCC office was under intermittent surveillance and—SNCC believes—continuous wire tap) so he decided to leave the dynamite there. He hid it in the basement where it stayed eight days. Fred Meely, Philadelphia SNCC director, learned about the dynamite, according to Dawson, and urged him to get rid of it. To complicate matters, on the night of August 10, Dawson was attacked by a carload of white men he believed to be police who had been following him earlier. They beat and kicked him unconscious, and he received hospital treatment.

Finally on Thursday, August 11, Dawson says that he, Meely and SNCC staffer Morris Ruffin carried off the sticks:

> Dawson: Each of us had a bag, plus the fact that Fred had two blasting caps. My bag had two and a half pieces and I don't know how the other bags were shared. We planned to throw the bags into the Schuylkill River.

Dawson says he thought he was tailed from the office, so instead of going to the river he dropped his bag of dynamite over a fence near Brower's apartment. Interrogator Wolf, without a lawyer to intercede, then asked Dawson how the dynamite he had dropped by the fence on Thursday wound up under the couch in Brower's apartment during the Saturday raid. Of course, there was no proof that this was the same bag of dynamite. With so much of it flying around, even in the hands of FBI informants, it was a presumptive question. Dawson said he didn't know.

Police arrested Winston Ealy and he said that a 45-year-old construction worker named John Jenkins had given him the dynamite. Jenkins, a blaster, admitted that he had been stealing dynamite off and on for years. Later, he led police to a private mine field of sorts where he used to bury the sticks and caps. Jenkins told police that he had given a batch to Ealy because he was afraid of children playing with it. Then he got drunk and lost track of the stuff.

It seemed a sloppy conspiracy, but Mayor Tate returned from vacation to congratulate everyone on a fine job. Police had already released three of the first four so-called "SNCC" members arrested—Brower and the couple in his apartment—but Dawson, Jenkins and Ealy were held on various dynamite and conspiracy charges (possession of dynamite, without intent to use it illegally, is no crime in Pennsylvania). Fugitive warrants were issued for SNCC's Meely, Ruffin and Anderson who had dropped from sight.

Recapitulating, police were saying that a non-SNCC man named Jenkins gave stolen dynamite to a non-SNCC youth named Ealy who gave it to SNCC member Dawson. Dawson, furthering a conspiracy, enlisted SNCC-ers Meely and Ruffin to carry it from their headquarters to sites unspecified. Police raiders in a non-SNCC apartment searched unsuccessfully in two small rooms for ten minutes before a Negro officer suddenly found the dynamite under the couch. Net cache uncovered—two and a half sticks of du Pont de Nemours' best.

Some skepticism developed in the city and by August 15 the Bulletin was editorializing that "some observers may see a disproportion between the results of the raids and the overwhelming forces mobilized to effect them." But it then discoursed on "wild rumors" and "ill-informed people easily converted into a destructive mob," and concluded with Alexander Hamilton's remarks on the 1794 Whiskey Rebellion: "Beware of magnifying a riot into an insurrection by employing in the first instance inadequate force. 'Tis better far to err on the other side."

'Tis best of all for a newspaper to correct itself when it errs, but the Bulletin never cleared up its initial, erroneous tale. By August 16, with plot developments buried inside, the front page carried a sad little story that 300 Youth Corps applicants in Philadelphia had been told that theirs was the first poverty program in the country to be suspended because funds were diverted to the Vietnamese War. There was a brief plot flurry next day when police dug under an old doghouse in the yard of Jenkins' girl friend and found nine blasting caps. Serial numbers on two of these caps, it was claimed, matched numbers on the dynamite sticks turned in by the FBI informant. But Acting Commissioner Rizzo had said that those sticks came with caps. Were they wearing somebody else's caps?

The judicial atmosphere was gamy at the hearing August 22, when Philadelphia officials produced an undated photograph, allegedly showing Ruffin and Dawson leaving SNCC headquarters with two small parcels the officials said contained dynamite. Since the photo was not taken with an X-ray camera, there was no way to verify this assertion. However, the photo was released to the press as showing dynamite in transit, in defiance of the Supreme Court ruling on safeguarding evidence.

Some people in and around SNCC concede privately that the dynamite probably got into the office in the manner Dawson described. They feel he was lured into a dangerous and atrocious error by persons who collaborated with police on a frame-up to destroy SNCC. "If they keep you on the defensive," said former Executive Secretary James Forman, "you can't do anything creative."

"All those people know how to handle dynamite," says Lieut. George Fencl in charge of community relations for the Philadelphia Police Department. "We can't say the field secretary said, 'we need dynamite, go get it,' but we know it got there from a man who had picketed with SNCC and NAACP [Jenkins]. It was found in Brower's apartment—and you should have seen the filth and the roaches when we searched. Maybe he wasn't what you'd call a card-carrying SNCC member, but Young Militants and SNCC hung out there. They're interchangeable."

But in the next breath Lieutenant Fencl says that if Dawson really had been beaten a few days before the raids, it wasn't by police but by members of the Young Militants who wanted to be paid for picketing Girard College. Police, he admits, never checked the hospital records on Dawson's beating.

Mayor Tate quietly let his actions speak louder than words as white feeling ran against the blacks. Two days after the hearing, he was scheduled to address a convention of the National Technical Association, an engineering society of Negro and other minority groups. An aide told the association in the morning that the Mayor had been summoned out of town "to a federal conference dealing with enormous sums of money."

An hour later, reporters found the Mayor playing golf at the Whitemarsh Valley Country Club. When rioters stormed the apartment of a Negro couple moving onto an all-white North Philadelphia slum street, Mayor Tate again did not choose to speak.

On August 30, 2,000 Negroes attended the largest black power meeting ever held in Philadelphia.

* * *

Atlanta bills itself as The City Too Busy To Hate. One of its many Negro ghettos has the lovely name Summerhill. There are 30,000 black people living in Summerhill under Southern slum conditions. Four or five times in the past, the city considered Summerhill for renewal but always by-passed it for projects it considered more urgent. The administration of Mayor Ivan Allen (who spoke for the 1964 Civil Rights Act and lately denounced Lester Maddox) is all white and, understandably, has an all-white conception of human priorities.

So today, looming two blocks from Summerhill, is a shining concrete $18 million sports stadium. The city went deeply in debt to build it, but the money should come back in gate receipts. Integrated baseball and football teams play there. You can stand on the porch of a shacklike Negro home lacking hot water and furnace, and watch the 4,000 spaces in the parking lot fill up. If you have a poetic turn, you may remember Sarah Cleghorn's lines:

The golf links lie so near the mill that almost every day the laboring children can look out and see the men at play.

On September 6, an unarmed Atlanta Negro with a record for car theft was shot when he ran from police who were trying to arrest him. Within hours, Negroes in Summerhill were stoning police. Within a day, Atlanta was charging SNCC workers with insurrection. The press seized on the story with a glee that lent substance to SNCC's repetitious charge that the media cannot be trusted.

The New York Times, whose news columns are often a solitary light on the darkling plain of American journalism, editorialized:

> An artificially induced riot involving a few hundred susceptible Negroes shattered the calm of an Atlanta afternoon. . . . They had been whipped to a frenzy, reportedly by the so-called Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee, espouser of the separatist and inflammatory slogan Black Power.

The Times did not say what the Negroes were susceptible to, or why a ghetto should be calm in an Atlanta afternoon or any other time, or how one determines the artificiality of a riot. A month before, the Times had published what it claimed was a SNCC position paper on black power, obtained clandestinely. It was a lucid statement of our racial realities, neither separatist nor inflammatory unless to urge blacks to unite for survival is to inflame. But in its own "rush to judgment" on Atlanta, the newspaper was accepting an old Southern theory that "darkies are contented until outsiders stir them up."

N.B.C. Radio listeners heard David Brinkley's observation that "Southern cities trying to help the Negroes have had race riots." Brinkley called SNCC (with 135 members) "one of the largest Negro organizations" and said Carmichael was a "classic demagogue."

Atlanta Constitution publisher Eugene Patterson had served on the U.S. Civil Rights Commission. He wrote:

> The Student Nonviolent Coordinating was born here. It was betrayed here by roughnecks who took it away from students and turned it away from nonviolence. It would be fitting if SNCC died here as a result of its naked incitement to riot this week in Atlanta.

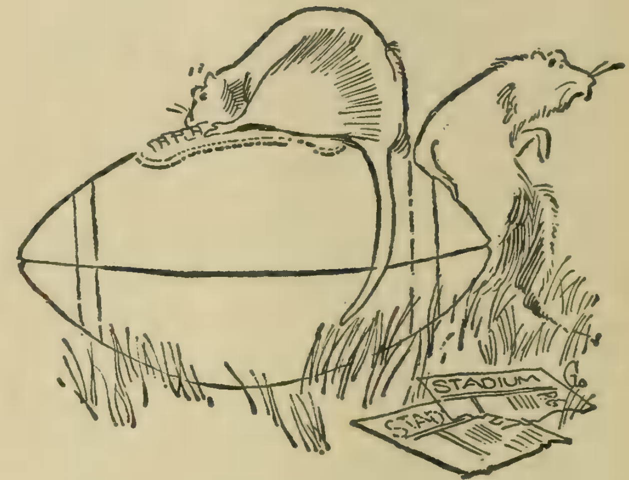
Patterson had toured Vietnam and SNCC's anti-war stand offended his sense of patriotism. As a white liberal, he objected to the change of character in SNCC; civil rights, presumably, should forever be frozen, smiling into a Birmingham fire hose. Patterson had his own built-in Southern-liberal clock for colored progress and no hour on its face was marked NOW. Little of what any of these know-nothings or know-somethings said was addressed specifically to the question: What happened in Summerhill and why?

It is impossible to reconstruct precisely how a street disturbance begins. Summerhill is an area where slow fires of discontent have burned over the years, sending up faint signals like those blue ghosts of smoke that rise over Southern "Niggertowns" in early morning. Atlanta SNCC had made passing efforts to get the people there mobilized, but had centered its attention on a worse ghetto called Vine City. In neither place had it become a moving force (Atlanta Negro mobilization in general is dismal, with only 50 per cent of eligible voters registered despite public and private efforts).

"We brought in too much philosophy and not enough program," one SNCC veteran told me. "Talk, talk, talk. Some gets through subjectively but people need programs to rally around."

About 2:30 on Tuesday afternoon, September 6, Harold Prather, 24-year-old father of four, became a rallying point. Two white policemen with a warrant chased him near his home and one of them shot him twice. He crawled to the porch of his mother's house, lay there and was handcuffed.

"You ain't going to hurt him no more," his mother said to the policeman who shot Prather. "There used to be days in slavery times when they killed people like dogs, but this is another day. If you live and he lives, you'll pay for this."



People began gathering, their mood angry. Emmanuel Hall, a Negro news announcer for Atlanta station WAOK, went with Carmichael to the scene where SNCC had been planning to organize a rally. "Local people had made picket signs against police brutality," Hall said. "Stokely moved around, asking what had happened, quietly. Then he made a short speech and said he was coming back at four."

Police claim Carmichael said he was returning to "tear this place up." Atlanta civil rights lawyer Howard Moore says he said ". . . to tear up your old ways." Hall isn't sure what was said. Carmichael frequently complains that he's misquoted, more often he is misinterpreted and sometimes he forgets what he says. Since no tape of his remarks at Summerhill exists, the semantic point remains in doubt. But the great emphasis placed by white opponents on the words of one black man among many seems an attempt to embody responsibility in a single individual for what was a mass reaction.

By four o'clock, two SNCC members trying to get a sound truck in operation were under arrest. Carmichael came back and a Negro policeman later testified he heard him exhorting: "Burn, baby, burn. . . . Stay on the streets." Carmichael denies it. A thousand officers were massing in the stadium parking lot and blacks faced them across years of enmity and distrust.

"One white police officer grabbed a colored boy around the neck," said 18-year-old Jerry Lowe. "The people started hitting the police officer with their hands and sticks until the policeman let that fellow go. He ran away. Somebody hit the white policeman in the face with a brick."

Young Doris Williams of Summerhill gave unwitting testimony to the image of SNCC in the neighborhood:

> The boys across the street were urging other neighborhood boys to throw bricks at white folk's cars. It wasn't any SNCC-looking boys. . . . I've never seen any SNCC people but I've heard the boys have lots of hair, that the girls wear pants, wear their hair natural and look like boys. I saw a lady and a boy who looked like they might be SNCC folks talking so loud everyone could hear, but they didn't say anything about hurting the mayor or anyone else.

While police made wholesale arrests, seventy-two in all, and Carmichael departed, Mayor Allen arrived on the stormy scene. Editor Ralph McGill, abetting the deification of Allen, described him in his Constitution column: "Impeccable, bareheaded, distinguished looking, he walked literally into the midst of fighting groups where angry and embittered men were embroiled."

Allen tried to calm the crowd from the top of a car but was knocked off. Bricks and bottles flew, police fired warning shots from the hip. Allen angrily gave the order for tear gas and included houses in his order. The gas broke the crowd; it also sent women and children crying from houses where it had been tossed indiscriminately. As a riot, it was not much—no burning or looting—although any riotous incident does carry incalculable potential for violence.

Carmichael and other SNCC members were arrested over the next two days and some initially faced insurrection charges, which carry a possible death penalty and are not bondable. After the word "insurrection" served its purpose by making national headlines, the charges were reduced to disorderly conduct and inciting to riot. The American public was saturated with a version of Atlanta reality epitomized by a Time story which began: "Atlanta, which deservedly prides itself on a tradition of racial moderation," and described Mayor Allen as being "as protective of Negro rights as he is of Atlanta's reputation."

But the cynical black Atlantan could ask, what was he protecting that day in Summerhill, rights or reputation? Do Southern blacks under the First Amendment have the right to gather angrily to hear their grievances articulated in a time of stress? Or shall an administration which has no Negro department heads in a city 40 per cent black and no visible Negro desk help in City Hall decide the time and tone of protest?

The Council on Human Relations of Greater Atlanta, a humanistic but nonradical group, said:

> As much as we deplore violence in any circumstances, the Council . . . does not accept the explanation that SNCC members were directly responsible for Tuesday's rioting. SNCC members are not responsible for the conditions under which Atlanta citizens live in the Summerhill and Mechanicsville area.

Atlanta achieved its moderate reputation by opening registration years earlier, by taking the lead in desegregating public accommodations, by City Hall appeals for racial reason and a façade of equal opportunity. Its poverty program has been one of the best in the country, which is to say that the poor in it have stayed off welfare and on a poverty level.

But Atlanta's image had no relevance to the black poor. Mayor Allen is proud of Atlanta Stadium, but SNCC viewed it as an infinitely worse crime than car theft. It demanded black control over black people, which would mean the end of white control over everything.

"Allen is a vicious racist," charged Attorney Moore. "Negroes get nothing for their vote. But Allen can send a black politician's kid to a nice school by seeing he gets a liquor license. Naturally when SNCC tries to organize people to take charge of themselves, whites are against it. The feeling comes all the way from Washington. Why do you suppose now, for the first time, SNCC's taxes are being investigated?"

At City Hall, the mayor's affable assistant, Dan Sweatt, calls what happened in Summerhill "trouble" rather than riot, and he says Allen is planning a housing campaign to end Atlanta's slums forever.

"The Mayor's handling of Summerhill set a new standard for U.S. mayors," he said. "He had the guts to call a spade a spade, not blame the trouble on economics or any sociological business. It was the first time anybody called Stokely's hand and it provoked a lot of thought. I think it will help kill black power and SNCC."

To kill SNCC and black power is a prevalent white wish. Says SNCC's former executive secretary, James Forman:

> The Administration wants to get us. Basically because we are the one black group both articulating opposition to Vietnam and taking action. Johnson has this need for consensus. But our job is not to psychoanalyze him and make him feel loved. All the harassment does is to make the issues clearer and to make the black man see just what he's up against.

When Carmichael says things like "I want chaos so bad I can taste it," he perhaps convinces himself that he is speaking metaphorically, but the white opposition relishes his words as proof not only that he isn't lovable but that he may be lethal. Carmichael may just be indulging himself when he flourishes contempt for whites, or it may be that he is indicted for misdemeanors while he dreams felonies. SNCC as an organization does not invariably handle truth or statute law with any more respect than, say, leaders of the Democratic or Republican Parties. But in a society with a history of horrendous mistakes, SNCC and Carmichael should be allowed some of their own, subject to criticism but free from persecution, as they struggle for black self-realizations that must not be deferred or compromised.

It seems clear that if the phrase black power had never been invented and Stokely Carmichael had never been born, the currently insecure American mood would have found something else black to try to crush. The essence of the backlash says that Negroes must subscribe to the dominant white version of what their reality should be or otherwise must suffer as bad "niggers" have always suffered.

So the stage is set for our peculiar tragedy. Denounce the bomb plot and insurrection. Praise the informer and riot police. Hiss the villain Stokely. Cheer the hero Ivan Allen. Audiences arise at the first note of the National Anthem. Whistles and applause.

HISPANIOLA '66

BAHAMA ISLANDS
CUBA
GREATER ANTILLES
JAMAICA
HAITI
DOMINICAN REPUBLIC
SANTO DOMINGO
PORT AU PRINCE
HISPANIOLA
PUERTO RICO

Haiti: Chaotic and Corrupt

GERARD R. LATORTUE

Mr. Latortue is a former professor of economics at the Law School of the State University of Haiti. He is co-author of Politics and Economics in the Caribbean (University of Puerto Rico Press).

> Latin America is in deep need of reforms. Not just a new tax structure or an improved federal agency, not just putting the outs in and the ins out, is required. To toss out one oligarchy in favor of another will solve nothing, even if the new oligarchy is modern and progressive and willing to make less profits on its investments and ready to delegate some of its power to technicians. What is needed is a total rejuvenation, a change in attitude, habits, interests, and alliances, a change in philosophy and a change in practices. (Italics added.)

This opinion, expressed by John Gerassi in The Great Fear in Latin America, is true for almost all the countries of the area. In the case of Haiti, however, the need for basic change is desperate. The situation there has almost reached the point where the Haitian masses will no longer be able to satisfy the voracity of the so-called "elites" (blacks as well as mulattoes) that have been exploiting the country since Independence Day in January, 1804. If something is not done now to curb the arrogance of the ruling classes and support those who favor change in "Feudal Haiti," the country will explode in a scene of terrible violence. The longer that eruption is postponed, the greater it will be.

Dr. François Duvalier exploited the great desire for change during the 1957 campaign, but as President he has taken no positive steps toward long-term social and economic improvement in Haiti. His demagogy only hides his regime's incapacity to find other than superficial solutions. In many respects the situation in Haiti is worse today than it has ever been.

That being the case, one wonders how long the United States can remain indifferent to a potential crisis so near its shores; one looks to Washington for signs of a policy toward Haiti. Relations between the two countries have been strained in the past, particularly so in the years from 1914 to 1934 when United States Marines occupied Haiti. In recent times, however, a better feeling has developed and most Haitians still remember President Roosevelt, who brought the occupation to an end; and President Truman, whose Point IV program conferred great technical and financial assistance on Haiti.

During the Kennedy administration, American officials at the embassy in Port-au-Prince established excellent contacts with the different social groups in Haiti. Nevertheless, most American officials still see Haiti as a small "black republic," not very important in terms of global foreign policy. This attitude changes only when Haiti's geographical position becomes strategically important—as in 1914, when German investments in Haiti led to the arrival of the Marines, and in 1962, when Castro's espousal of communism in Cuba brought increased financial aid to Port-au-Prince.

In addition, the United States has from time to time tried to establish military bases in Haiti, principally at Môle St. Nicholas in the northwest, which offers control of the Windward Passage. Haitian nationalists have always shown strong opposition to such bases, but Duvalier, who calls himself a great "Dessalinist," in reference to the vigorous spirit of independence expressed by the nation's founder, has offered them to the United States. More than that, he at one time asked Trujillo's air force to patrol the air space and seas of Haiti, and in April of 1965, after U.S. intervention in the Dominican Republic, suggested that American or inter-American forces be sent to Haiti to prevent communism.

Immediately after his election, Duvalier expressed publicly his willingness to cooperate with the United States and his hope that the United States would adopt toward Haiti the same solicitude it was showing toward Puerto Rico, a U.S. Commonwealth. For a time, President Eisenhower and later President Kennedy responded to Duvalier's advances. Mr. Leslie Manigat describes the relationship in Haiti in the 60's:

> In a kind of uneasy game, with unkept promises and unrealized hopes on both sides, relations between the Duvalier government and the United States Mission had their ups and downs. The initially cold attitude of the Embassy [American Embassy in Port-au-Prince] was tempered, in 1959-61, to encompass open political support and the hope that Duvalier would be amenable to American guidance towards democratization and administrative rationalization.

That open political support was accompanied by increasing United States aid. In 1957, Haiti received $3.1 million; in 1958, $4 million; in 1959, $12.7 million and in 1961, $15 million. At the same time, a United States military mission, headed by Col. Robert Debs Heinl, Jr., was giving military training to those who were to become known to all Haitians as the Tontons Macoutes.

By late 1961, however, the United States had become most reluctant to continue its support of Duvalier's regime. Many reasons have been given for that change of attitude. Mr. Manigat offers five reasons for the new stand:

¶ The removal of Clément Barbot, secret police chief, who, as acting President during Duvalier's heart attack, had become friendly with the American ambassador.

¶ The dislodging of certain public servants and politicians known to have excellent relations with the U.S. agencies in Port-au-Prince.

¶ The temerity with which, at the Inter-American Conference of the Finance Ministers in Punta del Este, Haiti tried to bargain by withholding to the last moment its deciding vote for adoption of the American position and displaying its preference for nonalignment.

¶ The refusal of the Haitian Government to satisfy Alliance for Progress requirements for representative democracy and development planning.

¶ The surprising election coup d'état of May, 1961.

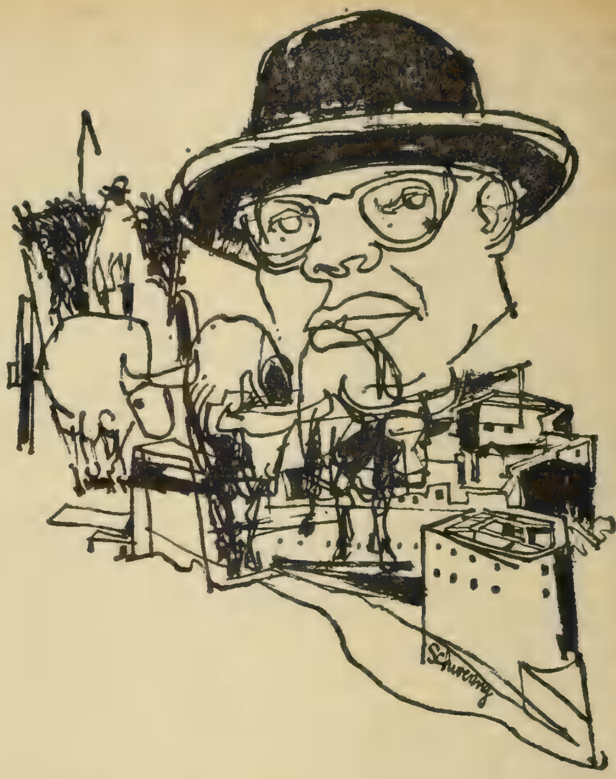
To that skillful analysis one might add that President Kennedy (like many groups in Haiti) believed at first that Duvalier would make the economic, political and social changes that Haiti so badly needed. When he found out that Duvalier had only a "Fascist answer" to Haiti's problems, he abruptly stopped helping. That decision was in line with Kennedy's general policy toward Latin America, which was to support no dictatorship, Right or Left. This principle was applied consistently, and Latin American liberals generally agreed with Kennedy's decision to sever diplomatic ties and suspend economic aid after Duvalier's coup d'état of May, 1963, after the Juan Bosch overthrow in September, 1963, and after the military coup in Honduras of October, 1963.



That rational attitude toward Latin America has not been followed by President Johnson. He has reopened diplomatic relations with Haiti, the Dominican Republic and Honduras. He has also resumed economic aid to the two latter countries. Furthermore, the appointment of Thomas Mann as chief adviser to President Johnson for Latin American affairs chilled the hopes of most Latin liberals that the United States would continue Kennedy's policy of accepting changes in Latin America.

Mr. Mann has since resigned, but the new doctrine he developed has been fully accepted by President Johnson, although from time to time he solemnly declares that he wants justice and freedom for Latin America. It has only one preoccupation: to prevent another Cuba in Latin America. The result is that the Johnson Administration will be readily satisfied with any government that outlaws communism by official decree. If, in addition, that government supports U.S. foreign policy in the international bodies, and "protects" American interests at home, it will enjoy the good will of Washington, whatever its domestic policies.

It is time that public opinion in the United States recognized that outlawing communism is not a solution; it only creates a greater fanaticism among the extremists. Moreover, whereas in many countries the Communist Party was once the only organization openly promoting the welfare of the masses, today the "democratic Left," initiated by José Figueres (Costa Rica), Rómulo Betancourt (Venezuela) and Muñoz Marín (Puerto Rico) proclaims social and economic justice. President Eduardo Frei of Chile led his party to victory on a similar platform. But such an approach to Latin American problems does not appeal to minds so sensitized to communism that they view with suspicion all appeals to social justice.

Meanwhile, Duvalier plays the game according to the current rules. He declares himself pro-Western and pretends to get along well with the "leader of the free world"; most of the time he votes with the United States at international meetings. He offers no threat to American investment in Haiti and keeps the Communist movement in check. That seems enough to elicit sunny smiles from the Johnson Administration.

Earlier this year, some sectors of the American press were attempting to "improve" the image of the Duvalier regime. Several newspapers and magazines suggested that any change of government in Haiti might now be worse for the country. The Washington (D.C.) Evening Star devoted three articles (June 15, 16 and 17) by Jeremiah O'Leary to the subject. In the third article, cabled from Port-au-Prince and entitled "Duvalier Held Lesser Evil," Mr. O'Leary wrote:

> The decision [to resume aid to Haiti] was reached by Washington policy makers on the basis of political reality and genuine concern for the incredibly poor Haitian people. . . . "Papa Doc," a cruel throwback to earlier Haitian tyrants, represents stability in that he and his Tonton Macoute organization are the absolute rulers of Haiti. So long as they are in charge, it is reasoned, there will be no need for American troops to wade in and restore order or prevent a communist takeover.

Mr. O'Leary concludes: "Thus Duvalier, as bad as he may appear, seems a better alternative to a power struggle and possible blood bath."

It has been said in other reports as well that the United States wants to avoid "chaos" in Haiti. But Duvalier is himself chaos—in public administration, university, secondary and primary schools, courts, House of Representatives, unions, Chamber of Commerce. In fact chaos prevails today in all sectors of the political, social and economic life of Haiti. And what is worse, it is aggravated by a corruption that exceeds anything known in the past because it has now spread to all levels and sectors of the nation. If the United States really wants to help the people, strict controls must be placed on any aid to Haiti: otherwise Duvalier and his greedy clique will steal in the future as they have stolen in the past.

Another excuse sometimes given by American officials and some newsmen to justify American indifference toward those who are fighting against Duvalier is the lack of leadership among Haitian exiles. There may be some truth to this, but officials in the United States also have a concept of leadership that may not apply in the case of Haiti. They are always looking for "a big name"—someone who has been an ambassador, a general, Cabinet member or high-ranking civil servant—and most of these former bigwigs still live in the past and have identified themselves with the privileged groups in Haiti. When they had power themselves, they used it for their own benefit, and that of their relatives and friends. They are part of what has been wrong with Haiti.

President Johnson gives the impression today of wishing that the problem of Haiti would go away. He has been widely criticized for his actions in Vietnam and the Dominican Republic, and would like to avoid any new foreign policy commitments, particularly between now and 1968. But Haiti under Duvalier is not a problem that will disappear, and that may be why most Haitian patriots (abroad as well as on the island) hope that one day such American liberals as Sen. Robert Kennedy and Gov. George Romney will have a stronger voice in framing the foreign policy of the United States.

Dominican Republic: Burden of the Past

KAL WAGENHEIM

Mr. Wagenheim is editor of the monthly San Juan Review. He has lived in Puerto Rico and covered Caribbean affairs for the past six years.

About a year and a half after the bitter civil war there is today a mood of guarded optimism in the Dominican Republic; that troubled country is engaged in what one might call a period of "embryonic democracy." For more than thirty years Trujillo ruled tyrannically. After his death, President Joaquín Balaguer was dumped by a military coup and the country was run by an army-dominated civilian council. Juan Bosch won the 1962 Presidential elections by a landslide, but lasted only seven months, after which the military ruled once more through a civilian puppet regime until the revolt of April, 1965. Now, Balaguer is back in power, but his victorious Reform Party shares legislative responsibility with Bosch's Partido Revolucionario Democratico (PRD) which Bosch proudly calls "the first loyal, creative opposition in the Dominican Republic in years."

However, the mere existence of a legally elected President and a loyal opposition does not solve the problems of the Dominican Republic. The roots of its dark and tragic past still live and threaten to strangle what is as yet only a promise of social, economic and political progress.

One of the biggest threats is the army, heavily influenced by a clique of ruthless, corrupt officers who long for "the good old days" of Trujillo—or, even better, the days just after Trujillo's death when they ran the country and funneled into their own pockets huge amounts of government funds. To them, even the conservative but reform-minded, Balaguer is not to be wholly trusted, and rumors of an impending coup d'état were dignified by Balaguer's denial of them in a Presidential address. For all that, the government is more secure than it would have been under Bosch, whose mildly socialistic ideas were considered "subversive and far leftist" by the Dominican military.

Balaguer has already felt compelled to make several concessions to hard-line military and police groups. Many police officials of the Trujillo era are back in their old positions of influence. Two months ago, José Rafael Molina Ureña, secretary-general of Bosch's PRD, was touring the southern region of the country with a few party members. They were detained by members of the Dominican Air Force who brandished weapons, threatened them, and later put them through several hours of intensive questioning. When outraged PRD legislators protested the detention of their secretary-general and asked that the Dominican House of Representatives pass a motion to condemn the episode, the majority party refused to act. House Vice President Roque E. Bautista of the Reformistas said: "We deplore what has happened, but we should not act too rashly."

Pressuring Balaguer from the other side are the Dominican masses. Desperately poor under Trujillo, they have become still poorer from the disastrous effects of the civil war, and they are now impatient for a better life. Thus, Balaguer urgently needs cash to finance employment-creating projects: to build houses and roads; to provide more funds for education in a land crippled by illiteracy. He has thrown the country wide open for investment from abroad, but must be careful lest nationalists accuse him of selling away the Dominican patrimony. Even the United States is interested in protecting Balaguer from such accusations. It is said that he was on the verge of selling the government-owned airline to an American company, but that Washington exerted pressure to have the deal canceled.

Sugar is the key problem in the Dominican economy. "The gravest ill of our sugar industry," wrote an editorialist in the daily Listín Diario recently, "is that it is so important to us."

At President Balaguer's inauguration ceremony on July 1, Vice President Hubert Humphrey announced that the United States would do "all that is possible to aid in the economic recuperation" of the Dominican Republic. About a dozen U.S. aid projects, totaling nearly $50 million, are now being considered; if put into effect, they would make the Dominicans second only to Chileans with respect to U.S. aid per person.

Yet many Dominicans feel that the most effective aid of all, which would have cost the United States not a cent in capital outlay, has been ignored—or rejected. Washington's policy on sugar is causing murmurs of discontent in a nation still smarting from the humiliation of having foreign troops invade and occupy its soil.

Mexico and Brazil consume 74 and 78 per cent, respectively, of their sugar output, but the Dominican Republic uses only a tenth of the million tons it can produce annually. It is, accordingly, heavily dependent upon the sweet cane for foreign exchange; it represents 50 per cent of Dominican exports and 60 per cent of the nation's income. Also, the sugar industry employs more than 85,000 people, half of the organized labor force, including thousands who work for less than 20c an hour because there is nowhere else to work.

In recent years, as the world price of sugar has plummeted to an unprecedented low of about 1.5c a pound, it has become crucial for poor sugar-producing nations to be included in the quota allotments of major purchasers like the United States, who pay an artificially high price of nearly 7c per pound. And the major purchasers, in turn, have consistently used their quotas as levers of political influence.

The U.S. sugar quota assigned to the Dominican Republic in 1962 was 863,439 short tons. In 1963, the year of Juan Bosch's short-lived Presidency, the quota was reduced to 605,103 tons. In the next two years, while the Republic was first run by a military-dominated civilian body, and then embroiled in a bloody internal war, it hovered at 400,000 tons. The 1966 quota dropped below that level.

But at mid-year, with a new pro-U.S. and anti-Communist President in office, Dominicans felt confident that there would be a return to at least the 600,000-ton level of 1963. The extra 200,000-ton assignment would provide about $15 million annually in extra revenue—an enormous sum when one considers that the entire annual budget for the Dominican nation is about $150 million. Dominican hopes rose when it was learned several months ago that Puerto Rico and the Virgin Islands would fall short of their U.S.-assigned quota by 415,000 tons, and that this amount would be redistributed among other nations. And hopes soared when a joint U.S. Congressional committee recommended that about half of that amount—200,000 tons—be assigned to the Dominican Republic "if political conditions permit."

But the Department of Agriculture, ignoring the committee's recommendation, assigned only 40,867 tons of the available 415,000 to the Dominican Republic. Thus, the Dominicans would have to dump about half of their sugar production on the world market at below-cost prices. They cannot understand why the United States, publicly committed to helping them, should ignore this obvious mode of economic aid. Rumors immediately began to sprout in Santo Domingo. The weekly magazine ¡Ahora! alleged in a cover story that "the reduction of the Dominican sugar quota forms part of an elaborate long-range plan whose objective is to force, by the building up of economic difficulties, the sale of the state sugar mills to private interests."

Since then, Washington has raised the quota somewhat, but it is still not close to the 800,000-ton level of 1962, and recent events have given further grounds for suspecting that U.S. interests may be maneuvering to control a greater part of the Dominican sugar industry.

During his thirty-year reign, Trujillo put together an enormous network of personally owned industries; these were taken over by the state at his death. One of them was the Companía Azucarera Dominicana (CAD) which, together with two privately owned mills, accounts for the entire national sugar cane production. (According to ¡Ahora!, the United States has favored the two private companies by buying 80 per cent of their production and only 40 per cent of the CAD's.)

The CAD was in serious financial trouble. It was "padded" with thousands of extra employees who clung to it like barnacles to avoid becoming statistics among the nation's 40 per cent unemployed. It needed reorganization and additional financing to carry it through a difficult transition period, but President Balaguer announced recently that his government, which is itself being subsidized, was "in no position to subsidize the CAD." A few weeks ago, the Dominican legislature (despite strong protests by the minority party) voted to dissolve the CAD and create the State Sugar Council. This reorganization breaks up the massive government sugar industry into twelve autonomous mills, and the new law states that if any of them operates at a loss for two consecutive years it may be closed. ¡Ahora! has suggested that such bankrupted companies could then pass into private American hands, whereupon the U.S. quota would be jacked up, allowing them to prosper.

Whether or not such a plan exists, the grounds for suspecting its existence certainly do, and no one in Washington has yet explained why the Department of Agriculture reduced the quota level recommended by the Congressional committee.

This would not be the only time that commercial interests were rumored to have tried to buy Dominican Government industries. In the May 23 ¡Ahora! exiled Dominican Air Force General Rafael R. Rodríguez Echavarría (who led the coup which deposed Balaguer in late 1961) writes:

> Many people do not realize that a powerful grain consortium from the United States told Ramfis Trujillo [the dictator's son] that it would arrange for the lifting of U.S. economic sanctions against his government in exchange for Molinos Dominicanos [the government's grain mills] being delivered to the consortium, and that this operation was under way when the government of which I formed part . . . confiscated that industry. The consortium even offered the Trujillo family $2 for each sack of grain produced.

And rumors are current today that President Balaguer is being approached to sell other government-run industries and properties to private U.S. or Puerto Rican interests. "Balaguer has got to sell," one source said, "because his government is hard up for money and will do anything to get some development projects going."

While the United States may not be directly involved in pushing for the sale of the Dominican sugar, or other interests, such sales would definitely serve the goals of U.S. foreign policy. The Dominican Government industries form part of what Juan Bosch envisioned as the "infra-structure" of a mildly socialistic, Scandinavia-like republic. Despite many obstacles, Bosch's PRD drew more than half a million votes in the July 1 elections. It is not impossible that it could win the next election, in 1970, but if meanwhile the government industries had been sold off, Bosch would probably not feel strong enough to reconfiscate them, and his vision would remain a dream. Also, with key industries in North American hands, the Dominican Republic would be more than ever dependent upon the United States.

These, admittedly, are only assumptions, but they seem to fit a pattern of assumptions. Thus, it is difficult to believe that the United States, when it intervened in the civil war, really feared communism in the Dominican Republic; but one can make a forceful case for the theory that not even an independent Dominican Republic would be convenient to U.S. interests, and that this—not communism—was the real threat of the April, 1965, revolt. It may be quite true, as one Dominican said, that "we are just a chip in the big game of the cold war." With the cold war in such delicate balance, with each vote in the UN or OAS potentially decisive, a "maverick" (if non-Communist) Dominican Republic could be as awkward for the United States as Tito's nonconforming communism has been for the Soviet Union.

Juan Bosch, who has often said: "I am not a Communist, but I am not an 'anti-Communist' because too many people have made themselves rich by abusing that term for their own gain," seemingly aspired to become the de Gaulle of the Caribbean. Toward that end, he might have tried to reduce his import-export dependency upon the United States, by "shopping around" with his country's vote in the UN and OAS. Eduardo Sánchez Cabral, who was the Dominican ambassador to the OAS during Bosch's Presidency, alluded to such a neutralist technique recently when he said: "We must develop an Organization of Free American States: Uruguay, Costa Rica, Chile and Mexico —a balancing force."

A neutral or independent Dominican Republic would also have softened the effect of the U.S.-directed blockade of Cuba. Although Bosch and Castro have often traded insults, it is possible that—rather than dutifully join hands in the blockade—the Dominicans under Bosch might have simply ignored Castro or, like the Mexicans, maintained "correct" relations. This would have helped considerably to legitimize Castro's now "quarantined" government.

Dominicans who find this view of U.S. foreign policy persuasive, point to the fact that Trujillo—whose death they believe to have been brought about by CIA-supplied weapons—was not touched until his relations with the United States soured and he began a flirtation with the Communist nations.

President Balaguer is considered eminently "safe" in this matter of East-West balance. He boldly pronounced in his inaugural speech that he was "in favor of maintaining diplomatic relations with all the countries of America, without it mattering to us the nature of the institutions under which they live . . . and we are in favor of establishing strictly commercial relations with the Socialist nations." But when asked about Cuba, Balaguer replied, "Cuba is neither ideologically nor politically part of America." Haiti, one of the most brutal, backward dictatorships in history, apparently is "ideologically and politically part of America," for Balaguer announced recently his decision to renew diplomatic ties with Duvalier's regime.

Of course, Balaguer is not alone in his "see-no-evil" view of right-wing dictatorships. As Robert D. Crassweller notes in his new book, Trujillo: The Life and Times of a Caribbean Dictator (Macmillan):

> An influential body of opinion in the United States Congress—not a majority, but a vocal minority—came to the support of the Dominican Republic and its dictator in the last half of the 1950's whenever trouble threatened. . . . The Majority Leader of the House, Representative McCormack of Massachusetts . . . referred in May, 1957, to the "broad, humanitarian policies" of Trujillo. . . . "This rock of stability in the turbulent Caribbean" [was] the phrase of Senator Johnston of South Carolina, who spoke frequently on this note. "Every attack on the Dominican Republic can benefit only Moscow and Peking," said Representative Overton Brooks of Louisiana. Many Congressmen fell in with this view, including Representatives Anfuso of New York, Zablocki of Wisconsin, Reece of Tennessee, Long of Louisiana, and Senator Smiley of Wisconsin and the influential Senator Smathers of Florida.

Here, rumors and ideological myopia aside, are some of the realities of the Dominican "plight":

Employment: At least 40 per cent of the working population is presently unemployed. It is estimated that in twenty years the present population of 3.5 million will more than double, and that even with a healthy annual economic growth rate of 7 per cent there will be 1.2 million unemployed by 1986.

Education: Only 5 per cent of the national budget goes toward education (compared with more than 40 per cent for military expenditures). More than 130,000 school-age children are not enrolled in classes; half of them would need clothing in order to attend: three-quarters would need to have food served to them at school. At least 3,000 more teachers are needed, and at least half of those now teaching lack degrees. The government's Adult Education Department has been running an anti-illiteracy program for fourteen years, during which period literacy has declined (only one out of seventy Dominicans reads a newspaper, compared with one out of fifteen in neighboring Puerto Rico, and one out of three in the United States). The entire nation, which is 70 per cent agricultural, has only twenty-five agricultural engineers and twenty veterinarians.

Housing: More than 65 per cent of Dominican homes have dirt floors and palm-leaf or cane-stalk roofs. More than 75 per cent have only one room which, as Dominican sociologists put it, "accents the problem of promiscuity." Less than 10 per cent of the homes have inside toilets; many do not even have outside latrines. More than 20,000 housing units are needed in the next two decades; only 10,000 are being built.

Nutrition: Food intake averages 2,100 calories daily, a deficit of 400 calories, with a marked deficit in animal proteins.

Trade: More than two-thirds of imports are consumer goods, rather than raw materials for income-producing fabrication (a recent study showed that the country could produce $40 million worth of goods which are currently being imported).

One can become hardened to figures like these, until one remembers that they refer to people, living in shacks, defecating in the fields like animals, going to bed hungry, diseased, jobless. And these people live just a couple of hours by plane from the United States—which invaded to prevent communism, and which did not invade when a democratically elected President was toppled by the military.

Today the United States seems bent upon pumping up the economy to unprecedented heights—as long as the Dominican Republic remains comfortably within the U.S. sphere (it will be recalled that Chile also received generous aid once it decided that rather than confiscate the U.S. copper companies it would buy shares in them).

However, Juan Bosch once commented: "You cannot pour two liters of water into a one-liter bottle." He meant that the Dominican Republic so lacks trained technical and administrative talent that existing Dominican institutions will be unable to absorb and apply the amount of aid funds available to them. Thus, many ambitious U.S.-backed aid projects may take longer than expected to materialize. And the Dominican rich, still fearing political turbulence in the future, are shipping their capital abroad.

These delays and frustrations may produce the turbulence. Strikes and protests are commonplace throughout the world, but the Dominican police and military—heavily manned by illiterate brawlers whose idea of keeping the peace is to crack heads—have a way of inflaming small protests into mass riots. Economic activity—keeping people busy—can avert this unrest, and Balaguer is trying. He has announced a massive road-building project that will employ 40,000 men, and a home-construction program to raise 1,900 houses in the near future. He also chose women to govern the country's twenty-six provinces, since so few men, thanks to the rancorous nature of Dominican politics, are sufficiently liked to promote tranquillity.

In the name of patriotism, Balaguer has called for a strict austerity drive to help put the country back on its feet. All government salaries have been sharply reduced; his own to $750 monthly. Wages in private industry have been frozen for a few months.

The austerity drive has been hailed by everyone, but once people begin to tire of sacrifices, and demand results instead, the strikes and protests may come. And if Balaguer turns "liberal" to mollify the people, he will have to deal with the military which removed him from office in 1961. What happens then is anybody's guess. The military has been equipped with modern weapons by the occupying U.S. "Peace Force," and the constitucionalistas still have thousands of firearms hidden away.

The Dominican people have yet to force a showdown with the Dominican military. At this point, the future of Joaquín Balaguer's government is highly enigmatic. If it should turn dictatorial and the people should revolt, few Dominicans doubt that the United States would intervene again (despite Lyndon B. Johnson's statement in Mexico on April 28, 1966: "My administration . . . will not be deterred by those who say that to risk change is to risk communism"). And if Balaguer should be dumped by a military coup, there is always the precedent of the recent Argentine military take-over: the United States gave diplomatic recognition within two weeks. Perhaps Juan Bosch was suffering from the bruises of political disappointment, but he summed up the attitude of many of his countrymen when he wrote in his latest book: "Any democratic Latin American government that refuses to use its power for the benefit of the chosen few . . . cannot survive in this underdeveloped world of pirates with Cadillacs. Such a government must be a Communist regime and must forthwith be smashed."

PRESSURES ON LABOR

Vietnam, Race and the Unions

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

Detroit

Repercussions of the escalated war in Vietnam have at last disrupted trade unions' activities to an extent that requires a fresh look at old problems and tested solutions. A war-oriented economy, characterized by inflation and labor-market shortages, puts new pressures at the collective bargaining table as union leaders strive to keep their ranks under control. The increasing unrest and the cracks now widening in the monolithic façade of American labor are evident in current arguments about AFL-CIO foreign policy; rejection of the "wage-price" guidelines as a basis for significant union bargaining, organizational gains and changes, new difficulties on the civil rights front, resistance of the rank and file to union leadership, and the considerable growth of white-collar unionism.

Walter P. Reuther, president of the 1,300,000-member UAW, is unable any longer to stomach the hard-line Vietnamese stand of George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO. He took recent public issue with the foreign policy resolution adopted at the August meeting of the AFL-CIO Executive Council—a statement reflecting Meany's rigid world outlook, which includes lumping Moscow, Hanoi and Peking together in a myopic blur ordinarily associated with veterans' organizations. The council's resolution, giving blanket endorsement to President Johnson's policies was, in Reuther's words, "intemperate, hysterical, jingoistic and unworthy of a policy statement of a free labor movement."

This outburst is only the latest in a series of important arguments between the two leaders. Last summer, Reuther questioned the tactics of having an AFL-CIO representative walk out of a meeting of the International Labor Organization because a Russian delegate took his regular turn as chairman.

Early last summer Victor Reuther, director of the UAW International Affairs Department, charged that the AFL-CIO foreign affairs director, Jay Lovestone, was working with the CIA overseas; he was also most critical of the role and functioning of the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD), which the AFL-CIO operates with support from some major industrial firms, and with a subsidy from the federal government.

In immediate response to the Reuther charges—rejected by the vast majority of the AFL-CIO council—Joseph Bierne, president of the Communications Workers of America and secretary of the AIFLD, gave a public accounting of the institute's work. He reported that the AFL-CIO had contributed $200,500 to the institute, business and industry (including some firms not celebrated for their pro-union attitude) about $150,000, and the government Agency for International Development about $3 million in 1965 alone. All in all, about $8 million has been spent since 1961 when the program began. So far, 43,000 unionists in Latin America have been training under AIFLD, of whom only 455 went either to classes in Washington, D.C., or at Fort Royal, Va., where, presumably, the CIA would have a voice in the training.

Other sources of friction between Reuther and Meany are the UAW's independent foreign policy statement which called for admitting Red China into the United Nations; the dispatch of a UAW inspection team, including Pat Greathouse, UAW vice president, on a trip to the Soviet Union last summer, and the UAW's increasingly independent role in the world labor movement, expressed in the creation of world auto workers' councils, and maintained through an active liaison office in Geneva.

While it is too early to guess the outcome of this schism in the top leadership of the American union movement, it is clear that Walter Reuther is labor's counterpart to Senator Fulbright. At their September convention, the Steelworkers adopted a foreign policy resolution more in line with the flexible views of Reuther than with Meany's standpat doctrine. How effective these developments will be in breaking the Meany-Lovestone monopoly on foreign policy decisions should become evident during the full-dress debate of the issues scheduled for a November meeting of the Executive Council of the AFL-CIO. Much depends, of course, on what happens on the Vietnamese front in the next several weeks.

In the area of economic problems, the headline-making strike of the machinists union against five major airlines last summer has been from many viewpoints the most important labor struggle of 1966. It bared the inadequacies of the Council of Economic Advisers' guideline policies, and shattered the influence of that body. It demonstrated how tinged with politics collective bargaining had become in some sectors of the economy, a consideration damaging to the Johnson Administration. It shook up the labor hierarchy, since the successful repudiation by the striking machinists of a contract their leaders had accepted set an ominous precedent for rebellious rank and filers in other unions. It provided an opportune occasion for the steel industry to take another swat at the guidelines by announcing a 3 per cent price increase on sheet metal—an act criticized by Gardner Ackley, chairman of the CEA, but soon accepted by the Administration.

The "wage-price" guideline was almost in a shambles before the machinists tied up the airline industry. Business has learned much since the dramatic confrontation between the steel industry and President Kennedy; selective price increases, or changing the "quality" of the product are much more difficult tactics for the Council of Economic Advisers to counter. Both industry and the union disregarded the guideline formula in the 1964 auto contract settlements. Recently, the auto industry has again raised its prices without provoking the wrath of Washington. With rare exception, the building trades unions and the construction industry have ignored the guidelines. The powerful Teamsters union has considered laughable any suggestion or interference from Washington on its collective bargaining. James Hoffa, the Teamsters' president, showed the extent of his contempt for the guideline theory when he urged the airline strikers to turn down the last and accepted offer whose cost was estimated at more than 5 per cent.

In view of the high profits of the airline industry, its growth possibilities, and the report that its annual productivity increase is about 7 per cent, the Hoffa suggestion is not as irresponsible as it may have seemed at first glance. Given the cost-of-living trend (it is increasing at a rate of about 3.5 per cent per year), to expect labor to take seriously a 3.2 per cent guideline is to enter the Washington dream world. As Newsweek pointed out in its September 26 issue, business profits have nearly doubled in the long boom since 1961, while pay-check gains have been cut in half by the rising cost of living.

Besides price increase, the profits have come from the more efficient use of plant capacity because of the high volume of production, and the introduction of automation and other technological innovations which have kept unit labor costs almost at a standstill. Corporation profits have soared from $44.2 billion before taxes and $32 billion after taxes in 1960 to $82.9 billion before taxes and $48.7 billion after taxes in 1966.

Important as this data may be for labor-management arguments about the "cut of the pie," it would be an error for the protagonists to become embroiled again in their postwar debate as to who was to blame for inflation. At that time they blackguarded each other, when the truth was that the pent-up consumer demand of the war years had created the basis for what is now recognized by many economists as demand inflation. To find the culprit today one would have to look into the farm sector—food prices are important—and what effect government monetary and fiscal policies have had on the economy.

In 1965, gross farm income totaled $44.4 billion, and realized a net farm income estimated at $14.1 billion. Direct government payments to farmers, or more exactly to the farm industry, were about $2.5 billion. (This prosperity does not reach down to the 4 million-plus farm people whose gross incomes are much lower than $5,000 annually and most of whom are classified as living in poverty. The plight of the agricultural workers, dramatized by the march in Texas and the long strike in the vineyards of California, did enlist the support of sections of the union movement, but a long fight lies ahead before unionism extends its beachheads among these dispossessed.)

And what kind of profits are the large middlemen making? Are rises in farm prices justified, or does government policy contain a large element of "political pay-off" to the farm lobbies? Farmers paid 4 per cent more for what they bought last year, but the price of commodities they sold increased 9 per cent.

As for government monetary and fiscal policy, there is evidence that devices like raising interest rates have not succeeded in checking inflation, but have priced many potential home buyers from the market (housing starts are declining to a rate of about 1 million annually from a high of more than 1.5 million). High-profit industries have not cared much about higher interest; they can afford it.

The inflationary pressures have come from business investment in plant and equipment and from increased defense spending. Although President Johnson has urged industry to restrain investment, his failure over the past year to touch the special 7 per cent tax depreciation allowances has encouraged business to intensify investment. Now the question is: can action still be taken on that front, or are bigger taxes needed?

The real cost of the war, in terms of federal purchases of goods and services, has been hidden in the comfortable statistic that these expenditures for "national defense" were only 7.5 per cent of the gross national product in 1965, and are estimated to increase to only 7.6 per cent in 1966 and 1967. But this is pressure placed on top of an already boom situation.

The added commitment in Vietnam and its economic consequences were predicted by Fortune in April, in an article entitled: "The Vietnam War: A Cost Accounting":

> But the war, it appears, will get bigger. U.S. Senators who know what the defense department witnesses say in closed Congressional hearings have predicted a U.S. buildup to 400,000 and more. General William C. Westmoreland, the U.S. Commander in Vietnam, has reportedly requested a buildup to 400,000 by the end of December. With that many U.S. Servicemen in South Vietnam, the cost of the war would run to $21 billion a year — even more if bombing and tactical air support is increased in proportion to the buildup on the ground.
>
> At any such level, the Vietnam war would bring on economic strains beyond what most economists appear to foresee and beyond what makers of public policy appear to be anticipating.

On June 6, The Wall Street Journal made a similar analysis: "The economic effects of Vietnam seem to have reached a stage where any change that takes place in the degree of U.S. involvement could prove disruptive. . . ."

With industry running close to full capacity, the demands for military hardware have priority in already critical materials like copper and textiles, and goods of all sorts are likely to be in short supply for the consumer. This will automatically drive up prices (the cost of clothing, for example, is up 7 per cent) and create an inflationary pressure. Shortages continue to mount. What is really happening to the economy was reported in The Wall Street Journal on July 13:

> Defense contract awards, which ran to $27.4 billion in the fiscal year ended in mid-1965, probably reached $36 billion in the year completed June 30. Though they're tentatively scheduled to drop to $34 billion in the new fiscal year just begun, few in the Pentagon now think they will. Estimates range from $36 billion to $40 billion if the pace of the war accelerates significantly. . . .
>
> As a result of this speedup, total defense expenditures last fiscal year probably topped $55 billion, compared with the $54.2 billion predicted in January. And the $58.3 billion budget estimate for fiscal 1967, too, seems certain to be eclipsed. One reason is that the budget submitted in January assumed arbitrarily that the Viet Nam war would end by June 30, 1967 — which few people in the Pentagon believe will happen.
>
> Already major "hardware" with long lead-times, such as aircraft, is being ordered for delivery beyond that date. Thus spending now is expected to climb beyond the $60 billion mark in the new fiscal year. . . .
>
> Along with higher spending, increased disruption of the civilian economy seems certain. A wide variety of industries is having trouble getting materials and equipment: Rope, telephone cable, textiles, forgings and castings, electronic equipment and machine tools are in short supply or subject to long delivery delays. Anthony A. Bertsch, assistant administrator of the Commerce Department's Business and Defense Services Administration (BDSA), forecasts "selective disruption" of the civilian economy in the months ahead.

The victims of inflation are in the main poor people, pensioners and people with fixed incomes, notably lower salaried personnel. It is not surprising, then, that teachers, nurses and government employees have revolted against this burden. Strikes, threats of strikes, mass resignations and other forms of pressures have been manifestations in 1966 of the unrest in the white-collar sector of the economy. In a sense, the vigor of the American Federation of Teachers in recent times—winning contracts and growing to about 125,000 members—is a white-collar analogy to the arrival of the CIO on the industrial front during the middle 1930s. The example of the CIO revitalized sections of the AFL; the teachers' union has already succeeded in transforming its rival, the National Education Association, into a semi-union, bargaining, threatening sanctions, and otherwise being forced into competition for teachers' loyalties as an instrument of protection in an inflationary period. Government employee unions now number about 1.5 million members.

Collective bargaining in one form or other is here to stay in the public sector, and given the shortage of teachers, nurses and other public servants, the white-collar groups enjoy today some of the economic power formerly reserved to skilled labor. A case in point is the AFT strike in Ecorse, Mich., where 194 teachers were fired for striking at the end of the spring semester. By August, the board of education had realized that replacements were impossible to find, and the union settled on terms better than it had originally demanded. Nurses in San Francisco discovered the power in mass resignations, and somehow money was found to meet their needs.

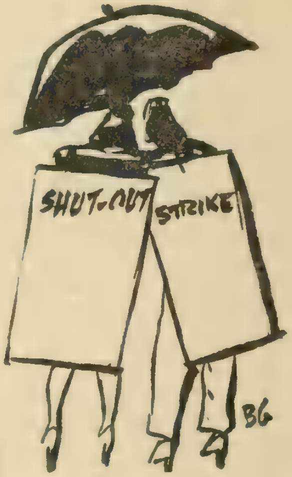
The growth of unionism in this new area has somewhat alarmed the Washington Establishment. James Reston referred to the government's misgivings in the September 4 New York Times: "Unfortunately, the feeling in official circles here is that the leaders in the newer unions organizing and bargaining for the airline workers, the retail workers, the teachers and other government employes are not outstanding, and that the older and more responsible leaders of the AFL-CIO have little influence over them, and have not been able to provide for the transition to the new generation of national labor union leaders who will have to take over from Mr. Meany in the AFL-CIO."

The real problem for labor leaders is somewhat different. The role of "labor statesmen," so much admired in newspaper editorials, no longer has quite its old appeal for men who remember what happened to David J. McDonald, labor statesman par excellence, and who note that George Burdon, president of the Rubber Workers union has just lost his job. The recent White House dinner for 100 labor leaders did succeed in improving relations between President Johnson and his guests, but few of the labor leaders present would have forgotten how many previous White House guests no longer run their unions. The increasing intrusion of the rank and file into union affairs gives substance to the definition of a labor statesman as a labor leader who has retired.

The fear of union democracy was well illustrated in a New York Times interview with William E. Simkin, director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service: "Mr. Simkin gives 'some credence to the fears of union leaders,' that Congress, in passing the Landrum-Griffin Act to restore more democracy to unionism and curb bossism, went too far in the other direction of encouraging rebel movements."

On the contrary, it seems to me that the recent Steelworkers' convention again demonstrated that a solid union leadership which genuinely respects the rank and file, as does the new regime of I. W. Abel, is a far superior implement for welding an effective organization than were the traditional attitudes of fear, contempt and iron-handed rule. The convention of the International Union of Electrical Workers, under its new president Paul Jennings, fortifies that opinion. The view-with-alarm school also forgets the high degree of correlation that has prevailed between dictatorially run unions and the incidence of racketeering and corruption.

In another important area of concern—the effect of trade unions on the civil rights struggle—it is difficult not to remain a pessimist. Although the AFL-CIO officially uses its limited influence to support social legislation, there is little suggestion of anything but an increasing strain between the Negro communities and the unions. Currently, there are an estimated 250,000 apprentices in the one-to-four-year programs in which unions are involved, and if one makes the generous estimate that 10 per cent of these young people are Negroes, about 25,000 Negroes may gain entry into unions via that route. At a time when Negro unemployment is at almost 9 per cent, and Negro youth unemployment at about 31 per cent, the apprentice entries are a tiny dent in a massive problem.



The failure of the NAACP to nominate Walter P. Reuther to its board of directors is eloquent evidence of the new estrangement between Negro organizations and unions. Reuther's record on racial issues is far superior to that of anyone else in the trade union hierarchy, and the NAACP can hardly be categorized as "black nationalist." At the Labor Day rally in Detroit Roy Wilkins, executive director of the NAACP, bluntly criticized large segments of the labor movement for failing to rally to the Negro's cause.

A staunch friend of unions, Msgr. George G. Higgins, director of the National Catholic Welfare Conference's Social Action Department, added his warning: "Too many labor leaders and too many members of the rank and file have yet to grasp the depth and passion of the present racial crisis. As a result, there is, unfortunately, a growing rift between organized labor and the Negro community." How deeply the "white backlash" has penetrated the union ranks can be better estimated when the current election returns have been analyzed.

Although Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., and his organization retain close ties with the Reuther forces, it is openly acknowledged in Washington that many union officers are deeply disturbed by the Negro leader's activities in Chicago and other Northern cities. They feel that he creates new political difficulties. A common complaint, for example, was that he hurt the re-election chances of Sen. Paul Douglas by his Chicago demonstrations. The assumption seems to be that King has other options, though no one suggests what they might be.

Unless there is a dramatic shift in the war in Vietnam—a bigger war promises wartime restrictions on labor and management, and peace would introduce the problems of reconversion—all signs point to increasingly difficult labor disputes. A new breed of rank and filers confronts union leaders and their management counterparts in negotiations. The social composition of the work force is changing. The young strikers in the airlines defended their demands far more eloquently than did the CIO militants of the thirties who hated the open-shop industrial relations system, and wanted a union of their own choice. Those shock troops of a generation ago are gone or are disappearing. The young workers want results on a rising scale of expectations: salaries for blue-collar workers, guaranteed annual wages, cost of living "escalator clauses," annual gains. Making good on these issues, rather than reminders of the struggles and sacrifices of the past, is the criterion for a growing body of blue-collar workers who were not even born at the outbreak of World War II. This social factor, added to the economic impact of the war, augurs troubles in the major negotiations ahead.

Any tendency to discount these signs should have been stopped by the aftermath of the recent negotiations between General Electric and the International Union of Electrical Workers, supported by other concerned unions. Even though the package came to a 5 per cent increase (again mocking the 3.2 per cent guideline), the ranks were not satisfied, and a series of local strikes were settled only with Taft-Hartley injunctions and great leadership skill.

With certain modifications, one can also agree with this blunt statement of Walter Reuther: "Look, I'll level with you. Organized labor is in deep trouble. I could give you a story that would make headlines across the country; I could tell you things that would blow organized labor apart. But I'm not going to do it." Events of the past two years suggest that organized labor's leaders may well be "blown apart" by the ferment, unrest, exposures and weaknesses at the top. But unionism itself is too deeply integrated into the industrial relations systems for anyone to talk seriously of its demise. Union revenue and income, the fact that 90 per cent of agreements are signed peacefully and for two- and three-year periods, and a public policy which recognizes the right to organize and bargain, even when restricted by state and federal laws—these factors make certain that trade unions will play a permanent, if inadequate, role on the American scene.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Yevtushenko and the Underground Poets

SIMON KARLINSKY

Mr. Karlinsky is associate professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California. He is the author of Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art (University of California Press).

The more one studies the Symbolist-Acmeist-Futurist creative explosion in Russian poetry of the first three decades of our century, the more staggered one is by its total scope and accomplishment. By the early 1930s, that great age was forcibly brought to an end by what in retrospect amounts to a governmental ban on all creativity and imagination. While Mayakovsky was being acclaimed the great Soviet poet and his work nationalized; while Pasternak was being decried by the Soviet press for his uniqueness and individuality, no younger poet was any longer allowed to try to equal the stylistic daring and modernity of either of these two. Victorian-age poetic techniques, themes and styles were brought back, proclaimed the latest word, and institutionalized as the only possible way for Socialist-Realist poetry, whereupon all Russian poetry worthy of the name ceased until after Stalin's death. As Boris Slutsky, a poet who survived the Stalinist period, described the plight of Russian poetry during those years:

> Only yesterday she was on the run,
> Wringing her hands in terror.
> Only yesterday she was on the executioner's block
> For perhaps the tenth time.

Since 1956, however, there has been a definite poetic revival in the Soviet Union. Within the country, the most striking development of the past decade is the grudging recognition now granted to the great Russian poets of the early 20th century and, most important, the partial availability of their work. The recognition and availability are limited and subject to certain carefully observed ideological rules, but with all that, the really momentous phenomenon in Russian poetry of the past ten years is that the poems of Anna Akhmatova, Boris Pasternak, Marina Cvetaeva, Velimir Khlebnikov, Nikolai Zabolotsky and, most recently, Andrei Belyi can actually be read, after decades of suppression, vilification and officially imposed oblivion. But at least a dozen of other major poets who were exiled, condemned to silence or physically destroyed by the Soviet regime (Kuzmin, Gumilev, Mandelshtam, Zinaida Gippius, Viacheslav Ivanov, Khodasevich, to name a few) have not yet been republished and are still treated very gingerly in the Soviet press and scholarship.

Outside the Soviet Union, the younger post-Stalinist poets have been making the biggest news. The international attention now attracted by Yevtushenko and Voznesensky is nothing short of phenomenal. Their poetry is read in translation and acclaimed by thousands of young Europeans and Americans for whom Akhmatova and Pasternak were merely names, and who probably had never heard of Mandelshtam or Cvetaeva or Zabolotsky. This situation is paradoxical: the reverse would be for a generation of Russian readers who had never heard of Yeats or T.S. Eliot or Auden or Marianne Moore suddenly to acclaim Allen Ginsberg as the first significant English-language poet since Whitman and Wilde. But this situation is also the sign of the times. The fact is that Yevtushenko and Voznesensky represent two of the possible options that a Russian poet has today. Examining the respective situations and accomplishments of these poets and contrasting them to the alternative options, exemplified by such poets as Bulat Okudzhava, Iosif Brodsky and Nikolai Morshen, may perhaps throw light on the actual state of Russian poetry.

Antiworlds: Poetry by Andrei Voznesensky. Edited by Patricia Blake and Max Hayward. Basic Books. 120 pp. $4.95.

The New Russian Poets 1953 to 1966. An Anthology, Selected, Edited and Translated by George Reavey. Bilingual Edition. October House. 292 pp. $7.50. Paper $2.95.

Yevtushenko Poems. Authorized translation by Herbert Marshall. Bilingual edition. E. P. Dutton & Co. 191 pp. $4.50.

Voznesensky: Selected Poems. Authorized Translation, with Introduction and Notes, by Herbert Marshall. Hill and Wang. 129 pp. $4.50.

Selected Poems of Andrei Voznesensky. Translated and with an Introduction by Anselm Hollo. Grove Press. 107 pp. $1.95 paper.

Yevgeny Yevtushenko. Selections from The Bratsk Hydroelectric Station and Other Poems. Translated by Bernard L. Koten. New World Review. 48 pp. $1 paper.

Iosif Brodsky. Selected Poetry. (In Russian.) Inter-Language Literary Associates. 239 pp. $2.25 paper.

Nikolai Morshen. Poems in The New Review. Nos. 82 and 83. (In Russian.)

Bulat Okudzhava Sings His Songs. (In Russian.) 12" record, recorded and pressed for ARFA by RCA-Victor Custom Records Division. $4.50.

Bulat Okudzhava. "Lots of Luck, Kid!" Translated by Robert Szulkin, in Pages From Tarusa. Andrew Field, editor. Little, Brown and Co. 367 pp. $7.50.

Yevgeny Yevtushenko is undoubtedly the biggest name in Soviet poetry today. There has not been such a matinee idol in Russian poetry since the days when Igor Severianin used to recite his Ego-Futuristic poems to audiences on the eve of World War I. Despite Yevtushenko's vehement denials, there is an unmistakable kinship: he shares Severianin's penchant for a pseudo-elegant foreign vocabulary and has on occasion the same sure-fire sentimentality and the same facile and bouncy optimism. He also possesses Severianin's theatrical flair. To hear Yevtushenko recite his versified editorials is a spellbinding experience. But deprived of the author's delivery and reduced to a printed page, his poems inevitably disappoint.

Yevtushenko's main strength is in being topical. Such poems as "Babi Yar," "The Ballad on Poaching," the still unpublished "Letter to Esenin" and the recent, dreadfully maudlin "Italian Tears" can state the thoughts and attitudes of the younger Soviet generation in ways that could not be safely printed in the Soviet Union unless dressed up as verse. There is an obvious analogy in this with the czarist Russia of the 1860s: Nekrasov's verse and Chernyshevsky's literary criticism also had ways of bringing up certain "burning issues" otherwise too hot to be aired publicly. Considering the role his poetry plays within the present-day Soviet society, Yevtushenko's success and fame at home are both understandable and well deserved. But when his foreign admirers accept his mixture of grandstand histrionics and mawkish sentiment as a major poetic utterance of our age, there is evidence of a total misunderstanding of what poetry is all about.

Yevtushenko can be admired for his editorial daring; the daring of Andrei Voznesensky is largely stylistic and thematic. His poetry tries to be frankly original and unabashedly imaginative—two qualities that are of course essential for any true poetry, but which were considered grave sins in Stalin's era. Voznesensky, more than any other young Soviet poet, also brings back the emphasis on the verbal aspects of the poet's craft. His strident assonances, out-of-control alliteration and overly insistent play on verbal stems are all borrowed from his great predecessors Khlebnikov, Pasternak and Marina Cvetaeva, who used such devices, however, both with more restraint and greater expressive effect. But these poets are dead, while Andrei Voznesensky is alive and celebrated and, besides, Soviet poetry can certainly use a transfusion of technical originality, whatever the source. A far more talented and accomplished poet than Yevtushenko, Voznesensky shares with him a certain provincial limitation of outlook and the habit of interspersing his more daring efforts with more conventional or even conformist utterances on the standard themes of official Soviet poetry: the greatness of the Russian people, the tenderness and affection inspired in the poet by Lenin's name, and the horrors of American militarism, Western decadence and the FBI. When Mayakovsky treated similar themes back in the 1920s, there was no doubt that they represented his actual convictions; in Yevtushenko and Voznesensky, whatever their feelings may be, the reader gets the inevitable Soviet clichés which all Soviet writers (and especially those allowed to travel abroad) have been required to reiterate ad nauseam for the past thirty years.

COMMENTARY

WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?

SEE FOR YOURSELF

☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79

☐ 12 Mo. $8.00

COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address..................
Zip..................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

VOL. X, NO. [illegible] FALL 1966

Canadian Issue

JAMES EAYRS
Canada and the US:
The Politics of Disparate Power

JOHN W. HOLMES
Canada as a Middle Power

FRANK H. UNDERHILL
The Canadian Way of Being Unhappy

W. L. MORTON
Quebec—Federation or Association?

JOHN CONWAY
Ideology and Environment in New France

LAURIER L. LAPIERRE
The Evolution of French Canadian Nationalism up to 1896

HILDA NEATBY
French Canadian Nationalism and the American Revolution

• • •

Subscription rates:
$1.00 each for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues); $5.00 for two years
Available at bookstores or from

110 Morrill Hall,
Michigan State University,
E. Lansing, Mich. 48823

For the third most popular Russian poet now writing, Bulat Okudzhava, freedom from the compulsory cliché has become the crucial freedom within the context of Soviet literature. Although he has published several slim volumes of verse, Okudzhava is primarily a chansonnier in the French tradition. The effect of his poems depends equally on the melodies he composes for them and on his own subdued and intimate delivery. The most original and popular of his songs were not included in his published collections; nor are they commercially available on Soviet-made records. But privately made tapes of Okudzhava's songs enjoy an enormous circulation in the Soviet Union, and no party in Moscow or Leningrad has been complete without them for the past five years. The recording recently released in this country contains some of his best-known pieces. A good half of the songs included represent underground poetry.

The concept of literature, including poetry, as a lesson or a sermon has always been central to Soviet culture. In his minor and modest way, Okudzhava now revives the opposite, nondidactic concept of art, stemming in the Russian tradition from Pushkin and Chekhov. His songs simply show or describe things as he sees them and his attitude to his subject matter is contained within his manner. He can also be quite refreshingly irreverent. His Paper Soldier treats the whole notion of military heroics, Soviet or otherwise, as absurd (the same kind of scoffing in Okudzhava's amusing novella "Lots of Luck, Kid!" was literally horrifying to the orthodox Soviet critics).

Another Okudzhava song tells of water-front prostitutes and of some Soviet sailors who are frightened to go out to sea. Prostitution is not indicted, the sailors' cowardice is neither defended nor condemned—there is an implied presupposition of an adult audience that has outgrown Sunday school. Okudzhava's The Midnight Trolley has particularly irked the orthodox Soviet mentality. The hero of this song tells of his remedy against loneliness and acute depression: take the midnight trolley in Moscow and sit in it next to others who have also experienced shipwreck in the night. Neither Lenin, nor the great Russian people are evoked. Instead:

Who would have thought that there is so much kindness
In silence. In silence.

Quietly, unobtrusively, Okudzhava brings back the things that are most inimical to the Soviet brand of Socialist-Realistic aesthetics: a detached irony, freedom to be either optimistic or pessimistic, depending on the subject at hand, and, at times, a genuine sense of human tragedy. His refusal to take out insurance in the form of occasional reiteration of official clichés is apparently what makes some of his most popular work unpublishable in the Soviet Union to this day. Other younger Soviet poets who have come into prominence in the past decade—Bella Akhmadulina, Yevgeny Vinokurov, Viktor Bokov, Novella Matveeva—do take out such insurance. The remaining alternatives for a Russian poet today is to publish clandestinely in the Soviet Union (and perhaps to send his work to be published abroad at great personal risk) or to be an émigré poet.

Shortly before her death, Anna Akhmatova stated in several interviews that today's important and lasting Russian poetry does not appear in the official press and is unknown abroad. (See "Akmatova: Tragic Queen Anna" by Alexander Werth, The Nation, Aug. 22.) The underground poetry Akhmatova had in mind has a minuscule circulation in the Soviet Union in mimeographed publications, the very names of which constitute a challenge to what is officially acceptable: Syntax (an open invitation to a charge of formalism), Sphynxes (an assertion of the mystery of poetic creation) and Phoenix (a rebirth of poetry from the ashes). In these privately circulated publications (some of which have been reprinted in toto in a West German émigré journal), young and unknown poets can achieve a full measure of freedom from the ideological fetters and can write in any style about anything they please. Their stylistic inspiration comes for the most part from Khlebnikov's experiments with language of some fifty years ago; Marina Cvetaeva (who committed suicide in 1941 after her voluntary return from exile) and Nikolai Gumilev (shot for counterrevolutionary activities in 1921) are objects of a cult. The poetry in these little journals is by no means great, and it is even rarely good, but it is fresh and free in the way Yevtushenko's is not.

The most notable poet to have so far emerged from these clandestine publications is Iosif Brodsky, who became famous after the Soviet authorities put him on trial for being a "parasite" and a "sponger." The transcript of his trial, published in the West, left no doubt that what was really indicted in Brodsky's person was the whole notion of writing socially useless poetry. After being sentenced to five years at hard labor, and spending almost two years carting manure in a remote northern area, Brodsky was quietly released this year. A piece of poetry he has written since his release has just reached the West; it is a cycle of poems dedicated to the memory of T. S. Eliot. A selection of Brodsky's poems, most of which appeared in Soviet underground journals, was published in 1965 by the Inter-Language Literary Associates, Washington, D. C. Brodsky's poetry is uneven, often murky and verbose, but at its best it has a seriousness and a profundity no other Soviet poet can match. He uses surrealistic imagery freely, his acknowledged foreign influences—John Donne and Eliot—are not on any Soviet approved list; and if Okudzhava's jaunty songs admit only a possibility of a tragic view of life, Brodsky's brooding elegies are at times permeated with an oppressive sense of doom which only the eternal values of art and nature are allowed to overcome.

The best present-day Russian poetry is not produced by any of the four by now internationally famous poets discussed so far. Since the death of Anna Akhmatova, the finest living Russian poet is a man whose poetry is known to perhaps a few hundred people at most. His name is Nikolai Morshen. In originality of content, profundity, literary culture and craftsmanship, neither Voznesensky nor Brodsky can even touch his work. Morshen has been publishing for over a decade, yet his name remains virtually unknown in the Soviet Union. It is all a question of the peculiar role of geography in modern Russian literature. St.-John Perse or Thomas Mann could reside in America and maintain their positions in their respective literatures. But a modern Russian writer who leaves his country inevitably loses not only his Russian audience but any claim to international attention.

Nikolai Morshen, the most important from Cambridge

THE TRAVEL DIARIES OF T. R. MALTHUS
Edited by PATRICIA JAMES

The diaries of Malthus's 1799 Scandinavian tour, discovered in 1961, are now published for the first time.

Aside from their significance as an authentic record of a stage in the evolution of Malthus's thought on population, these journals offer considerable entertainment as the traveler comments on the people and their habits, on food and drink, prices, houses, marriage customs, scenery and everything else he observed. Illustrated. $8.50

EVOLUTION AND SOCIETY
J. W. BURROW

A study of the development of social evolutionary theory in Victorian England. The period from 1860 to 1890 is emphasized, although the themes discussed are traced from the late eighteenth century.

Among the evolutionary social theorists, Dr Burrow deals particularly with Henry Maine, Herbert Spencer and E. B. Tylor and their faith that sociology could uncover laws analogous to those of the natural sciences. $8.50

ILLIBERAL LIBERAL
RUTH KNIGHT

New South Wales in the 1840's provided a stormy setting of great appeal to young Robert Lowe, an English albino barrister with no money but plenty of mettle. He quarreled with the governor, then with the squatters, and was active in every political controversy of the day.

Ruth Knight has written a lively account of the Australian career of this unusual man who later became Chancellor of the Exchequer under Gladstone. Published for Melbourne University Press. Illustrated. $12.00

Cambridge University Press
32 East 57th Street, New York 10022

of several interesting Russian émigré poets now active in the West, left Russia as a very young man during World War II, and lives at present in Monterey, Calif. His one small book of verse was published in West Germany in 1959. Entitled The Seal, the book uses this pinniped mammal, with its breathing hole in the Arctic ice, as the central metaphor for the collection, whose theme is the situation of a restless and inquisitive intellectual in an environment of totalitarian orthodoxy. Since the publication of The Seal, Morshen's poetry has been steadily growing in scope and stature. This year he has published in the New York-based Russian literary journal The New Review two sets of poems which clearly place him in the front rank of 20th-century Russian poets. Influenced initially by Mandelshtam, Pasternak and Zabolotsky, and later by Teilhard de Chardin, Morshen has more recently matured into a wholly original poet, unlike any other in Russian literature. His latest poetry draws on completely new areas of human thought (cybernetics and paleontology, for example); the elegance of his verbal texture, which is light years away from the strident pyrotechnics of a Voznesensky, is comparable to the best of Pasternak; a recent poem in which the grasses and weeds of the North American wilderness are made to recite a tiny anthology of classical Russian poetry is a tour de force of truly dazzling proportions. There is no doubt that a large and enthusiastic audience awaits Morshen's poetry in the Soviet Union, should it be made available there (at which time, presumably, translators into other languages will also deign to notice it).

In the meantime, there is a veritable flood of English translations of Yevtushenko and Voznesensky. Anselm Hollo's versions of Voznesensky, inexplicably endorsed by the poet himself and now available in paperback, are a particularly blatant example of that all too frequent recent phenomenon, translation of Russian literature by guesswork. Knowing the language only sketchily and apparently not wishing to use a dictionary, Hollo translates "hunting hound" as "rodent"; "Ah, those home-grown Iagos!" as "O they are hothouse flowers"; and "Poetesses hasten to become market-women" ("Poètessy begut v lotosvicy") as "And the poet-girls, running, running . . . / Toward the trembling black grove." Whenever the text gets too idiomatic for comfort, Hollo simply drops the passage and develops an earlier or later phrase. He throws in Anglo-Saxon obscenities or French words, apparently just for the hell of it, when there is not the slightest pretext for them in Voznesensky's Russian original. At times he totally misses the point of an entire poem.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 11-21-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

Compared to Hollo's "translations," even Herbert Marshall's versions of Yevtushenko and Voznesensky look well. But the improvement is only relative. Marshall understands many more Russian words and he tries to convey something of Voznesensky's style and verbal structure. But as an English stylist, Marshall is naive, to say the least, and he, too, has considerable difficulties with the Russian idiom. Voznesensky's introduction to his "Triangular Pear" begins: "I am writing a work of major proportions, with a plot. It is about 'the discovery of America.'" Marshall's rendition of this is: "I am working on a big thematic subject: 'About the Discovery of America.'" (Hollo's version of the passage is: "I am working on a great theme: the discovery of America.")

Marshall's own wildly ungrammatical Russian sentences, quoted by him in his largely irrelevant introduction to the Voznesensky volume leave no doubt how ill equipped he is to translate anything at all from that language. Copious footnotes have been supplied by Marshall for both the Yevtushenko and the Voznesensky volumes, and the only word for some of them is "unbelievable." Natasha Rostova, in a footnote appended to a spectacularly garbled and misunderstood Yevtushenko passage, is described as a character from Tolstoy's "great novel Anna Karenina" (Yevtushenko Poems, p. 149), while the Queen of Sheba and Bathsheba, mentioned in Voznesensky's "Ballad of Work" are left in their Russian transcriptions and helpfully identified by Marshall as "A Tsarina of Russia, patron of the arts, of whom many portraits were painted," and "A lake in Estonia," respectively (Voznesensky: Selected Poems, p. 115).

Fragments from Yevtushenko's long epic "The Bratsk Hydroelectric Station" have been translated by Bernard L. Koten. (How odd that this sprawling, verbose opus should become available in some three English translations, while such authentic masterpieces of Russian 20th-century narrative poetry as Belyi's "First Rendez-Vous," Cvetaeva's "Poem of the End" and Zabolotsky's "Triumph of Agriculture," to name a few, still remain untranslated.) Coten worked with greater care than Marshall, in whose volume this poem is also partly represented. At least Coten conveys the meaning of the title, while Marshall's equivalent, "Bratsky GES," makes no sense in English and throws the gender agreement of Yevtushenko's Russian title out of kilter. But Coten, alas, also has his vocabulary trouble (Yevtushenko speaks of Lermontov's "bilious gaze," which Coten renders as "bitter vision") and as poetry, even on Yevtushenko's level of the term, Coten's translation is often plodding and uninspired.

The same has to be said, unfortunately, of the translations in George Reavey's anthology, though Reavey's are on a far superior level than the grotesqueries of Hollo or Marshall. In addition to the inevitable Yevtushenko, Reavey's book offers a sampling of Voznesensky, Brodsky, Okudzhava, the underground poet Galanskov, the witty and whimsical Novella Matveeva (her least typical work, it seems) and a few others, but all of them somehow emerge flat and unrewarding in English, with Okudzhava, stripped of his direct and laconic manner and relentlessly explicated to the full, faring about the worst. Whatever one can say about the new post-Stalinist Soviet poets, one thing is certain: they deserve better from their English translators.

Voznesensky, for one, does get better (and then some) in the unusual volume Antiworlds, edited by Patricia Blake and Max Hayward. The contrast between this volume and the others mentioned is dazzling. Not only have Voznesensky's poems been translated by those who have understood all his Russian words and who have no problems with Russian idiom or syntax (an elementary requirement, of course, though it is rarely met these days), but most of the poems in this volume stand up remarkably well as English poetry. In fact, the paradoxical fault of Antiworlds, if regarded as a set of translations, is that the results are too spectacularly good. Put into English by the likes of W. H. Auden, Robert Lowell (who on this occasion, for once, was given reliable trots) and Richard Wilbur, Voznesensky loses the naive and provincial tone he often has in Russian, sheds his often crude and overemphatic alliteration, and indeed becomes the kind of poet he undoubtedly could be had he the literary culture and sophistication of his translators. But this is probably mere carping. Everybody who contributed to Antiworlds is to be congratulated (Voznesensky on his good fortune). Is it too much to hope that a similar venture may be organized by the editors to furnish an equally successful English volume of Mandelshtam or Cvetaeva or Khodasevich or Zabolotsky?

Familiars of Death

JOHN BERGER

Mr. Berger served as art critic of the New Statesman for ten years and is now a regular contributor to New Society (London). His most recent published work is Success and Failure of Picasso (Penguin).

It is five years ago that I first saw the sculpture of Ernst Neizvestny in Moscow and first wrote about it. Since then he has developed very considerably as an artist, and what were then predictions are today certainties. Nevertheless, it is reasonable to suppose that his most important works—according to the very high standards which he has set himself—are still to come. Whether or not they are created depends upon whether he is granted the space and time in which to work slowly and calmly. He is now a fully mature artist who can no longer be content with sketches and indications. The critical question is not that of a reputation: but whether the genius of Ernst Neizvestny is fully expressed in works or remains only a challenge.

It would be an exaggeration to say that he was neckless: but Neizvestny's head seems to be part of his body. His body is short, broad and expressive of extraordinary energy. You remember his shoulders and chest as you remember another person's forehead or jaw. One of the shapes that recur many times in his drawings and sculpture is that of an enlarged heart. As a result of a heart attack several years ago, he himself is said to have a "weak" heart, yet considering the pace at which he still lives and works, it must have been an unusually tough organ to begin with.

It is difficult for him to stay still. He sleeps only a few hours at night. Very little passes him by. On a practical level he is almost excessively observant. This observation combined with his intelligence and organizing ability might have made him a remarkable soldier or politician. As it is, his art has curiously little to do with what he observes directly. His art is the creature of his own physical existence. Not in any hedonist sense. It is as though the structure of his imagination had been formed to demonstrate the severe truth—that being conditions consciousness. It is via his own body—as we shall notice later—that he has become a spokesman for his country and age.

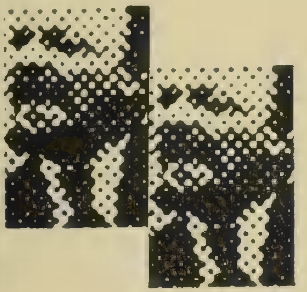
He was born in 1926. On his official papers it says 1925. This is because he lied about his age when he applied to join the army in the Second World War. His father is a successful doctor and his mother is a scientist and writer. They live in the Urals where Ernst was brought up as a child. It was an area where there were many exiles both of the anti-Communist and Communist intelligentsia. He grew up in an atmosphere of intellectual tension.

"My war began in early childhood, and it hasn't stopped. I have always had the feeling of being in the front line. Now I've reached the point where I feel really well only when I'm under stress. But of course today it could be the stress of work. . . ."

In 1942, he joined the army, aged 16. He became a lieutenant in command of a platoon of commandos. They were dropped behind the German lines. Part of a poem that he wrote at that time has the documentary value of a soldier's letter. Neizvestny would today make little claim for the poem as such. But it illuminates something about his later attitude as an artist. All his sculptural figures are familiars of death. They are the very antithesis to, say, the "deathless" figures of Maillol. Neizvestny talks of there having to be a dialogue within each figure. All imitation classic art he dismisses as a monologue. And of dialogues none is deeper than that implied by the following:

A lull. They fell in clusters.
Fell asleep instantly erased by fatigue.
The living and the corpses embracing.
  In blood.
No disgust. Soon we'll all be dead.
Anyone here? Get up — it's Reveille.
Unfamiliar faces. Blue.
Anyone from the Second Storm
  Battalion still alive?
On your feet. There's fun ahead.
The corpses getting up? How strange.

PATTERNS OF SOVIET THOUGHT



RICHARD T.
DE GEORGE

How can both the Chinese and the Soviets quote Lenin to support opposing positions? How could an educated Soviet citizen accept the official about-face concerning Stalin? To help answer questions like these, Richard T. De George summarizes the works of major and minor philosophers of communism from Marx to the present and offers a detailed critique of their important ideas. This book provides the basis for an understanding of present-day Soviet policies and of the developments that are to mold the future course of the Soviet Union.

$6.95

A Republic of Equals

LESLIE W. DUNBAR

With the great Depression, liberalism became the dominant force in American politics. This book examines the impact of one of liberalism's most dramatic manifestations—the Negro revolt. Leslie W. Dunbar discusses the consequences of the civil-rights movement for American politics. He points out some of the pitfalls and discusses the place of the courts, the uses of government, and the implications of liberalism's new goals.

$4.00

The University of Michigan Press
ANN ARBOR

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

The FBI Nobody Knows

by Fred J. Cook. 414 pp. Pyramid Books.

A portion of this important book first appeared in The Nation (October 18, 1958), as a special feature and attracted nation-wide attention and the highest praise. Now it has been rewritten and enlarged with much new material.

" . . . an effective and powerful document. . . ."
—Mark DeWolfe Howe, New York Review of Books

"Fred Cook must be credited with a courageous as well as an illuminating book. Let those who dispute his charges refute them if they can."
—Alan Barth, New York Herald Tribune

"A devastating case against the Federal Bureau of Investigation and its veteran director, J. Edgar Hoover."
—San Francisco Chronicle

"J. Edgar Hoover won't like this book . . . well-documented . . . likely to cause plenty of furor."
—Publisher's Weekly

THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS has the unique distinction of being the central point in the plot of Rex Stout's latest Nero Wolfe who-dun-it, THE DOORBELL RANG.

For your FREE copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS fill out the subscription coupon below, and start receiving The Nation, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion.

THE NATION 333 6th Avenue New York, N. Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of THE FBI NOBODY KNOWS.

☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....

ADDRESS ....

CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No. ....

11-21-66

I thought the living ones were over there. . . .

Soon after, Neizvestny was severely wounded in the chest and in the back, and left for dead. Twenty years later he was awarded the Order of the Red Star for his part in that battle. In the intervening twenty years no one had made the connection between Lieutenant Neizvestny, missing, presumed dead, and a notorious sculptor.

Yet the connection could not have been more fundamental. Neizvestny's sculptural figures, familiars of death, express at the same time endurance, pain and the will to survive. They allude to an experience of time probably known only to those who have been given up for dead. Tolstoy's famous passage about Prince Andrey lying on his back at Austerlitz describes the same truth. Prince Andrey thinks: "How was it that I did not see that sky before? And how happy I am to have found it at last!"

Neizvestny's work is concerned with the following chain: Time = Change = Pain = Endurance = Release = Arrival = Time. The less experienced would expect to find Departure instead of Arrival. The chain can be interpreted in terms of survival or creation, in terms of living or the sexual act.

After the war Neizvestny studied philosophy as well as art in Moscow. It was at this time that he first read the early Marx—and, later, Gramsci. He wrote a paper on the nature of Fascist art, which led him to study the beginnings of Nazism in Germany. He came to the conclusion that the early Nazis had learned a good deal from émigré members of the Russian Black Hundreds: the prototype Fascist organization first formed in the 1860s, backed by the big landlords, incidentally anti-Semitic, and operating as a force of intimidation against the liberation of the serfs. During his childhood Neizvestny had met men who had been latter-day members of the Black Hundreds. It is an absurd understatement to call Neizvestny's lifetime—our lifetime—a period of transition. It is a period of revolutionary transformation. But in the visual arts the implications of this have generally not been understood.

Neizvestny worked as an assistant to various sculptors and as a mason. One of the most eminent of the official sculptors for whom he worked—modeling the boots on some gigantic monument to Stalin—noticed that his assistant tended to be independent-minded, and tried to warn him: "The secret of success is to do what they tell you. To try to go against their wishes—believe me—is like trying to pee against the wind."

Fifteen years and many events later

REPORT TO THE BLUE GUARD

the problem: to remember the dreams of the day to report to the blue guard on the bridge

and i will forget tonight again
and lie in the sun pits uninterrogated painted many colors far below the bridge standing on the bridge with the blue guard smoking swaying

ROBERT HERSHON

the same sculptor made a proposition to Neizvestny: "Look, why can't we be friends? We're the two strongest men in the field, we should arrange things together." Neizvestny laughed. "You're a member of the Academy," he said. "You have the army behind you and an honorary rank of general, you have a vast studio, a large car, a dacha, a marble bathroom, you get continuous commissions, and you have the illusion that you're strong."

In the late 1950s Neizvestny began to work by himself and to acquire a widespread unofficial reputation—more especially among the young—as an artist who was different and would make no concessions. The fact that he was a sculptor and not a painter or poet was highly significant: more significant at that time, perhaps, than the quality of his work, which was still somewhat hesitant—in the sense of being formally somewhat inexperienced.

There was already a large tradition of writers and painters working "privately": their work was usually highly personal, lyrical or contemplative (e.g., Pasternak in literature or Falk in painting). Their privacy tended to be preserved by a veil of some kind of mysticism.

Neizvestny, however, was challenging the official record in one of the least private, the most public, branches of art—sculpture. Furthermore, he was prepared to argue for his work by virtue of its monumental, its social function. This was not another quietist withdrawal. He was contesting the right of Soviet sculpture, as it was generally being practiced, to its own claims.

The challenge carried with it its own dangers. To write poems you need a notebook in a park. To paint pictures you need a room and some paints such as you can buy in a shop. To make sculpture you need stone or wood or bronze, a foundry and a studio. The only access to any of these in the Soviet Union is through official channels which are controlled either by the Academy of Arts or the Union of Artists.

Neizvestny was forced to find himself an unused shop which he had no right to use as a studio, and to buy his materials illegally on the black market. (A little later he gained one official commission—to build a wall of sculptural relief for a pioneers' camp in the Crimea.) For a large part of his time he was now occupied with what—according to the letter of the law—was his own illegal work, bronze figures—mostly consequential to war. The contradictions of a man working with the conscience of a public artist—as distinct from an idiosyncratic nonconformist—being forced to become a petty criminal, helps to explain the drama of the next sequence of events.

The confrontation between Khrushchev and Neizvestny in November, 1962, is well known, but in order to understand its meaning one must correct a frequent illusion about the struggle concerning the arts in the USSR. It is not a simple struggle between a Philistine political leadership and a group of constrained artists. There are certain powerful voices on the Central Committee who are in favor of experimental art. So far as the visual arts are concerned, the greatest single obstacle to change lies in the power of the majority of well-established artists who dominate all policy decisions in order to defend and maintain their own position of excessive privilege.

Among these privileged artists there are, of course, differences of attitude. The most successful are members of the Academy. The Union of Artists is mostly in the hands of "liberals," who oppose the Academy—up to the point when they, themselves, have the opportunity of being elected to the Academy—as a kind of licensed opposition. The former believe in serving the people with whom they share, at the very most, a sense of patriotism; the latter believe in their own artistic sensibilities which have so far been underestimated.

The enemy of progress in Moscow is not Philistinism but opportunism manipulating Philistinism.

The exhibition which Khrushchev greeted with shouts of "Dog shit! Filth! Disgrace! Who is responsible for this? Who is the leader?" had been specially assembled at the Manège Building so that Khrushchev and other members of the government might inspect it. In the room were most of the participating artists, who had labored all night to mount their works. Many of them were the young experimental artists whom Neizvestny has been encouraging for several years, both directly and indirectly. In style they range from Kinetic artists to those predominantly influenced by Surrealism and Dada. It might seem that he encourages anything nonconformist just because it is so. His reasoning is, in fact, far more responsible.

He recognizes the value in most recent innovations in art (and is, incidentally, very well informed about them) but, at the same time, he recognizes that their revelations, however genuine, are extremely narrow. He sees the crisis of art today as being epitomized by the inability of the artist to approach his work from any distance: such inability being caused, in the last analysis, by a sense of historical impotence. Consequently, he sees the need for a synthetic view which will both recognize and situate the innovations: a view which can only be born out of historical understanding.

In his shop there is a model for a "sculpture," a construction on a huge scale which people will cross like a park or enter like a building. Uncommissioned, as yet unaccepted, but taken seriously by a number of architects and philosophers, it is a project for the new scientific research town near Novosibirsk. In this,

WFF'N PROOF

The GAME for THINKERS

Can you solve this problem?

1. There are three numbered statements in this box.
2. Two of these numbered statements are not true.
3. The average increase in I.Q. scores of those who learn to play WFF 'N PROOF is more than 20 points.

Is statement No. 3 true?

A NEW DIMENSION IN EDUCATIONAL GAMES

WFF 'N PROOF: The GAME of MODERN LOGIC $6.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

EQUATIONS: The GAME of CREATIVE MATHEMATICS $3.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

ON-SETS: The GAME of SET THEORY $4.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

by Professor Layman E. Allen

WFF 'N PROOF

Box 71-MZ
New Haven, Conn.

Please send me ....WFF 'N PROOF
...............ON-SETS ....EQUATIONS
I enclose $ .... and understand that if I am not completely satisfied, I can return the games in 10 days for a full refund of the purchase price.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State........... Zip.........

Refund and return privileges guaranteed!

Dealer Inquiries Invited

WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF

Neizvestny imagines artists of all styles being employed, but each section forming part of an overall sequence whose theme will be that of human thought examining its own history. Scale frightens no Russian, and so grandiosity, although it exists, is seldom thought of as a danger. "The new vulgarity," says Neizvestny, "is good taste."

It was Neizvestny who was pointed out to Khrushchev as the leader of the group. When Khrushchev started to shout again, Neizvestny shouted back: "You may be premier and chairman, but not here in front of my work. Here I am premier and we shall talk as equals."

The discussion which followed was extraordinary for the courage Neizvestny displayed. It went on for more than an hour, during which Neizvestny was accused of being a beatnik, a homosexual and a thief. In the end Khrushchev told him: "You are the kind of man I like. But there's an angel and a devil in you. If the angel wins, we can get along together. If it's the devil who wins, we shall destroy you."

A later investigation included an examination to test Neizvestny's sanity. The need for this may have arisen from Khrushchev's asking Neizvestny, some time after the Manège affair, how he could withstand for so long the pressure of the state. Neizvestny replied that there are certain bacteria—very small, soft ones—which can live in a super-saline solution such as would dissolve the foot of a rhinoceros. The doctors found him sane.

WORLD'S BEST ?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription —$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)

☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip

MAE WEST

heats up lusty lyrics for a "WILD CHRISTMAS" Privately recorded—a collector's item!
Spicy songs of the season, as only Mae West can sing them!
33⅓ lp album.

ORDER BY MAIL. CHRISTMAS DELIVERY GUARANTEED.

MONO—$4.98 ea.,
plus 25¢ postage & handling
STEREO—$5.98 ea.,
plus 25¢ postage & handling

Send check or M.O.
Include name and address.

DAGONET RECORDS, INC.
1800 N. Argyle Ave., Hollywood 28, Calif.

BUY YOUR BOOKS through The Nation. Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

The entire Manège incident will eventually be seen to be a turning point in the history of Soviet art. Partly as a result of Neizvestny's behavior, partly as a result of many other broader social and political developments, the existence of a new art was acknowledged and, despite all the threats, not forcibly suppressed.

But this is to take the long view. Meanwhile Neizvestny's working situation is the same as it was then. He is less threatened. But his art is as much hindered.

He has received no new commissions. All applications for the exhibition or sale of his works abroad are turned down by the appropriate committees, dominated by the established artists who, since he has so improbably survived, have become even more aware of the danger he may represent. One might ask why they should be so worried by one competitor—when the state spends about 50 million rubles a year on sculpture projects. But they realize that if his claim to be a sculptor was admitted, their own would soon be doubted, and a whole new generation of sculptors would then form behind him. This is—or so I am convinced—the basis of the arguments which overtly are about style, content and realism.

Neizvestny sells drawings and a few small sculptures privately to individuals—mostly to scientists of one sort or another. Occasionally a supporter at government level outflanks the artistic bureaucracy. Thus one of his sculptures was presented as a state gift to the President of Finland. Thus last year he was given permission to go and work for an international symposium in Yugoslavia. There, for the first time in his life, he was able to work unharassed in proper working conditions, for six weeks on end. He made two large stone carvings and numerous drawings on the theme of Dante's Inferno. With these he won first prizes. The prize money he was able to take back to the Soviet Union. But not a single word about this honor gained by a Soviet artist has yet been published in the Soviet press.

He continues to work in the unused shop. It is cramped and dark. Full of most of his life's work to date, the working space is now reduced to about 2 square yards. He still has to cast his own bronzes in an absurdly small and primitive furnace at the back of the shop. This means that any figure measuring more than about 2 feet has to be cast in several pieces. It also means that the quality of the casts is extremely rough. He must find his materials and any equipment he needs on the black market.

The disadvantages of these wretched conditions affect his work less drastically than they might another kind of artist. "I think, read, philosophize before working—and then work in an unthinking passion."

When he is modeling he depends far more on his sense of touch than on sight—hence the dinginess of the light and the cramped space are not insuperable difficulties. By laboriously having to do all his own casting he has found that he can often come nearest to his intentions by working directly on the sand molds, changing them radically, as compared to the original plaster models. "I can work from inside the body instead of from the outside, and what will be the exterior surface of the bronze feels no further from the center of me than my own skin."

Yet if an artist habitually works at this pitch of intensity, one must face the possibility that his working life may not be all that long, and then the use to which he can put his perhaps limited energy and time becomes critical.

Neizvestny continues to have to waste a great deal of both in order to improvise and organize for the minimum he needs in order to work at all. "In the last five years I've been able to spend about 15 per cent of my energy on sculpture."

If the situation does not change, the loss could still be tragic. Neizvestny may well be the first visual artist of genius born in the USSR since the revolution. Furthermore, he is a Soviet artist. This is not a case of an artist in an enclave, surrounded by a society with which he is out of sympathy, demanding the freedom to pursue his own art. The truth of this can be demonstrated, I think, by examining the general meaning and content of his work.

"He clove my breast with a sword, and plucked out my quivering heart, and thrust a coal of live fire into my gaping breast. Like a corpse I lay in the desert. And the voice of God called out to me: 'Arise, O prophet, see and hear, be filled with my will, go forth over land and sea, and set the hearts of man on fire with your word.' " This is a prose translation from a very famous poem by Pushkin (Penguin Book of Russian Verse, edited by Dimitri Obolensky) about the creation of a prophet. One of Neizvestny's most recent life-size figures is also entitled "The Prophet." It has a gaping breast and through it are thrust the man's own hands as though to grasp the "coal of live fire." I am not sure whether Neizvestny had the Pushkin poem in mind. Anyway the analogy is more general than that. The poem applies to all Neizvestny's work—and to certain aspects of his life too.

Sometimes Neizvestny calls all his recent figures "Prophets." He imagines them finally assembled together to form what he terms a "Gigantomachia." These prophets developed out of sculptures of "Machine-Men" and these in their turn developed out of figures of wounded soldiers and war victims.

The fundamental element in common among all these figures—also described in Pushkin's poem—is the substitution of a natural part by an unnatural, incongruous or artificial part. Among the early works there is a sculpture actually entitled "Man With Artificial Limb"; in the "Machine-Men," machine parts are absorbed by the body; in the prophets, parts are ripped out and reassembled. This is the mode—as we shall see—of Neizvestny's obsession with endurance.

It is the same preoccupation which leads him to make some of his figures hermaphrodites, to sculpt a centaur, and to make several hundred drawings inspired by Dante's Inferno. In all of them the human body suffers radical transformations, which are usually the result of substitution or an intrusion of something foreign to that body.

This preoccupation clearly refers to his own war experience. And in doing so it can refer to the experience of millions of others.

The most important single fact in the post-revolutionary history of the Soviet Union is that 20 million men, women and children lost their lives as a result of the Second World War. There is now a Soviet artist who might be capable of creating a memorial that would do some justice to this fact. In a sense, part of Neizvestny's work already constitutes just such a memorial.

But his art has wider references. It is a comment on the relationship between man and the machine or, more generally, on man's ability to interrupt and alter the processes of nature. It is realistic comment. It takes into account the fact that the intrusion of the machine—combined with the knowledge that it makes possible—has increased and qualitatively changed the human possibility of suffering. This is why Neizvestny has no use for classic harmony. At the same time he shows that man is stronger than the machine. His "Machine-Men" are not spiritless robots, nor are they monsters: they are men adapting to a new condition. He shows this with the human body. A chain is only as strong as its links; a machine—or an argument—is as strong as its parts. But a man is stronger than most of his parts—and may one day become stronger than any of them. He can survive subtractions and additions. By comparison with him all artifacts are absurdly delicate. Such is the meaning of Neizvestny's figures.

There are some affinities between Neizvestny and Rodin. Both have, as artists, a strong sexual impetus; both are concerned with ideas. Neither of them is in any sense a formalist. Both are deeply involved with the idea of endurance. But here also is the revealing difference between them.

For Rodin, endurance meant the suffering of inevitable change. This is implicit in such works as "She Who Was Once the Helmet-Maker's Beautiful Wife." He saw time as a current that eventually swept all away. "How we imitate, or rather how we are nature," he said. "Those clouds are no more capricious than we. Our souls and our thoughts are fleeting too."

Neizvestny's very different view of time is the result of his remaining faithful to that self which was given up for dead. Everything that follows is an unexpected gift. He has ceased—except purely physiologically—to be the victim of time. He is its surveyor. Hence, for him, endurance means the extension of what is possible: the reduction of what was previously thought impossible.

It is not so difficult, with the help of Marxism, to arrive at such a point as an intellectual hypothesis. But for an artist to make it utterly implicit in his work requires very rare experience and very rare qualities.

RECORDS / Benjamin Boretz

STRAVINSKY: Pulcinella. Irene Jordan, soprano; George Shirley, tenor; Donald Gramm, bass; Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6281/MS 6881.

Le Baiser de la fée. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6203/MS 6803.

Perséphone. Vera Zorina, speaker; Michele Molese, tenor; Ithaca College Concert Choir; Texas Boys' Choir; Gregg Smith Singers; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6319/MS 6919.

Agon. (with Gunther Schuller): Seven Studies on Themes of Paul Klee. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2879.

The complete Pulcinella is one of the peaks of Stravinsky's discovery in terms of large-scale consecution and local detail. Because of the familiarity (and hence compositional neutrality) of the Pergolesi pieces that form the backdrop for Pulcinella's real structure of rhythm and sonority, one can perceive in its purest form Stravinsky's generation of a wholly new continuity out of the succession of internally uniform sections sharply differentiated in qualities of motion and enunciation. Indeed, the power of such differentiation as a primary unit of relation is largely derived from this very internal simplicity. It creates a macrocontext in which entire sections function as simple "elements," ribbons of texture cut off at different lengths, and thus precisely measurable against one another in terms both of total time difference and the articulative differences with which they fill a given span of time.

The result is a remarkable "rhythm in the large," functioning between separated movements as well as, and most strikingly, within individual "scenes" where several Pergolesi movements are joined to produce a single composite projection. The quality is still further developed by the interspersion among these "composites" of extended "closed" numbers consisting of a single Pergolesi piece (the "song" in its first appearance: later, significantly, it returns as an element of a "group"; the trombone-double bass Vivo; and the woodwind Gavotte and Variations just before the final scene).

Kennedy in '68?

Jack Newfield (The Nation, Nov. 14) thought it might be possible.

We would like to make it probable.

Will we succeed? A lot depends on your help and your dollars.

And if we fail, will there be a ticket in '68 that holds the hope of a sane policy for Vietnam?

Or will you have to choose a Lyndon Johnson or a Richard Nixon?

—————CLIP AND MAIL TO—————

CITIZENS for KENNEDY/FULBRIGHT
Box 408, Cathedral Station
New York, N. Y. 10025

Name ....

Address ....

☐ I wish to contribute $..... to CFKF; check enclosed.

☐ I want to help by doing volunteer or organizing work. Please send more information.

This macrorhythm is complemented by an extraordinary placement of local details (superimposed on or insinuated into the fabric of the original pieces) that, similarly, extend the sense of a single sonority over longer segments, thus composing a new rhythmic level—the rate of sonority change—that counterpoints with the smaller-scaled inflections within the subsuming frames. And the way Stravinsky has thus approached Pergolesi's conventional 18th-century harmonic limitations—not, as might have been expected, by using them as an open field for elaborative intricacy in the manner of Richard Strauss's Couperin or Schoenberg's Handel, but by intensifying them to transform a collection of compositional trivia into the precisely particularized elements of a total structure—is an awesome demonstration of the compositional craft, in both senses, that Stravinsky has uniquely revealed.

Since almost none of these qualities can be discerned in the Suite of separate movements through which Pulcinella is most frequently represented, and which actually reduces it to the set of attractive transcriptions that Diaghilev thought he was commissioning, the need for an adequate recording of the complete work is obvious. Stravinsky's own earlier recording with the Cleveland Orchestra, while instrumentally competent, was vocally catastrophic. The present recording, however, rectifies much more than this vocal deficiency; for the free-lance "Columbia Symphony," precisely because it lacks any predetermined ensemble sound, produces for Stravinsky a sharpness of accentual inflection, a "close" articulation of rhythmic contour, and a fibrous separation of timbral levels that were simply unavailable to the pre-integrated, overconditioned Cleveland players. The advantage, unhappily, is somewhat dissipated by ensemble imperfections, notably a frequent nonsimultaneity of attack, which are evidence of hasty recording practice especially inexcusable in connection with a project of this historical and musical magnitude.

Tchaikowsky's music is rather too directly ancestral for Stravinsky to have produced, in Le Baiser de la fée, a Pulcinella of the 19th century. There are, after all, places in Tchaikowsky that are (in the rare proper performances) astonishingly "Stravinskian" in texture, sonority and even rhythm (listen, for instance, to Klemperer's recording of Tchaikowsky's Fifth Symphony). Thus the individual pieces in the Baiser are rather too nostalgically handled, are never welded into the special concision and proportional precision of their Pulcinella analogues. If anything, they seem somewhat overextended in presentation, and single "numbers" are sustained over such long spans that they tend to "close" internally, never creating a piece-to-piece connection that transcends their episodic succession.

But Baiser is interesting, if thus on a lesser level, for what Stravinsky hears in Tchaikowsky's orchestrations and textures; in his accentuation and, especially, his harmony. In particular, interesting ideas of phrase accent result from Stravinsky's special instrumental partitioning of linear conjunctions—an especially "nice" touch since so much of Tchaikowsky's own characteristic phraseology derived from his approach to this domain. And there are, predictably, quantities of wonderful ideas of instrumental sonority—low flute, tremolo strings, plucked basses, etc.—but primarily one is aware of that magnificent Stravinskian absence of sonorous redundancy, the constant accretion and discovery of new combinations that are not simply "different" or "varied" but "developmental." Thus, for example, in the last section a locally "beautiful" conjunction of woodwinds, harp and horn is transformed into a relation of bowed and plucked strings, and then expanded into a full-orchestral sonority—a succession whose insight into the range of timbre-relational possibility should permanently transform the auditory awareness of any attentive listener. Performance and recording in the present release are reasonably faithful.

Of the other recordings, Perséphone is the one Stravinsky work whose hybrid elements seem to remain unreconciled, and where the presentational manner imposes requirements of contrast, transition and proportion that don't appear to merge with a unitary compositional idea. The result is a sense of "padding," event emptiness, and even at some points a purely gestural appropriateness that almost negates all the strokes of imaginative idea. The very sharpness of this recording (except for a pitch-uncertain tenor) exaggerates the fundamental soft-headedness of the music. And the Boston Symphony's performance of Agon warrants mention only to warn that its conceptual and executive misrepresentation imposes articulative ponderousness and sonorous homogenization on one of the most intricately lucid works of the century.

TWO DEPARTURES

1. GIRAFFES

The giraffes got away at dusk, the pair of them headed for the zoo exit.
along with the departing crowd—two giants hardly seen against foliage in half-light floating down the path among the trees, their hooves frolicking out just as the gates were shut, and the keepers chasing too late after into a deserted street as the tall shapes faded in the dark air.

2. GIANTS

Out in the street the two giants head home after work like everyone else with rolled-up workclothes under their arms, holding lunchboxes, and make their way to the train that will take them to their nearby village:
It is Italy.

I was afraid, and ran ahead into a restaurant and watched the approaching scene from a table through the plate-glass window.
A gang of boys were following them down the street like they do in Italian towns attracted by the great mis-shapen bodies and knobby heads.
And as the giants turned off toward the railroad station, no monsters but just workmen after all living dull, hard-working, ordinary lives (luckily there were two so they had each other) the whole gang of boys streamed into the restaurant where I was and let them go on.

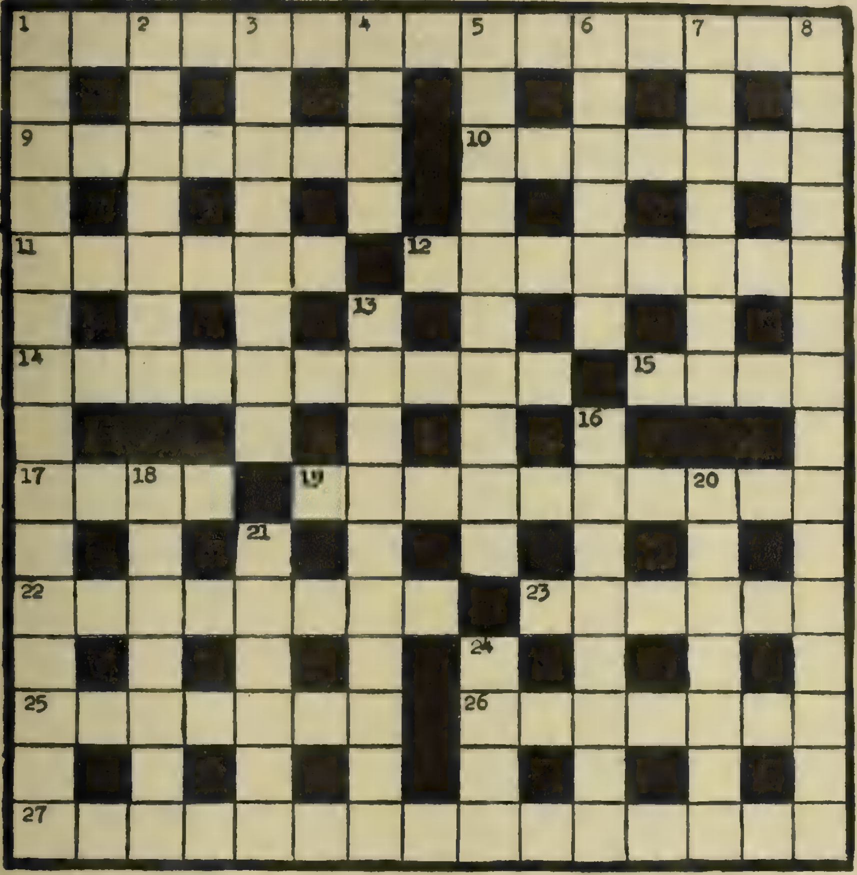
EDWARD FIELD

Crossword Puzzle No. 1176

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 If one sees a sultan drive in a strange way, such people don't try to look well. (15)
9 Experience. (7)
10 How the percussion section might consider the quiet passages. (7)
11 Came down with cold condition, and cried? (6)
12 Deviates from the calming type? (8)
14 You might be on the right track with one, but still in the dark. (5, 5)
15 See 4 down
17 Dean of Bingen? (4)
19 A really fabulous horn! (10)
22 Are misanthropes, because they do? (8)
23 A plant of Siam, strangely enough, to be found around an American state shortly. (6)
25 Mitigate, like usage, in a way. (7)
26 The rote involved in addition? (7)
27 Duke Ellington's song, given without short notice, and how the subject behaved? (15)

DOWN:

1 Having us mail law letters for a man of note? (7, 8)
2 Certainly not a little girl fish dishing it out! (7)
3 Racks, perhaps. (8)
4 and 15 It might prevent a smash opening, but drops too violently! (4, 4)
5 Proving people with no wings are peculiar? (10)
6 One can't be trusted, if a bad sailor overseas. (7)
7 Made of calf, fit only to cause 3. (7)
8 Is the justification of the egoist? (4-11)
13 Hunter keeps such a trio of stars around him. (6, 4)
16 There's usually no purpose in having one. (8)
18 Donate a little food? The faint-hearted does easily. (5, 2)
20 Go ahead! (7)
21 Talk a little, with the content a little salty. (6)
24 About the ear? (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1175

ACROSS: 1 Lackluster; 6 and 24 Stoppage; 10 Neptune; 11 Trainer; 12 Ibis; 13 Impalpable; 15 Linseed; 16 Tonneau; 17 Newborn; 20 Palatial; 22 Sidewinder; 23 Trio; 25 Upshoot; 26 Swahili; 27 Duty; 28 Spenserian. DOWN: 1 Long Island Sound; 2 Caption; 3 Lout; 4 Stemmed; 5 Extract; 7 Tenable; 8 Perpetual motion; 9 Campanile; 14 Lemonwood; 18 Wideset; 19 Nonstop; 20 Press on; 21 Termini.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

EDUCATIONAL

THE THOREAU SCHOOL. Five day boarding, grades five through eight. An intimate, cooperative community, combining study with the tasks and joys of country living. School bus brings your children home weekends to New York City. Now enrolling for opening September, 1967. Write: Rodman, RD 1, Wallkill, N.Y. Phone: 914-895-5523.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

TRAVEL

WORLDWIDE FREIGHTER GUIDE $1.25

Lists: Rates — Routes — Schedules — Accommodations — 700 Passenger Carrying Freighters. INEXPENSIVE — yet FIRST CLASS — Voyages vary from a short 7 days to all the way around the world. Longer voyages average less than $12 a day. Almost as low as staying home, yet you enjoy an ocean cruise, & visit exotic ports, with first class food & accommodations.

TravLtips,
40-21 Bell Blvd., Dept. GA, Bayside, N.Y. 11361

REAL ESTATE

WANTED TO BUY, by academic family; 1 acre minimum, with house; 1 hour from upper N.Y.C.; good schools imperative. Box 597, c/o The Nation.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

PUBLISHER'S EDITORIAL ADVISOR. Well-known writer, analyses and aids in revising manuscripts. French-English. Box 596, c/o The Nation.

OUTSTANDING news stories, features, articles considered for publication. Box 598, c/o The Nation.

WANTED — TEACHERS

To sign and help circulate nationwide teacher call for action to end Vietnamese war.

Contact Nationwide Ad,
Teachers Committee for Peace in Vietnam, 5 Beekman St., New York, N.Y. 10038

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74¢ a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

Direct to you from the LAMBERT STUDIOS magnificent full-color

Art Prints

hand silk-screened by master craftsmen

yours at a fraction of retail price!

DECORATOR PANELS

218. MATISSE: FLOWER PETALS. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in shades of blue-green, yellow, red, orange on a soft beige background. 12" x 47½".
Pub. at $16.00. Only 5.95

101. The above on paper. Pub. at $8.00. Only 2.98

229. PARTRIDGE PANEL. On genuine artists' canvas. Shades of blue, green and metallic gold gilt silk-screened onto handmade rice paper. 12" x 36½".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 5.95

163. The above on paper. Pub. at $8.00. Only 2.98

201. CRETAN WALL PAINTING: BULL DANCERS. On genuine artists' canvas—reds, blues, yellows, browns, grays, black, silk-screened on rag paper. 17" x 42".
Pub. at $20.00. Only 6.95

103. The above on heavy art stock.
Pub. at $12.50. Only 3.95

226. MUSICIANS. On genuine artists' canvas. Handsome 16th century woodcut panel—silk-screen of brown figures against a metallic gold background. 10¼" x 31¼".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 5.95

118. The above on handmade rice paper.
Pub. at $7.50. Only 2.98

207. THE WEIGHING OF SOULS (ca 1300 BC.). On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in flesh, gold, green-blue, Egyptian red, black, white. 14½" x 43".
Pub. at $20.00. Only 6.95

123. The above on heavy art stock.
Pub. at $12.50. Only 3.95

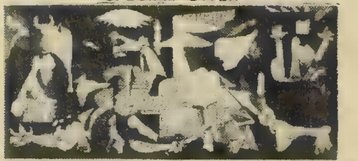
SPECIAL OFFER



143. Picasso's "GUERNICA". Lithograph in tones of gray, black, yellow. 54" x 27½". Pub. at $12.00. · Only [illegible]

REPRODUCED ON GENUINE ARTISTS' CANVAS

Silk-screened by hand on the very same quality canvas that artists paint on. Used by leading interior decorators for America's finest homes and offices. Now offered direct to you at far below original prices of $6.00 to $20.00. Also available on Japanese rice paper, special parchment paper, or heavy rag stock for as little as $1.98

227. KLEE: SINBAD THE SAILOR. On genuine artists' canvas. Silk-screen in spectrum blues, vivid pinks, marigold, red, white, black and warm oranges. 16½" x 23". Pub. at $18.00. Only 6.95

161. The above on paper.
Pub. at $10.00. Only 3.95

211. VAN GOGH: WHITE ROSES. On genuine artists' canvas—white flowers, dark blue-green vase on yellow-green background. Silk-screen. 25" x 20".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 5.95

126. The above on paper.
Pub. at $9.00. Only 2.98

213. FEININGER: TOPSAIL SCHOONER. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in gray, blue, umber, yellow and black. 26½" x 20".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 5.95

114. The above on paper.
Pub. at $7.50. Only 2.98

217. KLEE: THE LONELY ONES. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen of two lonely figures in soft blues, browns, indigo, orange. 19½" x 27½".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 6.95

147. The above on paper.
Pub. at $10.00. Only 3.95

209. PICASSO: STUDIES FOR MOTHER AND CHILD. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in charcoal and brown on chestnut stock. 16" x 20½".
Pub. at $12.00. Only 4.95

113. The above on paper.
Pub. at $6.00. Only 1.98

208. ROUAULT: THE OLD KING. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in red, yellow, blue, black, blue-green. 22" x 16".
Pub. at $15.00. Only 5.95

124. The above on paper.
Pub. at $8.75. Only [illegible]

228. DAUMIER: WHITE STALLION. On genuine artists' canvas. Original silk screen after Daumier reproduced in browns, grey and white. 22½" x 32½".
Pub. at $15.00 Only 5.95

162. The above on paper.
Pub. at $8.00. Only 2.98

212. VAN GOGH: SUN-FLOWERS. On genuine artists' canvas — Silk-screen duplicating the vibrant palatte of yellows, greens, browns. 25¾" x 20".
Pub. at $17.50. Only 5.95

125. The above on paper.
Pub. at $10.00. Only 2.98

221. KLEE: BIRD GARDEN. On genuine artists' canvas—silk-screen in blues, blue-green and green, with yellow, tan and a rich red-brown background. 17" x 23¾".
Pub. at $17.50. Only 5.95

155. The above on paper.
Pub. at $8.00. Only 2.98

■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ MAIL COUPON TODAY ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■ ■

LAMBERT REPRODUCTIONS: Dept. NA-15 336 Central Park West, New York, N. Y. 10025

Gentlemen: Please rush the prints whose numbers are circled opposite.

101	103	113	114	118	123	124	125
126	143	147	155	161	162	163	201
207	208	209	211	212	213	217	218
221	226	227	228	229

The prints I have circled opposite amount to $ ________

Plus Sales Tax (when applicable) ________

Plus Handling Charge ____ 35¢

☐ I enclose total $ ________

☐ Send C.O.D. (limited to orders of $5.00 or more in Continental U.S. only) in amount of $________ plus C.O.D. post offices charges.

Name ________________________

Address ________________________

City ____________ State ________ ZIP ________

Please add 25¢ per print for delivery outside U. S.

We do not offer a catalog because our selections are done by hand and constantly changing.

PUBLIC

Showdown On Vitamins

RALPH LEE SMITH

THE NATION

NOVEMBER 28, 1966 35 cents

TEST RUN FOR '68

Blue Notes from Dixie

PAUL GOOD

Too Soon for Peace

SANFORD GOTTLIEB

Mathematics of Consensus

LOUIS H. BEAN

Indonesia

Hope After Massacre

ALEX JOSEY

What Shall A Moral Man Do?

CHRISTOPHER LASCH

PER NEW BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

strident friend

New York City

DEAR SIRS: For me the truly phenomenal aspect of "The Bobby Phenomenon" is the increasing number of publicists engaged in apologetics for and promotion of the Senator. Jack Newfield's performance [The Nation, Nov. 14] is as strident as the screams of any bobby-soxer at the sight of the Beatles. . . .

Mr. Newfield is a bit apologetic about the image he projects of the Senator as an Existentialist philosopher, the Albert Camus of American politics. But he is unrestrained to the point of fulsomeness in his praise of Bobby Kennedy, the "new kind of liberal" eschewing the "clichés of the old liberals, who remain tuned to the paternalistic federal bureaucracy" and their "simplistic slogans," etc. It is a pity that Mr. Newfield in drawing this portrait did not adopt his idol's distaste for rhetoric and clichés. . . . At some points he is really overwhelming, as when he speaks of the Senator's "wit, rebelliousness, candor, glamour, activism and odd combination of tough-mindedness and compassion which the young find so attractive in other culture heroes like Bogart, Goddard and Bob Dylan," and as when he ends his panegyric worthy of an Elizabethan courtier with: "The future is inscrutable, fate is capricious, facile prophesies are arrogant. But some day Robert Kennedy will lead his legions—the young, the black, the alienated, the romantic, the educated—to Armageddon."

I wonder whether this gush does not make the Senator . . . just a little uneasy. I hope he will forgive one of his well-wishers for warning him that sycophancy has the opposite effect, certainly on Nation readers, from the one intended.

David L. Weissman

jingle

Atlantic City, N. J.

DEAR SIRS: Johnson's favorite thesis, that we must show 'em that might does not make right, suggests the following quatrain:

What we fight
Is "Might Makes Right."
We're so strong,
We can't be wrong.

Abraham Glicksman

changing the old order

Bath, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: As an overseas reader, Prof. Hyman Levy [letter, The Nation, Oct. 31] deserves an answer to his inquiry: "What sort of people have you become . . . ?" The answer is we have merely readjusted our priorities. We still believe in "the pursuit of happiness, [civil] liberty and life"—in that order.

S. Drucker

Mr. Kostelanetz replies

New York City

DEAR SIRS: I am continually appalled that Oscar Handlin should allow his reputation to be exploited by organizations that win his allegiance; however, here his associates betray his trust, for his letter [The Nation, Oct. 31] is full of mistakes and falsifications. In fact, there were three (not two, as he says) Negro Fulbright scholars my year, and the third, who lived in Manchester, was considerably darker, which is to say less invisible, than the other two. Second, included in our contingent were several nonacademics, both by profession and personality; and my list of eccentrics, in context, exempli-

(Continued on page 580)

EDITORIALS

A Look Ahead

The President's recent visit to the hospital invites speculation about his political future. It goes without saying that everyone was glad to hear of the success of his two operations, although there was some adverse comment on the strange spectacle of the President of the United States surrounding himself with reporters and TV cameramen four hours after he came out of the anesthetic. But that is a matter of taste, which is scarcely Mr. Johnson's forte. His political future, on the other hand, is a matter of cardinal importance to the United States, and indeed to the whole world.

It would seem quite possible that the President may not be a candidate for re-election in 1968—not necessarily because of ill health, although that remains a possibility, but because he had decided to bow out rather than undertake a political campaign in which the odds were not in his favor. On more than one occasion Mr. Johnson has demonstrated what his friends might call political prudence; his enemies would term it political cowardice. Witness, for instance, his failure to come to the aid of Governor Brown in California. True, the attempt would probably have failed, but for that very reason an inveterate fighter like Harry Truman would have made it.

By present indications, Mr. Johnson has passed the zenith of his popularity. The Republican election victory, however qualified, shows that the tide has turned. Social progress in the United States must largely be financed henceforth with federal funds. State, county and city budget directors look to Washington for support in fighting poverty, air and water pollution, wretched housing, medical indigence and other stigmas of poverty in the midst of plenty. But federal funds are now flowing to Southeast Asia in a war which may not be over in 1968. Liberals will be tugging Mr. Johnson in one direction, conservatives in the other. It is no longer a question of the Great Society, but of maintaining any social progress at all. In such a relatively static situation a President can hope for little good will. As for past achievements, political gratitude is proverbially short-lived.

Should the President decide that his chances are poor against, say, a Romney-Javits or a Romney-Hatfield ticket, he might decide to leave while, from a historical standpoint, his name was still in good repute. But if he did thus resign himself to fate, he would in all likelihood do so late in the game and without advance notice. He would probably give "ill health" as the reason, making the exit as graceful as possible, and relinquishing power no sooner than he had to. The role of a lame-duck President would be particularly galling to a politician of Mr. Johnson's temperament.

Political prophecy is perilous at best, but we would venture to guess that a Romney-Hatfield ticket would give Hubert Humphrey a great deal of trouble if he should be the Democratic nominee. For another prospective nominee —Robert Kennedy—1968 would be too early. The wave that might sweep him into the Presidency is more likely to crest in 1972. These two aside, where are the possible

JAN 4
~~MAY~~

Democratic nominees for the two top offices? To ask the question is to point to one of the major weaknesses of the Democratic Party at this juncture. Just a few years ago, the Republicans were without new faces and stood in dire need of suitable candidates. Now the situation is almost exactly reversed.

An obvious possibility is that in 1968 Mr. Johnson might conclude that his one chance to win would be to tap Robert Kennedy as his running mate. Unthinkable? Not really. Franklin D. Roosevelt dropped Henry Wallace with a thud at a time when Wallace had as much popularity as Humphrey has now—probably more, because Wallace had a consistent record as a liberal, while Humphrey has lost much of his liberal support without making friends among conservatives. And a Johnson-Kennedy ticket would be no more incongruous than a Kennedy-Johnson ticket was in 1960. There was no love lost then, and there would be none lost now, but the idea is not unthinkable.

Hawks on the Wing

Secretary McNamara's press conferences rarely bode any good for the American people, but the latest such appearance, at the LBJ Ranch with Walt W. Rostow, Gen. Earle G. Wheeler and the President himself in the supporting cast, is pregnant with mischief beyond the ordinary. It forecasts a compromise on deployment of an ABM (anti-ballistic missile) system and, as a corollary, a revival of the dormant shelter program. Estimates of the capital cost of an ABM system range as high as $30 billion; shelters, if they are to provide the populace with meaningful protection against blast and fire, could easily account for another $30 billion. Once the barriers are down, the odds favor an early escalation to full-scale deployment of these "defensive" measures.

Money cost is not the most serious consequence of the anticipated decision. The prime casualties will be the current U.S.-USSR nuclear standoff and, eventually, the nuclear test ban. Sen. Henry M. Jackson began the assault on the latter when he took to the floor in the closing days of the 89th Congress to warn the Defense Atomic Support Agency to do nothing that might reduce U.S. capability to resume above-ground testing on short notice. Mr. Jackson is usually prescient in such matters.

The reason the test ban is in jeopardy is that all the ABM schemes are almost entirely based on theory, calculation and speculation. Before even a single operational battery can be designed and manufactured with any assurance that it will work, even partially, test firings will be required. To jettison the test ban and resume polluting the atmosphere will require a considerable public relations effort, but this can be powered by suitable depictions of the Red Chinese nuclear menace and the Soviet ABM menace. How effective the latter may become no one knows, neither the Russians nor ourselves, since their system will necessarily be experimental, just like ours. From a technical standpoint everything in this field is vague, but politically it offers great opportunities for hawks—not the little hawks of the Vietnamese War but big hawks who look forward to the ultimate nuclear showdowns, whether in great exchanges and world devastation or in new stalemates like

IN THIS ISSUE

November 28, 1966

EDITORIALS

562

ARTICLES

565 Indonesia:
Hope After Massacre
Alex Josey

Test Run for '68:
570 Blue Notes from Dixie
Paul Good

573 Mathematics of Consensus
Louis H. Bean

575 Too Soon for Peace
Sanford Gottlieb

578 Showdown on Vitamins
Ralph Lee Smith

BOOKS & THE ARTS

581 What Shall A Moral Man Do?
Christopher Lasch

586 Theatre
Harold Clurman

588 Art
Max Kozloff

589 Playing with Children (poem)
Seamus Finn

591 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor
MARION HESS
Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN
Art
MAX KOZLOFF
Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION
Volume 203
No. 18

the one between the U.S. and USSR which the ABM schemes threaten to upset.

Our plans are so nebulous that it is not even clear whether those finally selected will be designed to protect American population centers or only portions of the Minuteman complexes. That is one reason for the differing views regarding shelters. Another is that ICBMs of large caliber, say 50 megatons, might be used to set fire to large sections of countryside with high-altitude bursts beyond the range of defensive missiles. The hope is that fireproof shelters in metropolitan centers might reduce casualties from such catastrophes. It is only a hope. None of the ABM systems is capable of anything more than palliative action. McNamara's conjecture of 130 million United States casualties in a massive surprise attack might be halved, some researchers think. But this is only another of the big guesses which, in this realm, seem to be as effective as Hitler's big lies.

The ABM project is open-ended in all directions, including the design of future ICBM systems. Mr. McNamara has already forecast a complete refitting of the forty-one Polaris submarines to enable them to fire the upcoming Poseidon missile. Poseidon will have the same range as the A-3 Polaris but will offer about double the payload, and can thus carry a variety of penetration aids against an enemy ABM defense. Since the A-3 has a range of 2,500 nautical miles, there is little need for increased range. The distance from the Taiwan Strait to the farthest point of mainland China is 2,500 nautical miles.

The diverse attitudes of the services to the ABM reflect their several preoccupations. The Navy is indifferent: its interest is in nuclear carriers and submarines and the deployment of Poseidon will presumably satisfy it for the time being. The Air Force is intent on getting the big bomber. Only the Army is hot for the ABM and the trading within the Joint Chiefs of Staff has brought it within reach of success.

From the standpoint of domestic politics the ABM has a bright future. The 89th Congress forced on the Department of Defense $168 million beyond the amount requested for the Nike-X ABM development. This increment will not be spent, since in the current program there is nothing to spend it on. But now that the lid has been pried up further on the ABM, legislative hawks can count on years of patriotic activity, with most of the earlier inhibitions thrown off.

Double Discrimination

A November 15 AP dispatch from Jackson, Miss., tells of a suit filed in Federal District Court by the Lawyers Committee for Civil Rights under Law as a class action on behalf of a 20-year-old Negro civil rights leader, John Otis Sumrall. The complaint charges that as a result of personal intervention by the state Selective Service director, Col. James L. Davis, three criminal charges, all involving civil rights activities, against Sumrall were dismissed, thus clearing the way for his induction into the army. It is charged further that Sumrall is being inducted out of turn, as chastisement for his civil rights activities. The suit also seeks a court order to compel Gov. Paul B. Johnson, Jr., to appoint Negroes to draft boards in proportion to the composition of local populations, and to suspend all Selective Service operations until such time as this has been accomplished.

It would take some doing. At present, according to the complaint, not a single Negro is serving on any local board or appeal board in the state of Mississippi. If the federal court finds merit in the suit, an acute shortage of pliable Negroes might result. It is even possible that some Negroes who insist on justice to members of their race might, temporarily at least, find themselves on a draft board.

The present total absence of Negroes on these boards shows the racist character of Mississippi—not that a further demonstration was needed. The boards now serve in several capacities—coercive, punitive and exploitative. For short periods, during the harvest season, Negroes will be passed over by their draft boards so that they can work in the fields for white masters. Local draft boards are given such wide discretion, on the theory that they will exercise neighborly justice, that the grossest abuses may be perpetrated instead.

The situation in Mississippi is another argument for a checkup on the operation of the entire system. This will be a time-consuming process at best. In the meantime, should this suit be allowed to drag through the federal courts? Is the Commander in Chief of the armed forces powerless to cope with a moral outrage so glaring? And the Secretary of Defense? And the Director of Selective Service? Surely there is enough "white power" in Washington to correct an injustice to the whole Negro race. And if the power exists, why should there be reluctance to use it?

The Contagion of Corruption

From a two-month study by a group of reporters one learns that enormous sums of U. S.-appropriated funds disappear every year in Vietnam: through black marketing, theft, bribery, waste and currency manipulation. Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, on a morning stroll, notices luxury items from PX stores on sale in a section of Saigon known as PX Alley: champagne, Scotch, transistor radios, tape recorders, expensive cameras, and similar items. The Ambassador summons the police. Sirens wail and the culprits are soon picked up and carted off to the court where they pay their fines—100 per cent of the value of the goods. But payoffs are made immediately and the next day the same items are back in PX Alley—with the price advanced enough to cover the costs of the fines!

There is virtually no limit to this kind of corruption and no way of coping with it. William L. Ryan of the Associated Press, revisiting Saigon after an absence of some time, reports his impressions: ". . . an acute feeling of depression . . . [from the streets] a stench of garbage and refuse . . . peddlers everywhere pushing black-market goods . . . kids sleep everywhere . . . corruption has become a serious infection reaching far down the ladder." To Mr. Ryan the cause is clear: we have committed economic and social aggression against the Vietnamese. "The most affluent society in history descended on a poor and backward country. Along with the Americans came the signs of their wealth, in profusion: things the Vietnamese had never seen before. Corruption has been nothing new at the top in various regimes. Now it is spreading down the ladder. The temptation has been too great to resist. . . . American affluence has hit Saigon like a monsoon rain." While quibbling a bit over details in the AP report, senior officials of the U.S. aid mission concede that graft is rampant and that the Vietcong are among the beneficiaries. "As readily as any other Vietnamese," one official said, "the Vietcong can buy what's available in the economy. It's part of the bounty of this war." The recent reports confirm in abundant detail John McDermott's analysis of "welfare imperialism" in Vietnam which we published earlier this year (The Nation, July 25). It is not a pretty "image" that is being beamed back at us and time will not brighten it.

That Committee Again

The Nation of January 23, 1960, contained an article by John O'Kearney titled "The Lobby of a Million Ghosts." It was about "The Committee of One Million Against the Admission of Communist China to the United Nations," the brain child of Marvin Liebman, a New York publicist who has long busied himself with right-wing causes. The Nation's next reference to Liebman's pet organization was in Urban Whitaker's "China Lobby's New Gambit" (October 7, 1961). Whitaker pointed out that as of that year the committee had only 6,000 contributing members and printed only 25,000 to 35,000 copies of its brochures, so that the other 965,000 "members" had little knowledge of what "their" organization was up to.

At that juncture Liebman intended to reorganize into a "Committee Against U.S. Participation in the UN," thus aligning himself with one of the standard right-wing phobias. In 1962, however, the original name was on a mimeographed handout which came into the hands of Harry W. Ernst, a staff writer for the Charleston (W. Va.) Gazette. Now the Committee—or the indefatigable Liebman—was warning Adlai Stevenson that "continued American support of the UN would not be justified if its Charter is weakened and ultimately destroyed through the admission of representatives of the so-called People's Republic of China." Struck by the committee's new-found solicitude for the UN, Ernst rescued the manifesto from the wastebasket and his "Behind the Handout Curtain" appeared in The Nation of March 17, 1962. The handout listed 349 Senators and Representatives who were identified as "Congressional endorsers." W. E. Chilton III, publisher of the Gazette, queried fifty of the 349 who had reputations as liberals or moderates. Of the twenty-five who replied, only three said they believed the United States should abandon the UN if Communist China became a member.

Liebman is still operating at the old stand, however, and the committee, still a million strong on paper, produced the same well-worn arguments against Red China in a full-page advertisement in the October 31 New York Times. This time Liebman aroused the ire of Representatives Fernand J. St. Germain and John E. Fogarty of Rhode Island, whose names appeared in a list of fifty Senators and 282 Representatives ostensibly in agreement with Liebman's principles. In a long story in the Providence Evening Bulletin of November 5, Lewis W. Wolfson of the paper's Washington bureau noted that Sen. John O. Pastore was no longer listed: last November he had sent the Committee a "scathing denunciation" of its tactics. The Messrs. Pastore, St. Germain and Fogarty are not particularly in favor of admitting Communist China to the UN, but they are even less in favor of Liebman.

No doubt from time to time there will be other dropouts, but Mr. Liebman is no quitter. He is not only founder and secretary of the "Committee of One Million" but one of the founders of "Young Americans for Freedom," the "American Jewish League Against Communism," the "American Committee for Aid to Katanga Freedom Fighters" and other groups which are working with might and main to save the U.S. from communism, broadly defined. He is also allied with Dr. Fred C. Schwartz's "Christian Anti-Communist Crusade." He once said, "If there is a China Lobby, we (the 'Committee of One Million') are it." A less modest man would have said, "I am it."

INDONESIA

HOPE AFTER MASSACRE

ALEX JOSEY

Mr. Josey has been a free-lance correspondent in the Far East for the past eighteen years. He is the author of Socialism in Asia and Trade Unions in Malaya.

Singapore

I recently visited Jakarta again for the first time since 1962. On my previous stay, I was there, by chance, when Sheik Azahari staged his abortive coup in Brunei on the island of Borneo. That morning I had been to see D. N. Aidit, leader of the Partai Kommunist Indonesia (PKI). We had been meeting for years. As usual, I brought with me a pile of anti-Communist books, mostly American, which he had asked me to buy for him in Singapore. Aidit was a keen student of anti-Communist books. In exchange, he gave me signed copies of his own books and pamphlets. He was a prolific writer. We drank coffee in his office (adorned with a big bust of Stalin), chewed peanuts and gossiped. Aidit told me that party membership had risen above 3 million. He said some generals in the army were trying to whip up feeling against the PKI: they were, he said, trying to produce an anti-Communist hysteria by accusing the PKI of plotting to capture the government by force. Aidit denied this. "We have no such plans. We don't need them. . . . We are prepared to tolerate insults and threats. We will not be provoked. If the army spits in our faces we will wipe it off and smile. We will not retaliate. Time is on our side. We shall win without a struggle. We will go along with Sukarno's guided democracy. That suits us fine." I asked him if I could quote him. Aidit said I should not quote him direct. Then he added, after thought: "Why not?" I said I would particularly like to use the phrase about taking all the insults. He threw more peanuts into his mouth and said: "Go ahead. It's true."

When I left Aidit that morning I expected to call upon him again in a couple of months, but a few weeks later the soldiers shot him dead. In Jakarta, a general told me Aidit was shot trying to escape, after signing a confession in which he took sole responsibility for organizing the abortive coup. The general smiled when he said: "trying to escape."

After that final meeting with Aidit, I had gone to another suburb to meet some Socialist friends. I was with them when Radio Jakarta broadcast the news of Azahari's uprising in Brunei. Now, four years later, they were broadcasting the trial of Dr. Subandrio, the former foreign minister. Direct from the court, the questions and answers went on for hours. People listened for sensational revelations which never came, and the general feeling seemed to be that this was a dull affair, a heavy-handed effort to cloak political murder with legality. "Much better to have shot him out of hand, like Aidit," was the consensus among the people with whom I spoke. One of the generals disagreed. "Subandrio must die because of his complicity in the abortive coup. We have staged this trial, and broadcast the proceedings throughout the country, because we want to damage Sukarno's image. In effect, Sukarno himself is on trial and, in a Javanese way, in what you would call a devious way, the people will understand this."

Physically, Jakarta had not changed much in four years. It still took me longer to get out of the airport, through passport control, immigration and customs, than it did to fly from Singapore to Jakarta. The airport building was under repair, the place was half dark, and there were muddy pools. But, unlike my last reception there, I was treated well. Most officials were in army uniform, but this time there was no shoving about, no rude demands to open this bag or that, no audacious stealing of watches or rings: everyone was friendly and helpful. Arms akimbo, the customs officer did no more than raise an interrogative eyebrow, and, when I shook my head, he smiled and waved me through. What had taken all the time was the minute inspection of every traveler's passport.

Hotel Indonesia had a small bus waiting outside in the dark. All of us, Japanese, Dutch, American, a few Indonesians (heavily loaded with presents) scrambled in. There were few street lights, and heavy rain added to the gloom; the streets to the hotel were awash. I thought the roads felt to be in better condition than they had been four years ago, hardly any potholes. (After an intensive week of traveling over Jakarta roads I came to the conclusion that some were much better than others.)

Soon after I was smoothly and efficiently booked into the hotel, the power failed in that part of the city, and the hotel's emergency lighting came on automatically. There were four power failures during the week I was in Jakarta; none lasted longer than ten minutes. This is a great improvement over 1962, although I was told that the failures in other parts of the city were much more frequent, and that sometimes residential areas were without water. While I was there the governor of the city issued a warning that excessive rain had fouled the water supply with sewage. Most guests in the hotel preferred to drink coffee, at 30c a cup (four times the price in Singapore).

There seemed to be more automobiles in Jakarta now than four years ago. Indonesian petrol is the cheapest (some say the worst) in the world; but cars are not cheap; and yet officials told me that there are close to half a million of them running through Jakarta's streets (sometimes four abreast down the busiest streets, causing fantastic traffic jams), and the majority appear to be large and in good condition. Every visitor is puzzled to understand who can afford them. Or, for that matter, who can afford to be sick, since the price of some medicines has gone up 500 per cent in two years. Certain other commodities and goods have gone up 1,500 per cent.

Wages for everybody, including army officers, are still miserably low. Fortunately, Indonesia's civil service (reputed to be easily the largest in the world) and, of course, the armed forces (about 450,000) get a subsidized rice ration, and in the rural areas the peasants grow their own food. Police Brigadier General Dr. Awaluddin Djamin, minister for manpower, reckons that 71 per cent of Indonesia's working population (there has been no census for years, but it is probably in the neighborhood of 23 million) is in agriculture, and 29 per cent in industry. He admits that there are 13 million unemployed or underemployed in Indonesia, and 1.3 million job seekers are coming into the labor market each year. The Central Bureau of Statistics gives out that the population now stands at 109.5 million. If the labor estimates are reasonably accurate, there are tremendously more workless than workers in Indonesia. Officials admit that the tin mines produce a quarter of their 1958 output. Industry is running at between 15 to 20 per cent of capacity.

These statistics underline Indonesia's grim economic position. But the situation is not evident in the air-conditioned Hotel Indonesia, where you must pay for your rooms in American dollars or other hard currency (Indonesia must be the only nation in the world which rejects its own currency). Hotel officials tell tourists now trickling in from the United States, Japan and Thailand that they can buy anything at Sarinah, the state-run skyscraper wonder store, five minutes away. Not all its twenty floors are yet open; they may not be for some time, for although there is indeed an almost embarrassing selection of foreign-made luxury goods (mostly from Japan), hardly any Indonesian can afford to buy anything. In the basement one can get Indonesian food (as well as Irish stout and Coca-Cola in tins: there is little difference in price), and on the second floor there are textiles from Japan and India, as well as locally made stuff. Both the basement and the second floor do a reasonable business. Jostling crowds of men, women and children, and soldiers with guns, swarm through the other floors as well, riding joyfully up and down Indonesia's first shop escalators (carefully guarded by neatly dressed, attractive, patient girls who help old ladies on and off and shoo away the children). They gaze at the expensive cameras, the beauty preparations, the matched luggage, the tape recorders, the furniture, and they marvel. They buy nothing. Sarinah is another monument to Sukarno's stupidity; it may have contributed to his downfall, for its mocking showcases remind Indonesians how far their own standard of living lags behind that of the citizens in other modern states.

A factor new since my previous visit was the urban Indonesian's attitude toward the Chinese merchants and technicians, still largely responsible for the city's economy, especially the private sector which includes the distribution of consumer goods. The tolerance of the past has been replaced by an active hostility encouraged by the authorities. You can almost smell the racism. The Chinese are afraid, and with good cause. They are blamed for increasing prices and short supplies. "They are more rapacious, the Chinese capitalists in Indonesia, than were the colonial capitalists," growled Adam Malik, the present foreign minister, on a visit to Tokyo. This sort of talk, constantly repeated, has established the official line against the Chinese minority.

Once the Chinese numbered about 3 million in Indonesia. Now Malik talks about a million and a half Chinese, who, he says, constitute a problem because only 80,000 of them can be persuaded to go home to China—a home they do not know, most of them, since they were born in Indonesia. In the week that I was there, 10,000 Chinese left for China in a ship sent by Peking. They took with them little more than the clothes they wore. Thousands were left behind on the dockside to wait for another ship. Malik complained that under the Dutch the Chinese received "all the facilities, all the opportunities," to exploit Indonesia. He said they had been allowed special rights, such as their own schools, their own newspapers. General Suharto, head of the junta that took over control of the government from Sukarno, had stopped all that. No longer would Indonesia allow the Chinese "special advantages in banking and trade." Neither Malik nor anyone else has explained what these so-called special advantages were. The truth is that the Chinese has a greater aptitude for business than the leisure-loving Indonesian. Removal of the Chinese from the local economic scene will not by itself transform the Indonesian into a go-getter. This was proved years ago when the army brutally rooted out all the Chinese shopkeepers and merchants from the rural areas. The rural economy almost collapsed, and it has never recovered in spite of all the promises, no doubt sincerely made, that the army would provide the peasants with co-operatives.

For centuries the Chinese enriched themselves in Indonesia, but they also organized an economy. Now Indonesia, like other emergent states in Asia, feels the strong winds of nationalism, and wishes to be rid of everything that can be associated with colonialism, damaging though this clean sweep may be to the nation's economic well-being.

General Suharto has said that Indonesia's efforts to absorb the Chinese have failed because of China's influence. The charge is dubious because Chinese rarely assimilate in any foreign country. But now General Suharto wants to get rid of them all, and it is difficult to see how they can remain in the face of what amounts to national opposition. At the airport I saw a dozen Chinese men, women and children, all of them wearing Mao Tse-tung-type uniforms. Traders who had accepted the inevitable, they were dressed for reception in Peking, where Red Guards are waiting to pounce upon returned Chinese wearing bourgeois Western clothing.

When you talk to government servants, and also to the military, in Jakarta, they tell you that things are not too bad. They insist that the military command has never been more unified, that the army, marines, navy, air force and police are working together. They deny that war lordism survives anywhere. They say that General Suharto can, and has, put his own commanders in sensitive places. And this, they point out, includes Central and East Java, traditionally pro-Sukarno regions. They admit that the economy is chaotic, that the people cannot afford such essential commodities as rice, frying oil, salt fish, vegetables and sugar, but they speak with confidence of new methods, reorganization, massive foreign aid.

Indonesians, in the mass, are easygoing. Adam Malik told them frankly that their foreign debts were enormous (approximately $3,000 million, costing about $500 million a year in interest), but they were, he said, insignificant compared to the nation's natural resources. "Indonesia has diamonds, oil, copper, uranium," Malik said, "and these resources can be developed through cooperation with foreign investors." Malik spoke the truth. Indonesia is potentially one of the richest nations on earth, with black volcanic soil on some islands capable of producing a wealth of agriculture hard to imagine. Can the Indonesians be organized to turn all this treasure into monetary terms, and a higher general standard of living? General Suharto must solve the economic situation and, at the same time, he must balance the conflicting power forces in order to achieve a measure of political stability. He must contain Sukarno while making use of Sukarno's unquestioned popularity in the rural areas. He must placate the students and watch the activities of the political parties. Even more important, he must be on guard lest factions within the armed forces cooperate to overthrow him. He must treat the Left with solicitude, while not offending the anti-Left Muslims. President Sukarno, master intriguer, could juggle these forces to his own advantage. Suharto has yet to be tested fully, but he is making certain careful moves.

Suharto and General Nasution worked with the students at the start to bring down Sukarno. That having been achieved, they suddenly slapped down the students and the organized children when these attempted to insist that Sukarno should be tried. The army wants to keep Sukarno as a constitutional President. He is a most useful scapegoat; beyond that, he knows too much to be subjected to public trial. KAMI (Indonesian Students Action Command), claiming to represent 80 per cent of Indonesia's 300,000 university students, and KAPPI (United Indonesian Students Action Council), with a membership of half a million high school children, demanded to know why Sukarno was with Aidit and other plotters at Halim Air Base, headquarters of the abortive coup, during the critical hours of October 1. Suharto had already asked this question and Sukarno had explained: "I was of the opinion that the best place for me was near an aircraft which could transport me at any moment to another place if anything which was not expected took place." In Tokyo, Malik told the Indonesian community: "We accept that explanation." Then he went on to blame Sukarno for lack of action immediately after the coup had failed and the wanton killings began. Why did Sukarno remain silent? For three days he did not speak, and when he did it was not to condemn "PKI treachery which killed six generals in one night in an atrocious manner. There was unrest because of the President's indecision. Chaos followed, causing the death of hundreds of thousands." Malik said that the PKI began killing nationalists and members of religious groups after the collapse of the coup, and that savage retaliation followed.

By now, the generals claim they can account for at least 60 per cent of the known PKI leadership. Most of them are dead; the rest are in jail. Gen. Sugeh Arto, the attorney general, told me there were probably 120,000 Communist suspects in jail, in addition to 800 suspects in the armed forces. He hopes they will be sorted out by the end of December and those against whom evidence is available will be tried. The general agreed with me that counting the dead and the suspects, the total would come to about a quarter of a million. If we accept as even approximately accurate Aidit's claim that there were 3 million Communists in Indonesia (including about 110,000 in the armed forces), many are still unaccounted for. Gen. Sugeh Arto believes the PKI has an underground setup, but thinks that given reasonable economic and political progress, the Communists will never again be a threat in any part of Indonesia.

The generals know they must move carefully. Sukarno has mass support, unorganized but potentially powerful, especially among the religious peasants. To reassure the population of Sumatra, commanders of the armed services issued a joint statement promising they would follow Sukarno's leadership as long as he obeyed the People's Congress. Similar statements have been put out elsewhere. The PNI, Sukarno's old political party, is not without support in the ranks of the army, and in Indonesia's colossal civil service. The generals see no virtue in stirring up serious discontent by ousting Sukarno. They say they want to create a new order, based upon democracy. They want a government made up mostly of elected representatives of the people, but including also representatives of the armed forces, regional groups and functional groups. How this is to be made ready before July, 1968, when the army has promised general elections, provokes a great deal of discussion among generals and politicians.

What seemed to me particularly significant was the lifting of the ban on the Murba Party when Malik was in Moscow discussing Indonesia's debt and the possibility of aid. This could have been a coincidence, but the Murba was founded by a Communist, Tan Malaka, who was earlier a founder of the Partai Kommunist Indonesia. It was a nationalist, as distinct from a Cominform-affiliated, Communist party. Both Adam Malik and Tan Malaka were tossed into jail by Sukarno in 1946 when they tried to capture power. This was the first abortive Communist coup. A year later, Tan Malaka, still scheming, was shot dead by pro-Sukarno soldiers. Sukarni, the original chairman of the Murba, is still in office. After the removal of the ban, he said that Murba stood for a just and prosperous society based on Pantjasila (nationalism, religion and socialism). It opposed foreign investment in Indonesia, though it would "tolerate" joint ventures; supported General Suharto's cabinet, but opposed liberalism in political and economic affairs. It condemned United States aggression in Vietnam, and "could not justify China's intervention in Indonesia's internal affairs," approved peaceful coexistence among nations with different social systems, and strongly opposed any kind of racism.

Leaders of the still banned Partai Sosialis Indonesia told me they were prepared to become part of Murba's "mobilization of all Pantjasila forces of socialism," and that they would accept Adam Malik's guidance and leadership. They believed that, with Malik's prestige and influence behind it, Murba could become important in Indonesian political affairs, filling the vacuum created by the disappearance of the PKI. Until now, the Socialist movement in Indonesia has been restricted to an intellectual group and has lacked mass following. Murba was also an intellectual organization. To become a factor in political affairs, to compete with the two Muslim parties, the PNI (Nationalists), and the Masjumi (still banned), Murba and the PSI combined might now attract thousands of disillusioned leftists stranded by the demise of the PKI.

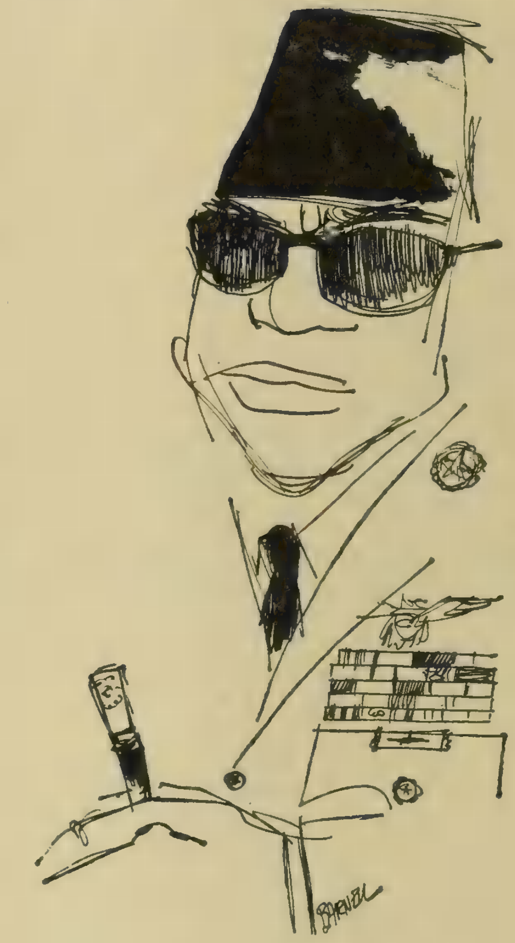
This may be the intention of Adam Malik and General Suharto, though care would have to be taken to prevent PKI elements from taking over. By creating a respectable, controllable Left, Indonesia's new rulers could balance the pressure and influence of the Moslem parties, and thus retain the national balance which history may judge to be Sukarno's only worth-while achievement in twenty Presidential years.

Did Aidit die? The army, "for security reasons," has never issued a statement giving details of his death. There is, however, persuasive evidence that he was shot in the early hours of November 22, 1965. What I find much more difficult to accept is the confession which was printed in extract in the Asahi Evening News of February 10, 1966. I can never believe that the Aidit I knew for nearly a decade would write a confession accepting full responsibility for organizing an armed coup without explaining why he had been prepared to use force to bring about something which for years he was absolutely confident could be achieved peacefully.

As I read the Asahi Evening News version of the confession I could not help recalling Adam Malik's admission that a good many people were reluctant to believe that the plot which led to the murder of the six generals and the subsequent massacre was in fact Communist inspired. What really happened, a cynical British journalist told me with a grim disbelieving smile, was that the generals became fed up with saber rattling against Malaysia, since it was depressing the nation's economy and most seriously affecting their sales of copra, rubber and tin. Many colonels, accustomed to getting a rake-off on the commerce, were becoming restless. They argued with Sukarno, but he was adamant and threatened to demote officers not carrying out his instructions to invade Malaysia with guerrillas. So the military formed the Council of Generals, but not without the knowledge of Sukarno who saw a chance to rid himself of unfriendly generals and replace them with stooges.

Sukarno passed word of the brewing conspiracy on to the Communists. Aidit at once realized that if the Council of Generals toppled Sukarno the Communists would also catch it in the neck. He had no alternative but to make the first strike. Sukarno, meanwhile, made the usual private reservations: if the coup was successful he would go along with it. Here was a chance for him to become the head, perhaps the reluctant Moslem head, of a Communist state, which was what he had always wanted to be. If the plot failed he would, of course, condemn it. Aidit struck, and the army walloped him smartly. Half a million people lost their lives, and Sukarno slunk back home.

If that is not exactly what happened, it is the most plausible reconstruction to be offered thus far. We may never know the truth. What we do know is that the PKI leadership is smashed, Sukarno is contained, confrontation with Malaysia has ended, and trade is starting up again with Malaysia and Singapore. The army is in control, and could be for a long time, in spite of talks about elections. Sukarno appears to be accepting his new status, but he is the most experienced Indonesian politician of all and knows how quickly power in Indonesia can change hands. The generals know it too.



Sukarno

Other questions which may never be answered are whether Peking was directly involved in the plot, or whether the United States in any way influenced the students' agitation against Sukarno. From inquiries I made in Jakarta, I concluded that there is no real evidence that Peking on this occasion departed from its basic policy of limiting its encouragement of local Communist movements to words of advice. At his trial, Subandrio did admit that Peking agreed, in talks between the two governments, to supply Indonesia with a quantity of small arms. But even if Subandrio was in the thick of the plot, that hardly points to Peking as a co-plotter. An Indonesian Foreign Office official testified that during the flight back from Peking Subandrio gave him certain instructions about the final destination of the small arms, but the Chinese may have known nothing of that.

As for the students' demonstrations, for two years and more Sukarno's "to hell with you" policy toward the United States and Britain had, perhaps fortunately, made it difficult, if not impossible, for those countries to intervene, however subtly, in Indonesian affairs. I believe recent developments, ranging from the abortive coup to Sukarno's containment and Suharto's rise to power, were entirely Indonesian affairs. Indonesia was shaken, in my view, by an old-fashioned battle for succession, rather than by an ideological clash. Sukarno's reported ill health brought the contending groups abruptly into collision.

As I flew back to the efficiency, the modern comfort and the comparative security of Singapore, I tried to imagine what role Indonesia could be expected to play in Asian affairs in the foreseeable future. This country of 100 million people is potentially among the richest in the world, but it is encumbered with a run-down, state-controlled economy, with between 2 million and 5 million civil servants (nobody really knows), and with more than half a million in its armed forces. It desperately seeks a domestic political formula and economic sanity. If there is to be progress in these fields, the generals and the politicians will have their hands full for some time to come. Relations with China will probably deteriorate; those with the Soviet Union and the West, including the United States, will most likely improve; Japan will move much closer. The non-Communist world may be relieved that Indonesia has been rescued, on the brink, from communism. And, by now, thanks to Radio Jakarta and the controlled papers, most Indonesians may share this view without knowing exactly why. But the truth is that the abortive coup, whatever it was, the awful massacres, Sukarno's containment and the new army regime have left Indonesia very much as it was before. With, however, one important difference: there now is hope.

TEST RUN FOR '68

Blue Notes from Dixie

PAUL GOOD

Mr. Good is a free-lance writer who specializes in reporting political and social events in the South.

The South has taken another turn for the worse: The Republican Party failed to crack the mono-politics of the solid South; the Negro voter had no place to turn, and George Wallace is leering at the White House over the shoulder of his bewildered wife.

In the welter of post-election statistics and analyses, it is clear that racism won the ballot of a majority of white voters. The hope that a nascent two-party system would provide Negroes and white progressives with an alternative to habitual Democratic recidivism died in the polling booths. Sometimes considerable Republican gains—particularly on the state legislative level in places like South Carolina—were applauded as if the appearance of a second party were a creative political achievement without reference to what the party was doing. But with the qualified exceptions of Republican Winthrop Rockefeller as Arkansas governor and Howard Baker as the new Senator from Tennessee, most GOP candidates tried to out-seg the Democratic segs.

The elections underscored the limitations on the Southern Negro vote, which generally found itself forced to choose between the lesser of two considerable evils if it wanted to count at all. That has been the history of the Southern black vote when it was minuscule—scurrying around like a poor cousin, trying to find some rich protector it could trust. Most ominously, George Wallace—thanks to the smashing victory of his governess—has established himself as a force capable of creating incalculable rightist mischief on a national scale in 1968.

Despite the Republican callowness, the indecisive Negro vote and the saga-to-be-completed of the Wallaces, optimists take comfort from the fact that Rockefeller, a mild segregationist, climbed victorious from the muck of racism and personal vilification that Democrat Jim Johnson shoveled against him. "Moderate" South Carolina Democratic Gov. Robert McNair beat immoderate Republican Joseph Rogers (Dixiecrat-turned-Republican Sen. Strom Thurmond and Negro-baiting GOP Congressman Albert Watson also won in South Carolina).

Tennessee was a mixed bag, with both Senatorial candidates courting the Negro vote, though what they would do for Negroes if elected was left vague. A screaming GOP reactionary, Dan Kuykendall, was elected to Congress and other Republican victories smudged any image of triumph for party moderation, to say nothing of liberalism.

Finally, in Macon County, Ala., Lucius Amerson became the first black sheriff in the South since Reconstruction and possibly the only one in the entire Republic. This occurred, it must be noted, in a county where voting-age Negroes outnumber whites four to one, and registered Negroes hold a numerical edge of 2,000 despite 175 per cent white registration. The county is the home of Tuskegee Institute and unique in the Black Belt. But Negroes must be grateful for small gifts.

Against these pale encouragements were unanimously reactionary results in Georgia, the rest of Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi and Florida. Texas options were so slight that most liberals went fishing rather than vote for Democrat Waggoner Carr in his losing effort against conservative Republican John Tower. Black power, applied politically, failed in its first challenge to the murderous white supremacy of Lowndes County, Ala., and the Mississippi Freedom Party candidates were suffocated by bipartisan racism.

Elsewhere in America, these results would assume the color of a disaster for democracy. For the South, they are seen as tolerable, though of course lamentable. This is partly because of the confusion over images and labels. Segregation has become increasingly sophisticated in Dixie; politicians are adapting to the waning provincialism and waxing urbanism of most constituents. The national observer is so relieved to be spared a gallus-snapping reincarnation of Bilbo or Gene Talmadge "cussin' out niggers" that he is less repelled by a new breed of bigot—one who opposes civil rights advance, and champions the "Nigra" status quo, but is labeled "moderate" because he condemns the K.K.K. and lynching.

Even an occasional anachronism with the ax-handle mentality of Georgia's would-be governor, Lester Maddox, presents an urbane front. He offered a platform of help to the aged and of keeping the schools open in cooperation with federal decree that might have been denounced as socialistic twenty years ago. And he managed to go through an entire campaign stressing program and rarely alluding to race. Everybody pushes program in the new South; one-note racism is passé.

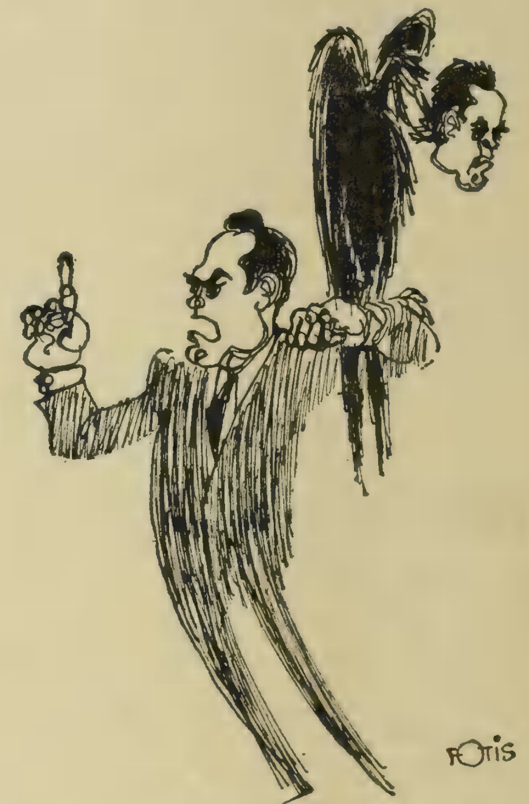
Writing of unfortunate racist political trends before the election, University of Mississippi Law Prof. Michael Horowitz noted:

> More subtle and dangerous, is the growth of the Chamber-of-Commerce Babbittry for which the Republican Party speaks. The button-down, dispassionate, country-club racism of the nouveau riche, whose dominant sense of the political process is that no one ought to take away the money they have made too quickly and too easily, is the politics of the Republican Party.

This realistic appraisal is a far cry from the hopes expressed before the election by the Republicans for Progress, a Washington-based group striving to excise segregation from the party. "It is urgent," the organization said, "that the Republican Party seize its opportunity and rally responsible Southerners to fight for the leadership of a New South. If it demonstrates courage and leadership now when the future of the American South appears to hang in the balance, the Republican Party can expect to command the respect and allegiance of the new generation of Southern voters."

That is well put, but unfortunately, the opportunity to create a second party in the South sprang from the worst Southern motivations. In 1964, whites voting with almost blind fury against the Johnson Administration and its Civil Rights Act carried Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina for Barry Goldwater. All five states elected Republican Congressmen, some for the first time since Reconstruction, but moderate Republicans (whatever they are) who had long nurtured dreams that the party of Lincoln might attract Negroes, were brutally shoved aside. They had not been doing much anyway.

By 1966, Negro registration in the eleven Southern states had risen to more than 2,600,000. This was something less than formidable compared with 14,300,000 whites. However, Republicans favoring civil rights hoped this potential bloc would be attractive enough to induce Southern GOP leaders to offer Negroes more than dreary, old-line Democratic rejection. But men like Alabama's John Grenier, who ran the Goldwater Southern campaign, were firmly in the saddle and convinced that a repeat of 1964 would win again. Basically, he was right, although the Democrats outflanked him.



Southern defiance of civil rights, Grenier saw, was running as strong as ever. And in 1966 an important factor had been added—supporting sentiment from the rest of the nation. The social seismographs of Democrats and Republicans alike were responding to rumbles throughoutout the United States. Northern indifference had sealed the Negroes' fate after Reconstruction, and Southern segregationists sensed the same opportunity in the backlash.

The spirit of intransigence took heart when the Administration reacted lackadaisically to the brutal gas attack on Meredith marchers in Canton, Miss. It was cheered when the Mayor of Waukegan, Ill., went on television to denounce Negro rioters in his segregated enclave as "scum" and "savages." The Saturday Evening Post editorialized that the White House was devoting an "inordinate amount of time" to Negro problems, but no time-study charts were offered. The most substantial evidence that defiance of civil rights was going places in 1966 and thereafter was the treatment accorded Education Commissioner Harold Howe II.

Less than 10 per cent of Southern schools are integrated, with considerable tokenism included in this figure. Howe reasoned that twelve years after the Supreme Court reached a decision, a law should mean something or become meaningless.

"I have the feeling," he said, "that those of us who think of ourselves as gentlemen should either stop pretending that we care about racial equality or we should step down from our air-conditioned podiums and start something definite in the way of a program."

Howe tightened up the slipshod guidelines. Eventually, funds would be withheld from only seventy-four of 1,800 Southern school districts. But Howe came under ungentlemanly fire from both sides of the Mason-Dixon line. South Carolina Democrat Mendel Rivers called him a "misfit . . . an idiot . . . this man talks like a Communist." Rep. Paul Fino, a Bronx Republican courting backlash, whose only previous claim to legislative fame was backing a federal lottery, said that Howe was a "socialized quack." Nobody came to Howe's defense. One day, Majority Leader Mike Mansfield said that Education was pushing too fast; next day he said it was going too slow.

On October 9, The New York Times cited "erosion" of enforcement provisions in Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act (prohibiting discrimination in federally assisted programs). The story said that Congressional chipping away was to blame. "Now when we call on Southern school officials for compliance," said an Office of Education official, "they just laugh at us. They feel they have the rest of the country on their side now."

This was the key, establishing the climate of the Southern elections, the plausibility of defiance. But Republican Goldwaterites generally could not capitalize on it because even "moderate" Democrats ran as if President Johnson and the Great Society (Negro aid) were figments of someone's diseased imagination.

In Alabama, GOP Rep. James D. Martin was emboldened to compete against Mr. and Mrs. Wallace for governor, and was swamped. Grenier took on Democratic Sen. John Sparkman, who is despised by Wallace and not much loved by anyone else, but whose contributions to the state and Senatorial seniority are widely respected. With the help of the Wallace landslide, Sparkman won easily. The Republican Party in Alabama may have suffered a mortal wound.

In Mississippi, the GOP rebuffed Negroes and ran Rep. Prentiss Walker (a Goldwater creation) against Sen. James Eastland of Sunflower County. A Negro protest vote for Freedom Party candidate, Rev. Clifton Whitly, gathered only 27,000 votes, although 140,000 Negroes are registered in the state. The result was a Democratic sweep and further entrenchment of die-hard segregation, with Ross Barnett of Meredith-at-the-University fame probably returning to the governorship next year.

Georgia politics have been described as "never dull and sometimes downright hilarious." The tragi-comic result of the 1966 election is ample proof of the truth in jest and an example of how the two-party system has misfired in the Deep South. Ax-handler Maddox finished in a dead heat for governor with Goldwaterite Rep. Harold "Bo" Callaway. This was fitting. Voters were offered little except a difference in style and class between the two. Lester was a po' boy become rich. Callaway, in the words of a rural Maddox booster, was a millionaire from the moment the doctor "first slapped him on his butt." He is also a West Point graduate whose voting record in Congress shows him completely at home in the 19th century.

But Negroes are losers whether he or Maddox is eventually declared winner in the tangled election aftermath. The only election alternative Georgia blacks had was to join the write-in campaign for former Gov. Ellis Arnall. Even if Arnall had won by some miracle, significant Negro advances could not have been gained with a "moderate" white administration psychologically unable to think in terms of the drastic effort needed to bring Negroes fully and equally into Southern society.

Florida offers an example of Republican bankruptcy in the South. Businessman Claude Kirk, Jr., capitalized on backlash and the alarm cry of organized crime to defeat liberal Democratic Miami Mayor Robert High. The most reactionary Democratic elements campaigned for Kirk. Toward the end of his campaign, he borrowed a racist slogan from Maryland gubernatorial candidate, George Mahoney, to put him over the top: Your Home Is Your Castle.

This, of course, was an attack on open housing and shorthand for everything else racial. It was the one note sounded by Mahoney, who had the white middle-class Maryland vote and probably lost because he did not realize that the Compleat Segregationist today must also present a Program. Mahoney's note fitted Kirk's Babbitt medley and he won in a state where the potent Negro vote (second in percentage only to Tennessee) had beat back Goldwater in 1964.

This helps define what the black vote can and cannot do. Southern politicians made dire predictions about a Black Wave after the 1965 Voting Act was passed. But an examination of statistics tells a different story.

In the five Deep South states of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, Louisiana and South Carolina, Negroes have a potential voting majority in only sixty-five of 418 counties. Presently, and despite intensive campaigns that have tailed off, Negro registrants are in a majority in only twelve of those sixty-five counties. The majority is often a bare one. By contrast, there are thirty-six counties in Alabama alone where white registration is far in excess of white eligibles. Ghostly hands vote white supremacy. And the county level is where control is exerted over homely but vital facts of life like school boards, law enforcement and road paving.

Before the elections, the Southern Regional Council made public progress accounts of its Voter Education Project. Here is a typical field report from a county in central Georgia: "We registered 649 people and have a list of 862 who were not able to register due to fear of losing their jobs, or causing their parents or members of their families to lose theirs. Some are afraid of the Ku Klux Klan."

Results of this kind of intimidation showed up in places like Lowndes County, Ala., during the elections. Mrs. Viola Liuzzo and seminarian Jonathan Daniels were murdered in Lowndes and their slayers were freed—once by a black-white jury. While voting-age Negroes outnumber whites 5,122 to 1,900, a better than 100 per cent white registration gives the races an almost equal number of registered voters—around 2,800 each. On November 8, the independent Lowndes County Freedom Organization, popularly called the Black Panther Party because of its emblem, ran seven candidates for offices ranging from sheriff to tax assessor (an extremely important post in Lowndes and elsewhere, since undertaxed white landowners get away with fiscal murder at the expense of minimal service to Negroes and poor whites). All the Black Panther candidates lost by an average of 600 votes. The county has a hard core of Uncle Toms that the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee numbers in the neighborhood of 350. Add to these the victims of fear and some idea emerges of the difficulties inherent in creating a meaningful black rural vote.

The problem is intensified by two other factors: diminish-

MATHEMATICS OF CONSENSUS

LOUIS H. BEAN

Mr. Bean, a political and economic analyst, is the author of How To Predict Elections. He has been economic adviser to the United States Department of Agriculture.

Why did the Democrats lose ground in the 1966 elections? Can the Republicans now count on taking over the White House in 1968?

As to the reasons for the Democratic losses, you can, by proper selection, point to one or more that fit your judgment. Do you think the Vietnamese War swayed the election? Look at Hatfield's victory in Oregon. Were the race issue, riots, backlash determining? See Reagan's victory in California. Did the farmers turn thumbs down on President Johnson and Secretary Freeman? The Republicans made notable gains in the Midwest. Were youthful faces preferred over age and experience? See Percy vs. Douglas in Illinois. Was there general revolt against government spending, taxes, the Great Society programs? Just look at the forty-seven House seats and the eight governorships the Republicans won. Perhaps it was chiefly a matter of family name, since three Rockefellers (two Republicans and one Democrat), young Taft and young Stevenson were victorious. You can of course find instances that point to just the opposite conclusion.

To get at the central features of this election and its meaning for 1968, one must compare the results with what should normally have happened. It then appears to have been neither a Democratic calamity nor a momentous GOP victory leading straight to a Republican White House in 1968.

The prospects for 1966 pointed to more than normal midterm losses in the House, and by normal I mean the number of seats, twenty-five to thirty, that the party in power tends to lose, in midterm years, because the President's coattail influence is absent. Why should one have expected losses to exceed this number?

(1) The falling off in voter turn-out I expected to be about 10 million, from 66 million voters for Congressmen in 1964 to about 56 million in 1966 (UPI, November 10, said the vote was near 56 million). Most of this drop was to be on the Democratic side, not merely because the Democrats were in power but because about 2.5 million Republicans had stayed home in 1964, not wanting to vote for Goldwater. This pointed to a drop in the Democratic share of the vote for Congressmen from 57.5 per cent in 1964 to 53.5 per cent in 1966. (It was probably 52.5 per cent.)

(2) While pollsters say that it is not possible to translate a change in the percentage of the popular vote into a change in the number of seats, my formula says that for every percentage point there is a shift of nine to ten seats. The prospect for 1966 was therefore a Democratic loss of thirty-six to forty seats, about ten more than normal. (The actual loss, forty-seven seats, is therefore about twenty more than normal.)

(3) There were across the country about sixty districts where Democrats had won in 1964 with less than 55 per cent of the vote. Of these nearly forty, or two-thirds, had been Republican in the two or three elections prior to 1964, and were therefore most likely to elect Republicans in 1966, merely as a result of midterm apathy and the absence of Goldwater (more than 60 per cent of the Republican House gains occurred in the marginal districts).

(4) Geographically, the 1964 marginal districts were concentrated in the Middle West, with some in the Northeast and some in the Far West, and a few in the South. And for the most part these marginal districts were rural, not metropolitan (and it was here that the Republicans made most of their comeback).

The actual results thus conform closely to expectations, as to the size of the vote, the geographical distribution of the Republican gains, and even the total number of seats gained.

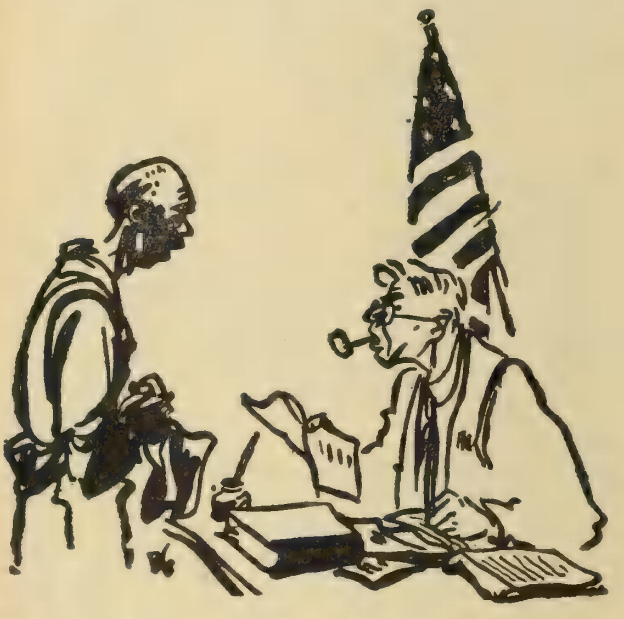
If looking at the election results in this statistical way makes sense, then the real question to be answered is what significance have issues, personalities, campaign expenditures, public relations operations, television exposure? If thirty-six to forty seats were destined to go Republican anyway, we are left with only about ten seats to be explained by all of these factors that politicians, columnists and political analysts worry about. And if one allows for a certain number of Republican candidates that rode in on the coattails of the three Rs (Romney, Reagan and Rockefeller), even less of the Republican gains need to be explained by the so-called issues in this last election.

With very little change in the make-up of the Senate, and with very little to explain in the GOP Congressional gains over what would be normally expected, it seems to me that the main features of this election that will stand out on further analysis will be the noticeable Republican gains in the state capitols, and the further Republican gains in the South. One other fact that will be noted particularly by Democrats is that the 1966 Congressional roster, with 245 midterm Democrats in the House, would, if translated into its equivalent for a Presidential election, amount to about 270 to 275 Democratic seats. That is the kind of Democratic Congress President Johnson could have had if he had been running for re-election now.

ing ability of civil rights groups to put registration volunteers in the field (in the absence of federal efforts) and white political manipulations aimed at scotching black militancy and maintaining an uneasy but politically profitable status quo. White liberal refusal outside the South to complete the job and lack of support from Negro groups that should know better will increasingly cripple private efforts to encourage Southern Negro voter participation.

More insidious is the role of Democratic politicians on the high national level. Mississippi furnishes a good example. For the past two years, the Johnson Administration has been tampering with the efforts of Mississippi Negroes to create some kind of workable black force, given the indifference of the two major parties. SNCC's Stokely Carmichael summed up militant Negro reaction to suggestions that blacks make a coalition with whites by exploding: "Coalition! Who you gonna coalesce with?"

It's a pertinent question but it raises another. In Mississippi, with white registration 3.5 times black, how can you win meaningful victories without white allies? Mississippi "moderates" with backing from the White House tried last year with the Mississippi Conference to wean away Negroes from the activism of the Freedom Democratic Party and into an alliance that supposedly would work to reform the state's regular Democratic Party. It failed, not only because blacks weren't buying but because no reform is yet possible in the race-obsessed state.



However, that hasn't prevented the Johnson Administration from trying to cripple the Freedom Party, SNCC and everybody else who refuses to play the coalition game. The action of Sargent Shriver's Office of Economic Opportunity in killing the Head Start program of the Child Development Group of Mississippi was not very subtle. It substituted Mississippi Action for Progress, a collection of hand-picked blacks and whites, in an agglomeration that plainly was attempting to establish a patronage base with Poverty Program dollars toward the long-range aim of building a Democratic nucleus responsive to Washington and not to the mutinous Mississippi Democratic overseers.

The CDGM program was widely praised by Northern observers, including Walter Reuther. It undoubtedly had its built-in defects and it clearly was oriented toward Freedom Party thinking. But it did reach children effectively and why should it be the only Head Start program in the country to be publicly disowned by Shriver? Unless Shriver, a thoroughly political animal, was responding to political pressure from an old and expert hand.

The frustration of Negro voters with nowhere to go was most apparent in Alabama where the Wallaces (who had been spreading around some state jobs to Negroes in Montgomery) received substantial black votes. He—they—didn't need them. Wallace has become a contemporary Huey Long, a smooth-functioning tyrant who exerts almost total control over his state. Twelve state Senators last year successfully opposed his attempt to legally succeed himself; all are now out of the legislature through defeat, resignation and one suicide.

Wallace has led Alabama through the most violent days of its modern history and he has visions of leading the entire United States. While he is an accomplished administrator and appeals to the masses with his highway, school and industrial programs, he has only one basic credo to offer nationally: white supremacy. Even with the current backlash, it seems impossible that he could mount a significant third-party campaign in 1968. Still, he scared hell out of the professionals in 1964 when he took 30 per cent of the Indiana Presidential primary, 25 per cent of pristine white Wisconsin, and 43 per cent of Maryland.

On election night in the Montgomery executive mansion, seated beside his quiet-as-a-mouse wife, Wallace said: "I don't have any great ambition at all to be President." But in the next breath he warned that if neither major party provided a clear choice for conservatives in 1968, ". . . you can look for us to be in your state all the way from Maine to California." He then proceeded to eliminate virtually every candidate to the left of American Nazi George Lincoln Rockwell from his list of possibilities. Wallace wrote off Ronald Reagan, Barry Goldwater, George Romney, et al. It is clear already that he intends to make a run for it.

How will he do? Last month in Birmingham, Goldwater said that a third-party effort wouldn't work and "shouldn't even be tried." The Louis Harris poll played with the possible three-horse race of Johnson, Nixon and Wallace, and proved to its own satisfaction that Wallace would hobble the GOP and insure Johnson's re-election.

Any realistic appraisal of Wallace's chances must be based on national developments in 1967. The present year has demonstrated that ghetto Negroes are at the boiling point. New York avoided riots largely because of effective use of Poverty Program "quiet-down" money and because a civilian-dominated Civilian Review Board gave the ghetto Negroes the feel of having a legal weapon against white authority. Now the Poverty Program is foundering as money is diverted to Vietnam, and a backlash vote has erased the review board.

It isn't pretty to think that widespread riots in 1967 would give George Wallace fuel for his run. But there are chilling signs that some people are thinking of it just that realistically. In a recent speech to the convention of Independent Mutual Insurance Agents, Norman Lustic, president of Consolidated Mutual, discussed the problem of insuring high-risk property in areas of potential riot. He said: "Nor is there any guarantee that riot will necessarily be confined to the square blocks in Harlem . . . that it will not spill out. . . . I cannot conceive that an underwriter will accept a risk in the heart of any of these depressed sections without a full recognition that a riot might destroy the building."

Should riot disfigure national life next year, Wallace could become a symbol of white against black that loomed over other issues and qualifications. The feelings of outrage and fear would probably not be strong enough to elect him, given the basic sanity of the electorate, but they might be strong enough to induce the Republican convention to nominate a rightist candidate in the hope of heading off the Wallace ploy. Or, more likely, Wallace could deny either major-party candidate a majority in the electoral college. This would send the election into the House of Representatives where his adherents might swing the choice to him. Each state delegation would get one vote, and twenty-six would carry the Presidency. A man with six or eight states in his pocket could conceivably determine the next President of the United States.

It can't happen here? Neither, thought Georgia progressives, could Lester Maddox. Nor, for that matter, did anyone think that a Mississippi Head Start program would be cut off for political reasons by an Administration supposedly committed to Negro exercise of civil rights free from intimidation. What happens next in the South is closely tied to what happens in Washington. And anyone searching there for reassurance looks in vain.

Too Soon for Peace

SANFORD GOTTLIEB

Mr. Gottlieb is the political action director of SANE. He was coordinator of the March on Washington for Peace in Vietnam of November, 1965.

The war in Vietnam had little direct impact on the 1966 elections. It has not yet bitten deeply enough into the American conscience to produce clear voting patterns. The 5,000 dead are 5,000 too many, but in a nation of 197 million relatively few families have been touched. That tight money and high prices are largely caused by the war is not yet understood by the public. The morality of destroying a people to "save" it from "communism" has so far failed to agonize even clergymen who are not already committed to the peace movement.

As an issue, Vietnam is still ambiguous. Voters feel tugged in several directions. They want to back their President, as citizens traditionally do in time of war, but they don't trust him. They want to "support the boys," but don't clearly understand what they are doing in Vietnam. They want to "stop communism," but are increasingly reluctant to pay the price. This ambiguity will disappear as the war continues. Mounting casualty lists, extensive draft calls, higher prices, and the crippling of badly needed domestic programs for a burgeoning urban population will sharpen the public mood of frustration, and America will tend to polarize as it did during Korea. There will be more people on one side who want to use more force to "get it over with," and more on the other side who simply want to get out. The climate will be ripe for major challenges to the Johnson Administration. Richard Nixon understands this: on October 31, he warned that if the war drags on indecisively, the Republican Party might be "grievously tempted" to bring forward a peace candidate for President in 1968.

In 1966, however, peace candidates still represented an idea whose time had not yet come. The Republican gains reflected no more as yet than an unfocused dissatisfaction in the country. Rep. George Brown, Jr., of California, who survived both the Republican tide and a scurrilous attack on him as a pro-Vietcong "appeaser," thinks the nation needs a redefinition of its goals. "We haven't set goals which can attract the ordinary human being," he reflected after Election Day in attempting to analyze the discontent. The average citizen may be eating well, Congressman Brown observed, but he wonders where we are going.

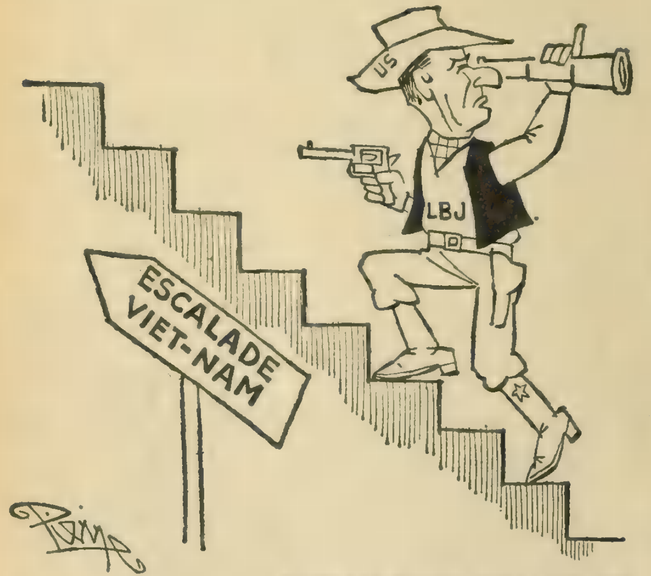
There is a sense of drift, and the public has lost confidence in the man at the helm. As one travels around the country, one sees that people simply don't trust Johnson. Americans of many persuasions judge him to be an operator who manipulates the truth as he manipulates people. I think many Democrats suffered defeat on November 8 in large part because the electorate is repelled by Lyndon Johnson, the man, his policies, his power and his professions. Where voters split their tickets and elected Democrats to local offices, they rejected Democratic candidates at the national level. Even in Lyndon Johnson's corner of Texas, a Republican, Sen. John Tower, carried the area for the first time.

Against this background, it is justifiable to suggest that below the surface the public senses the contradiction between the promise of a Great Society at home and a dirty war abroad, between the civil war which erupts in the streets of the ghettos and the civil war we have helped to internationalize in Vietnam.

The peace candidates who tried earlier this year to bring these connections into focus failed to achieve many electoral victories, although they reinvigorated the political process in many areas. About eighty nonincumbent peace candidates ran for Congress in 1966, stressing American initiatives to achieve a peaceful settlement in Vietnam. There were fifteen such candidates in California, thirteen in New York, nine in Pennsylvania, eight in New Jersey, four in Washington and one, two or three in nineteen other states. A handful, including Robert Scheer in California, espoused radical platforms combining a New Left critique of American society with calls for immediate withdrawal from Vietnam. The others, however, moved on their separate paths toward an essentially nonideological, humanist view of the world and support for U Thant's three-point program for peace in Vietnam. Most were amateurs—professors, lawyers, businessmen, writers and housewives—who had never previously run for public office. Their mere presence in the electoral arena was a phenomenon, since their candidacies were in great measure spontaneous and uncoordinated. Most ran as Democrats, a score as independents and write-ins, and a few as Republicans.

With the exception of Mark Hatfield in Oregon, who belongs in a special category, none of the major-party insurgents was elected in November. Most met defeat in the primaries, although sixteen Democratic peace candidates did survive until November. Defeated in the election, they had much company. Only two new Democrats were elected to the House outside of the South, one of them in a district previously represented by a Democrat. By now, the Democratic peace candidates tend to look much like any other defeated Democrat, especially in traditionally Republican districts. Only one independent peace candidate, Stephen Minot in Connecticut's 6th District, emerged as the balance of power between Republicans and Democrats. His 3.5 per cent of the vote caused the defeat of a lackluster pro-Administration Democratic incumbent. Except in marginal districts, independent peace candidates have little future except as outlets for a protest vote.

The peace candidates lost for reasons usually unconnected with the issue of Vietnam. Particularly in the primaries, they often lacked the manpower and organization to compete with the political machines. In New Jersey, a Senate primary campaign of several months by science writer David Frost could not begin to defeat an entrenched Democratic machine, despite Frost's considerable personal appeal, the expenditure of sizable sums of money and the help of enthusiastic volunteers. On Election Day the machine used hundreds of members of ethnic groups and city sanitation departments to "pull" voters to the polls. Frost carried communities where he was able to field volunteers, but received only 11 per cent of the state-wide vote. The machine candidate received 75 per cent, three other candidates the balance. Frost did succeed in getting Vietnam discussed before the New Jersey electorate, and convinced many people that he was more able and articulate than his opponent. But the votes eluded him. "There's no substitute for organization," he later concluded.



Pierre-Aux Ecoutes, Paris: Ben Roth

"And at the same time, I must keep my eye on the voters!"

Moreover, in American politics a candidate's personal background, experience and fame count heavily with an electorate which is oriented more to personalities than to issues. Most of the 1966 peace candidates were unknowns. If there were any surprises during the year, it was that some peace candidates, such as James Pelley, a professor and livestock breeder in Ohio's 24th District, won contested primaries. About half of those who did so had either held or run for public office, as was the case with the two New York Reform Democrats, Ted Weiss and Melvin Dubin, who came so agonizingly close to victory.

Americans are not renowned as protest voters, especially in primaries. They tend to cast their ballots for candidates who generate a sense of trust and confidence. Aside from purely personal factors, nothing generates these like political experience.

Massachusetts was a case in point. Thomas Boylston Adams, peace candidate for the Senate in the Democratic primary, has a distinguished family name. However, his opponents, Gov. Endicott Peabody and Mayor John Collins, were political pros closer to the contemporary limelight. Adams ignored his opponents and attacked President Johnson's policies in Vietnam. His opponents ignored both Adams and Vietnam and ran traditional Massachusetts Democratic campaigns. Adams received 8.7 per cent of the total (and about the same number of votes that H. Stuart Hughes collected as an Independent in 1962). This impressed some of the local politicos and newspapers; they were surprised that so many Massachusetts Democrats were interested in world affairs.

Another handicap was the one-issue campaign. While most of the peace candidates had platforms which covered both international and domestic issues, many were publicly identified almost entirely with Vietnam. Regardless of the feelings of the voters about the war at election time, many of them were more concerned about inflation, open occupancy, tight money and big government. At the very least, they wanted a candidate who could speak knowledgeably about a wide range of subjects. A one-issue candidate makes them suspicious.

In some areas, peace candidates were hurt by the "don't-split-the-vote" reflex. This emerged in Maryland's new 8th Congressional District, where labor lawyer Seymour Spelman was a last-day entry in a field of six. Spelman quickly became one of the three top contenders. Royce Hanson, a well-known, well-liked liberal who had run before and had the backing of most of the Democratic workers, was the front runner. Mike Monroney, son of the Senator from Oklahoma and an Administration supporter on Vietnam, was runner-up. Spelman received only 7 per cent of the primary vote in a district of high educational and income levels. Hanson, who adopted a position mildly critical of the Administration after Spelman entered the race, won easily. Spelman failed to capture at least several thousand potential votes because many liberals were convinced that "a vote for Spelman is a vote for Monroney," and were repelled by Monroney's hard line. Hanson later succumbed to the Republican sweep in November.

Events within Vietnam did seem to have some influence on the fates of the peace candidates. On the whole, peace candidates fared better in May than in September. The May primaries were held soon after the Buddhist uprisings in South Vietnam, an event which sowed doubt among many Americans. It was not by chance that in May the get-out-of-Vietnam sentiment reached its high point in the public-opinion polls. The September primaries, on the other hand, followed by several days the Ky regime's elections in South Vietnam, an operation superbly merchandised in the United States as a great defeat for the Vietcong and a victory for representative government. This packaged optimism clearly helped the pro-Administration candidates. By November, the surviving peace candidates were swept up in the Republican tide.

However, a look at the new Congress reveals that the Republican tide by no means submerged all the doves. In the Senate, the body with the greater influence on foreign affairs, the election of three prominent Republicans has strengthened the forces favorable to a peaceful settlement in Vietnam. Mark Hatfield's victory in Oregon brings to the national stage the one man who refused to support President Johnson's Vietnam policy at the last Conference of Governors. Hatfield conclusively defeated Robert Duncan, the only pro-Administration Democrat who waged a one-issue campaign on Vietnam. He replaces Maurine Neuberger, who tended to keep private her criticisms of Administration policy. The elections of Edward Brooke in Massachusetts and Charles Percy in Illinois have replaced two Administration supporters, Leverett Saltonstall and Paul Douglas, with two moderates who favor more vigorous efforts to negotiate an end to the war. Percy attacked Douglas during the campaign for refusing to rule out the use of small nuclear weapons in Vietnam, and campaigned for an all-Asian peace conference. Brooke has opposed further escalation, stated that the National Liberation Front should be included in negotiations, and criticized the Administration for making its offers of negotiation less credible by escalating the war.

The re-election, in most cases by overwhelming margins, of Senators Bob Bartlett of Alaska, John Sherman Cooper of Kentucky, Lee Metcalf of Montana, and Claiborne Pell of Rhode Island will return to Washington a quartet of scholarly and moderate advocates of a negotiated settlement. Senator Pell received two-thirds of the vote in Rhode Island against a self-styled hawk. Sen. Thomas McIntyre's landslide victory over retired Air Force General Harrison Thyng in New Hampshire is further evidence that the voters were not accepting extremist solutions.

In the House, all the Congressmen who voted against military appropriations in 1965 and 1966—George Brown, Phillip Burton and Don Edwards of California; Edith Green of Oregon; John Conyers of Michigan; and John Dow and William F. Ryan of New York—have been re-elected. While five of these incumbents were in safe districts, Congressmen Brown and Dow went into contests where outcomes were very uncertain. This indicates that voters do not automatically punish Congressmen who vote their principles in opposing further escalation. On the other hand, among the Democrats who were defeated in the Republican sweep were sixteen who had signed one or more of the joint statements advocating restraint in Vietnam and greater efforts to reach the conference table. They were not defeated because of their stand on Vietnam, but their loss to harder-line Republicans strengthens the hawk sentiment in the House.

Yet, will it be that clear? Will the freshmen Republicans identify with Dirksen and Strom Thurmond or with Hatfield, Percy and Brooke? Will they rally 'round Lyndon Johnson's now tattered standard, or will they play the game Richard Nixon's way? Nixon wants a "strategy for victory" within a year, as well as "peace without appeasement." The shrewder Republicans will no doubt play both sides of the street. This creates a situation of greater fluidity, since many Democratic critics of the Vietnamese escalation who have now been defeated hesitated to go against the President of their own party. The Republicans will be under no comparable constraint, especially after the results of November 8. More than ever before, political pressures may now influence Administration actions in Southeast Asia.

What, then, can be learned from the 1966 elections? The first lesson would seem to be that government policy is not changed by pressure groups alone or by fledgling efforts to use the electoral machinery. If government policy is to change, it will be through constant work by pressure groups and by influence in at least one national party. There were pressure groups for peace before 1966; thanks to the peace candidates, there are now bridgeheads in the political party structure. During 1967 these must be buttressed and additional ones established.

If the lack of electoral victories does not lead to discouragement, we shall be able to look back at 1966 as the year the peace movement became political. Thousands of new people began to use the electoral process to bring about a change in government policy. They have gained invaluable experience, not the least of which is an understanding of the need for patient grass-roots organizing, to which peace-oriented citizens have not been attracted in the past. Yet there are no short cuts. The party machinery helps select the candidates and helps write the state party platforms. If by early 1968 the peace forces are not in position to influence both the selection of candidates and the direction of the party platforms, they will have little direct leverage on the Administration, whether they want to end this war or prevent the next one. Now is the time to lay the groundwork for the peace candidates of 1968.

Whether they work in nonpartisan pressure groups, in political parties or both, peace-oriented citizens should be looking for allies. In the past too much effort has been wasted trying to get everybody concerned to agree on all the particulars of joint efforts. What is needed is greater understanding of the separate but overlapping interests of different groups. When a member of a peace group works to end the war in Vietnam, he is also working indirectly to free the resources now consumed in that struggle for possible use in rebuilding the slums at home. When a member of a civil rights organization lobbies Congress, for aid in the ghettos, he is working indirectly to end the war in Vietnam. For the resources of even the wealthiest power in the world are limited.

So let each group apply its own pressure, keeping channels of communication open and exploring common action in the political field. Those candidates who stump the country in 1968 suggesting that we should do well to invest a sum equal to the $32 billion spent on Vietnam this past year on rebuilding the cities, creating mass transportation, cleaning our air and water and providing quality education for the half of our population under 25 would have a compelling—perhaps a winning—formula.

SHOWDOWN ON VITAMINS

RALPH LEE SMITH

Mr. Smith is the author of several books, among them The Bargain Hucksters and The Tarnished Badge (both Crowell).

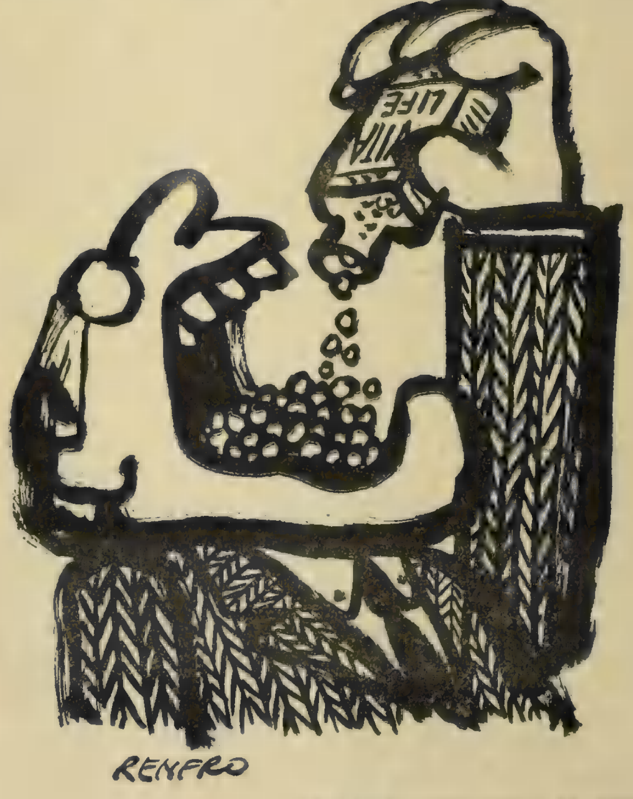
In September the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers' Association and twelve of its member firms went into U.S. District Court in Washington, D. C., seeking a court order to prevent the Food and Drug Administration from holding public hearings on new regulations it proposes for vitamin preparations and dietary foods. This is the latest move in a little-known battle the drug industry is waging for very big stakes. Dr. Robert Shank stated before the Senate Special Committee on Aging in 1963: "Perhaps the most lucrative deception is perpetrated by nearly every distributor of vitamins and vitamin-mineral supplements." Dr. Shank is head of the Department of Preventive Medicine, Washington University, St. Louis, and chairman of the Council on Foods and Nutrition of the American Medical Association.

Vitamin deficiency is a rare condition in the United States. Less than 1 per cent of the population suffers from it, according to expert medical testimony received by the Federal Trade Commission in its recent cases against two leading vitamin-mineral products, Geritol and Vitasafe. "All of the nutrients that man requires are found in ordinary 'everyday' foods readily available in all parts of the country the year around," says the American Medical Association. "It is not necessary to memorize the details of the nutrient composition of foods in order to achieve a nutritionally adequate diet. Simply choose foods from the four basic food groups: milk, meat, vegetable-fruit, and bread and cereals. These foods offer us a wide variety and assure us the basis of a healthful diet."

"The American food supply," says the Food and Drug Administration, "is unsurpassed in volume, variety and nutritional value. In fact, Americans have to go out of their way, nutritionally speaking, to avoid being well nourished." Dr. James L. Goddard, commissioner of Food and Drugs, notes that in economically depressed areas some families do not have a varied or plentiful supply of foods, but that, as a simple medical fact, this rarely appears to result in failure of such persons to secure basic nutritional requirements. And he sees food-distribution programs, not vitamin pills, as the answer to such needs as exist.

Under these circumstances, the sale of about $300 million worth of vitamins and vitamin-mineral preparations a year, often at immensely inflated prices, to people who almost never need them, is a marvel of modern merchandising. To achieve it, the drug industry has invested heavily in advertising and public education.

The approach has involved the subtle use of a well-proved combination—fear and reward. The fear part of the campaign warns people that if they do not take vitamins they may be risking insidious, undetectable dietary deficiencies—and who in his right mind would take such a risk when it can so easily be avoided? Dr. Walter A. Compton, executive vice president of Miles Laboratories, distributors of One-a-Day multi-vitamins, informed the Senate Committee on Aging in 1963 that people who fail to take vitamin pills are risking serious consequences and that "our company and other reputable pharmaceutical firms serve the public by recommending for their use and marketing multiple vitamin preparations." "The average person has no way of knowing how good his diet is," the National Vitamin Foundation agrees dolefully, and recommends vitamin pills as "insurance." The industry-financed foundation bears about the same relationship to the vitamin business that the Tobacco Industry Research Council bears to the tobacco industry.



The reward for using vitamins is the alleged therapeutic value that the ads often state or imply. Among other things, vitamins have been offered to help cure symptoms of fatigue—Geritol's "tired bood" is an affliction well known to the air waves, if not to the medical schools. They are also said to promote feelings of pep, health and well-being. A TV commercial for Squibb's Vigran multi-vitamins shows a handsome young man jogging through a park in an early morning workout. Superimposed on the picture, and in time with his stride, are the letters VIGRAN, going up and down like pistons.

The messages are drummed home with large advertising budgets. In January, 1965, Miles Laboratories stated that its ad budget for the year was $8 million, and that it planned to spend $2 million to promote a single product, One-a-Day Plus Iron Tablets. The Federal Trade Commission, in its case against the Vitasafe company, found that the firm's annual gross business was $9 million, of which $3.5 million was spent for advertising. Advertising figures for Geritol are hard to come by; its distributor, the J.B. Williams Company, does not disclose sales or earnings. In 1962, Advertising Age estimated the Geritol ad budget at $6 million. In all instances, of course, the cost of advertising is incorporated into the price of the product. In the late Senator Kefauver's memorable phrase, the people pay for their own brainwashing.

Another cost borne by the purchasers of the products is the struggle that the industry, and many firms in it, have put up to avoid federal regulation of their activities and claims. Any company or industry that has both the will and the money can fight running battles with federal authorities over many months or years while continuing the lucrative practices to which the government has objected. Many drug firms have the will, and needless to say, they have the money.

Thus, it took a complicated series of actions by three government agencies—the Food and Drug Administration, the Post Office Department and the Federal Trade Commission—extending from 1957 to 1966, to curb effectively the therapeutic claims that were being made for Vitasafe capsules. A final ruling has yet to be handed down in the case against the distributors of Geritol, initiated by the Federal Trade Commission in 1962. After lengthy and complex hearings, the FTC ordered the firm in October, 1965, to stop representing that all cases of tiredness, loss of strength, run-down feeling, nervousness and irritability indicate a deficiency of iron and that Geritol is an effective remedy for these symptoms. "The inescapable conclusion," said FTC chairman, Paul Rand Dixon, "is that the number of people in the total population who are tired because of iron or vitamin deficiency is infinitesimally small." Geritol promptly appealed the FTC ruling to the courts and announced that meanwhile it would continue its fabulously successful advertising themes. This means more years of grace for "tired blood."

Another problem is the composition of multi-vitamin and vitamin-mineral preparations. Whatever may be motivating the scientists who dream these pills up, it does not seem to be the facts of medical science. In almost every instance the formulas bear no relationship to the realities of diet or of dietary deficiency. Vitamin and vitamin-mineral products now on the market, the FDA said in June, 1966, "contain as many as seventy-five ingredients. Only a few of these ingredients have any real value as food supplements." Most of the products, FDA went on, contain more than a reasonable amount of some nutrients and less than a reasonable amount of others. This was strongly confirmed by the American Medical Association's Council on Foods and Nutrition. Checking 1,000 vitamin preparations listed in The American Drug Index, the council found that 993 exceeded the council's recommendations in either the amounts or the kinds of certain vitamins or vitamin-mineral combinations. "Only seven preparations," says Dr. Philip L. White, secretary of the council, "were considered to be rational."

A product called Nutri-Bio, which was launched about 1960 and which had achieved $8 million sales volume by 1961, had listed on its label more than thirty ingredients, for over half of which the need in human nutrition has not been established. "There is no reason," Dr. White stated, "for including most of the ingredients." The product was hawked on a door-to-door basis, with purchasers being required to buy a six-months' supply. Two items were offered: Nutri-Bio Vitamin and Mineral Tablets at $24; and Nutri-Bio Protein Tablets at $15.50. Thus, a family of four that purchased both items for the whole family would pay $316 a year.

Vice president in charge of nutritional research for the

VITAMIN	PRICE PER 100 TABLETS
	Squibb	Eli Lilly	Drug Guild	Hudson Vitamin
(1) Thiamin Chloride (Vitamin B_1) 50 mg. Tablets	$2.25	$2.55	$ .65	$ .65
(2) Thiamin Chloride (Vitamin B_1) 100 mg. Tablets	4.05	4.50	.85	.85
(3) Ascorbic Acid (Vitamin C) 100 mg. Tablets	1.20	1.40	.44	.45
(4) Pyridoxine (Vitamin B_6) 25 mg. Tablets	3.00	5.67	1.35	.75
(5) Riboflavin (Vitamin B_2) 5 mg. Tablets	1.17	1.30	.59*	.40
(6) Vitamin A 25,000 Units	4.09	3.65	.75	.75
(7) Vitamin E 100 Int'l. Units	6.00	6.50	1.95	1.95

---

*for 10 mg. tablets (twice as much)

The chart above shows recent retail prices for a number of identical vitamin products sold under four different brand names. Drug Guild is a brand name used for the distribution of drugs at moderate prices to drug outlets in the New York metropolitan area. Hudson Vitamin Products is a national mail-order firm. Food and Drug Administration inspections insure that there is no variation in either the content or the quality of the products.

firm was the movie and TV star Bob Cummings. A stock prospectus filed by the company with the Securities and Exchange Commission listed his salary as $76,641 a year, plus $7,453 set aside under the firm's profit-sharing plan. Another valued executive was Mrs. Cummings; her salary was listed at $76,141. Each of the Cummings' five children, most of whom were under 10 years of age, was on the payroll at $166 per month.

This racket was apparently not designed for a long voyage. In 1963, Cummings severed his connections with the firm and sold his stock; by 1965, Nutri-Bio was bankrupt, and its name and assets were acquired by a new group. FDA's latest record shows the seizure by FDA inspectors in May, 1966, of $9,404 worth of Nutri-Bio and Baby Bio on charges that they were deficient in vitamins A and C.

In 1962 the Food and Drug Administration had decided that the situation required a broader approach than individual actions against firms in the field. Back in 1941, FDA had promulgated regulations governing the labeling of vitamins, multi-vitamin preparations, and vitamin-mineral supplements. Since then, great strides had been taken in scientific knowledge of nutrition, and even greater strides had been taken in the technique of selling such products despite prevailing medical knowledge. FDA now proposed new regulations. Among other things, these would have prohibited claims of special dietary value for ingredients not recognized as essential in human nutrition. For pills containing perishable nutrients, the rules would have required an expiration date on the label. The industry rose up in arms and the rules were never applied.

In June of this year, FDA returned to the problem, issuing a new and more extensive set of proposed regulations. These rules incorporate the old ones, and contain additional positive provisions to assure buyers that they are getting something medically rational. "In order to be labeled 'Multi-Vitamin Supplement,' " the proposed rules state, "a product must contain Vitamin A, Vitamin D, ascorbic acid (Vitamin C), thiamine (Vitamin B_1), riboflavin (Vitamin B_2) and niacin, and may include Vitamin E, Vitamin B_6, folic acid, pantothenic acid, and/or Vitamin B_{12}. A 'Mineral Supplement' must contain calcium and iron, and may include phosphorus, magnesium, copper, and/or iodine. A 'Multi-Vitamin and Mineral Supplement' must contain all of the required ingredients and may contain any of the optional ones."

The proposed rules also specify minimum and maximum amounts of each ingredient that such pills may contain. Among the practices the provision would prevent is loading pills with immense amounts of relatively inexpensive nutrients, while failing to include, or including in insufficient quantity, more costly ingredients. "The content of most vitamin-mineral supplements now on the market will have to be changed to conform to the published standards," says FDA. "Most supplements now exceed the maximum amounts allowed to them in some respects and contain less than the required minimum amounts in other respects."

Another stipulation of the proposed rules would require the labels of vitamin preparations to carry a notice to the effect that "vitamins and minerals are supplied in abundant amounts by the foods we eat. . . . Except for persons with special medical needs, there is no scientific basis for recommending routine use of dietary supplements." (It should be noted that several members of the Food and Nutrition Board of the National Research Council have expressed reservations about the exact wording of the label. Dr. Goddard has stated that he believes an acceptable wording can be worked out.)

The industry took one look at the proposed rules and fled in collective horror to its attorneys. The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association has made the first move in trying to block public hearings. It's going to be a long, hard fight, with the public paying for every bit of it.

LETTERS

(continued from page 562)

fies the kind of people apparently excluded from the Fulbright scholarship's beneficence. (Also, William Faulkner was in fact a Fulbright lecturer, not a scholar.) Third, when Handlin says that British stipends give £6 per week and American £15, he unscrupulously juggles statistics, dividing the total British sum (£325) into a fifty-two-week calendar year, and the American (£558) into a thirty-five-or-so-week academic year; and as I said in the earlier article, the English could take formal jobs where we (sans a working permit) could not. Since Handlin did not attempt to live on the stipend, he is simply not qualified to judge its adequacy—unlike immigrants long deceased, we Fulbrights are able to speak for ourselves. That the program is no longer supported by war debts, even as part of "joint contributions," is news to me (as the executive secretary himself told me it was, at dinner on Feb. 16, 1965); and may I trust that my other proposals, which Handlin indicatively does not dispute, will become realities with equal haste.

What irritates me more about Handlin's letter are, first, its moral premise and, second, his own damned presumptuousness. His irate tone ("particular [sic] poor grace") presumes that the poor should never complain about relief, solely and simply because they are recipients of a government dole. (Need I say more?) Second, he claims to know more about my life than I do. Of the two "people with whom [I] chiefly came into contact at the commission," I happened to meet one, the most eminent (Cleanth Brooks), only once; and how I spent my own money or where it came from would interest only an incipient totalitarian—the sort who would also feel inclined to revise the facts of history to his own convenience. Finally, contrary to what Handlin tells me about myself, I did not at all suffer "unhappiness in London," but many of the discomforts that all the scholars felt I would attribute to needless deficiencies in the Fulbright program. Either the program reforms itself or it earns an increasingly bad name.

Richard Kostelanetz

The Nation dissociates itself from all passages in the above letter which characterize Oscar Handlin, deprecate his behavior or ascribe motives to him.—Editors eyes right

Trenton, N.J.

Dear Sirs: At a time when we hear so much about left-wing infiltration of the mass media, it is interesting to read Francis Pollock's convincing evidence ["Junkets to Apartheid: America's Press on Safari," The Nation, Nov. 7] that so righteous a government as that of South Africa is attempting to buy favorable opinion with free trips to American journalists. Christopher E. Fullman

BOOKS & THE ARTS

What Shall A Moral Man Do?

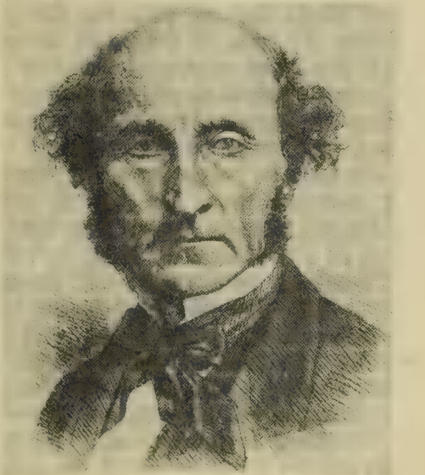
CHRISTOPHER LASCH

Mr. Lasch is a member of the History Department at Northwestern University. His most recent book is The New Radicalism in America 1889-1963: The Intellectual as a Social Type (Knopf).

Last February a book was published called The Psychology of Power, by R. V. Sampson, lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol.* The book appeared in England in 1965. Neither there nor in the United States did it cause much of a stir. In the United States, in fact, it has been almost ignored. I do not propose to "review" the book so much as to call attention to its existence, and beyond that, to try to formulate a position about some of the questions it raises. One of the difficulties in the way of the book's acceptance is that it is not blindingly original. Herbert Marcuse's One-Dimensional Man is a more thoroughgoing and brilliant attack on positivism than Sampson's, and Philip Rieff's Freud, The Mind of the Moralist, a more incisive critique of the moral and political implications of psychoanalysis. The Psychology of Power tells us something about the history of the family, and that alone would have justified its publication; but its principal importance lies not in its contributions to scholarship but in its powerful assault on the moral sensibilities of the reader. It is a book that calls the reader to account, asking him, with maddening insistence, whether the truth about certain moral questions is quite so complicated or obscure as he likes to pretend.

The book belongs to a literary genre once common but now altogether unfamiliar. It is neither history nor political theory nor sociology nor, in spite of its title, psychology. Nor is it another essay "for our times," a free-wheeling series of speculations about the contemporary "crisis," dazzlingly dressed up in fashionable despair. The Psychology of Power is not a despairing book, it is not even something which can be recognized and recommended as a "disturbing" book—of which we have had so many—one that clamors for attention, a book intended to shock and titillate at the same time. Sampson has something more serious in mind; but it is so seldom, these days, that anyone tries to be serious in this vein that readers hoping to be "shocked out of their complacency," or confronted with a startling new interpretation which "challenges our previous understanding of the subject," will turn away from the book in disappointment.

The book is not "for our times"; it is not even, exactly, an essay. It sticks quite closely to certain illustrative material, mostly 19th-century documents relating to the family; yet it is not principally concerned with interpreting these documents. It does not try to examine them exhaustively, as a historian would; nor does it subject them to "criticism." The book therefore gives an initial impression of thinness, of a want of allusion, resonance and depth. We have come to expect a critic and scholar to declare his primary allegiance to the materials which it is presumably the obligation of scholarship to interpret and explain. Sampson is not interested in interpretation except as it advances his other purposes. It is hard for us to remember, in the age of critical scholarship, that there is anything else to be interested in.



John Stuart Mill

"The blessed are the poor and humble and those who are ill-used by the world."

The Psychology of Power is a philosophical inquiry into the subject of human equality, or inequality, but very few academic philosophers would recognize it as philosophy. Philosophers, indeed, of all specialists, will least admire this work. Part of Sampson's subject, in fact, is precisely the decay of philosophy, and his treatment of this theme incidentally explains why his book will not be popular. Until the 19th century, he contends, philosophers argued about the moral premises from which conclusions were to be drawn. They argued, for instance, about the moral basis of political power. Did power derive from authority, from contract, or from the "consent of the governed"? Could any government which rested on force be said to be legitimate?

But within the last hundred years, according to Sampson, philosophers have agreed not to discuss questions about which it is impossible objectively to agree. They have chosen to regard moral questions as by definition questions of opinion, relative to time and place, and hence as improper subjects for philosophy. People in North America believe one thing, people in the Trobriand Islands another. Given the relativity of morals, philosophers now confine themselves to applying the techniques of logical and linguistic analysis to the working out of various premises, whatever the premises happen to be, without attempting to judge the merits of the premises themselves. A political philosopher, in Sampson's words, > . . . will scrutinize the way in which people use their political vocabulary, make recommendations to secure greater precision of usage, expose internal inconsistencies in argument, and bring into the open concealed or suppressed premises. The one thing that is definitely outside the competence of the logician of language are [sic] questions of truth or falsity in the sense of the ultimate appropriateness of any specific political theory.

The test of a given policy is whether or not it promotes the national interest, whatever the national interest happens to be. What this comes to in practice, according to Sampson, is that the test of realism becomes "the balance of opinion . . . among the people whose working lives are spent in investigating and handling the affairs in question." The test of policy, in other words, becomes the consensus among precisely the people most directly involved in making it. Realism is what they have agreed to regard as realistic; and if anyone doubts the appropriateness of such a test, the experts duly remind him, in the worn phrase of which they are so inordinately fond, that politics is the "art of the possible."

Recommendations which do not begin with the experts' own definition of what is possible automatically become idealistic and utopian. And although disagreements, sometimes sharp disagreements, can arise over the policies by which the national interest is to be promoted, objections to current policy must themselves be referred to the realism of the decision makers. It is possible for Hans J. Morgenthau and other realists to condemn the war in Vietnam on the ground that it is futile, in the long run, for the United States to oppose the dominant role which Communist China is bound to play in Southeast Asia, and on the further ground that American troops cannot indefinitely police the world. These objections, however, leave undisturbed the ruling premise that American troops ought to police those parts of the world in which the country has an acknowledged and unambiguous interest — the Caribbean, for example.

---

*Pantheon Press. 247 pp. $4.95.

In this way Walter Lippmann, in May, 1965, had to accept the logic of his position and countenance American intervention in Santo Domingo, arguing afterward only that the danger on which it was based—the danger of a Communist "takeover"—had been shown never to have existed. This particular intervention was thereby discredited in the minds of Lippmann, Senator Fulbright, and other liberals, but their objections presumably left the door open for further interventions, in the American sphere of interest, wherever a Communist threat could be shown indisputably to exist.

The argument between the Administration and its critics—grateful as one must be to the critics for raising any questions at all—boils down to a disagreement, necessarily confined to experts, about the boundaries of the American sphere of interest, and the danger, in particular cases, that Communists will acquire territory formerly defined as part of the area of freedom. The Administration contends that American interests are at stake in Vietnam. This may be absurd—it was certainly absurd to begin with, if it meant that American military security depended on a base in Vietnam—yet the continuing effect of American intervention seems to be creating interests in Vietnam, national or otherwise, the fact of which in turn becomes the justification for more intervention.

In any case, the argument about national interests — quite apart from its tendency to confuse the interests of certain rich and powerful individuals with the interests of the nation as a whole—furnishes no basis on which to insist on the immorality, the essential inhumanity of American policy in Vietnam, in Santo Domingo, in Watts and in many other parts of the world. The arguments of the pragmatic realists implicitly concede the point that more than any other needs to become the object of unremitting attack —that napalm, the destruction of crops, the destruction of villages, the "pacification" of peoples are justified under any circumstances at all.

Ladies Repository

ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING

. . . did not escape from her father's domination by appealing to his conscience but by defying him.

These examples, drawn from American debate, are my own, but they illustrate the truth of Sampson's contention that moral empiricism—"realism"—has come to dominate political discussion. Given the triumph of "objective" analysis, those who insist on the relevance of moral issues to politics invite the ridicule of reasonable men. But this is itself ridiculous, Sampson argues: how ridiculous, he tries to show by laying bare the philosophical assumptions—and beyond those, the social and psychological upheavals — which underlie the modern tendency to dissociate ethical judgments from objective reality: the decline, Sampson notes, of the "metaphysical debate."

The debate having declined, it is difficult for any writer to pick it up again: given the definition of reality as empirical objectivity, it is impossible in a strict sense to resurrect a debate which it is the whole purpose of empiricism to bury. One has to make an ad hominem attack: empiricism itself is subjective, an ideology in the sense that it serves the interests of those who wish to believe it. The triumph of ethical empiricism, according to Sampson, paralleled the decline of social conflict in Western society. The plausibility of empiricism "is clearly dependent on the absence of fundamental divisions of an ideological character within a given culture." The view that "when we speak of moral principles, we can rationally mean nothing more than that certain rules of conduct are observed with a greater or lesser degree of statistical uniformity at a given time and place"—this view naturally commends itself to homogeneous societies which have outlasted the wracking social conflicts of the 19th century and evolved into internally peaceable welfare states.

Tolerance, no doubt, is one of the intellectual virtues of such communities; but Sampson wants to make us understand the social and moral price, as it were, that has been paid for tolerance. He wants us to see not only what is obvious, that moral tolerance has usually been achieved by downgrading morality —by lowering the degree of ethical aspiration — but to see what is not so obvious: that liberal empiricism, claiming at last to have discovered an objective basis for philosophy, is in fact no more politically or morally neutral than other doctrines which make no claim to neutrality. "It is itself an intervention in the political debate. For while such a view is compatible with the liberal or pragmatic political stance, it is not compatible with the stand of Christians, Marxists or humanists. In these instances, the metaphysical framework requires every belief to be certified as valid in the sense of being grounded in objective reality"—and not merely certified by their being widely regarded as valid at a given time and place. "A verification principle that defines evidence in such a way as to make it coterminous with sense data, stands itself in need of verification."

In an article on "Soviet Ideology" (Soviet Studies, July, 1966), David Joravsky provides a succinct and workable definition of ideology. "When we call a belief ideological, we are saying at least three things about it: although it is unverified or unverifiable, it is accepted as verified by a particular group, because it performs social functions for that group."

(He adds the important corollary that it is impossible to analyze ideology, given this definition, without engaging in ad hominem arguments. "In analysing group beliefs the sociologist cannot avoid taking sides—or making them—for he cannot avoid accusations of ideology. Even if he is purely rational, rational discourse between him and the group he is studying will be as unlikely as it is between men of opposed ideologies." Joravsky is talking about the difficulty of rational—i.e., nonideological—conversation between Soviet and Western scholars, but the same observations apply to conversations between ethical empiricists and those who insist on the objectivity of certain moral beliefs.)

According to Sampson, ethical empiricism is an ideology in this sense. It rests on the unverified assertion that moral sentiments have no objective basis (a point to which I shall return). It accepts this unverified assertion as verified; and it performs certain functions for the liberal and civilized people who believe it—namely, the perpetuation of a state of toleration of which they are the principal beneficiaries, and beyond that, the perpetuation of the entire social order to which they owe so many of their privileges and pleasures. The effort by T. D. Weldon, a British philosopher of politics, to devalue the logical status of "foundations" to the level of recommended or agreed upon conventions, shorn of objective standing, serves Sampson as an example of the ideological basis of the view that all moral ideas are subjectively determined:

> It is not difficult to understand why this view should have commended itself to someone in Weldon's position. He was a member of a homogeneous, tolerant, essentially satisfied social class. The ascendancy of the class was marked by prestige, power and prosperity, and it could afford to be and is liberal, civilized, urbane. Essentially three facets of experience sharply impressed him: (1) the freedom of discussion and the comparative ease with which the sources of differences of opinion could be disentangled among people within his culture; (2) the corresponding magnitude of the difficulty of arriving at common conclusions with people from a different but powerful culture in the Communist world; (3) the irreconcilability of this conflict suggesting the advisability of an agreement to disagree with mutual avoidance of proselytism.

American debate (which Sampson, in the main, does not discuss) abounds in equivalent examples. George F. Kennan is a more attractive spokesman for this position than some of the other realists because there has never been the slightest doubt about the decency or intellectual integrity behind his work. No one has spoken more convincingly than Kennan about the need for "mutual avoidance of proselytism." Listening to his Norton lectures at Harvard in 1961, Edmund Wilson took heart at this sign of a "revival of relativistic intelligence." At the same time Wilson noted the outraged reaction of one member of the audience, that Kennan "didn't seem to know the difference between right and wrong."

Faced with a choice between Bostonian dogmatism—democracy is right, communism is wrong — and Kennan's skeptical relativism, our sympathies automatically go out to the latter (which is precisely why it is so important that a book like Sampson's be read by liberals). We automatically wish to declare ourselves on the side of liberalism, civilization and urbanity. Yet these values, as we know, are by no means incompatible with acts of inhumanity. To the degree to which Western liberal culture still rests on the exploitation of colonial peoples, they may even depend on acts of inhumanity. The undeniable element of proselytism in American foreign policy, together with the existence of a fanatically righteous and increasingly powerful Right, makes it hard for us to see that ethical objectivity may pose an even greater danger than proselytism. But if we recall the writings of Herman Kahn—one of many examples to which one can point—the dangers of "objectivity" seem less remote and abstract.

Far from being proselytes and moralistic crusaders, Kahn and the other strategists of escalation have no interest at all in the moral and ideological debate between communism and the West. If they found themselves on the other side, they would presumably be writing and saying the same things they are saying now. Their sole concern is national survival—it hardly makes any difference which nation. The trouble with George Kennan's political relativism, tolerant and civilized as it is, is that in grounding itself on considerations of national interest (as opposed to moralistic crusading), it becomes ethically indistinguishable from the "realism" of Herman Kahn. If Kahn has taught us how to think about the unthinkable, so in his own way has Kennan, because there is nothing in Kennan's philosophy to suggest that some efforts on behalf of the national interest ought to be considered morally impermissible—indeed, that the very idea of the national interest may be a moral abomination. (To be sure, Kennan on at least one occasion [an article that appeared in The Atlantic in the late fifties] has argued that the use of nuclear weapons might be considered un-Christian. But this consideration is extrinsic to Kennan's realism, an intrusion of moral issues that cannot be reconciled with a philosophy of international relations which argues that the national interest is the standard against which everything else has to be weighed.)

On the contrary, it is precisely moral considerations which the political realists blame for the shortcomings of American policy in the past. Hans Morgenthau, as Sampson notes, has gone so far as to say: "The moralistic detractors of the national interest are guilty of both intellectual and moral perversion." It would be hard to find a more striking illustration of the "decline of the metaphysical debate."

The realism of Kennan and Morgenthau who today criticize the war in Vietnam, not only blends imperceptibly into the realism of Kahn, who has outlined a strategy for its escalation; it also keeps us from experiencing, as a moral fact, the geopolitical fact with which we are all so familiar, that the West represents historically an island of physical well-being in an otherwise wretched world. It is in this respect that realism is most fully an ideology: it blinds itself to the way in which an ethic of moral relativity, of live and let live, serves the interests of the privileged, educated, white Americans who subscribe to it. It serves their interests not only by its built-in insistence on "orderly" change in parts of the world where orderly changes mean no changes at all. More important, it does so by the mood of moral relaxation which it induces in those who subscribe to it—a weary, sophisticated sense of the world as an inherently imperfect place which serves to insulate us from the moral horrors in the midst of which we live. Not yet the direct victims of these horrors, we can experience them only with an effort of the imagination. But it is precisely this imaginative effort that the prevailing tolerance, the sense of the world's imperfections, the denigration of moral enthusiasm, all serve to thwart. Since these attitudes serve so well to diminish the critical sense, one is justified in asking whether that is not the reason for their popularity.

If one is to insist on the ideological basis of moral empiricism, one must also show that its tenets are unverified or unverifiable. Sampson accordingly asks us to believe that one moral principle is universal and objectively based, namely, the idea of equality; and that the counter-

Bobbs-Merrill

viet nam in the mud

"A freelance photographer, one of the best, Pickerell has covered the war mainly from the foot-soldier's viewpoint . . . with a sympathetic insight few others have been able to command."—Virginia Kirkus Service.

"In his down-to-earth account, he approves the larger objectives of American policy, but not our political and military tactics . . . This book deserves wide reading."—Library Journal over 100 photographs

by JAMES PICKERELL

introduction by MALCOM W. BROWNE

Paper $2.25 • Cloth $5.00

Bobbs-Merrill

assertion—that moral issues are mere opinions—has been accepted as valid not because it has been shown to be valid but because people desperately need to believe that it is. The strategy of this argument will disappoint those who expect Sampson to set about "proving" his case by showing that equality has been universally upheld as a norm (as some writers, for instance, have tried to prove the universality of incest taboos). His appeal is to the reader's conscience rather than to his hunger for empirical demonstration. The argument for the universality of the sense of equality turns out to be merely a restatement of the ad hominem case against empiricism, that empiricism functions as a mechanism of resistance which enables us to conceal from ourselves what we really know to be true. "The truth is not complex or difficult to know or relative but very simple."

The truth, Sampson argues—whatever we may say or do—is that every person has a right to be recognized as a moral agent capable of living his own life, and that when by the sheer superiority of our power over other people we deny them that right, we commit an immoral act. The truth, as John Stuart Mill wrote in his Essay On Liberty, is that "the blessed are the poor and humble, and those who are ill-used by the world," and "that if [we] would be perfect [we] should sell all that [we] have and give it to the poor." But the truth, Sampson maintains, "when stated so lucidly and unequivocally is felt to make impossible demands upon us. Therefore the need is great to deny that this can be truth." (Even the Nazis had to invent rationalizations for genocide.) Or, more precisely: "People . . . waver between asserting these things to be true in a mechanical verbalistic fashion without any underlying conviction and affirming that because they cut across the grain of 'human nature,' that is, what they themselves want to do, they cannot be true." As Kierkegaard put it, in a passage quoted by Sampson in commenting on the passage from Mill, the "tolerance of the orthodox"—that is, the idea of moral relativity—derives from the simple fact that what people "really desire" is "to have a good time in this world."

Of course none of these statements proves anything. And in any case, the reader may ask, how can we accept the assertion that equality is universally held up as a moral good, when inequality is universally the practice? Sampson replies that inequality is the general practice because there is invariably something important to be gained from treating people as unequal—it fills the pocket or puffs up the self-esteem. Treating people unequally, in other words, accords with what we want to do, it accords with having "a good time in this world." But the conflict between what we want to do and what we know we ought to do is unbearable. Hence we have to rationalize what we want to do by inventing moral justifications for it. Hence the appearance, in the world, of ethical pluralism: people's rationalizations vary. This is still no answer to the demand for empirical proof.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 11-28-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

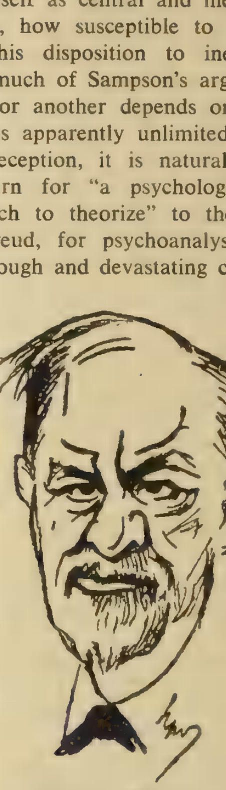
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

Instead of answering his questions, Sampson appeals to the reader's conscience and to his sense of history as a history of exploitation. The reader is asked to admit to the conflict between his sense of injustice and his desire to enjoy the good things of life undisturbed by thoughts of the life that most people are forced to lead. He is also asked imaginatively to confront the spectacle of millions of other people, throughout history, faced with the same conflict and resolving it in the same way. Common-sense conservatism would have us believe that inequality is a natural phenomenon, the inevitable result of the malapportionment of brains, strength, or beauty; the result of sheer bad luck; or, more subtly, of the ingrained and unchangeable lust for power, which assures that some people will always prey on others. Sampson, in common with a long line of radical thinkers, wants us to see inequality as historically determined—the sum of innumerable individual and collective choices, conscious or otherwise. Inequality comes about because some people derive advantages from dominating others; but the very pervasiveness of the fact of domination makes it seem that the urge to dominate is a psychological constant, a given, a permanent part of human nature, like sexuality, which can be superficially modified but never eliminated.



SIGMUND FREUD

"Nature has determined woman's destiny through beauty, charm and sweetness."

This psychological issue is the heart of Sampson's argument. "The question presents itself as central and inescapable: how rigid, how susceptible to modification is this disposition to inequality?" Since so much of Sampson's argument in one way or another depends on a sense of people's apparently unlimited capacity for self-deception, it is natural that he should turn for "a psychological base from which to theorize" to the authority of Freud, for psychoanalysis is the most thorough and devastating critique of self-deception that exists. Like Philip Rieff, Sampson argues that one of Freud's blind spots was the psychology of women; more generally, his inability to see love except as an aspect of authority. "The human being's natural capacity to love derives, according to Freud, from the original primacy of emotions of dependence and submission," that is, from the Oedipus complex which in "normal" adults gives way to a freer love, still grounded, however, in earlier, dependent relationships. Freud's remarks on John Stuart Mill, quoted at length by Sampson, show the extent to which Freud conceived of the sexual relation as a relation of unequals. In a letter to his fiancée (November 5, 1883), Freud praises Mill as "perhaps the man of the century who best managed to free himself from the domination of customary prejudices" and then rebukes Mill, in Sampson's words, "for his supreme achievement in unmasking the most disastrous of prejudices to which Freud succeeded in clinging his life long"—the natural inferiority of women. Freud's letter continues:

> In [Mill's] whole presentation it never emerges that women are different be> ings—we will not say lesser, rather the opposite—from men. He finds the suppression of women an analogy to that of Negroes. Any girl, even without a suffrage or legal competence, whose hand a man kisses and for whose love he is prepared to dare all, could have set him right. . . . It is possible that changes in upbringing may suppress all a woman's tender attributes, needful of protection and yet so victorious, and that she can then earn a livelihood like men. It is also possible that in such an event one would not be justified in mourning the passing away of the most delightful thing the world can offer us—our ideal of womanhood. I believe that all reforming action in law and education would break down in front of the fact that, long before the age at which a man can earn a position in society, Nature has determined woman's destiny through beauty, charm and sweetness.

These bourgeois prejudices, Sampson argues, come out unmistakably in Freud's own courtship and marriage. It might be added that Freud's prejudice is shown in his whole psychology of women, a view which is now for the most part discredited. (As an example of the remarkable insensitivity of many psychoanalysts to questions of sexual equality—an insensitivity, needless to say, which is not peculiar to psychoanalysis—Ernest Jones, in whose biography of Freud this letter first appeared, adds the following comment, from the lofty pinnacle of the superior insight into these matters afforded by the science of modern psychology: "In exculpation [!] of Mill one should mention that his wife is supposed to have been the main author of the book in question.")

The point of this discussion, however, is not to score points against Freud, whose "position in intellectual history," Sampson thinks, "is secure." The point is that "since the sexual relationship is the most important of all human relations . . . an error at this point is bound to distort the total picture of man's psychic possibilities." Sampson tries to document this assertion by examining a number of 19th-century case histories—Elizabeth Barrett, Samuel Butler, John Stuart Mill himself—which illustrate the corrupting influence of sexual inequality and the tendency of this corruption to spread to every other kind of relationship. The subjection of women, Sampson argues, perpetuates itself from one generation to the next, in the form of the paternal tyranny so vividly recorded by these writers, but also, more insidiously, in the form of the feminine will to power, thwarted in the mother and transferred to her children. More precisely, the will to power derives in the first place from the frustration, particularly in women, of the will to freedom. "As Mill correctly sees [in his classic polemic, The Subjection of Women], the female who is denied by birth the normal freedom permitted to persons born as males will seek power as a surrogate." What Mill did not see was that the will to power led women to conspire in their own subjection, a fact which has always embarrassed feminists because it seems to imply that the injustices of which they complain are largely imaginary. The denial of freedom to women, according to Sampson, and their pursuit of power as a compensation, lead them to comply with the very system that thwarts their wish to control their own lives—the system of relationships founded on dominance and dependence. "Women, denied the rewards of psychic freedom, develop a strong interest in preserving such opportunities for psychic power as they have been able to forge for themselves." And these opportunities for power generally take the form of intense vicarious ambitions for their offspring.

The life of Mill's father, James Mill, vividly illustrates the process. The child of a poor Scottish shoemaker and a restless, ambitious woman who resented her husband's lowly status and compensated for it by visiting her ambitions on her son, James Mill became a successful man in the world's terms. In turn he became a perfect example of the dominating parent, subjecting his son to the famous course of studies that was to make John Stuart Mill a worthy successor to himself. It was out of this experience, and the nervous crisis to which it led him at the age of 20, that John Stuart Mill eventually struggled to the triumphant conclusion that "the desire for power over others can only cease to be a depraving agency among mankind, when each of them individually is able to do without it: which can only be where respect for liberty in the personal concerns of each is an established principle."

The fact that Mill, Butler and Elizabeth Barrett did, in the end, win through to a realization of their own victimization does not vitiate the argument that the whole process tends to repeat itself from generation to generation. What is important is the searing struggle which taxed the limits of their resources and would have defeated those with no such resources on which to draw. What is important, in short, is the price these people had to pay for such freedom as they managed to achieve; freedom, in any case, which is always qualified to the degree to which rebellion ends, as it did in Samuel Butler, not as an unambiguous assertion of the corrupting influence of power but as a cynical mockery of all pretensions, which allowed Butler to rest in the knowledge that "for most men, and most circumstances, pleasure—tangible, material prosperity in this world—is the safest test of virtue."

Nor can it be objected that in deliberately choosing extreme examples of domination, Sampson has ignored all the evidence that would have refuted his theory. The purpose of these extreme examples is to force us to recognize the persistence of authoritarianism beneath the rhetoric of equality in which family life is clothed in the 20th century. The family has admittedly changed since Victorian times, and it may even be that these changes tend toward equality; yet honesty compels us to admit that the patterns revealed, in exaggerated form, by these 19th-century biographies are familiar today. Many readers could doubtless testify to fresh outrages of their own.

Sampson has not established as an indisputable fact of history that the inequality of the sexes is the root of all evil, but the hypothesis certainly merits consideration. We might modify it to say that the new phase of family life, in which the family became increasingly isolated from the rest of the world—a change which seems to have taken place in the 18th century—intensified the struggle for power at the same time that it gave rise to the ideal of sexual equality, the former tending to corrupt the latter. In this form, the hypothesis might help to clarify the ambiguities of the feminist movement and of the "sexual revolution" which is supposed to have

The poet in Russia is more than a poet!
Yevtushenko

YEVGENY YEVTUSHENKO

selections translated from

THE BRATSK HYDROELECTRIC STATION and other poems

$1.00
free with 4-month trial sub to

NEW WORLD REVIEW

monthly, specializing in US-USSR relations, cultural exchanges, peace.

In every issue:
new works by Soviet poets.

(regular 1-year sub $3.50; foreign $4.50)

NEW WORLD REVIEW
156 Fifth Ave., Suite 308
New York, N.Y. 10010

I enclose $1.00 for 4-month trial sub. Send me free copy as noted above.

Name ....

Address ....

City ....

State .... Zip code ....

taken place within the last hundred years. Whatever else it may be, The Psychology of Power is an important contribution to historical analysis.

It claims to be, and is, much more than that. Read with sympathy by readers who hold in suspension the impulse, prompted by uneasiness, to cavil at every point, it is the kind of book that quickens our sense of injustice and reminds us of the degree to which we deceive ourselves into accepting a debased moral currency as if it represented a real standard of value. I have written at such length about the book not only because it is a compelling statement of the pacifist position —a position which it is too easy for "reasonable" men to dismiss—but because, quite apart from the merits of pacifism, it confronts us head-on with a challenge to our motives in dismissing it. Pacifism may or may not make political sense, but the fact remains that our common-sense objections to this and other varieties of political idealism—our eagerness to subscribe to the axiom, in one or another of its myriad forms, that "you can't change human nature"—serve to rationalize our fear of making fools of ourselves, our reluctance to invite ridicule by challenging arrangements which everybody accepts, and from which, in any case, we ourselves derive both profit and pleasure.

It must be said, however, that the political implications of Sampson's argument are not entirely clear. Faced with a world dominated by the psychology of power, what should a moral man do? He should dissociate himself from those who wield great power, that much is clear: intellectuals, for instance, should not serve the state. Neither should they effect a quietistic withdrawal from the world. What choices remain? According to Sampson, the only political movement with which a moral man can associate himself is a movement "that is striving against opposition to make headway in the right direction and is not itself seeking political power."

This formula is unexpectedly vague. It applies to the peace movement, in its nonviolent phase, and to the initial stages of the civil rights movement in the United States. But nonresistance, in the civil rights movement, is giving way to a drive for black power, and the peace movement is struggling to evolve from a protest into a political force. Are these developments to be deplored? Does the transformation of moral protest into political action furnish yet one more instance of the corrupting influence of the psychology of power? It can no longer be said that these movements are not themselves "seeking political power," when that has become their avowed intention. Are they therefore corrupt? Only a simple-minded pacifism can solve the difficulty by arguing that although the civil rights and peace movements have become political, they are still nonviolent. Power, not violence, is the issue. And in any case the search for political power has already begun to alter the nonviolent orientation of the protest movement. Demonstrators have begun to answer violence with violence, and discipline is becoming more and more difficult to maintain. Revenge emerges for the first time as a motive in the protests of the sixties: the vision of a revolutionary apocalypse, a universal turning of tables.

It is not easy to distinguish between the wish to dominate and the wish to be free from domination, when the wish to be free begins to take a political form: the attempt to fight power with power. Moreover, the pursuit of domination easily masks itself in the rhetoric of equality. The distinction, however difficult, can nevertheless be made, because the quality of a group's aspirations inevitably manifests itself in the things its leaders do and say. Groups seeking political power are not necessarily seeking the power to dominate other groups. They may be seeking no more than the material requirements for a decent life. Perhaps that is all Sampson means when he speaks approvingly of movements that are "striving against opposition to make headway in the right direction." But when he says that "all history testifies to the fact that the law of love is by no means impotent to move men's hearts and minds," he appears to reject the use of power under any circumstances, on the ground that the law of love is always incompatible with the law of power. The oppressed must appeal to the conscience of their oppressors.

Nordisk Press

SOREN KIERKEGAARD

"What people really desire is to have a good time in this world."

This is the true spirit of nonresistance —a spirit that is rapidly going out of the protest movement in the United States. One regrets its passing not because the appeal to conscience ever accomplished very much but because it did great credit to those who tried, in the face of every discouragement, to converse with their enemies. The conversations, however, were seldom reciprocal; indeed they merely testified, once again, to the arrogance of power and to its inaccessibility to persuasion. Power seldom yields without a struggle. Elizabeth Barrett did not escape from her father's domination by appealing to his conscience but by defying him. Similarly it would seem that civil rights for Negroes and self-determination for Asiatics can be won only in the face of the prolonged resistance of powerful groups in American society. If, in these situations, the appeal to conscience were to succeed, it should have succeeded a long time ago.

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

There is a scene in Viet Rock written and directed by Megan Terry (Martinique Theatre, Broadway at 32 Street) which caught my attention. A frightened and grieving mother is conducted into a military hospital to see her wounded soldier son. She bends over to speak to him—he is unrecognizably disfigured—but cannot elicit any response. Horrified at his silence she inspects the boy's identification tag. He isn't her son; the attendant apologizes for the error. The woman bursts into wild sobs as she presses the hopelessly marred soldier to her breast. This stranger too is her son.

The scene—no more than a moment really—is something of an intrusion in the proceedings. It may not be an original dramatic idea but it is vivid and potent. Yet it probably passes unnoticed in the hullabaloo of the proceedings. Viet Rock is an irregular chain of improvisations, in feeble rock 'n' roll style, intended to protest and mock the indignity and stupidity of our action in Vietnam.

One would suppose that such an enterprise, however crude, would arouse our social conscience, stir us to applause and shouts of approbation. Viet Rock does not propose "art" but propaganda. But we who are not averse to propaganda—particularly in a theatre that offers so little art—are sorely disappointed to find ourselves not only untouched but embarrassed by it. The reaction comes not simply from the ineptitude, the lack of originality in the various parodies (the screaming sergeant in charge of muddled recruits, the barking of inane slogans, the imbecile Congressional hearings, etc.), or a straining after strong effects of satire and caricature. We squirm because of something peculiarly pretentious behind it all. What disturbs is a tone not of youthful bravado or raw radicalism but of a certain artiness and a by now no longer new conformism.

It sometimes goes by the name of "total theatre," an item in "the theatre of cruelty." It aspires to be free and gay, raucous, graphic, topical, improvisational, saltatory, shocking and politically explosive. What is aimed at is not a show but an event. Something of this was done with incomparably superior skill in the Brook production of Marat/Sade, and it has been brought off in various forms throughout the theatre's history; but in Viet Rock we are given the gesture without wit, invention, thought or real point. There is little to indicate that this farrago is propelled by the force of genuine social indignation or understanding. There is hardly any true spontaneity; only untempered ambition and unripe mind. Such exhibits are swipes of avant-garde-ism.

Several steps up in the ladder of this "movement" is America Hurrah, "3 Views of the U.S.A.," as the author Jean-Claude van Itallie calls them (at the Pocket Theatre, 100 Third Avenue). Compared to Viet Rock, the proceedings are much better disciplined, steadier in aim, more coherent in effect.

The three "views" are played against an antiseptically neutral—white and silver—background resembling the surface aspect of a refrigerator. The setting is emblematic of the nature of the satire, or complaint, leveled against our civilization. The first piece, "Interview," begins with a group of applicants being questioned by clerks at an employment agency. The faces of the applicants and the interviewers multiply and merge into a phantasmagoria of the city. We are in the subway, at a street accident, at a charm school, at a discothèque, at the feet of a candidate for the governorship delivering a campaign speech, in a confessional, on a psychiatrist's couch listening to the medico's refrain: "Love! Love! Love! Hostility! Penis! Mother! Money!," terminating with an inglorious death for the central personage. The choral and picture motto of it all is a line of human ciphers whispering in the shadow: "Will you help me? Next! Will you help me? Next!" The lines of dialogue are illustrated by the actors in well-designed and arresting poses like photographic stills often accompanied by telltale flickers of sound. The eye which composed them is alert.

The second "view" equates the mediocrity of conversation and behavior among three office workers with the atrocious banality of television programs. They are played off contrapuntally against one another and finally merge, the first becoming indistinguishable from the second. The pattern is clear and clever up to a point, but the verbal material is routine.

The final episode, "Motel," is for me the most striking and, as a "signature" for the occasion, symbolic. It is wholly nonliterary: what counts in all three pieces is not the words, which are shorthand for meaning, but images. Language as individual expression is nonexistent. In "Motel," a figure—body as well as face entirely masked—speaks in taped speech—advertising the advantages of the motel's accommodations. As the spiel progresses we cease to listen to what is being said but watch the similarly masked and entirely grotesque figures of a man and woman as they disrobe and prepare for the expected sexual hanky-panky of the night. They scribble obscenities all over the walls and in every possible manner wreck the joint. Meanwhile, blinding lights are projected in the direction of the audience and a pandemonium of discordant sound thunders through the house. We are submerged in an absolute chaos of the senses. The result, astonishingly enough, is exhilarating. This is our natural element; this is home!

There is talent in America Hurrah; how much cannot be determined until future evidence is brought forth. The evening is well prepared and directed by Jacques Levy and Joseph Chaikin; the actors perform their several chores dutifully and ably.

Though I was certainly not bored, my responses were nevertheless restrained. The difficulty with such entertainments is that the derided clichés tend to be turned into further clichés. It is all very well—it is, in fact, necessary—to hoot at the vile personal disaffection of our time. But to take any pleasure in its exposure, or even to enjoy some masochistic satisfaction (in the guise of retaliation) at the injury, we must get more than its petty reproduction. In America, every new aesthetic enterprise seems to set out from scratch and nearly always with somewhat less energy and humanity than was manifested in a similar vein by our forebears.

Our scorners and jeerers, the would-be rebels in the theatre nowadays, appear to have hardly any artistic or cultural memory. There is only the present, con-heats up lusty lyrics for a "WILD CHRISTMAS" Privately recorded—a collector's item!

MAE WEST

Spicy songs of the season,
as only Mae West can sing them!
33⅓ lp album.

ORDER BY MAIL. CHRISTMAS DELIVERY GUARANTEED.

MONO—$4.98 ea.,
plus 25¢ postage & handling
STEREO—$5.98 ea.,
plus 25¢ postage & handling

Send check or M.O.
include name and address.

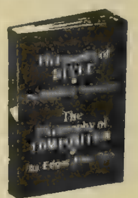
DAGONET RECORDS, INC.
1800 N. Argyle Ave., Hollywood 28, Calif.

WORLD'S BEST?

TRY IT AND SEE

☐ 7-month subscription—$4.79 (reg. $8 per year)
☐ Commentary Card catalog—10¢ (handsome reproductions of historic Jewish art)

COMMENTARY NA
165 East 56th Street
New York, N.Y. 10022
Name
Address
City State Zip



FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

WFF'N PROOF

The GAME for THINKERS

Can you solve this problem?

1. There are three numbered statements in this box.
2. Two of these numbered statements are not true.
3. The average increase in I.Q. scores of those who learn to play WFF 'N PROOF is more than 20 points.

Is statement No. [illegible] true?

A NEW DIMENSION IN EDUCATIONAL GAMES

WFF 'N PROOF: The GAME of MODERN LOGIC $6.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

EQUATIONS: The GAME of CREATIVE MATHEMATICS $3.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

ON-SETS: The GAME of SET THEORY $4.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

by Professor Layman E. Allen

Box 71-NA
New Haven, Conn.

Please send me ....WFF 'N PROOF
..............ON-SETS ....EQUATIONS
I enclose $ .... and understand that if I am not completely satisfied, I can return the games in 10 days for a full refund of the purchase price.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip........

Refund and return privileges guaranteed!
Dealer Inquiries Invited

WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF WFF'N PROOF

taining no yesterday and looking forward to no morrow. Thus Dada and Surrealism are never recalled, or German Expressionism (Georg Kaiser, Ernest Toller and others), or the genuinely lyric outcries that lent poignancy as well as color to Lawson's Processional, Rice's The Adding Machine, Cummings' him of our own twenties, or even the political cabarets of the thirties, and the fun and games of Beyond the Fringe and the shows at "The Premise." Some of this is to be found in the smudged plaints and jibes of our solitary "fools": Mort Sahl, Lenny Bruce, Bob Dylan, but the theatre which demands a synthesis and a progression is still barbarously infantile. We are thus made to appear even more abject and impotent by the trappings and parade of a hell-raising "sophistication" which are merely the discarded rags of affectingly ancient and ill-used clowns. Our attempts at liberating laughter and tonic defiance are kid stuff. The only innovation is the lack of heart. We may smile and occasionally guffaw but the consequences are for the most part dispiriting—as with the recent elections. Can we not become a little wiser without all of us first submitting to a real crack on our heads?

ART / Max Kozloff

Wrote Zola of Manet:

> I cannot repeat too often that in order to understand and savor his talent, we must forget a thousand things. . . . The artist is neither painting history nor his soul. What is termed "composition" does not exist for him, and he has not set himself the task of representing some abstract idea . . . he should neither be judged as a moralist nor as a literary man. He should be judged simply as a painter. He treats figure subjects in just the same way as still-life subjects. . . . Don't expect anything of him except a truthful and literal interpretation. He knows how to paint and that is all. . . . He is a child of our age.

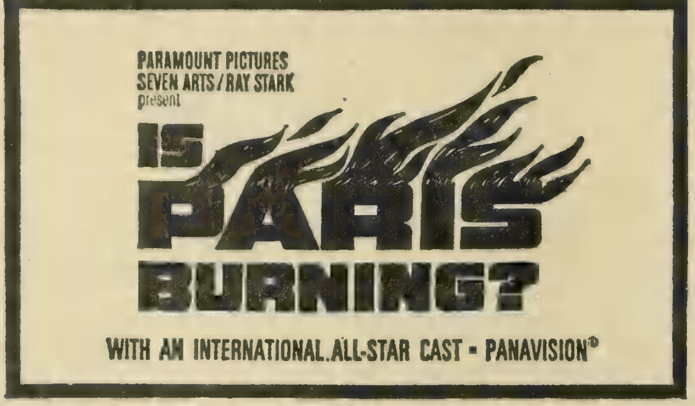
Contrast that with Paul Mantz, on the same subject:

> If the representation of human life, with its attendant joys and miseries, counts for anything in painting, then Manet's work . . . has very little to tell us. . . . The actors whom he places on the stage are mostly dumb. They pose immobile—don't ask them to show any feeling, or to express an opinion. They share the calm of a still-life group. They are examples of painting in which the sole interest lies in the technical questions they raise.

Two writers, observing the same art, not even disagreeing very much on what is seen, find themselves on opposite ends of the evaluative pole. It is a common enough occurrence. But what distinguishes this particular tiff is that it was initiated by the unwitting founder of modern art. (The Philadelphia Museum is currently showing a momentous display of Manet's work.) The issues he provoked are still resonantly with us, fruit not only of a particular sensibility but of a philosophical dilemma. Reluctant to speculate on abstract ideas, one viewpoint insists on the primacy of "painting" per se. Unwilling to settle for anything so hermetic as "technical questions," the other chafes at the deflation of humanism in the art of the last hundred years. What Manet seems to have done was expose the whole question not of any specific conventions but of aesthetic credibility. His work pivoted the spectator's attention away from the reception of various messages, visually embodied, to examine the way artistic meaning itself could be plausibly formulated. How much intrinsic significance one grants a painting, how much one is asked to contribute to it as an experience, are queries for the first time seriously invoked by images that once looked as harshly contrasted and stereotyped as playing cards.

In a sense, the conflict between a vacancy of human affect and a plenitude of pictorial charm is a false conflict, since the two neither preclude nor signal each other. In addition, nothing physically created by a man can be dissociated from the human, even if the 1860s were not prepared to make such a generalization. But on a more mundane level, the diminishing of, say, the illustrative quotient in a work (as well as other factors I shall discuss) could make evident how superficial had been one's stakes in it as a creation. The spectator was then called upon, either to shore up the aesthetic liaison anew (with whatever sensations were available), or to affirm loyalty to something "larger" than art, some complex of values which art had unaccountably betrayed. In either case, the physical data of the object became so much raw material for differing rhetorics of seeing—not just of responding. Dating from the crucial "Déjeuner sur l'Herbe," and "Olympia," both 1863, this sudden introduction of instability into the experience of art produced a great uneasiness. Innocence collided with memory, the necessity to "forget a thousand things" clashed with the urge to remember them. Both reactions were overcompensating and inevitable.

The artistic disequilibrium provoked by Manet would not have been so decisive had the 19th century been less materialistic and psychologically oriented. His work was shocking precisely because it converted a previous interest in material into an entity more sensuously alive than the simply tangible while, at the same time, it removed itself from the picturing of psychological relations. It might be said of these attitudes not that they were taboo in their particular milieu but that they would be resisted in proportion as they seemed self-contained—or rather, self-con-



RESERVED SEATS NOW AT BOX-OFFICE OR BY MAIL

PARAMOUNT PICTURES
SEVEN ARTS / RAY STARK present
IS PARIS BURNING?

WITH AN INTERNATIONAL ALL-STAR CAST - PANAVISION®

EVES.—MON. thru SAT. at 8:30 P.M.
SUN. EVES. at 8 P.M.
MATS.—SAT., SUN. & HOLS. at 2:30 P.M.
WED. MATS. at 2 P.M.

CRITERION THEATRE
BROADWAY AT [illegible] STREET (212) [illegible] 2-1795-6

cerned. According to a conscience that is still with us today, such self-concern is amoral. Even Baudelaire, the most perceptive critic of his age, could quote with approval Stendhal's "painting is nothing but a construction in ethics." By having apparently thrust the moral burden of primitive acceptance or rejection upon the spectator, while erasing all moral distinctions in the portrayal of life (itself a perfectly ethical position), Manet committed an unpardonable act.

But there is a deeper sense in which he was, and still is, a radical artist. Psychological dissociation was not exactly a new element in the history of ambitious figure painting. There were precedents for it of such caliber as Giorgione and Watteau. But these artists rendered a sense of human isolation within an envelope of longing. Shot through their work is a nostalgia in which some golden, but above all spiritually integrated, previous age is contrasted with the dross and fragmentation of the present. The figures in this art act as emblems of recall, shaded by a crepuscular light that gives poetic distance to, and hence acknowledges, a feeling of loss.

Manet, however, conveys something of this same sentiment as an inflection of the intractable, ungraspable sunlit present. Again, it was Baudelaire, this time prophetic, who postulated a theory with which to understand what had happened (although he was speaking of another artist, Constantin Guys):

> The past is interesting not only for the beauty which artists, whose present it was, have extracted from it, but also as past, for its historic value. The same applies to the present. The pleasure which we gain from the representation of the present derives from the beauty with which it may be possessed as well as its essential quality as present. . . . Modernity is the transitory, the fugitive, the contingent, one half of art of which the other half is the eternal and the immutable. . . . By suppressing it you forcibly tumble into the emptiness of an abstract and undefinable beauty.

Thus Manet's sin, in the eyes of his contemporaries, was to accept the definable and the immediate, even in his own social circumstances, as beautiful. Yet it had no aura of the memorable except that which his sensate touch could lend to it. In affirming the force of the individual moment itself, he embraced "modernity," but was constrained to exclude "history": certainly the major historical act in 19th-century art. Yet just as surely, this present, this "nowness," was an abstraction; it demanded to be fabricated, or rather, synthesized from the most fleeting impressions. That is what gives his work—whether in the bustle of a brasserie or in the face of Victorine Meurend—its look of being simultaneously observed and invented. The critical confusion over Manet's "realism" originates in the inability to bridge the paradox of this quest for the "immutably" fugitive.

Moreover, the local environment was a "no-environment" or limbo, unless it was conceived of as genre, that is, a typological situation. Such was not Manet's inclination (although he did produce innumerable pictures classifiable within genre modes). By stepping into familiar territory he entered, oddly enough, into the unknown. Rather than the still-life character of his images, upon which so many observers have remarked, I sense in them a curious unromantic because unacknowledged homelessness. One sees it in the "Concert in the Tuileries Garden," 1860, "Luncheon in the Studio," 1868, and "A Bar at the Folies Bergère," 1881 (all unrepresented in the present show), as well as, in more diffused form, almost everywhere else in his work. A Manet person reminds you that he likes solitude even when he is alone, as Jules Renard would say. But this enigmatic delicacy was quite outweighed by the fundamental strangeness that presented itself to a society which saw its dislocated reflection blinked miraculously into paint. The spectacle was neither heroic nor documentary. Very few people knew how to look at it.

Manet, then, cultivated a rather problematical immediacy. For, just as his view of reality was optically fluffed, instigating new codes of recognition, the pictures he painted required awareness of a new fiction, the autonomy of the work of art. It was evident that he had substituted fresh equivalents for formulas in his rendition of surfaces and lights—and that this, for the first time, constituted the "idea" behind an artist's vision. Detached from any given body of pictorial information, these equivalents—slashes of tone that became sleeves or masts—took on their own life. They rooted the spectator into an examination of his own present, that is, into a consciousness of his own experience as shaped by the work of art. Their sentient opacity overwhelmed, or

PLAYING WITH CHILDREN

Odd how the first forms of play involve the enactment of a growling savage animal that leaps unexpectedly from a hiding place and throws out its hands in claw-fashion causing the off-spring to tremble with an even odder glee

SEAMUS FINN

RALLY
Observing Two Anniversaries
Founding of the Soviet State
USA-USSR Diplomatic Relations dedicated to
PEACE AND FRIENDSHIP
MONDAY EVENING - NOV. 28
Carnegie Hall, 7:30 P.M.
* * *
Theme:
Peace in Vietnam — How?
Speakers
Mrs. Cyrus S. Eaton
The Hon. Alexei Stepunin
Miss Sara B. Harris
Mrs. Charles G. Burroughs
Mrs. Kenneth E. Boulding
The Rev. Wm. H. Melish
Musical Program
The Pennywhistlers
Surprise Soviet Artists
* * *
Reg. Admission $1.50 • Students 75c
National Council of American-Soviet Friendship
156 Fifth Ave., N.Y. 10010 • YU 9-6677

COMMENTARY
WORLD'S BEST MAGAZINE?

Commentary
SEE FOR YOURSELF
☐ 7 Mo. Trial $4.79
☐ 12 Mo. $8.00
COMMENTARY, NA
165 East 56 St., NY, NY
☐ Bill me.
☐ Check enclosed.
Name..................
Address................
Zip......................
Outside USA + $1/yr.

$2.95 each
SAVE YOUR COPIES OF (YOUR PUBLICATION)
- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office
3 for $8.25
ORDER NOW — send check or money order.
MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

put to flight, the vestiges of a narrative transparency. Even the "reminiscent" elements of such pictures assisted in this transformation. With casual daring, an artist uses older motifs—in this case, from Hals, say, or Goya—not as inspiration or rebuttal, that is, not rhetorically, but merely as anatomical material to be rearranged under a pictorial flesh. In addition, the habit many of his personages have of seeming to gaze inward at their own memories appears largely as an effort to redefine their identity in the present. Everything in Manet's art is caught up with concentration on isolating that which is happening now.

In the typical texts on modern art, this phenomenon is usually misunderstood to have inaugurated the reductionist aesthetic, the recurring effort to parse forms down to an essential minimum. While it is true that Manet made all kinds of sacrifices of what he considered superfluous—what serious artist doesn't?—his work actually grew more complex and pictorially rich (from flat masses to broken color) as his career developed. He was obeying no imperative, no outside prescriptive or cyclical view of art history. A more recent perspective, growing out of our immediate situation of impersonal forms and "primary" structures, might view him as the prototype of the "cool" artist, handling his elements at a deliberate remove from emotional involvement. Only a few years ago, a French writer, Georges Bataille, wrote: " 'The Execution of Maximilian' reminds us of a tooth deadened by novocaine; we get the impression of an all-engulfing numbness, as if a skillful practitioner had radically cured painting of a centuries-old ailment: chronic eloquence." Although it is true that we tend to meditate on, rather than partake of the emotions implied in a Manet painting, we are made to sense their presence in a new way. Various states of feeling are indirectly presented to us, rather than given. And just because there is no attempt to solicit or manipulate, they become much more authentically the artist's own. With Manet, detachment leads only to the personal.

If one comes back to the original problem, aesthetic credibility in Manet takes on almost urgent overtones. After him criticism was put defensively on its guard about the evocativeness, not merely the mechanics, of paint qua paint. More important still, the spectator was left with no screen, no conventional lens with which to view an artistic transcript of ideas into sensations. Instead, he was disconcertingly and invigoratingly confronted with his own responsibility to grasp an artistic metaphor which pretended to be nothing but itself.

Next week, I shall discuss the Manet exhibition proper.

FREE! With every new subscription to

THE NATION

Report on
THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY 1966 by the authors of Danger on the Right
Benjamin R. Epstein
and Arnold Forster

A Vintage Book V-358 $1.45

THE BIRCHERS:

- Who they are
- What they want
- How they work
- The real extent of their power and influence today

"This is pamphleteering in the classic sense. The authors who have collaborated on previous books, including Report on the Ku Klux Klan, are never shrill. The Report is a revealing tour through the theory and practice of the philosophy of Robert Welch and the influential forces behind him."

—William Hogan in the San Francisco Chronicle

For your FREE copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY, fill out the coupon below, and start receiving THE NATION, this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of opinion.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

Herewith is my order and payment for a NEW subscription to The Nation. Please send me FREE a copy of REPORT ON THE JOHN BIRCH SOCIETY.

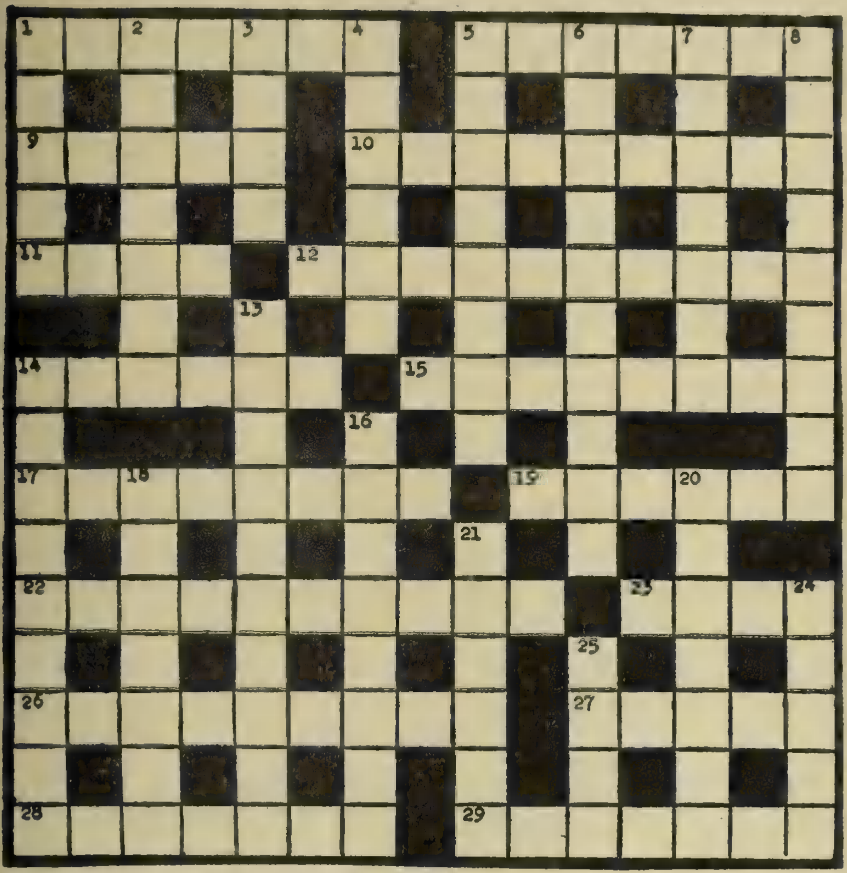
☐ One Year, $10 ☐ Two Years, $18 ☐ 6 Months, $6
(Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 per year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY .... STATE .... ZIP No..............
11-28-66

Crossword Puzzle No. 1177

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 The vessel of good cheer, in part, after conflicts? (7)
5 The one floating in "Guys and Dolls," or is such a head all stuffed up? (3, 4)
9 and 8 down Polite drivers on the line, but they know the public works. (5, 9)
10 See 17 across
11 One was certainly attached to the land. (4)
12 A boy may be, but not Albert. (It might even apply to a rarity.) (6, 4)
14 The sort of care belonging to me is smooth. (6)
15 See 25 down
17 and 10 Bill gets paid now but it could be time for a little casual thought. (3, 3, 2, 9)
19 Soft turf around, as one understands. (6)
22 Gulls. (10)
23 See 2 down
26 Is the meaning of Latin "vene" related to the "land of the rising sun"? (9)
27 Some shocks are, when equipped with listening devices. (5)
28 Broken lines at the point of a bastion. (7)
29 He is likely to pay according to the going rate. (7)

DOWN:

1 In the light of our forebears, were they turned up at that time? (5)
2 and 23 across Engaged to back up what some clerics did, in part. (7, 4)
3 Bill mentioned a better one without aspiration. (4)
4 Look! Henry's wife is about the room! (6)
5 Some of us hope spring will soon, being attractive! (8)
6 Take a wrong route, and go with a pleasant disposition. (4, 6)
7 Inclined to be heavy, as Poe said. (7)
8 See 9 across
13 Probably not the characteristic of good waiters. (10)
14 Mice, perhaps, in range of New York. (9)
16 One should know if it's a plant! (8)
18 Its meaning might sound summary! (7)
20 Asparagus is, but shouldn't be. (7)
21 Tells the truth about the various floors? (6)
24 Bill might have what Schumann made wild. (5)
25 and 15 across Two spots describing the location of the general? (4, 3, 5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1176

ACROSS: 1 Valetudinarians; 9 Undergo; 10 Restful; 11 Hailed; 12 Sedative; 14 Night train 17 Inge; 19 Cornucopia; 22 Loveless; 23 Mimosa; 25 Assuage; 26 Thereto; 27 Sophisticatedly. DOWN: 1 Vaughan Williams; 2 Ladling; 3 Torments; 4 and 15 Door stop; 5 Norwegians; 6 Rascal; 7 Afflict; 8 Self-explanatory; 13 Orion's belt; 16 Accident; 18 Gives up; 20 Proceed; 21 Alkali; 24 Otic.

TRAVEL

WORLDWIDE FREIGHTER GUIDE $1.25
Lists: Rates — Routes — Schedules — Accommodations — 700 Passenger Carrying Freighters. INEXPENSIVE — yet FIRST CLASS — Voyages vary from a short 7 days to all the way around the world. Longer voyages average less than $12 a day. Almost as low as staying home, yet you enjoy an ocean cruise, & visit exotic ports, with first class food & accommodations.
TravLtips,
40-21 Bell Blvd., Dept. GB, Bayside, N.Y. 11361

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FREE! Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

PERSONALS

WHO KILLED KENNEDY?
1" button, 10" bumpersticker, 50c. each, ppd. Any 3, $1.00. Quantity Discounts. WHO KILLED KENNEDY?, P.O. Box 309, Venice, Calif. 90291, Dept. F.

OUTSTANDING news stories, features, articles considered for publication. Globe Press International, Box 598, c/o The Nation.

RECENT anti-war films for rental. American, North & South Vietnamese. Write for rates: Free School, 20 East 14 Street, N.Y.C.

Buy Your Books
through The Nation

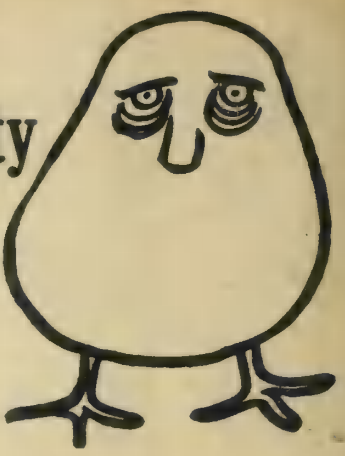
Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to: The Nation, 333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014.

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

The Truth Shall Make Ye Silly Putty



Is it true what they say about THE REALIST?

". . . more or less the periodical equivalent of Lenny Bruce."—Steve Allen

". . . the most anarchistic publication in the country today; The Realist is the bible of the American underground."
—Raymond Heard, The Montreal Star

". . . a sometimes sophomoric, often significant, frequently funny satirical magazine."—Newsweek

"You can say things in The Realist that you can't say in other publications."
—Terry Southern

". . . the funniest magazine in America."
—Timothy Leary

Following are the highlights of the 5 most truthful (and still available) issues of The Realist. They cost $1. They're yours free with a subscription.

- Jules Feiffer—on closing the credibility gap; plus playlet whose theme is that sex is dirty after all.
- Racial Conflict—on one hand, Bill Worthy discusses Negroes and Vietnam; on the other hand, "The Whitey Survival Manual".
- Profound Analysis—"The Ethnic Joke as a Barometer of Class Distinction"—reprinted from The Journal of American Poverty.
- Religious Revival—The Americanization of Zen; also, The Devil's Visit to New York.
- Impolite Interviews—a unique question-and-answer session with Dr. Timothy Leary of LSD infamy; a confrontation with a high school student attempting to rid his community of venereal disease.
- The Vietnam War—Michael Myerson's slanted report from Hanoi; A Thousand Nights, the memoirs of Dean Rusk.
- Cartoon Spreads—Freezing after death; the junkie battalion; protest marches; the fag battalion.
- Conspiracy Theory—The role of the CIA and the police in the murder of Malcolm X; Who killed Adlai Stevenson?
- Personal Journalism—Bratwurst Day in Sheboygan, Wisconsin; I was an Abortionist for the FBI.
- Strange Debate—Resolved: that there should be a violent peace movement.
- Non-Obituary—Lenny Bruce, Lyndon Johnson and the Deodorant Syndrome.
- Soft-Core Pornography—Implications of the Ginzburg decision, or "The Day the Supreme Court Banned Vaseline".

THE REALIST, Dept. N
589 Broadway
New York, N. Y. 10012

Enclosed please find:

☐ $1 for your 5 most truthful issues.
☐ $3 for a 10-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free.
☐ $5 for a 20-issue subscription plus those 5 issues free.

Name ....

Address ....

City .... State .... Zip ....

IMPROVISATION BIT JULIUS NOVICK

THE NATION

DECEMBER 5, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY Burlingame, Calif.

PREVENTING THE PEACE

REPORT FROM AN INTERMEDIARY

PHILIPPE DEVILLERS

•

SAIGON: DROWNING IN DOLLARS

DESMOND SMITH

View from Hunters Point

No Way Downtown

DONOVAN BESS

NEWSPAPE
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

Reston as censor

Paris, France

DEAR SIRS: Your editorial on Herbert Matthews ["The Penance of Matthews," Oct. 31] brings to mind a revelation on a singular Congressmen-newsman relationship.

At a Congressional hearing in the aftermath of the Cuban missile crisis, James Reston coolly told a House subcommittee investigating news management that he had known of U-2 spy flights for years before Gary Powers was caught, but the news was not printed because it might have damaged U.S. security.

Sitting in a front row, collecting research for a master's thesis, I had an unobstructed view of a Congressman on the subcommittee start bolt upright in his chair, his face expressing incredulity and surprise, look around at serious, silent colleagues, and then assume similar expression at Reston's continuing testimony.

More shocking to me than the fact of an unpublished story was James Reston's complete righteousness in telling of it, and the obeisance given him by Congressmen, motivated not to question this New York Times "Duke." Harold Barnstein

white Australia

East Lansing, Mich.

DEAR SIRS: I want to contest Hugh Weston's statement ["Letter from Australia," The Nation, Nov. 14] that all polls and surveys indicate that "white Australia is favored by the overwhelming majority." The following are Gallup poll percentages:

Year	Keep Asians Out	Let Them in	No Opinion
1954	61	31	[illegible]
1956	51	42	7
1957	55	36	9
1958	45	44	11
1959	34	55	11
1960	33	59	8
1961	39	51	10

(The 1961 poll mentioned Africans as well; for "Asians," 57 per cent favored change.)

It should be noted that 1957 and 1961 were recession years, when there were fears of unemployment. I do not have figures for later than 1961; but advocates of immigration reform have been able to use the fact that the percentage favoring a change steadily increased until in 1964 (the last poll I saw before leaving Australia), more than 75 per cent favored a change. . . .

It might be mentioned that when the Labor Party modified its hitherto very conservative attitude last year, it was praised by almost every major newspaper.

Allan Oaten

left thumb sketch

Amherst, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: Frank Donner's review of my "very important" book, The Communist Controversy in Washington [The Nation, Oct. 24], reminded me of the artist before his easel, arm outstretched and eye squinting, thumb rising from a clenched fist as though measuring the proportions of the studio figure in the background. And on the canvas, we can see that what he is actually painting is a portrait of his left thumb. . . . What I object to is the reviewer's pretense that his left thumb is my text.

His conclusion is that my book is an "elaborate apology for the Congressional witch hunt, the prime tool

(Continued on page 612)

EDITORIALS

The Moral Question

Time was when one of the uniformed or civilian heads of the military establishment, if he chose to honor an educational institution with a personal appearance, could be assured of a courteous reception. A general's stars, or the equivalent rank in mufti, strike awe into the hearts of most civilians. There has been no radical change in this respect among most members of the faculties and student bodies at practically all universities. A minority of the teachers and students, however, are so vehemently opposed to the Vietnamese War that they no longer abide by the rules of decorum. This may well mark a permanent change in the academic atmosphere, for even a minority may have a decisive effect on manners in a segment of society.

The change is not necessarily a substitution of violence, physical or symbolic, for discussion. A year or so ago red paint was thrown at Gen. Maxwell Taylor at a California junior college, but this incident was exceptional. More typical was the demonstration against Secretary McNamara at Harvard, and against Gen. Earle G. Wheeler at Brown. Such "noise" as occurs at confrontations of this type is between students opposed to the speaker and those who support him. The former no longer feel the obligation to be polite to the university's guest. One of their purposes is to embarrass him, if possible. Another is to get publicity for their cause.

Discourtesy gets the headlines; but the reporters and headline writers lose sight of the substance. The demonstrating students are concerned with the immorality of the war; the official who comes to present the Administration's case is concerned with effective prosecution of the war. This requires not only troops and weapons but a measure of approval among the people. The Administration spokesman comes with that objective; his opponents try to balk him and to bring their side of the controversy to public attention.

At Brown they tried to read a statement to General Wheeler. "We are here," the manifesto began, "as representatives of the protests that will follow you and other government officials anywhere in the world you choose to go." At Harvard they asked Secretary McNamara how many civilian casualties U.S. troops had caused in Vietnam. McNamara said he didn't know. An anguished howl went up: "Don't you care?" Maybe he does, but his concern has a low priority and, as a practical matter, does not affect his decisions. What he deeply cares about is (1) winning the war, (2) minimizing U.S. casualties, (3) minimizing casualties among the South Vietnamese military.

Tempers rise in discussion when one side feels it is not getting a fair hearing, and that is obviously the situation of students and others opposed to the Vietnamese War. Automatically, the media are on the side of the war-making establishment. They may give space and time to the opposition when Senator Fulbright, for instance, conducts an investigation but, day in, day out, the publicity pictures a just war and persuades the public to support it. Tempers rise also when one side feels that the other is misstating or distorting the facts. McNamara did that when he suggested that we should tax ourselves more in order to support both Great Society programs and the war. Assuming that we have the means to support both, as a practical politician he must know that we will do nothing of the sort. Given the pickup of Republican seats in the House, does he really believe that the upcoming Congress will appropriate more money for welfare? The striking irrelevance of McNamara's remarks on this topic would try the most angelic temper—and young adults are not angels.

This is only one facet of the unreality of much of American politics. When the central issue in an election campaign goes undebated and undiscussed, when most candidates avoid taking a stand on it and appeal to the voters on local issues and political stereotypes, the minority with discerning minds and generous emotions will take out their frustrations on any Administration official who comes within reach. The shouting and shoving that occasionally result may be unfortunate, even embarrassing, to administrators and officials, but it is to be preferred to the silence of the unconcerned.

Reuther's Chance

Not a few AFL-CIO leaders, men not normally given to overstatement, regard the election as a "catastrophe" for organized labor. The movement lost some forty friendly House members, and most of the governors it backed. The anti-labor radical Right has gained strength.

In the face of these untoward developments, George Meany, president of the AFL-CIO, keeps a stiff upper lip. He is gratified by the way in which the Committee on Political Education got out the vote: all we have to find out, he says, is why the vote went the wrong way. Mr. Meany is not likely to ask whether the miscarriage had anything to do with his own leadership and policies.

On November 14, the AFL-CIO executive council, which eats out of Meany's hand, reindorsed its past foreign policy decisions. Asked at a news conference whether this meant that no mistakes whatsoever had been made, Mr. Meany snapped "Yep." After a review of nineteen major areas on which the council had taken policy stands: "No, we can't find any mistakes," Mr. Meany said, displaying an immobility to be matched, perhaps, only by Dean Rusk when he submits to the inquiries of the press.

Walter P. Reuther, president of the 1.5-million-member United Automobile Workers, absented himself from the council meeting at which Mr. Meany received such a gratifying vote of confidence. Mr. Reuther's differences with Mr. Meany and with Meany's ideological mentor, Jay Lovestone, are well known. Last June, Reuther characterized an executive council statement on Vietnam as "intemperate, hysterical, jingoistic and unworthy of a free labor movement." The council cried that "disruption by even a well-meaning minority can only pollute and poison the bloodstream of our democracy."

What, then, must Meany think of the resolution adopted at the November 17 meeting of an organization representing 250 union leaders in New York and New Jersey, roundly criticizing the AFL-CIO executive council for its support of Administration policy in Vietnam and calling for an immediate de-escalation of the war? The position of this

JAN 4
JAN 26

IN THIS ISSUE

December 5, 1966

EDITORIALS

594

ARTICLES

Preventing the Peace:
597 Report from an Intermediary Philippe Devillers

602 Saigon: Drowning in Dollars Desmond Smith

606 View from Hunters Point: No Way Downtown Donovan Bess

609 TV Overseas: The U. S. Hard Sell Herbert I. Schiller

BOOKS & THE ARTS

613 The Improvisation Bit Julius Novick

615 No David in Sight Kal Wagenheim

616 Private & Public Sensibility Leonard Kriegel

620 A Tour of the Pops Robert Hatch

621 Art Max Kozloff

622 Lament for a Gifted Man (poem) Arthur Gregor

623 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 19

group is that of the Trade Union Division of SANE, a position which is necessarily anathema to the Meany-Lovestone concept of foreign policy.

It cannot be said that Reuther himself emerged from the election unscathed. Had he attended the council meeting, Meany would no doubt have thrown up to him the loss of five Michigan House seats and the defeat of Senatorial candidate G. Mennen Williams. These setbacks probably had nothing to do with Reuther's stand on Vietnam, to which only the most rapacious hawks could take exception. The results, however, are symptomatic of an underlying weakness in Reuther's current position, not only on foreign policy but on domestic issues as well. The issues now emerging are not amenable to mildly liberal slogans and prescriptions.

It may be that Reuther finds himself today in some such position as that of Sidney Hillman in the thirties. He may be compelled not only to adopt increasingly explicit positions on crucial issues but to take these issues directly to the rank and file of American labor. If so, he must be prepared to trade immediate losses for future gains. But Hillman was likewise prepared, and so was John L. Lewis.

The Real Danger

The world is understandably nervous about Germany, and Germany is nervous about itself. Thirty years is not long enough to exorcise the memory of a great nation surrendering itself to a homicidal demagogue and a party that, true to the implications of its policies, plunged the world into the bloodiest war in history. The success of the National Democratic Party in the elections in Hesse and Bavaria raises the question whether this malignancy may not recur.

Some of the outward signs give reason for concern: drumbeating, sensational posters, demonstrations, the same old breastbeating about the "Fatherland," the same strident appeals to atavistic emotions. But amid these signs and portents the real danger has been overlaid by speculation as to whether the NPD is made up of "new" Nazis or old ones, and whether they will form the nucleus of another catastrophic explosion of fanaticism.

The real danger has been discerned clearly by Theo Sommer in Die Zeit. He notes that the pillars of the state will not crumble unless they are brittle inside. If the pillars are sound, the emergence of such a faction as the NPD is not crucial. As Die Zeit puts it:

> Where distinct leadership is lacking, where one affair after another produces ill feeling, where the state is not able any more to manifest itself, there faith in the state will wane, there the people are forced to search for alternatives. . . . If there is any reason to be alarmed today, it is less because of the gain in NPD votes than because of the weakness of the classical center. The decisive question is not: how strong is the NPD? The question is: are the parties of the Bundestag strong enough to cope with this new structure on the fringe of the party system?

In the light of this analysis, how will Bonn react? Will it attempt to suppress NPD activities? Will it try to abrogate proportional representation? Such measures would amount to treating the symptoms, while leaving the underlying pathology untouched. The Nazis are not here again; what may remind us of the Weimar Republic is the decay of the Center, not the strength of the extremes or, as is now the case, the one extreme that is left after the purge of the Communists and the "bourgeoisization" of the Socialists.

The need, then, is to concentrate attention on the Center, on its ineptitude, its confusion, its immobility, and not to overplay the significance of the vote in Hesse and Bavaria.

Paradise Reagan-ed

To understand the election of Ronald Reagan as governor of California, it is important to grasp the idea of that state as "paradise." The Eden image has led millions to move there; from the Okie migrations of the thirties to the present the state has swarmed with newcomers.

California has given us the first auto-dominated city, Los Angeles; and even within the "old and settled" city of San Francisco people move around as though in a frenzy. All this movement to California and within it suggests that Californians are strongly motivated to escape—from the cold blasts of the Midwest or the problems of the South, or lack of opportunity, or whatever.

Thus, when an election came up during a time of rapid social change and increasing problems, the people of California fled reality. Instead, they indulged in a ritual cleansing, and brought in a totally inexperienced man who campaigned on the basis of being a political innocent. Brown, who campaigned on his experience, was fated to emphasize the very thing that people held against him: he reminded them that they were human, that they were part of society and had responsibilities. But now all is simple and wonderful in a land where "thinking makes it so." There is no need for government and, led by an innocent, the Californians can look forward to eternities of joy, while the rest of America, in the land of Nod (East of Eden) must continue to struggle and sweat.

What Nature Abhors

Marshall McLuhan, the media guru from Toronto, is presently touring the States, speaking before college audiences and businessmen's luncheons, and the press is following him with an avidity that recalls the royal visitation some years ago of Queen Marie of Rumania. Reporters have ever been partial to public figures who deliver remarks designed to make readers sputter over their morning coffee; Queen Marie had a native talent for such utterances and Dr. McLuhan has made a profession of it.

His great insight into the nature of our age is that reality resides solely in the media of communication—the media constitute the message. Thus recently he has been complaining because people persist in assuming that what he says is intended to mean something. It is the fact of his speaking that is significant, and the purpose of his words is not to convey ideas but to encourage people to think—rather as an electric current encourages a frog to jump.

McLuhan is a smiling sort of man who clearly enjoys being thought outrageous. It is not an unusual type—every large dinner party is apt to include one such, and you're lucky not to sit next to him. What is remarkable in McLuhan's case is that he can command national coverage for such a statement as that color TV will be more involving than black and white because the cone of the eye receives color, while black and white comes in only at the edges. However, it is on a par with the fact that $100,000 can be raised to put on in the biggest armory in New York a week of electronic happenings in which tremendous technological resources are employed to produce effects so insignificant that the viewer is not certain whether or not they have occurred, or with the fact that the pathetic Dr. Timothy Leary can fill a large theatre to preach the religion of LSD. We survived the era of the Big Lie only to enter the age of the Big Hoax. Dr. McLuhan's current tour is sponsored by the Container Corporation of America, a company interested in selling the box, not the contents.

A Touch of Realism

The image of the Teamsters' union as a roughneck, antisocial outfit is cherished by people who have no use for unions in general. Not a few of these would-be union busters live and vote in Southern California. For the most part their ideas are fixed, but some may have their minds changed by the Teamsters' Transportation Opportunity Program (TOP), a multimillion-dollar project now awaiting government approval as part of the War on Poverty program. The objective is to teach reading, writing and arithmetic to 1,500 persons in California in the next fifteen months, then to teach truck driving to 500, mechanical maintenance of trucks to another 500, and passenger car driving to the remainder. And then to get jobs for them.

TOP was turned down initially by the California Department of Vocational Education, on the ground that the Teamsters' union is not an educational institution. Of course it isn't, but its deficiencies in this respect may be remedied by a tie-in with the Institute of Industrial Relations at the University of California's Los Angeles branch. UCLA will supervise the program, with Teamsters' Joint Council 42 providing administrative services.

Several novel—and promising—features have been embodied in the TOP setup. The students will be school dropouts recruited from Watts and similar incubators of despair and disorder. The teachers will be experienced truck drivers. There will not be too wide a gap between trainees and teachers in dress, language and background. The trainees will be strongly motivated, since those who qualify will be in line for jobs. Young students will get the regular youth training allowance of $20 a week; adults can get up to $85 a week while in training.

The success of the project is not assured, despite its formidable support. The California Trucking Association, which has its own school for drivers, is not enthusiastic about the proposed alliance of the federal government, the Teamsters and UCLA. But the CTA course, like a number of others in the area, is not aimed at the poverty community: it costs the student $495.

The Teamsters seem to have thought out their role in the project. Even if a student does nothing but complete driver training, he will be qualified to take jobs which require ability to operate a car. After finishing the TOP course, students will be encouraged to accept non-driving jobs as a means of getting a foothold in the industry, if no drivers' jobs are open. Later the student may be able to work his way up to a well-paying long-distance driving job. The sponsors of the program wish to avoid resentment on the part of drivers who are working and have seniority.

The whole project is experimental, but it embodies a down-to-earth approach, and the combination of a great university and a powerful union gives it a good chance.

PREVENTING THE PEACE

Report from an Intermediary

PHILIPPE DEVILLERS

Mr. Devillers, at present a visiting professor in the Southeast Asia Program at Cornell University, is the director of the Southeast Asia Studies, Center for Study of International Relations, University of Paris. He is also editor of France-Asie. His publications include Vietnam and France, Histoire du Vietnam de 1940 à 1952, and with Jean Lacouture La Fin d'une Guerre, which to date is the most detailed study of the Geneva Conference and Agreements of 1954. Mr. Devillers was a correspondent in Vietnam and Cambodia for Le Monde from 1945 through 1946, and from 1947 to 1957 he free-lanced for various publications in Southeast Asia.

For more than a year now, North Vietnam has been facing a new blitz. Hundreds of planes daily pound roads, bridges, villages, factories, administrative buildings, etc. And behind the smoke of the exploding bombs and rockets, a voice keeps repeating: "I want peace. Come on, peacefully; don't be afraid. I just want to bring you to the conference table. Let us reason together."

Facing the new blitz, North Vietnam resembles London twenty-six years ago. The British people also heard the sweet words of peace and the explosions of bombs simultaneously, and they resisted both. Yet nobody in Europe has ever dared to cast responsibility for the four years of mass destruction and mass killings on Winston Churchill because he refused to "negotiate" in July, 1940, with Hitler. In what sense, then, is North Vietnam today alone responsible for the continuation of the fighting?

It is responsible, says the Johnson Administration, for two reasons: Hanoi is engaged in aggression against South Vietnam, and Hanoi refuses to come to the conference table. The grounds on which these assertions are made, and the means by which they are given a seeming credibility, are the topics of this article.

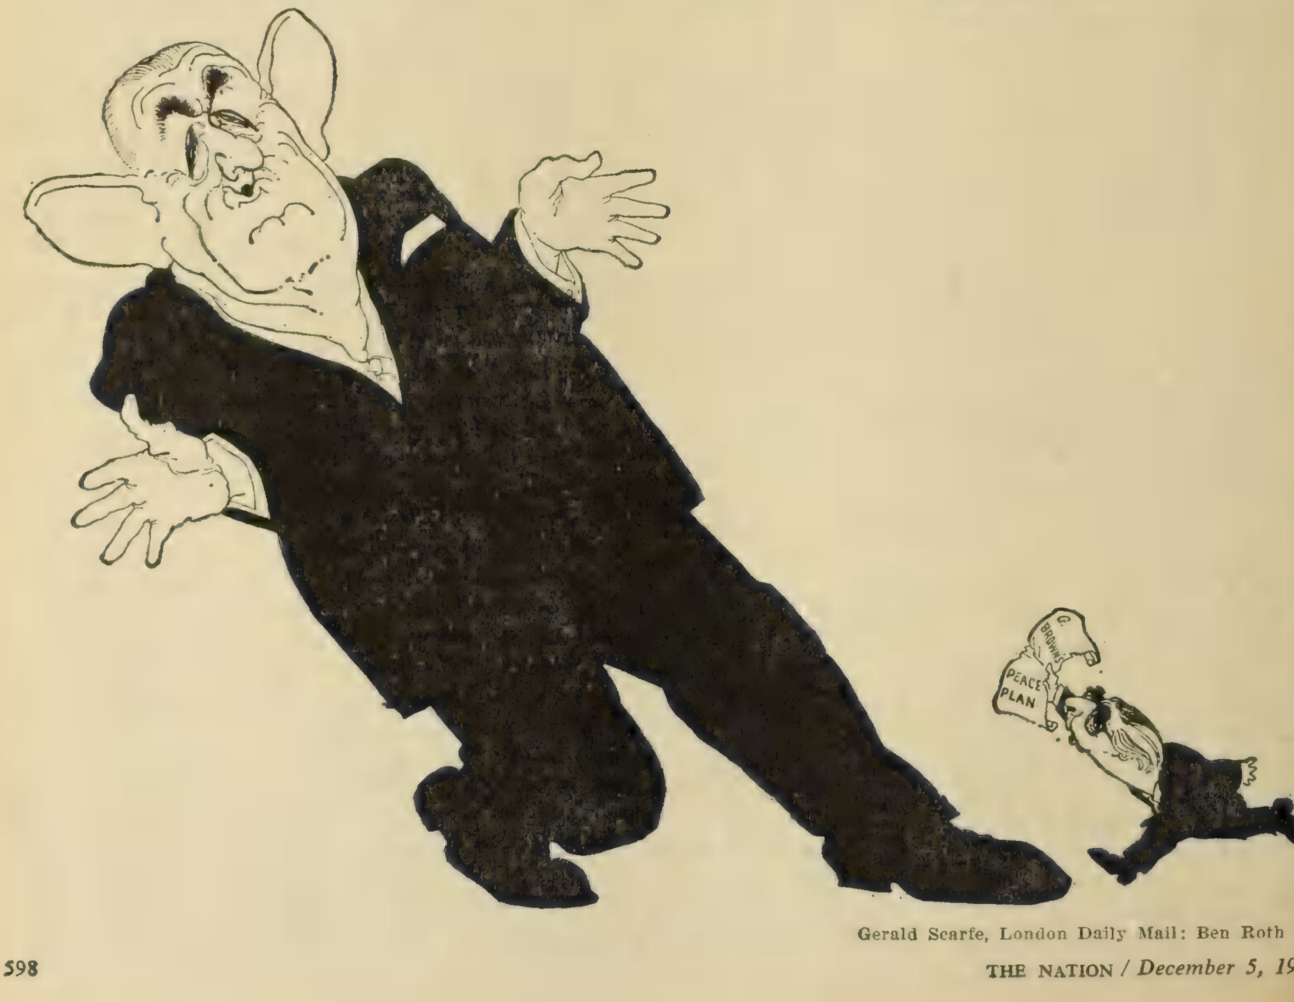
For many years Washington has presented the background of the war in Vietnam in a way to suit its own interests. This Orwellian rewriting of history, which twists or obliterates every significant event between 1954 and 1960, is now accepted by millions of well-meaning but uninformed people in many parts of the world. The official American version is so powerfully financed and widely spread through mass media that millions of people all over the world are now unable to know the truth.

To begin with, we can understand nothing about Vietnamese politics if we ignore the fact that Vietnam is the only country in Southeast Asia where there has been, for forty years, a very close association between nationalism and communism. As a Frenchman, I must confess that this is the unhappy but natural result of the policy of a right-wing-dominated colonial administration which, from 1921 on, called any opponent of colonial rule a "Communist." People who challenged colonial policy increasingly became allied, sometimes reluctantly, sometimes willingly, with the Communists. From the start, the Communist Party was a staunch opponent of colonial rule and consequently became widely admired. A high-ranking official of the French Colonial Office once told a friend of mine that almost any nationalist leader in Vietnam had his price—but, said he, "we could never buy Ho Chi Minh." Every Vietnamese knows this.

The association between communism and nationalism, the identification of a national cause and a social struggle, is so strong in Vietnam that it can be broken only by offering in its stead a strong nationalist, noncorrupt, non-oligarchic government. That is precisely what many of those concerned had hoped to achieve in the South after the Geneva Agreements.

What has been going on in South Vietnam since 1954? The story did not begin in 1959 when the Hanoi government allegedly decided to subvert and take over the South. The story actually begins just before the signing of the Geneva Agreements, when the French and the Americans decided that Diem would be the best leader of that part of Vietnam that could still be denied to the Communists. He was chosen not because he was an able or intelligent politician but because he was known to be a staunch anti-Communist who enjoyed a certain prestige, a reputation for incorruptibility, and because he had been recommended by the CIA.

Almost from the beginning, the South grew up as a dictatorship. Diem first purged the army and started the war against the sects; then he hunted the Southern democrats and leftists. He arrested many thousands of them, in violation of the Geneva Agreements which provided that nobody could be indicted or charged for the stand he had taken during the French war. With CIA help, he created a network of informers and police organizations throughout the country. With American acquiescence, he bluntly refused to talk with Hanoi about any resumption of normal



Gerald Scarfe, London Daily Mail: Ben Roth relations between North and South, and in 1956 he refused to hold the elections outlined in the Geneva accords.

I do not believe that the failure to hold the election was the determining factor in the resumption of the Vietnamese struggle. The main cause was Diem's partisan stand, his reliance on Catholic and Northern refugees, his imposition of a despotic oligarchic rule on the broad-minded and liberal Southern population. Very early, the regime started a denunciation campaign and outlawed all left wingers, democrats and middle of the roaders. By 1956, the network of police informers had become so efficient that the remnants of the sects, of the Viet Minh, of all former members of the French Union forces felt obliged to go underground and to respond to government violence with violence. Army "mopping-up" operations were met with increasing resistance all through the countryside.

In 1956-57, some members of those anti-Diem resistance movements, most of them right wing, went to Paris to ask for help. Even members of the Saigon officers corps were looking for help against Diem. These anti-Communist leaders were already concerned by the flow of former Viet Minh members who were joining their groups to escape Diem's witch hunting. Even then, they were afraid that Communists would soon outnumber anti-Communists in the resistance groups. But they were unable to get help.

The situation became more serious. Despite intensive searches, interrogation under torture, burning of houses and intensified mopping-up operations, the villagers did not yield. However, the police became increasingly exasperated and jailed or killed more and more people. In 1957-58, villages began to create "self-defense units" to resist police and army intrusions by force. The first "South Vietnam Liberation Front" came into being. Saigon replied by sending regiments with artillery and aircraft against the rebels. Guerrilla warfare was the result.

Thus, from 1958 onward, the army in South Vietnam became aware that Diem was playing into Communist hands by reducing the people to such a state of despair and exasperation that the Communists would eventually find it easy to take over the rebellion. The military felt they would have to seize power before this could happen. However, the network of Diem informers was efficient: the plots were foiled and the army purged.

American propaganda claims that the murder of village chiefs, the "Vietcong wave of terrorism," was the beginning of the story. But American propagandists do not point out that 80 to 90 per cent of the so-called "chiefs" killed or kidnaped in the villages in 1958-59 were informers of the secret police; nor that the people in these villages were closely watched and spied upon, often denounced, arbitrarily blackmailed, arrested and even tortured. The villagers had no more choice than did the resistance groups in German-occupied Europe: unless they killed the informers, they themselves would be arrested, tortured or killed.

Thus the revolt in South Vietnam is the direct product of the oppression of a peaceful rural populace by a police state. The Southerners had no choice other than to fight or be enslaved by the "bourgeois," mainly Catholic, "refugees" from the North who had the upper hand in the Diem regime. To survive, and to get rid of this hated oligarchy, they asked for Hanoi's support. Hanoi refused on the ground that its intervention would bring the United States into the struggle and Khrushchev's policy of coexistence would be impaired. It recommended that the Southerners try to get reforms from the Diem regime.

But urged on by the peasants, Viet Minh veterans decided in 1959 to go into action. In March, 1960, they published a letter saying that the people of the South could no longer wait, that they had to rise in self-defense; they called for drastic reforms and for setting up a new democratic coalition government in Saigon. This letter was distributed and published in Paris in April, 1960. It is therefore a mistake—or a lie—to state that Hanoi decided in September, 1960, to create a liberation front. The crucial issue at the Lao Dong Party Congress of September, 1960, in Hanoi was: "Should we support the comrades in the South who are now engaged in a dangerous struggle, or should we let them down or advise them to compromise?" The Chinese said that the Southern insurgents were fighting an anti-imperialist struggle and must be supported. The Russians recommended caution and stressed the risks of increased difficulties with the Americans, which might impair the spirit of Camp David and lead to a major conflict. Hanoi decided to let the comrades in the South decide for themselves what they thought best, and merely to help them make some adjustments in their "general political line." Representatives of various Southern resistance organizations decided in December, 1960, to create the National Liberation Front of South Vietnam.

The story of "aggression from the North" was fabricated early in 1960 by Diem, who circulated fake reports of "Northern" infiltration in the Highlands in order to conceal his inability to deal with the rural insurrection, and to enlist American armed support. Although foreign military intervention violated both the Geneva Agreements and the Manila SEATO treaty, the "idea" was accepted by Washington, and military assistance granted.

It is true that after 1962 Hanoi, in response to the American "special war," supported the struggle of the Southern insurgents. No one, however, can call that aggression. There are not two states in Vietnam, but two parts of one country. The Geneva Agreements are very emphatic and precise on this point. The "provisional military demarcation line" between French Union forces and the People's Army can in no way be considered a political boundary. In a letter of May 6, 1954, to Bao Dai, Mr. Bidault, the French Foreign Minister, said that because France was committed to defend the unity and independence of Vietnam, it would never accept a partition of that country.

Europeans are better able to understand this kind of situation. For anyone who remembers the 1940-44 period, the North Vietnamese who fight in the South with Chinese or Russian weapons are no more "aggressors" than were the Free French who parachuted into occupied France with British or American weapons. So the Diemist story of "Northern aggression" cannot be a justification for any kind of attack against the Democratic Republic of Vietnam, or for military action and escalation that were intended to conceal political and intellectual incapacity.

My second point concerns Hanoi's "refusal" to negotiate. Because of the new turns just taken by the American escalation machine, I feel I must disclose certain facts which have not hitherto been made public. Last year I was one of the many people who attempted to make possible a contact between Washington and Hanoi. In May, 1965, shortly after Mr. Johnson's Baltimore speech and Pham Van Dong's four conditions for negotiations, I went to Washington to find out for myself what the American Administration's position really was, and whether it was seriously prepared to negotiate. I was in Washington from May 15 to May 21—during the greater part of the bombing pause—and I had a most interesting series of interviews with White House, State Department and Pentagon officials, influential Senators and columnists. I was told by a responsible source that Ho Chi Minh knew perfectly well (it was reported that a message had been channeled to him) that he could stop the bombing at any moment: he had only to give a signal, a hint of his "willingness to talk." It appeared to me, however, that the Administration, ignoring (or unaware of) Vietnamese psychology, was pressing Hanoi so hard for an answer to Johnson's peace offer that it could scarcely reply without appearing to be yielding to a threat. The need for a neutral intermediary, to allow Ho Chi Minh to answer in an oblique way, seemed imperative.

Meanwhile, on the final day of the bombing pause, the representative of the North Vietnamese Government conveyed to the French Foreign Office a confirmation that Dong's Four Points were to be considered as a basis for talks and that Hanoi was not asking for a withdrawal of American troops prior to any negotiation. Because of the difference in time between Paris and Washington this message was transmitted three hours later: the bombing was thus resumed, and the chance to negotiate destroyed. At the time, there were roughly 30,000 American troops in Vietnam.

However, a few weeks later it still seemed worth while to attempt to get some answer from North Vietnam. So I wrote a personal letter to Ho Chi Minh. I asked him whether he was prepared to respect the independence of South Vietnam as long as the South Vietnamese wished to maintain it, whether he would prefer to negotiate directly with Washington or with Saigon, or through a reconvened Geneva conference, and finally, what his attitude was toward President Johnson's offer to negotiate. It took some weeks to get a reply, but it finally arrived on August 13, and Hanoi radio made it public. Ho Chi Minh wrote that the Democratic Republic of Vietnam would respect South Vietnam's independence as long as the Southerners wished (reunification would be effected by consent), that he would consider a Geneva-type conference if the Americans unconditionally and immediately ceased the bombing of the North, abstained from offensive operations in the South, and gave some "tangible proofs" that they had accepted the Four Point proposal. He asked for withdrawal of American troops, without being specific about any delay.

This answer was published in Le Monde (August 14, 1965), but although it was primarily directed to them, the Americans hardly took notice of it. There were only a few lines in such papers as The New York Times and the New York Herald Tribune. The conclusion drawn in this press and on the C.B.S. network by Mr. Rusk himself (August 23), was that the answer proved that Ho Chi Minh did not want peace. I thought differently; it seemed to me that this was a hard-line, but still open answer, not a blunt refusal, and that it could lead to negotiations. Therefore, from Boston, I wrote the White House to explain how I viewed the matter. I was invited to talk it over with the Assistant Secretary of State for Far Eastern Affairs.

On the 26th of August, near La Guardia Airport, I had a two-hour talk with Mr. William Bundy to whom I tried to explain my point of view, as a simple private Atlantic citizen. He refused to accept the notion that Hanoi was willing to negotiate and said that in any case Hanoi's third point ruled out the possibility, since the U.S. was determined not to negotiate with the National Liberation Front as a Southern organization. Bundy told me that in his opinion there was no chance of political settlement in the South for at least two or three years, during which time, he said, we shall have rebuilt the social structure of the countryside, the peasants will be so disgusted with the Vietcong that they will denounce them, and Saigon will then be able to wipe them out completely, or to bring them under strict control. After which, Bundy said, it may be possible to have free elections and then, perhaps, negotiations with the Left. I emphasized then to the Assistant Secretary (as I had the previous day to The New York Times) the necessity for "de-escalation." I said that the bombing of a dam in Tonkin, reported in that morning's papers, was not the kind of answer Ho Chi Minh's interview called for. On the contrary, in response to what has to be interpreted as a signal—even if it was not conclusive—Americans would have to show they had heard and understood it, and give a corresponding answer. That would be an easy way to "de-escalate." I asked then if, as I had been told in the White House in May, Washington could now consider a pause in the bombings. Bundy eluded the question. A few weeks later, a smiling young American diplomat told me in Paris: "We have been slow to move in, as in World War II. But now we have in Vietnam an absolute mastery of the air. When the Vietcong will be unable to move more than two men together in the rice fields without being shot from a helicopter, the war will fade out. . . ." Such attitudes could only make me suspicious of Washington's real intentions, and the suspicion was confirmed for me sometime later, when I heard the complete story of the breakdown of earlier attempts at negotiations.

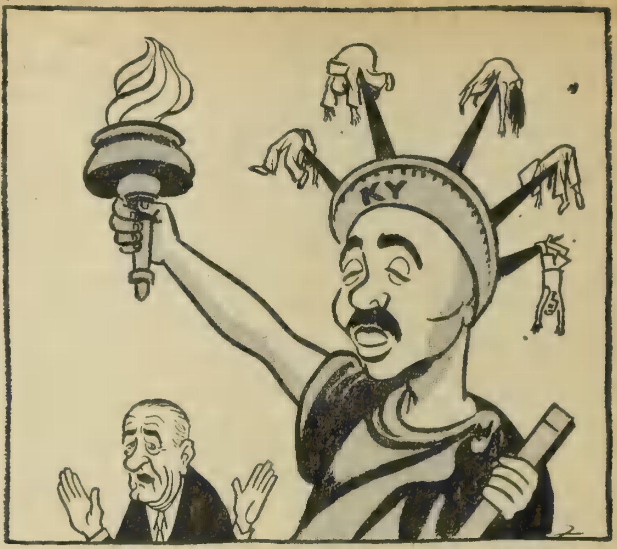
During a visit to Vietnam in February, 1964, I had tried to assess peace possibilities. At that time it had seemed possible to get some kind of political compromise in Saigon—which had been impossible under Diem—and with this, a chance of peace. But it was precisely because this chance of peace did exist, and had to be eliminated, that General Khanh made his coup with American backing. Soon thereafter the situation became so dangerous that on July 1, 1964, de Gaulle and Sihanouk suggested a new Geneva conference. U Thant strongly supported the proposal and made it more precise. The Russians, the Chinese, the Poles, the Indians—and Hanoi—accepted the idea. On July 23, de Gaulle made a second call to reconvene the Geneva conference. The following day President Johnson stated that such a conference would only "ratify terror" and aggression, a thing he could not accept. On July 25, the British Government supported this position and General Khanh "categorically rejected any proposal aiming to reconvene a new Geneva conference." On July 27, Khanh announced the reinforcement of the body of American advisers and of U.S. Special Forces. On July 28, George Ball said in Washington: "We do not visualize taking extreme decisions, but if there are provocative actions, we should probably respond."

A few days later came the Tonkin Bay incident which completely destroyed any possibility of international talks. I have had, from some Vietnamese officers who have since emigrated to France, some hints pointing to the conclusion that this incident was deliberately provoked in order to offset the pressure for peace. They said that a small special force was sent from the South and a secret landing made on the North Vietnamese coast, as well as on small islands, far north of the 17th Parallel, with the support of U.S. ships. What were South Vietnamese and American task forces doing in this area at that time? However the incident occurred, it was taken seriously in Washington: a Congressional resolution gave President Johnson a free hand "to deal by force with such aggression." It was good politics to meet Goldwater's warmongering, but it seems to me (and I suggested as much in public meetings and on television) that Congress ought to inquire into the Tonkin Bay incident and that full light should be cast onto what can be called the "masterminding of escalation."

After August, 1964, the North Vietnamese realized that they would soon be attacked. A contact they had in Paris states that they were then prepared to negotiate a settlement with the United States and to meet some envoy, in Rangoon for instance, for discussions. This message was channeled to the UN Secretariat and passed on to the U.S. Government. General Ne Win undertook to arrange the meeting; it was quite official and Ne Win's speech announcing the meeting appeared in the Burmese press. But the Americans took the line that the offer was not genuine, and in any case, they said, nothing could be done before the Presidential elections.

U Thant then offered to mediate in a private capacity, and Adlai Stevenson so informed the President. He had to wait two months for an answer, which appeared to be flatly negative. Stevenson was shattered. Washington rejected these last mentioned approaches on the ground that they would break morale in South Vietnam, already thoroughly shaken by Buddhist demonstrations and other anti-government moves. The time was again considered inopportune and the U.S. Government refused to negotiate from a position of weakness.

Still another approach was made through France in February, 1965. M. Couve de Murville went to Washington to inform the government there that both France and the USSR felt that the time was propitious for a conference and were ready to work for it; that Hanoi (where Mr. Kosygin had visited recently) would accept talks, and that even the Chinese had indicated they would not object. The American response was to bomb the North (March 2, 1965). To the French, it was as though an ambassador had been shot as he was returning from the meeting place, and by a man of his own party. Since then, as a neutral diplomat put it, the North Vietnamese can no more trust the Johnson Administration than the British and French could trust Hitler after the capture of Prague.



Tribune (London)

"We are not in Vietnam to dictate what sort of government they should have."—President Johnson

All this is only part of a longer story, but from it one should understand why no one involved in what has passed between the two sides in the last two years can credit the Johnson Administration's contention that it is seeking negotiations. The American side has not made a single serious approach. It has always knocked at the wrong door although repeatedly told what course to take, whom to approach, how and where. Johnson, Rusk, McNamara and the others just hope that some day Moscow will succeed in outflanking Peking and order Hanoi to withdraw its troops from South Vietnam; but they give no indication as to the regime that will then be established in the South.

A cease-fire could probably have been negotiated a long time ago; but a cease-fire can be negotiated only if the two parties concerned are told what will happen next. For the South Vietnamese people, what should happen next is that the resistance groups and movements—the sects, the democrats, the Communists and their allies, as well as their competitors—should be allowed to take part in the political reconstruction process. We know that the Americans and the Cao Ky government are not ready (and have never been ready) to give a voice to anyone who is not anti-Communist. The American political conditions, put forward on November 17, 1965, and confirmed to me by William Bundy on December 14, have not been softened. As long as Washington, at the request of South Vietnamese cliques, closes the door in this manner to movements struggling for social justice, democratic government and genuine national independence, there will be no end to the fighting.

We may, however, imagine what could happen. A civilian, representative government in Saigon could pledge that after a cease-fire all Southern organizations, whatever their creed or ideology, will be admitted into the discussion to form a provisional government. Such a "provisional government" could be made up of Buddhists, Catholics, trade unions, the army, the Front—the entire political spectrum could participate, on the basis of a limited program to be carried out by common action. This government could at least act as the representative of South Vietnam; it would be in a position to state that it would be neutral in international relations, that it would aim at normal, even good or cordial, relations with Hanoi; it could accept economic aid from any country in the world, provided it did not include political interference or strings, and it could commit itself to a general election.

I therefore think that the only way to end this war is to enter a gradual process of de-escalation, to proceed by stages: First an indefinite and unconditional halt in the bombing of the North, and in the South a "fading" of offensive operations on both sides. Second, a civilian, provisional but broadly representative government in Saigon. Third, a cease-fire, discreetly negotiated with the NLF, including serious, mutual political and military guarantees, followed by an international agreement guaranteeing the neutrality of South Vietnam. At this point, the withdrawal of the U.S. forces, at the request of the Saigon government, would take place in stages: first to some enclaves, then for home. In a free South Vietnam, left at last alone, there would be then a Presidential election, possibly controlled by an ICC.

These are only tentative suggestions, but they show that there are still obviously viable alternatives to military escalation. The trouble is that, for the time being, there is not much to negotiate between Washington and Hanoi. It is obvious, from the exploratory talks I had in the United States last year, that the only thing the Americans want from Hanoi is the withdrawal of their troops from the South and a cessation of aid to the NLF. And Hanoi's leaders understandably have made clear that they will not cease to help their brothers in the South as long as the Americans support the puppet regime in Saigon.

However, the negotiations that could lead to peace are not those between Washington and Hanoi but among the various groups in South Vietnam which could combine to form a truly representative government. The easiest, the cheapest way to peace is to act decisively in Saigon. Moscow and Peking will never jointly ask Hanoi to yield, and Hanoi will never ask the NLF to surrender or to yield. But if a way is opened in the South for discussions with the Front and if those culminate in a settlement acceptable to the Front, then events could move quickly. What the Front will find acceptable, Hanoi will also accept, and what Hanoi will accept, willy-nilly, Moscow and Peking will have to accept. So the door to peace lies in Saigon. All Washington has to do is furnish the key.

Saigon: Drowning in Dollars

DESMOND SMITH

Mr. Smith, a frequent Nation contributor, was recently in Saigon on assignment from an American television network.

"This is Tan Son Nhut," says a soft French voice on the intercom; "please fasten your seat belts." The Air France 707 was dipping its wet and glistening wings beneath a sky thick and dark with thunder. The flooded patchwork of emerald green rice paddies, canals and stands of coconut trees slid by below. The nose of the big jet dipped abruptly, and just as swiftly we are rolling to a stop on the rain-slicked runway. The war is here all right. Tanks line the perimeter; blast shelters house droop-nosed Phantom jets, and on the flight line stand the burnt-out hulks of several aircraft hit in a surprise Vietcong mortar attack.

• • •

The windows of the bar on the 9th floor of the Caravelle Hotel are crisscrossed with masking tape for protection against bomb blast. Outside the night sky is ghostly bright with flares, apparently a nightly occurrence. "It's O.K.," says a veteran correspondent, "the Caravelle is the safest spot in town. Let me give you the score. Number one—the joint is owned by the Catholic Church, so we've got God on our side. Number two (dropping his voice to a confidential whisper)—I hear that the management pays double taxes to the National Liberation Front."

"Really?" I asked, "then what about last year's terrorist bombing?"

A wry smile creased his face. "That was not the VC. As a matter of fact, they were quite upset about the entire affair, and I'm not sure that they didn't help to track down the culprit. In the end it turned out to be a disgruntled employee." So that disposed of the question about safety.

At about 8:15 the next morning, we were driving through Saigon's outer ring of festering slums. We were searching for an election rally, but Mister Chan, the driver, had lost his way. Now we were trapped in a welter of muddy alleyways and hostile faces. Bob Jennings, the cameraman, clutched tight his shiny new $45 Abercrombie & Fitch throwing knife. Lou Cioffi, the A.B.C. correspondent, kept his eyes on the crowded street. Harry Wheldon, the sound engineer, was busy racking off pictures with his Nikon. Meanwhile, Mister Chan talked quietly in Vietnamese to his 9-year-old Chevrolet as it slithered over the muddy road.

By the river's edge we finally ran into our election rally. Ringed by stony-faced police, a group of about thirty people, chiefly children and old men, were listening to a dapper man in a sharkskin suit—apparently one of the candidates—who was reading rapidly from a typewritten speech. Behind him, five other candidates fidgeted at a cloth-covered table; every so often one of them looked at his wrist watch (under the election rules, all the candidates had to appear together and each could speak for only ten minutes at a time). Lovely stuff. But first there was a small boy of about 11 who insisted on standing by the microphone and asking for candy, and soon Jennings was surrounded by clutching hands and the spectators lost all interest in the candidates and were watching the cameraman with rapt attention. It is a familiar phenomenon and, from our point of view, frustrating.

The mere presence of a television crew changes the scene in a hundred different ways. To my somewhat practiced eye, a half-dozen new elements entered the picture frame; a banner appeared, a candidate spoke more boldly, the police became alert, the crowd shifted its attention toward the camera, and so on. Later the candidate in sharkskin came over and asked if we would like some of his election material.

"Tell the American people I'm campaigning under the sign of the conical hat."

Since he spoke English, I asked him if he would mind telling us a little more about the election. He was willing to oblige, only he would prefer to stand with his back to the Saigon River.

"How many are in your party?"

"We have four candidates."

"What is your program?"

"A good program, an end to inflation and a democratic assembly just as soon as the Communists are driven out."

"What is your work when you are not campaigning?"

"I'm a public health doctor."

"Employed by the government?"

"Yes, of course."

"Has the government given you time off to campaign?"

"Yes, and it has also paid for all our posters and our campaign literature and it provides police protection so that we can campaign."

"You are not afraid of the Vietcong?"

The candidate laughs. "Why should I be afraid?"

A brave answer. One should never admit cowardice; one should be stoic like this doctor, standing with his back to the river.

■ ■ ■

A street map of Saigon literally reminds one of an elongated spider's web. The core of the city is totally dominated by the Americans occupying the biggest buildings. Between the heavily guarded PX (formerly a fashionable hotel) and the sandbagged American Embassy, the once elegant heart of Saigon is now a coruscating enclave of street urchins, prostitutes, GIs and honky-tonks. By contrast, the outer strands of Saigon are taken up almost wholly by dreary ribbons of tin-roofed shantytowns. Out there is a kind of political no man's land, occupied alike by Catholics, Buddhists and followers of the National Liberation Front. So insulated is the town's core from this perimeter that when the Buddhist-led street riots took place earlier this year most Americans in Saigon first learned about them in their morning newspapers. Two fundamental things, it seems, are terribly wrong here. The first is that the Americans have brought with them all the imperial trappings—fantastic corruption, unlimited wealth, and an age-old system of appointing court favorites. This has made many Vietnamese (not all of them VC sympathizers) suspicious about the purpose of this massive U.S. intrusion. The other thing wrong is that, for all their apparent power, the Americans live and work in a tight little enclave, isolated and insulated from the rest of the city. To an outsider the insecurity of Saigon itself is perhaps the most astonishing discovery.

In South Vietnam as a whole, some 5 million people, out of a total population of 14 million, live in a dozen government-controlled cities. But the bulk of the population lives in the countryside, a third of which is Vietcong day and night and the remainder no more than "secure by day." What the U.S. forces hold in fact is a series of garrison towns or forts. The war itself has a mood and character absolutely different from World War II; it feels like a replay of the Indian Wars. The problem for the American garrison is to "find and fix" the elusive enemy. Contact with the Vietcong then would appear to be accidental. It is not. The American tactic is to mount a search and destroy operation in known VC territory. The Vietcong tactic is to attack and destroy an American unit when the price of victory seems cheap. To make contact the American commanders will send a company deep into VC territory by means of helicopters; these units are "bait" for Vietcong. The initiative then is almost always on the side of the Vietcong. If the enemy chooses to fight, the "bait" company is frequently wiped out, either by the enemy or by the air strikes and artillery which are immediately called in to soften up for the main assault.

Along the crowded road that runs close by the now closed Vien Hoa Dao, Saigon's main Buddhist pagoda, old slogans have been whitewashed and new election posters are papered everywhere. We went there to interview the owner of a printing plant and publisher of one of Saigon's new dailies. He was happy to explain the coming election for his American friends. The main task now was to re-educate the South Vietnamese peasant in the ways of self-determination and democracy. As the South Vietnamese Army (ARVN) and the U.S. forces free more and more areas, pacification teams will move in, and free elections will be held in which the U.S. forces will not interfere. The present constitution-writing assembly will provide the basic document—a Bill of Rights, so to speak—for this future democratically elected assembly. All parties will be represented, Buddhist, Catholic, Hoa Hao, Cao Dai, perhaps even a few Communists. The people can elect any kind of government they want.

"Supposing it turns out that most of them choose the National Liberation Front?" The interview abruptly ended.

* * *

Nowadays South Vietnam lives, if you care to call it living, almost entirely off the Americans. Below the 17th Parallel the fragile Asian economy has all but collapsed under the prodigious dollar deluge. An Air Vietnam hostess told a British journalist recently: "Of course I want the Americans to stay—I don't want the Vietcong to take away my freedom. But I can't help hating the Americans for the way they are corrupting my country." No one can possibly underestimate the importance of corruption in South Vietnamese affairs. And in spite of questions raised during Congressional hearings, it seems unlikely that the situation will change.

The essential fact about South Vietnam is that the military directorate owns and runs it like a giant private trading organization. South Vietnam is divided into forty-five separate provinces, each commanded by a military officer. Each province is further subdivided into dozens of districts that are also under military rule. Communities (with the single exception of Saigon) all have army officers as mayors. In theory, all lines of authority reach back to the Defense Ministry in Saigon. In fact, the corps commanders are the virtual war lords of their regions. It is they who distribute the U.S. economic aid in their regions; they dominate the transportation system; their representatives have their hands on practically all business enterprises.

By the most conservative estimate, ARVN is one of the largest consumers of military aid in the world. Since 1960, more than $2 billion has been spent on training and equipment. One remarkable thing is that there has not been an audit of military aid since 1960. But while the military directorate has little to complain about, the ordinary ARVN conscript has plenty. According to a private briefing given by a U.S. general to newsmen in Saigon last August, more than 113,000 members of the Vietnamese armed forces deserted in 1965. An additional 67,000 deserted in the first six months of 1966. And in spite of stiff penalties, the desertion rate continues to climb.

The Ky military junta has been walled off from the U.S. military and civil command by a fiction that makes the directorate a government in its own right. Not since Major Watson of the United States Marines recognized Colonel Trujillo ("he thinks like a Marine!") as the legitimate head of state, has the United States painted itself into such a corner. The affection of South Vietnamese generals for their special interests as distinguished from the national interest thus makes a scandal out of every American sacrifice in this bitter war.

When Premier Ky's agents arrested Ta Vinh, a Chinese importer, and summarily executed him for "profiteering" it was a cruel publicity stunt. And that's all that it was. Immediately afterward, the Chinese community called a boycott on importing and sent prices soaring in a dizzy spiral. Last summer, Ky relented and eased restrictions. Now AID is financing the Chinese importers and profiteering is easier than ever. According to Sen. Robert P. Griffin, who visited Saigon earlier this year, only two officials, out of a total of 3,000 AID employees in South Vietnam, supervise the multimillion-dollar commodity improvement program. Griffin angrily accuses AID of laxity, and has quoted French allegations that $200 million in AID money has been deposited abroad by South Vietnamese businessmen.

The first thing I encountered in South Vietnam was a taxi driver who offered to exchange my dollars at a black-market rate of 160 piasters to the dollar (the official rate is 118). The second was a modest hotel room that cost $24 a day. The two phenomena are closely related. Prices in South Vietnam are fantastic, and (in spite of devaluation) are going up at the astounding rate of 1 per cent a day. It is difficult to calculate what the piaster means to a South Vietnamese worker, but even so the costs of most commodities are stupefying. A kilo of pork last year cost 60 piasters, today it is 260 piasters. Lettuce has jumped from 15 to 70. Rice—the basic food—from 5 piasters a liter to 18. A bar of soap costs 50 piasters; a suit of clothes 10,000 piasters; a phonograph record 1,000; a Honda scooter 50,000; a Taunus automobile more than 1 million piasters. A stevedore earns 200 piasters a day ($1.90).

Prices constitute the meanest form of rationing. In the ARVN where a soldier has to buy his own food, salaries range from 3,000 piasters a month ($25) for privates to 19,- 000 piasters ($160) a month for generals. Civil servants are, if anything, even worse off. The highest grade (Class A) earns only 9,500 piasters a month ($82). The Vietnamese educated class, with its Confucian ideas of good government, is understandably bitter and humiliated. A doctor summed it up from his point of view: "What can we say to you Americans—merci bien—for turning our women into a nation of bar girls?" Bar girls, a euphemism for prostitutes, earn more than government ministers.

From the economic point of view the overwhelming problem of South Vietnam is the dollar deluge. And the Ky directorate has printed money to pay for the war. Vietnam's money supply has soared from 27 billion piasters in 1965 to some 57 billion now. According to official figures, the American GI spends $30 to $40 a month in Vietnam, or roughly four times the annual per capita income of the Vietnamese civilian. In a desperate effort to soak up some of the dollar deluge every conceivable kind of luxury item is being squeezed through the already overcrowded ports. It is broadly true to say that in South Vietnam the American GI has available to him the best of everything. Yet one may ask how ordinary people are supposed to live. The answer could be that they don't.

■ ■ ■

"I'm telling you it's the Godforsaken truth," said Harry, that morning in Saigon, as we ate breakfast in his room at the Caravelle. "We are quite cold-bloodedly razing every VC village in South Vietnam. Operation Wipe Out. They've got about 12,000 hamlets to go and the only hold right now is the terrific napalm shortage."

"Stop it, will you," I said. "This is a war isn't it? People get killed in a war don't they? But that's a good deal different from what you are saying."

"Come with me to Long An in the morning—it's fifteen minutes by chopper—and I'll show you the scorched bodies we left behind on Friday."

"I'm not interested. What's the point?"

"I want you to see what's really going on. Bring the cameras. This isn't a bloody war, it's genocide. The trouble with people like you is that you hate facts. I want you to smell the goddamned facts."

"Look, I don't believe Rusk when he calls the VC murderers, and I don't believe you when you want to prove to me that the U.S. Army is nothing more than Murder, Inc."

"But what I'm telling you is the truth. They've got even bigger plans, including the fire bombing of all of Zone D."

"When was the last time you wrote this story for your paper?"

"You must be kidding! I can't file this kind of story. For one thing, they'd never run it. For another, I'd be called home—back to the financial pages." And as the sounds of Saigon waking up came through the thermo plate windows, Harry snapped on his Zenith world-band radio, and presently we were listening to Armed Forces Radio: "Next I'm going to spin a hot one for y'all—Frankie boy's Strangers in the Night."

"He must have made a million with that record," said Harry, his voice mournful. "How do you make a million in this game?"

■ ■ ■

This morning a Vietnamese woman was shot down as she sold food just across the street from the Suzy Wong tailors. We were about a block from the Caravelle Hotel when we heard the sharp ping of the bullet. From a heavily sandbagged building nearby MPs came running with their burp guns at the ready. We reached the intersection known locally as "Hell's Corner" (where earlier this year the MPs had mistakenly opened fire on passers-by, killing and wounding a score or more Vietnamese). Suddenly we saw three Negro GIs facing a wall, arms high, being frisked by two MPs. A crowd of some fifty Vietnamese had gathered around the dead woman. A GI pushed through the crowd and placed her conical straw hat over her face; a dark stain of blood was beginning to form under her shoulders. Meanwhile a red-faced MP lieutenant was shouting: "Get the Americans outa here! Get the Americans outa here!"

Within minutes there were three television crews on the scene filming the action and a dozen or so reporters were asking one another what happened. A photographer who claimed he was from Paris Match asked an MP to remove the straw hat so he could get a better picture. The MP stopped chewing his gum for a moment, then growled, "get moving buster."

From the Saigon Daily Post:

> The Army said that Pfc. Wallace A. Frazier, 21, of Philadelphia, Pa., was taken into custody after he allegedly shot and killed Dang Thi Mong, an innocent bystander, during an argument with a Vietnamese cab driver on a downtown street corner. The shot was fired with Frazier's personal weapon, a 25-caliber pistol which was not registered. The woman had been talking with friends across the street from where the argument took place. The woman is survived by her husband, and seven children. A spokesman said the commanding officer of Frazier's unit met with the husband today to discuss claims procedures.

And what is the going rate in South Vietnam for a life destroyed? According to the U.S. Army it is exactly $30.

● ● ●

Through the festering shantytowns and garbage-strewn streets of Saigon we worked our way in the wake of a slowly moving line of trucks and ancient taxis, through a billowing yellow cloud of dust and check points, until at last we were back again at Tan Son Nhut airfield. "This Way to the Land of the Big PX," says a sign by the roadside. In the soaking heat of the waiting room I flipped through a discarded copy of Time:

> Today South Vietnam throbs with a pride and power, above all an esprit, scarcely credible against the summer's somber vista.

At the next table tough-looking Green Berets are arguing with the waiter over the price of a round of "33" beer. An Air Force sergeant is apologizing to a French lady for spilling his drink all over her. "Shorry about that, ma'am."

As the hours pass, the scene in the waiting room takes on the appearance of an enormous party. "Just like Fort Benning, isn't it?" says a very drunk GI. And in the midst of this gay scene I must admit that that is the best one-line description of South Vietnam I have come across. Just like Fort Benning.

VIEW FROM HUNTERS POINT

NO WAY DOWNTOWN

DONOVAN BESS

Mr. Bess is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

Two weeks before 16-year-old Matthew Johnson, a black-skinned boy, was shot in the back by a white-skinned policeman in the Hunters Point section of San Francisco, I spent nearly eighty hours in the area. I talked with scores of officials and residents. My impression then was that this Negro slum was a skin cancer on the organism of the city, but that the persons (mostly white) in power in San Francisco, and the federal government, had decided to act as though the poverty and the emotional and cultural isolation of these people were really no more than a bad case of sunburn.

You can cure skin cancer, usually, if you catch it in time and have the will and equipment to apply modern technology. You can't cure it by rubbing it regularly with Sea and Ski. For a week after the rioting of Tuesday, September 27, most of the citizens of the Bay Area were acutely aware that a serious social illness had erupted in violent symptoms. Various campaigns were started to find jobs for Hunters Point Negroes, and there was a good deal of official talk about urgency. But a month after the rioting, the editor of The Spokesman, the newspaper published by the anti-poverty project in the area, said quietly: "The most outstanding thing about the atmosphere here now is that everything is the same as before. This is the problem."

The editor, Robert Simms, is getting a law degree at night school. He is one of the most thoughtful Negro leaders in the area; and when he is discouraged, it is time for the people who control San Francisco's wealth and political power to consider something more fundamental than "job programs." The Negroes of Hunters Point have heard that phrase too often. They believe that no "program" will mean what it says until the city's white people decide they really want racial equality.

Last spring, Simms said in a Spokesman editorial that the white man, in his conversations—and especially if reinforced by martinis—often puts himself firmly on the record as wanting integration, and "might even go for the idea of a Negro's marrying his sister if he is drunk enough." But he charged that such tolerant talk is rarely translated into social action.

Ten days after the rioting, Simms put out a special edition. He asked in an editorial why the news media had not reported that young men of Hunters Point had risked their lives in successful attempts to calm other youths infuriated by the gunfire of massed policemen. Too often, Simms charged, the whites "would like to believe that the rising incidence of rioting and bloodshed is in no way related to their imperialistic and supremacy attitudes."

The newspaper blamed Mayor John F. Shelley for failing to respond to an S O S sent to him by Negro youth leaders several hours before the rioting began. The youth leaders had requested that the Mayor come to the scene—a trip conspicuously avoided by white leaders over the years. "The group waited for Shelley for several hours, but to no avail," said The Spokesman. "There was nothing anybody could do or say to stop what resulted in one of the worst tragedies in San Francisco's history."

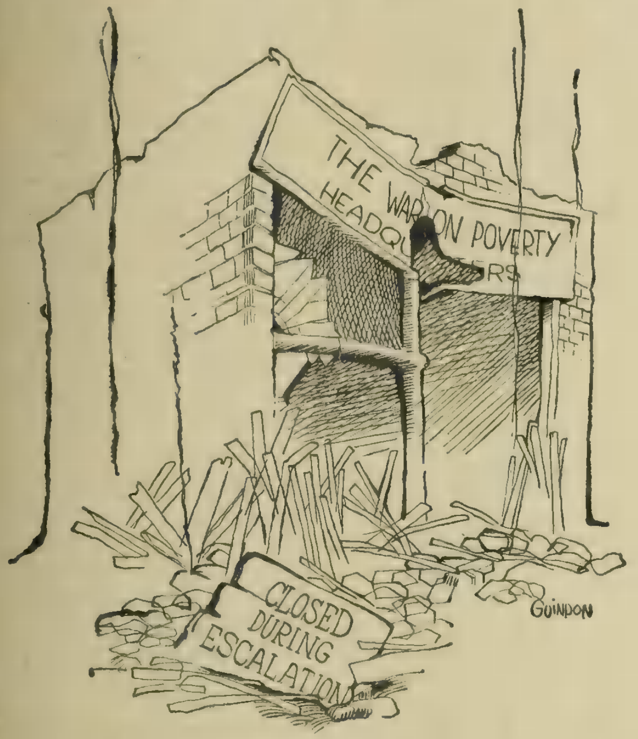
Social work officials have over the years made known to City Hall that the young men of Hunters Point have a specially deep hatred of white policemen. One young Negro from the area, Adam Rogers, told an interviewer last July: "The way to stop police brutality is to get the young cops out of this area. . . . One time I had to defend myself against eight young cops—rookies—because they beat me with flashlights while I had handcuffs on my wrists, and they beat me at the police station, too, and when I had to be taken to the hospital, they told the doctor to leave the room, and then they beat me unconscious." Another young man of the area, Elisha King, told the interviewer that policemen were more brutal to youths from Hunters Point "because . . . they want to test you to see if you're as bad as you've been branded." King claimed that "if you've got money you can get out of it," by pay-off. These statements typify the attitudes of young men who live on the hill that comprises most of Hunters Point. If a delegation of officials from City Hall had shown up, in civilian clothes, before the police had to be called, would the tension have been absorbed?

Hunters Point lies about 3 miles south of San Francisco's financial and shopping centers. It lies about a mile to the north of Candlestick Park, the stadium for the Giants' National League baseball team; when there's a home game you can hear the shrieking of the fans. Hunters Point is noticed by most San Franciscans only when they're going to or from a ball game, or if they happen to look east while driving along the freeway that runs down the prosperous Peninsula to San Jose. What you see, from that distance, is a shining pattern of buildings that you imagine must be splendid hillside apartment houses, put there to take advantage of a view of San Francisco Bay that equals that from the rich men's apartments on Telegraph Hill, or from the mansions across the bay in Piedmont, above the city of Oakland.

When you visit Hunters Point, you scarcely appreciate its view. Most of the apartment houses on the hill were built twenty-five years ago for the temporary housing of wartime naval shipyard workers. When the war ended, the hill became San Francisco's major social dump: a place of refuge from redevelopment projects in the central city, and from the prejudice of white landlords. Most of the paint has worn off the flimsy outer walls of these two-story buildings. Garbage cans stand astride front doors. Steady winds from the Pacific Ocean blow variegated trash across the bare terrain. There is not 1 square yard of that customary American garden amenity, the residential lawn. There aren't even doorbells. Broken glass glitters on the steep curves of the streets.

The average age of the hill's 6,300 residents is 13; the number of children under 5 is 985 per 1,000 women. This is the most biologically fertile area in San Francisco—it is even more fertile than Chinatown. But there is only one small playground on the hill, and almost no organized, after-school recreation. The sidewalks are much played upon. There used to be a small supermarket; vandalism forced it to close. Only the liquor store remains open. The apartments at night are chock-full of young ones. It's hard to hear the TV for the shouting and giggling. If you're in high school, it's hard to study. The noise from the over-crowded apartment next door comes right through to you.

Hunters Point is a 90 per cent Negro town. The other residents are chiefly Samoans, American Indians, a few whites. It stands on one of the famous seven hills of San Francisco, but it is hardly a part of that city, and has almost no part in the life of white America.



The isolation is aided by the fact that no through road passes near. A columnist in The Spokesman recently spoke of "the people in 'Frisco," using a term no San Franciscan cares to utter. (But in Los Angeles, San Francisco is commonly and rudely referred to by the nickname it hates.) The hill people just don't get downtown much. For one thing, it costs 30c a round trip on the bus; and why go to a strange town when you can't buy yourself some fun? Twenty-two per cent of the Hunters Point households have incomes of $2,000 a year or less.

Another reason the hill people tend to stay on the hill is that they don't like to be mistreated socially or psychologically; that's what they risk when they go downtown. Most of them come from the South. The young men, in particular, frequently respond to outer stimuli with the spontaneity characteristic of primitive peoples. If they don't like what you're saying—if they think you're lying, if they think you're smug or pious—they hit out with direct words. The white people, with their many decades of conventional upbringing, feel insecure in the face of such candor. The young men of the hill are apt to wear garish hair-dos, and usually they do not indulge in grinning, the standard device of ingratiation with young middle-class Americans. Early last July, an anti-poverty program worker took ten young men from the hill sightseeing in the Fisherman's Wharf section of the city. The group visited a wax museum and then, while the ten black-faced tourists were walking along the Embarcadero, an automobile full of young white men pulled alongside and shouted abusive, racist obscenities. One Negro youth muttered to his friends: "I've had about all I can stand from them sick people." Their guide, fortunately, was a female; she was able to talk the young men out of violence.

Eloise Wilson, a young matron of the hill, said: "Older people here are kind of afraid of what's outside, but younger people are beginning to mix more since the anti-poverty program began. The young ones are reading more —they pick up a newspaper once in a while and find out what's going on outside." "We don't want to stay in here forever," said Sylvester Brown, a 27-year-old father of five who, formerly a prize fighter in St. Louis, has had much experience of black-white mixing. "We want to know what's going on with those people," he said waving his hand toward the west, where white people live in comfortable homes, with soundproofing, flower gardens and doorbells; in districts equipped with shopping centers, tennis courts, bowling alleys, movie theatres, swimming pools and other amenities unknown on the hill.

For more than ten years, there has been a big supply in downtown San Francisco of "concern" about Hunters Point. The "concern" is like that which troubles parents when a rebellious teen-ager persists in behavior that violates the parental mores. It was out of such a baffled state of mind that the city's social-work establishments decided to apply skin oil to the very sore hill that university research people knew, from on-the-spot studies, was afflicted with something worse than sunburn. Nine public and private agencies conceived the idea of opening a Youth Opportunity Center in Hunters Point. The jobless young men and women would be trained, as necessary; educated, when the schools had failed to educate them. Employers would be trained to accept them, and openings would be found downtown. They got some Ford Foundation money and opened a stylish center atop the hill on August 1, 1963. During the next twenty-nine months they spent $2 million on this effort. The project was overseen by the Mayor's Committee on Youth, which is run jointly by City Hall and the United Crusade. In practice, the professional social-work executives who administer private philanthropy made policy for the center. They offered some elegant thinking to the project. One conclusion, based on employment facts, was that these young Negroes' only hope was to find work in the downtown offices of this city, the commercial and financial center of the West Coast.

The center staff found that about 80 per cent of the job seekers were unready for employment. The young men and women were given $1.3 million worth of training. They were coached on how to answer the telephone in the genteel white way; how to touch-type and mimeograph; how to run an adding machine; how to smile when you don't feel like it. Then the young people went back to the frail-walled apartments full of little brothers and sisters and tried to study, tried amid the screaming and tension to rehearse their instructions on how to make it in the middle class.

The young men, especially, were hard to place in the office settings. Of 1,173 who registered with the center up to January 1, only 589 were even referred to employment. Nearly a fourth of them never made it past the interview stage. Among other things, they suspected that their white professional friends were about to castrate them. Eunice Elton, who directs San Francisco's employment offices for the State Employment Service, commented that these young Negro men "see the masculine role as one that is working with things rather than ideas." Even if their masculinity had not been at issue, even if they had learned how to be "nice," the employers would not have welcomed them without reservations: nearly a third of the young men had police records (sometimes merely because a white policeman in quest of suspects was a bit too forward and brought on a "resist-arrest" charge).

"In proportion to the need, the staff and resources simply were not adequate," said Miss Elton. The man who directed the center last summer, Wilfred Ho, declared: "Sometimes I wonder what I'm doing up here, why I'm breaking my head against this." George Napper, who directed the anti-poverty program on the hill in its first eleven months, said the center "applied a cosmetic make-up to a situation that required surgery." George Earl, president of the Hunters Point Interblock Council (an unofficial town council developed by the anti-poverty staff), asked: "Why didn't they push for a better school system? These kids are forced to finish high school with only a junior high school education." He was stating a complaint heard from all sides on the hill: that teachers promote problem Negro children to get rid of the problems.

The Ford Foundation's achievement, in its major financing of the center, included establishing a base for dozens of officials and social workers and social scientists in pursuit of problems. "We are like a zoo which all these professionals come to visit," Earl said. "They go back to their middle-class settings and tell their friends, 'I know the Negro.' " One hill housewife said, contemptuously: "I have put a dozen young people through graduate school." Napper (himself a social scientist from the University of California) said: "The university people have studied the hell out of us. They even come down from the state of Washington to study us. They come by the hundreds. They don't work with us—they write books about us." Napper, unlike most students of the hill, lived there for three years.

This weariness with visitations from professionals who were paid to help and understand, found a brilliant expression last May in a Spokesman editorial:

> In these challenging times of social reform within a society bent on automation and specialization, a new kind of expert has bloomed; he is the Negro specialist.
>
> In most cases the Negro specialist is a white man with liberal ideas, who has spent time in Negro communities; and in some cases he is a Negro college graduate in the social sciences with white middle class attitudes. Whatever the case, the specialist gets an exorbitant fee for supposedly helping the Negro to help himself. . . .
>
> The white man can become a Negro specialist by associating with Negroes, or by living in a Negro community for a short period. He is considered a specialist once he learns how to "jerk," eats some chitterlings, or has a few Negroes as his "best friends"; or he writes a thesis on the Negro and participates in some community organization in Negro communities. With these contacts and experiences he is recognized by his white brothers as knowing more about the Negro than the Negro knows himself. . . .
>
> Negro communities are like time bombs, and every minute of unrest is another tick toward the zero hour. The job of the Negro specialist is to remove the pin from this time bomb. . . . It is obvious to Negroes that when a white man arrives in their community asking questions, snooping around at various meetings, and wearing a forged smile, that he has been sent to gather information, and if not obvious, it certainly raises this suspicion. . . .
>
> All Negro communities are not the same. The circumstances in each community will dictate the means necessary in organization and rehabilitation. And the persons most knowledgeable of the circumstances are the residents who have worked with these circumstances and lived with them.

The Office of Economic Opportunity, which is the latest benefactor to arrive on the scene, comes closer to meeting the formula outlined by The Spokesman. No white man whatsoever is being imposed on the hill residents in their own drive to organize themselves. The federal anti-poverty program there, in fact, does not even make use of black-skinned "Negro specialists," except in minor roles as technicians. (For example, Gene Orro, a psychologist who lives in a genial suburb in the redwood country, San Anselmo, and commutes to Hunters Point in his MG roadster, is tolerated on the anti-poverty staff for his professional know-how. He holds no position that would give him dominance in policy making.)

Hunters Point won its control over the federal anti-poverty funds along with three other San Francisco poor districts early last year. The movement to give the residents control was tenaciously opposed by Mayor Shelley, who was elected with strong support from organized labor and the city's minority-group organizations. (San Francisco has been for decades "a labor town." It still is: and in 1966 that means it also stands for racial discrimination by certain craft unions. It took the rioting of September 27-28 to compel the Mayor into an unequivocal public condemnation of such trade union practices.) Shelley lost this battle, and the Economic Opportunity council established four local boards which had almost total powers to design, control and operate the four anti-poverty programs.

Hunters Point abuts the somewhat less impoverished Bayview district lying on flat terrain just to the west. An anti-poverty program for both districts is conducted by one OEO board, which spent $494,000 in federal funds during the first eleven months of its operation (up to October 1). The salaries range from $170 a month for youth aides (at half-time) to $1,000 a month for the director, John Dukes. The staff now consists of seventy-eight men and women, all but one of them Negro (the white man is an Episcopal lay priest who lives on the hill).

Before the OEO program got under way in November, 1965, the Hunters Point-Bayview area had so little status it could get no official help for its tiny community center, and was totally dependent on donations and volunteer time from the women leaders who kept it going for several years in a bungalow. "The United Bay Crusade constantly refused the funds," said the center's director, Harold B. Brooks. "They said we had not shown an ability to handle money—a ridiculous statement, because we had had no experience in handling funds." The OEO board and its first director, George Napper, decided the foremost need was to organize people. "Community aides" were given priority assignments to knock on doors, to arouse the residents from an almost pathological apathy. The aides and new-won volunteers formed thirteen block clubs, and three district OEO offices were opened on the hill as combination community centers and liaison offices with the OEO city-wide network—and the various agencies and powerful persons downtown. Concrete results were immediate: sometimes jobs, sometimes solutions to old problems —like getting the Housing Authority to clean out the rats and cockroaches from the twenty-five-year-old-buildings.

Thus a significant new political force emerged in San Francisco, underwritten by federal money. Mayor Shelley was not unaware of this challenge to his power when, last May, he called for firm City Hall controls over the San Francisco anti-poverty program. His stand provoked a page-1 story in The Spokesman which attacked the Mayor's "anxiety over the program's creating a political organization," and asked "just what in the first place is wrong with the poor having a political voice?"

The voiceless hill has found a voice. Community meetings are held almost every night. Delegations are regularly calling on City Hall officials and monitoring commission meetings. This is a strong and permanent voice that probably will grow louder in the coming months and years in downtown San Francisco and in Sacramento. This voice, and other new voices like it, probably will be heard in Washington.

TV OVERSEAS

THE U. S. HARD SELL

HERBERT I. SCHILLER

Mr. Schiller is a research professor in the Bureau of Economic and Business Research, the University of Illinois.

The character and structure of American broadcasting are well-explored features of the domestic landscape. Less well known is the readiness with which a large and growing part of the world community has succumbed to the United States style, and how these developments have been engineered is a story of relatively current vintage.

In the pre-television era, the United States stood alone among advanced industrialized nations in having its radio broadcasting unabashedly commercial. Nowhere else did advertisers pay the bill and direct the destinies of the medium so completely. State broadcasting authorities were the rule in Europe, and the American arrangement was the exception.

With the advent of television, but not because of it, many national broadcasting structures adopted one or another variant of the American pattern. Wilson P. Dizard, author of Television: A World View, has written about this shift:

> Television has developed primarily as a commercial medium. This was to be expected in the United States and a few other countries, notably in Latin America, where broadcasting was traditionally a private venture. Elsewhere, however, broadcasting was a state monopoly without commercial connections. Theoretically, television should have followed in the established pattern; significantly it did not. . . . At present, television systems in over fifty countries are controlled, in whole or in part, by private interests under state supervision. Commercial advertising is carried by all but a handful of the world's ninety-five television systems.

For the new countries the emerging pattern is the same. Dizard notes "the virtual domination of local television in developing nations by commercial interest." UNESCO reports the same finding. Even strong, industrialized nations have been forced to modify their long-time, stabilized broadcasting services and accept commercial operations. Britain yielded in 1954; France is now teetering on the edge.

What has powered this almost universal push toward commercialization? Its advocates reply that commercial broadcasting is the most satisfactory method of meeting the financial and programmatic needs of the new media. Dizard, for instance, asserts: "The change [to commercialization] confirmed the effectiveness of American-style broadcasting both as a revenue producer and as a highly acceptable form of entertainment and persuasion."

The revenue-producing capabilities of commercial broadcasting cannot be disputed; the acceptability of the entertainment it offers is a matter that I shall go into in a moment. But neither reason faintly suggests the real force in operation. Nothing less than the viability of the American industrial economy itself is involved in the movement toward international commercialization of broadcasting.

The continuing and pressing requirements of United States manufacturers to reach annually higher output levels in order to sustain and increase profit margins activate the process that is relentlessly enveloping electronic (and other) communications in a sheath of commercialization. What happens is a continuing interaction. The direct intrusion of American influence catalyzes developments in the affected nations. Also, those countries with similar industrial structures and organization themselves feel corresponding, if at first weaker, impulses in the same direction.

Evidence of the international explosive thrust in private enterprise's market requirements can be found in the trade press. Television Magazine, for instance, describes the interconnections between the advertising, manufacturing and broadcasting industries (italics added):

> About 1959 a gentle curve representing the expansion of American advertising agencies overseas started an abrupt > climb which hasn't yet levelled off. . . . The growth of television abroad had something to do with this upsurge, since the head-start American agencies had in dealing with the medium commercially has given them a highly exportable knowhow. But television wasn't the prime mover. That role belongs to the client: The American consumer goods industry.

The magazine explained this process with a simple illustration:

> Take a giant corporation like Procter and Gamble with sales over $2 billion a year. Its position on the open market is based partly on the corporation's growth rate. But to add, say, 10% in sales each year becomes increasingly difficult when already over the two billion mark. Where do you find that additional $200 million? The answer, for more and more American corporations, is overseas.

American companies have been crossing the oceans regularly, either through direct acquisition or new plant expansion or leasing arrangements or combinations thereof. United States private direct investments in manufacturing abroad have spurted in the twenty years beginning in 1943 from $2,276 million to $16,861 million. In Western Europe alone, manufacturing investments increased from $879 million to $6,547 million in the period. To assist in marketing the output of these expanding foreign facilities, U.S. advertising agencies have been accompanying the industrial plants overseas. McCann-Erickson has seventy offices employing 4,619 persons in thirty-seven countries. J. Walter Thompson, "the granddaddy of international operations," employs 1,110 people in its key London office alone. There are twenty-one American-associated ad agencies in England, twenty in West Germany, twelve in France. In Latin America, Brazil has fifteen American ad agencies and there are more U.S. agencies in Canada than in any other foreign nation. Even the developing world has begun to be penetrated. "Three enterprising U.S. agencies have tackled the huge market of India . . . [and] Africa, too, may be part of a future wave of agency expansion overseas," according to Television.

Once the privately directed manufacturing enterprises have begun their goods production, all energies are concentrated on securing the public's ever-widening acceptance of the outpouring commodity streams. The insistence of powerful American sellers, temporarily allied with their local counterparts, on obtaining advertising outlets abroad is overwhelming state broadcasting authorities, one after another. The successful campaign to introduce commercial television in England was largely a matter of industry admen manipulating complex political wires. Gerald Beadle, the former director of B.B.C. television, explained with some understatement what happened in Britain:

> . . . there was an unusually strong demand from large sections of British industry in the early nineteen fifties for more opportunities for advertising their goods. Wartime restrictions, especially on paper, had only recently been lifted, and a real boom in consumer goods was developing, but industry felt that there were insufficient opportunities for telling the public about the large range of new goods which were becoming available. Television was obviously an excellent medium for this, and industry was not averse to harnessing the television horse to the industrial chariot.

What is emerging on the international scene bears a striking resemblance to the American routine of uncoordinated expansion of production, promotion of the output through the communications media, higher sales, further plant expansion, and then the cycle's repetition. American society's dissatisfied individual who seeks release in consumption is appearing throughout the expanding orbit of the international free market. According to Erich Fromm, "Twentieth century industrialism has created this new psychological type, homo consumens, primarily for economic reasons, i.e., the need for mass consumption which is stimulated and manipulated by advertising. But the character type, once created, also influences the economy and makes the principles of ever-increasing satisfaction appear rational and realistic. Contemporary man, thus, has an unlimited hunger for more and more consumption."

The man in the market economy has become a message receiver beyond all imagination. Bombarded in the United States by an estimated 1,500 advertising messages a day, these "contemporary men" are multiplying rapidly in the North Atlantic community, and are beginning to be discovered as well in Africa, Latin America and Asia. In 1964, private enterprise spent $21 billion for advertising in fourteen industrial countries, two-thirds of the amount being spent in the United States. Financing much of this staggering budget for global commercial message-making are the multi-national corporations whose plants and service installations are spread over several countries. (See table.)

Wherever these "big spenders" penetrate, broadcasting is subverted to salesmanship. It is not only a matter of the ubiquitous, jarring commercial. The entire content that illuminates the home screen is fitted to the marketeer's order. "TV is not an art form or a culture channel; it is an advertising medium," writes Daniel Karp in The New York Times Magazine. Therefore, " . . . it seems a bit churlish and un-American of people who watch television to complain that their shows are so lousy. They are not supposed to be any good. They are supposed to make money . . . [and] in fact, 'quality' may be not merely irrelevant but a distraction."

As of now, the situation of radio-television in the United States is the extreme case. In Western Europe, the tradition that state broadcasting authorities exercise some social responsibility has not yet been demolished. But the striving of the consumer goods producers to gain the attention of large audiences is unrelenting, and as Fromm

Table I — Advertising Expenditures of U.S. Companies, 1964 million

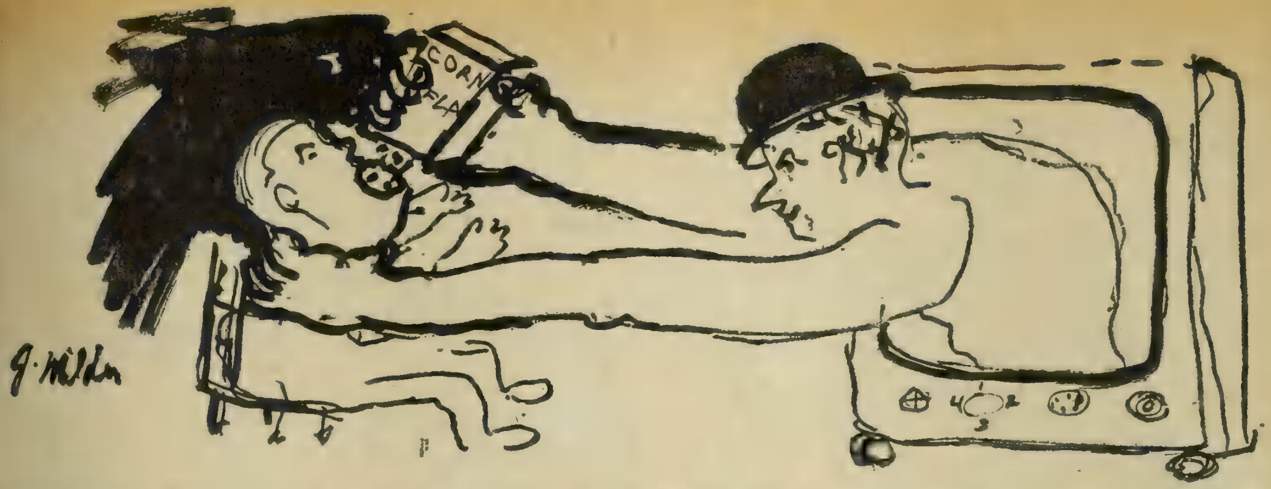
1. Procter and Gamble	$147.8
2. General Motors	137.5
3. Ford Motors	80.6
4. General Foods	74.8
5. Bristol-Myers	74.7
6. R. J. Reynolds Tobacco	68.8
7. Colgate-Palmolive	66.7
8. American Home Products	65.4
9. Chrysler	64.3
10. Lever Brothers (British-owned)	61.4



observes, once the contact is made, the audience itself searches out further stimuli.

If commercials are still controlled and compressed into special slices of the viewing time in some national systems abroad, the shows themselves often follow the dictates, directly or indirectly, of their sponsors. Certainly, that is the case with the popular and widely shown American productions where the advertising agency may have sat in at each stage of a script's development.

A.B.C., N.B.C. and C.B.S. send their packaged programing to all continents, charging what the freight will bear. In low-income areas in Africa and Asia, old U.S. films and shows are dumped at low prices to secure a foothold in emerging markets, regardless of the relevance or appropriateness of the "entertainment."

In Western Europe, the most stable noncommercial broadcasting structures of sovereign states are unable to resist the forces that are arrayed against them. Here from Television is one description of how "commercials" break through national boundaries, especially in the geographically compact North Atlantic region:

> Of course, the continued expansion of commercial television, despite powerful opposition, is playing a major role in making unity of diversity. Although many important countries, particularly in Europe, still forbid TV advertising, there is a certain "spillover" effect that tends to spread commercials even to those countries that originally were adamant. Only this year did the 11-year-old government-controlled Swiss TV service permit commercials on its three regional networks. The move was in large part prompted by the concern of Swiss manufacturers who knew their customers were viewing Italian and German TV across the border. The same process is expected to unfold in the Netherlands, a large part of which is also open to German programming and advertising messages. If Netherlands TV goes commercial, then Belgium is expected to follow shortly thereafter. Then France and Scandinavia will be the last big holdouts. . . . If French television goes commercial, an executive at J. Walter Thompson remarks, then there truly will be a common market for the TV advertiser.

If "legitimate" infiltration and demolition of noncommercial state systems of broadcasting is inapplicable for one reason or another, less sophisticated techniques are available. The pirate radio stations located off the coast of England, and some even in the Thames estuary, completely disregard international frequency allocation agreements. They broadcast Pop music interlaced with commercials to European and English audiences who are apparently hungering for the entertainment and not at all displeased with the accompanying consumer messages. Though the pirates are small-scale broadcasters at the moment, large-scale interests stand behind them. Until the government actively intervened, both the Institute of Practitioners in Advertising and the Incorporated Society of British Advertisers lent indirect support to the pirates. A director of the ISBA has stated: "We recognize they fulfill a need. We would be happier, though, if they were on-shore and permanent."

Reacting to an impending governmental regulatory bill, one of the pirates, Radio London, commented: "We expect to get sufficient advertising from overseas to enable us to continue. We have four million overseas listeners, and much of our revenue is from international companies who would not be affected by British legislation." (Italics added.)

Having secured control of communications across a good part of the earth's surface, commerce has now turned its attention to conquering space. At the White House Conference on International Cooperation last winter, the National Citizens Commission's Committee on Space (whose chairman incidentally was Dr. Joseph Charyk, the president of Comsat), listed as the first application of communications satellites their future impact on "trade and commerce." The committee's report stated: "It is possible to foresee use of closed circuit television by major companies doing a worldwide business to link together their offices and affiliates in order to kick off a new sales campaign or to demonstrate a new product or to analyze a new marketing situation in the far corners of the world."

Similar sentiment exists in other influential places. The London Economist views communications satellites as the chosen business medium of the future. Deploring the British Government's reluctance to participate more actively in ELDO (European Launcher Development Organization), the Europeans' sole hope of matching American communications technological advances, the magazine commented: "But is there only an American or a Russian or a Chinese way of life to be propagated around the world? Will Britain (and Europe) even be able to sell its goods around the world if it cuts itself out of the advertising medium of the 1970s?" (Italics added.)

An even better indication of how communications satellites are to be used can be seen in the attitudes of two recent conferences concerned with the space systems. In December, 1965, UNESCO assembled representatives from nineteen member states and other interested international organizations to consider the possible use of space satellites for informational and cultural purposes. A few months later, at the 18th World Congress of the Advertising Association in Mexico City, Worldvision, a network including sixty-two television stations in twenty-five countries, organized by the American Broadcasting Company's international subsidiary, A.B.C. International, ran a three-day workshop demonstrating how "international advertisers could use TV right now." In the words of Donald W. Coyle, president of A.B.C. International, "Global television is not something that we are going to have to wait for a far-off future to implement. It is upon us now."

The contrast in the two approaches is depressing: UNESCO's vision is of international control of communications satellites for cultural use in the future. Worldvision's program for the commercial use of space has already begun.

It is a mistake to view these developments as evidence of an international cabal seeking the global commercialization of communications. The forces are openly at work and the success of "consumerism" rests on a varied mix of human and institutional pressures which are at present very powerful. "Both a consumer oriented economy and commercial television seem to have things going for them at this moment of history in a good part of the globe," is the way Television puts it.

Western Europe has relied on the existence of national traditions of propriety unobserved in the United States and even on some limitation on American programing to hold back the flood of commercialization. Canada and Great Britain have both tried, not too successfully, to keep the proportion of American to domestic shows within certain limits. But attempts to exclude United States programing and to limit the number and length of national commercials are unlikely to be effective in any one country, no matter how influential that society may be in its own region. The subject matter that is denied local transmission is broadcast from neighboring states, with transmitters sometimes deliberately established for this purpose. Then, too, the business system in Western Europe, Canada, Japan and Australia supports the general principle of commercialization and throws its weight behind an advance of salesmanship.

As for the universe of the global poor, the have-not nations stand practically defenseless before a rampaging Western commercialism. Impoverished as they are, many developing states are able to afford the new communications systems only by accepting commercial packages which "tie" their broadcasting systems to foreign programing and foreign financial sponsorship. In this way their paths of economic development are set, regardless of the intentions and designs of their planners, by the pull of market-directed consumerism. Expectations of new roads to national development which might foster motivations and behavior different from contemporary Western styles are being dashed in their infancy.

The gloomy and bitter words of Japanese economist, Shigeto Tsuru, seem to apply everywhere in the wake of Western market enterprise's electronic communications offensive: "In this world of high-powered communications we may even have to speak of a new kind of 'self-alienation' for citizens living under capitalism. If there were a society on this earth somewhere which would make full use of the highly developed techniques of communication of today for the sole purpose of its inhabitants' autonomous cultural needs, it would be an experience of a lifetime for us to visit there—for us who daily, even hourly, cannot escape from the onslaught, either subtle or crude, of modern commercialism in a capitalist society."

LETTERS (continued from page 594)

of McCarthyism." Who could guess from this nonsense that it contains an extended attack on the Smith committee for leading a witch hunt against the National Labor Relations Board in 1939 and 1940 in behalf of businessmen, Republicans and Southern Democrats? Or that it provides a detailed account of McCarthy's chicanery in the Tydings committee inquiry in 1950? Or that there are two long chapters on China before the Second World War in order to lay a basis for accurately criticizing the McCarran committee investigation of the Institute of Pacific Relations? Or that 20 pages give a close reading to the final report of that committee that shows it to be insubstantial and tendentious? Or that it condemns McCarthy's witch hunt through the Voice of America and the overseas libraries? Except for a recital of some of these matters in a laundry list of contents at the beginning of the review, there is no mention of them thereafter. . . .

I am charged with having written a text without using the letter "e," which may be as bad as the pretense that the left thumb is a portrait of the sitter, and that I have substituted something distasteful for the "traditional emphasis on political institutions and their normative roles." At least 43 pages of the book deal specifically with political institutions and their normative roles, with special emphasis on the separation of powers of the federal government and the system of checks and balances. The treatment is analytical, and it shows how the use of prescriptive publicity by Congressional investigating committees was in fact an encroachment upon the roles assigned by law and custom to the Executive and the Judiciary. There is a presumptuous offer in paragraph 11 of the review to "translate from this academese" but readers of the book will understand it easily in the original. Earl Latham

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Dr. Latham's innuendo about my left thumb and clenched fist—an artful variation on a theme which so badly mars his book—prompts only the assertion that I never clench my fist when my thumb sits for its portrait. . . . Although my evaluation was the product of careful study of the book as a whole (against a background of almost twenty years of professional experience with the subject) . . . I have reread the portions of the book to which Dr. Latham's letter calls attention, as well as my 120 pages of notes. I find no reason to alter my views or to qualify my conclusion that the book, taken as a whole, is an apology for the Congressional anti-subversive exposure system. My review did not claim that Dr. Latham approved all of the anti-subversive probes or agreed with their factual conclusions. That is not the issue—and even here, Dr. Latham's text is somewhat more ambiguous than his letter indicates. Dr. Latham shifts the ground of our differences when he poses the issue in this way. What I did say is that his book develops an approving rationale for anti-subversive exposure as a Congressional institution. I still say so. Frank J. Donner

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Improvisation Bit

JULIUS NOVICK

Mr. Novick recently completed a survey of the American National Theatre for The Nation, based on a Ford Foundation grant.

The ordinary resident professional theatre is an import agency: its primary purpose is to disseminate in Hartford, Memphis or Seattle the international theatrical culture of New York, London and Paris. This is useful work; if Shakespeare, Shaw and Chekhov still have meaning in 1966, which I ardently believe, then bringing them to a national audience is important. The fact remains, however, that when we ask what original creative contributions the resident professional theatre has made to national or international theatrical culture, we are answered by an embarrassed silence.

There are, however, a few centers of genuine theatrical creativity out there in the country. They are resident and they are professional and they are theatres, but they are not resident professional theatres in the customary sense: they sell no subscription tickets, they conduct no fund drives, the Ford Foundation does nothing for them, they are not about to move into million-dollar buildings in civic arts centers downtown. Yet they have exported not only talented performers but whole productions, not only whole productions but a new—or at least a renewed—way of making theatre, to the metropolises. They are the improvisational theatres, modern American exponents of the Aristophanic art of the satiric cabaret.

The Committee, which opened in San Francisco in 1963, has played an engagement on Broadway, and covered the 1964 nominating conventions for National Educational Television. The Premise (now deceased), which began in St. Louis, sent companies to Washington, New York and London. (The London company got into trouble with the Lord Chamberlain, since improvised material can obviously not be censored beforehand.) But the great fountainhead of the improvisational movement was the short-lived Compass Players company in Chicago. From it came Mike Nichols, Elaine May and Shelley Berman; from its direct successor, the Second City—still flourishing in Chicago—came Barbara Harris, Alan Arkin and several other remarkable performers now working in New York and elsewhere. Second City companies have appeared on Broadway, in a large New York cabaret (for three years), in London (twice), on television, and on tour all over the American map, while other Second City companies held the fort in Chicago.

Paradoxically, perhaps, in view of their wide success, what distinguishes the Second City and The Committee on their home grounds is that their work seems aimed at a very particular audience, one that shares the assumptions and predilections of the performer-creators. This kind of theatre is of, by and for well-educated, urban young people, irreverent as a matter of course toward all authority, with no objections to what are still sometimes called obscenity and blasphemy (probably the only word that can still really shock them is "nigger")—people, finally, for whom leftist political assumptions are part of the air they breathe.

"But Job worshiped God," says a Second City performer, "with a fervor bordering upon stupidity." "There is a rumor," says a Committee member, "that J. Edgar Hoover is immortal." Both Second City and The Committee have had sketches in which the blackout line was a four-letter word. Both have had race-relations sketches in which white liberals are raked over the coals. The Second City sketch shows a couple of professed liberals driving through a Negro neighborhood in Chicago, and getting scared. "Black as a forest out there," says one. "You hear drums?" (Laughter: an audience laughing at itself.) At The Committee, a white girl and a Negro man shake hands. "It's just like on the Snick button," she says. Not a very funny joke to someone who has never seen a Snick button, and incomprehensible to anyone unaware that "Snick" is what the Student Nonviolent Coordinating Committee is called by its friends. Both groups, again, have sketches sympathetic to young men who don't want to be drafted. "Don't let 'em take your mind," says one draftee to another in the Second City sketch; it is something a lot of intelligent draftees, proud of their free-mindedness, must have thought as the army tried to mold them into gung-ho soldiers.

The regular resident theatres are highly eclectic, and that is a good thing in its way. But the result is a certain loss of personality. It is refreshing to discover theatres that (like the Berliner Ensemble, so they tell me) stand for one particular kind of theatre, one particular way of looking at life that they share with their audiences. At their best, the resident theatres deal, sometimes profoundly, with the important concerns of Western man; but too often their work seems to have little relevance to the lives of their audiences. The improvisational theatres are seldom profound, but they deal particularly with the here and now, with what it is like to be a well-educated, middle-class young person in Chicago or San Francisco at the time of the Great Society.

The Committee has a sketch about two housewives smoking marijuana (while doing their laundry, if I remember correctly). It is not a very funny sketch, but who else has even tried to reflect on-stage the possibility of pot smoking as a part of respectable everyday life—a possibility that is just around the corner, especially in the San Francisco area. When Committee members ask the audience to suggest themes for improvisations, they get replies like "God is alive in Argentina," "Nietzsche is dead," "Pervert," "Vietnam," "The morning after LSD." Spectators and performers are on the same wave length.

Most of the evening at Second City or The Committee is taken up by revue sketches, quite conventional in form. But instead of making a point in order to make you laugh (like the ordinary revue sketch), they tend to make you laugh in order to make a point. They are often rambling and overlong; sometimes they just do not come off; but on the whole they are distinguished for their intelligence and cogency (and for the quietness with which they are performed: no frenzied mugging, no fright wigs, no funny hats). The improvisational cabaret theatres have been largely responsible for an increased national interest in intelligent satire.

But where does the improvisation come in? Do the actors make it all up as they go along? No. The material is invented by the performers, but most of what the audience sees at most performances has been conceived and developed in rehearsal, under the leadership of a director. It was improvised once, and perhaps it changes from show to show, but by the time you see it, it has usually been well rehearsed.

Some of it, indeed, may be made up on the spot. Before the intermission, the actors often solicit suggestions from the audience for topics on which to improvise. The thought is that the actors will come back from the intermission with ideas for a handful of fire-new routines never tried before. It is a stunt, in a sense: the audience watches the improvising actors to see if they will make fools of themselves, as an audience in a circus watches a trapeze artist to see if he will fall. Can they really work up a sketch about Vietnam, perverts, or the death of God in ten minutes? In many cases, of course, they don't have to. Tonight's audience is very unlikely to be the first ever to be interested in Vietnam, perverts and the death of God.

Thus for the most part what the improvisational theatres set before their audiences are revue sketches, not profoundly different in form from what has been turned out in the past by sit-down writers. And, as an art form, the revue sketch has its limitations. But the leaders of the improvisational theatre movement believe that improvisation can do far more than produce revue sketches; they believe that it can have profound and far-reaching effects on the theatre as a whole, and on life beyond the theatre. Both the Second City and The Committee happened to be doing fairly conventional work on the occasions of my recent visits, and I am sure they do a considerable amount of conventional work even when I am not around, but the directors of both groups have done, and are continuing to do, a good deal of promising experimentation. The movement began with high ideals and, with some drooping of the flag here and there, has maintained them.

The guru, more or less, of the movement is a stocky Chicagoan named Paul Sills. (Sills's mother, Viola Spolin, wrote the standard text on the subject, which is used in schools and colleges all over the country.) Sills has founded four theatres, all of them in Chicago. The first of the four grew out of his work at the University of Chicago, and devoted itself to what are now the standard resident-theatre authors: Brecht, Shakespeare, Chekhov, Shaw. After twenty-five productions in two years, this early venture closed down and was succeeded by the famous Compass, the first professional improvisational theatre in this country.

David Shepherd, Sills's partner in the Compass, wanted a working-class theatre, "a theatre for Gary, Indiana," but Sills dismisses this as "sentimental." According to Sills, the Compass provided theatre that was "improvised from within the very middle of the community,"* but the community was Hyde Park, the University of Chicago neighborhood. Compass was "in the neighborhood, of the neighborhood, of the moment": a new two-hour show every week. But urban renewal pushed it out of Hyde Park, and it moved to quarters on the North Side. Here it lost its community roots: "more people from different sections were coming to see it, but fewer of them from each. It had no real base and so consequently it held because of its brilliance."* It grew, that is, more proficient and less close to its sources: a familiar evolution in American life. It folded in 1956; three years later, Sills, Bernard Sahlins and Howard Alk started Second City, "and it made it like crazy."

Second City remains essentially a purveyor of topical revue, and this does not satisfy Paul Sills. "Topical revue material," he says, "is nonsense."* And "Second City is a failure. . . . All these things are failures in terms of real organic theatre." But he feels that conventional resident theatres are worse failures: "No amount of pumping big civic repertory theatres into a town is going to make any difference in the cultural level of a town. . . . So-called intellectual theatre will not and cannot work."

"The theatre," he says, "is out to confirm the fact that there is meaning in the world." But meaning to him is "not cognitive. It's not known in the head. It's known all through you. It's Jewish knowing. It's body knowing." The basis of his theatrical method, the primary means he uses to attain meaning, is play, is playing together, as children do in games. "Playing is a communion. . . . Play is freedom. Play is also mutual. You can't play alone." When preparing a show he gives his actors games, and tries to get them to play instead of merely to "perform." "I fought my ass off to get them to see each other and play with each other on-stage."

Sills believes in a theatre that is connected to the larger community, and yet is a community itself. The Compass and the Second City broke through, he thinks, "because at a certain time they [the performers] were more interested in each other than they were in success. This is what it is to have a company . . . it's a brotherhood, a union, a guild." But professional actors are not noted for self-abnegation; they tend to resist playing together. And if they are talented, as many have been at Second City, the brotherhood tends to get broken up by offers from David Merrick or Hollywood. Sills maintains, moreover, that "culture is something that is created by the people themselves, not something they get fed in through the ear." This is essentially an indictment of the conventional theatre, but it may stand as an indictment of Second City too.

And so, while continuing to do a show a year for Second City, Sills founded the Forty-Third Ward Game Theatre to make experiments in playing together with a group of amateurs from the neighborhood. This fall, Second City and the Game Theatre were united in a new school and repertory theatre. According to Variety, the new body, a nonprofit organization, will be kept separate from the cabaret, which will continue to be a commercial venture. The Center has a $34,000 grant from the Community Arts Foundation for "research on the application of theatre games in education and in the theatre." (There will also be a children's theatre and experimental film-making activities.) The games, Sills says, will be used "as a training method which points toward the personal decision each actor must make if he is to become an artist."

Alan Myerson, the director of The Committee in San Francisco, is a disciple, within limits, of Viola Spolin and Paul Sills. He was not always an improviser; at one time he was going to UCLA with intent to become a lawyer, but then he began making new friends. Influenced by his roommate, "a junkie who opened my eyes to a lot of stuff," he quit UCLA and went to New York to be a writer. After various trials, he went to work for Second City, and at different times directed both the Chicago and the New York company. He quit Second City to go to the West Coast to meet his in-laws, and decided that San Francisco would be a good place for an improvisational cabaret theatre. The Committee opened in April, 1963, and has been going ever since.

Paul Sills is interested in improvisation as an end in itself; for him, the medium seems to be the message. For Myerson and The Committee, on the other hand, the message seems to be the message. The Committee is much more urgently interested in political satire than Second City is. "Our philosophic position politically," says Myerson, > is that the society we live in stinks. And we are constantly frustrated by the jarring fact that commenting on the unhappiness that exists is not terribly relevant to any change. We have often performed for benefits of a political nature for groups like SNCC, CORE, the Vietnam Day Committee, and have often participated in their activities following our performances.

Last year the entire company joined a sit-in at the Federal Building in San Francisco that was intended to induce President Johnson to send troops to Selma, Ala. More recently, The Committee

---

*From "The Celebratory Occasion," an interview with Paul Sills by Charles L. Mee, Jr., in the Tulane Drama Review, Winter, 1964. All unfootnoted quotations from Mr. Sills are from my own interview with him, or from his letter to me.

busied itself collecting war toys to drop on the Pentagon. Myerson wants to develop a group that will be part of a larger community; political activity, for The Committee, seems to be the central means to that end.

Myerson puts down conventional theatre for lack of "penetration to the audience. . . . The audience is never permitted to make a choice." "The theatre," he says, "ought to be a gigantic discothèque at which everybody does some dancing at one time or another." He is interested in involving the audience, in making them do something, and within The Committee's cabaret-show framework he has been conducting experiments toward that end.

Some nights an actor would come out and begin to discuss Vietnam with the audience. He would ask the hawks in the house to holler, then the doves, until the building rocked. Some nights the actors would sit down at the tables with the audience and talk with them about things both audience and actors found disturbing. Then, using material that came out of these discussions, they would improvise a "fear-guilt-and-impotence collage." Sometimes an actor would break character at a sensitive point and leave the stage saying, "I can't handle this; I can't take this," and the audience was left to wonder whether it was watching acting or an irruption of real life.

Now Myerson and his group are planning to transcend the cabaret-show format altogether. Last spring Myerson recruited an entirely new group to carry on the revue at Committee headquarters, allowing the old company (which had been at it, with a few changes of personnel, for three years) to turn its attention to a new project. Since June the members of the old company have been living on unemployment checks and writing plays. "We have regular irregular company meetings," Myerson reports, "in which anybody who wants to, reads whatever he thinks the rest of the group could be helpful with." The group provides applause, criticism and sometimes "the actual improvisation of scenes from the scenario or from what the playwright-actor presents to us. The writer then takes any or all of this material and uses it . . . as he sees fit." When the company finds a building for the new theatre it is planning, it will have an original repertory all prepared.

The improvisational movement has so far produced no single work of any consequence, but it has had, and will continue to have, a significant influence on the theatre at large. "Our theatrical philosophy," Myerson says, "probably depends upon the whole concept of involvement: on the stage between the actors, off the stage in the audience, and direct confrontation between actors and audience." A number of signs—the resurgence of "happenings," for instance, and the tremendous success of Marat/Sade—indicate that we are ready and eager for a redefinition of the relationship between actors and audience. Alan Myerson and Paul Sills should be able to help.

Bobbs-Merrill

viet nam in the mud

"A freelance photographer, one of the best, Pickerell has covered the war mainly from the foot-soldier's viewpoint . . . with a sympathetic insight few others have been able to command."—Virginia Kirkus Service.

"In his down-to-earth account, he approves the larger objectives of American policy, but not our political and military tactics . . . This book deserves wide reading."
—Library Journal

over 100 photographs

by JAMES PICKERELL
introduction by MALCOM W. BROWNE
Paper $2.25 • Cloth $5.00

Bobbs-Merrill

No David in Sight

DAVID: The Biography of a King. By Juan Bosch. Translated by John Marks. Hawthorn Books. 224 pp. 4.95.

KAL WAGENHEIM
Mr. Wagenheim is editor of the monthly San Juan Review. He has lived in Puerto Rico and covered Caribbean affairs for the past six years.

A biography about the King of Judah by the ex-President of a Catholic, Spanish-speaking republic in the Caribbean has a touch of the exotic for the North American sensibility. It will certainly cause a strange alliance of readers: students of the Bible and those of Caribbean politics.

For Bosch's biography of David (published in Spanish in 1963 and written before he became President) reveals probably as much about him as it does about the Israeli king whom he admires so effusively. It has the same type of appeal, to a lesser magnitude to be sure, as would a word portrait of Washington by de Gaulle.

But unlike some politicians who write, and some writers who politicize, Juan Bosch has full-time credentials in both fields. Living half his life in exile from the Trujillo-dominated Dominican Republic, Bosch helped found the Partido Revolucionario Dominicano, and though he was defeated for re-election to the Presidency which he lost via military coup, he remains a key figure in Dominican politics. His literary accomplishments include a study of Judas, biographies of Simón Bolívar and José Martí and numerous other fiction and nonfiction works, some of which are standard texts in Latin American schools. He is an engaging storyteller, and in using the Bible's rich source of drama he has a great story to tell.

"Our Lord chose to be called the Son of David," Bosch writes, explaining why he, a Christian, was moved to write the book. But more compelling, one suspects, was his curiosity as a writer and political scientist as to what makes a great leader. For at the time of the book's preparation, Bosch was making ready to enter his country's politics. And though it is not explicit in the text, one senses that Bosch was searching for applicable wisdom in the life story of a man who transformed Israel from a scattered pastoral community, prey to foreign domination and internal squabbling, into a powerful, prosperous nation.

"There is no actual biography of the Israelite leader," Bosch writes, "or, if such a work exists, it is practically unknown." He partially explains why when he notes that "the Bible is the only historical source available . . . there is so much that is obscure and contradictory that no doubt authors who may have sought to discover the real David gave up in despair."

But despite the scarcity of reliable data, Bosch makes the attempt, and the result is a fascinating novelette-length work which contains a clearly labeled blend of chronologically arranged Biblical quotations and Bosch's speculations on the lacunas. Despite occasional repetition (the book seems to have been first published in serial form for each chapter begins with a "bridge" synopsizing the previous one), and despite Bosch's occasional moralizing, he has managed to convert David into a contemporary figure, chronicling all the intrigues and subtle maneuvers he employed to achieve and maintain power, vividly describing his moments of glory and failure.

In citing the obstacles to discovering "the real David," who is beclouded by 3,000 years of history, Bosch makes an arresting observation:

> It is usual for an extraordinary career to contain great flaws. . . . What surprises one in studying the life of David ben Jesse . . . is not the passionate nature of his errors, nor their magnitude, but the fact that ideas of right and wrong were sufficiently advanced at the time for the chroniclers of his story to gloss over certain of his actions which might harm the king's reputation.

What, then, was the man really like? The man who called himself "David ben Jesse, who started life as a shepherd and became a captain at arms and son-in-law of King Saul, later turned fugitive and bandit chief, and afterwards was an ally and vassal of the Philistines, then in turn King of Judah and of Israel, captor of Jerusalem and a conqueror of nations. . . ."

Bosch asks as many questions as he attempts to resolve, but his admittedly sketchy portrait is an appealingly human one: "a composite figure of exceptional worth . . . a genuinely great man who while capable of having one of his followers put to death in order to take his wife, could also overcome an opposing army, weep over the dead body of his son, and write a lyric poem of infinite tenderness. . . . He is a king yet remains humble, he governs his people without oppressing them; he is a sensualist who organizes a state, a warrior who does not love violence."

Along the way, Bosch seeks to puncture several myths, among them the duel between the boy David and the Philistine giant, Goliath of Gath, which he feels is "made up of assorted parts of other incidents . . . welded together by the arts of a vivid oriental imagination."

In commenting upon a seemingly disastrous reversal when the young David is banished by his jealous father-in-law, King Saul, Bosch—the political scientist—observes: "Seldom can a man's life be assessed in sections, and still more rarely the career of a public figure. The concepts of success and failure are relative; even at the summit of his power a politician may have already failed, just as in the midst of adversity he may be paving the way towards ultimate triumph."

And, again as a political scientist, Bosch admires the prophet Samuel, who was asked by the elders of Israel to choose a king and unite the tribes under a single leader. "Samuel," he says, "perhaps . . . wanted the throne for himself, but he appears to have been one of those rare statesmen who recognize their own limitations. . . . Without him (Samuel) David could not have existed. . . ."

Earlier this year, during the Dominican Presidential election campaign, Bosch evoked thunderous bravos from his countrymen when, in referring to the U.S. intervention in his country, he said: "We have been invaded by a Goliath, and like David—who used a sling to conquer the giant—we must use our intelligence to rid ourselves of our Goliath."

It seems clear that Bosch relates his troubled homeland to pre-David Israel, and when he describes Israel's oppressors ("the Philistines . . . a race with a social system superior to Israel's, and a strong military tradition") one need not stretch the allegory too far to make it contemporary. And, in his appreciation of Samuel's recognition of his own shortcomings, one perhaps has a clue to why Bosch withdrew without strongly contesting the questionable results of the June, 1966, elections ("this country is not ready for democracy," he said, in acknowledging his defeat).

Thus, Bosch, who once aspired to be the David of his country, has in midstream seemingly attempted to change his role to that of Samuel, the maker of kings. But Bosch's tragedy—indeed the tragedy of his country—is that there is no David in sight.

NEW DIRECTIONS
19

An anthology of new work by 25 writers from 10 countries who are extending the frontiers of literature. Dahlberg, Ferlinghetti, Levertov, Corso . . . Alberti, Borgese, Enzensberger, Transtromer, MacBeth . . . the Chinese poetry translations of William Carlos Williams and D. R. Wang.

Cloth, $6 Paperbook, $2.75

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 Sixth Ave., N. Y. 10014

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 12-5-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY
STATE ZIP NO.

Private & Public Sensibility

THE YOKE AND THE STAR. By Tana de Gámez. Bobbs-Merrill Co. 309 pp. $5.95.

IDENTITY CARD. By F. M. Esfandiary. Grove Press. 236 pp. $4.95.

THE TIME OF THE HERO. By Mario Vargas Llosa. Grove Press. 409 pp. $5.95.

LEONARD KRIEGEL

Mr. Kriegel teaches English at the City College of New York and is currently working on a novel and on a study of politics and literature in contemporary America.

That these three novels lend themselves to analysis as political works is not to suggest that they cannot be read in any other way. Each of them seems to have been created as a "novel in which political ideas play a dominant role or in which the political milieu is the dominant setting." This definition of political fiction is taken from what is still the best book on the subject, Irving Howe's Politics and the Novel. And now that we seem to be approaching a point at which the relationship between politics and literature promises to become more overt, it is important to ask exactly how a novel can speak with a political voice while still maintaining the more usual tensions that its artistic success demands. For despite the efforts of Mr. Howe and others, a confusion still exists between the political and the didactic novel, especially among American critics who tend to suspect politics in a novel as an ideological intrusion on the province of art.

Perhaps we are particularly fortunate in having these three books to examine, since none of them is the work of an American writer (Miss de Gámez is evidently a naturalized American, but she is the least psychologically American of the three). What links them is that they are all products of that segment of world society which we Americans like to refer to with the euphemism "underdeveloped countries," and that they each evince in the reviewer—solely on the political level—a dual sense of guilt and hopelessness. This is not to say that Miss de Gámez's pre-Castro Cuba, the Iran of Mr. Esfandiary, or Mario Vargas Llosa's sullenly corrupted Peru are the pure products of America alone. But one of the virtues of the political novel is that it uses the private sensibility as a means of exploring a public world. And whether we want the role or not, Americans are increasingly being seen as the destroyers of other men's dreams. In the first two of the novels, we are asked to recognize ourselves; in the third, we are models for a hypocrisy that is almost total.

But a political novel, like any other, must first stand as a work of artistic consciousness. It cannot afford to trade reality for slogans. Unfortunately, Tana de Gámez's novel about Cuba under Batista contains all the faults that were so abundantly exhibited in so much American fiction of the 1930s—its drama frequently disintegrates into melodrama; its division of the world into good and evil has all the moral complexity of a Randolph Scott Western; it is incurably sentimental. In short, it is an exemplum of what a political novel should not be.

The story begins with the attack on Fort Moncado in Santiago in 1953. It ends with the invasion of Oriente Province in which Castro (here known as "the Doctor") and eleven others survive to reach the mountains and to launch the guerrilla war which was to conclude with the overthrow of the Batista regime. What happens between these two events is so divorced from any recognizable novelistic reality that the author must answer the charge of having unintentionally parodied what she set out to celebrate. For I find it difficult to believe that young people anywhere, even those in Mao's China, talk about the revolution while they passionately advance upon one another.

I do not mean to question the idealism, the ferocious hunger for freedom and independence, that went into the making of the revolution in Cuba. Nor do I mean that Miss de Gámez is not on the Lord's side. But she has the responsibility of taking a long look at what happens in heaven has written "an elegant sibylline, sophisticated striptease."

Photo: Jerry Bauer

—Virginia Kirkus Service

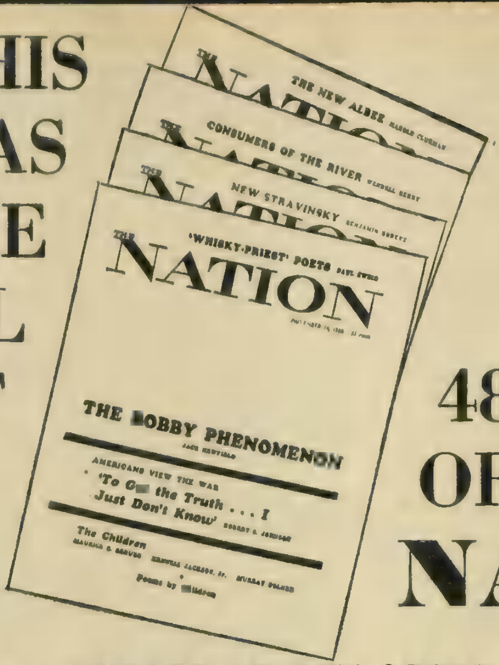
A current bestseller in France, LA MAISON DE RENDEZ-VOUS centers about a house of assignation known as the Blue Villa, run by Lady Ava, an expert at catering to every varying taste of her clients.

Marc Slonim says, in the N. Y. Times Book Review: "It is conceived and written as a mystery novel, with all the usual ingredients of the genre — murder, sex, money, beautiful girls strolling in the exotic streets of Hong Kong, enigmatic Eurasians—but they make a peculiar literary cocktail when mixed by Robbe-Grillet . . . Undeniably one of the most challenging novels of the season." $4.50

LA MAISON DE RENDEZ-VOUS

Now at your bookstore, or order directly from the publisher. (Please enclose payment with order.)
GROVE PRESS, 315 Hudson Street,
New York, N. Y. 10013

THIS CHRISTMAS GIVE THE THOUGHTFUL GIFT



48 ISSUES OF THE NATION

PLUS FREE BONUS BOOK UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

Here is the perfect gift for a thinking friend. 48 issues of this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion, plus this decade's most controversial book.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material." Science Magazine said UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED "is likely to be the Silent Spring of traffic safety." For anyone who spends any time at all in a car, this controversial book is "must" reading. And it's a bonus absolutely free, when you enter a Christmas subscription to The Nation.

- "A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."

Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

- "A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."

Wall Street Journal

- "Deeply disturbing. . . . Exhaustive and persuasive. . . . He cites numerous weaknesses in certain Big Three models of recent years, naming names in each instance and quoting from court proceedings."

John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER

THE NATION / 333 SIXTH AVENUE / NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a Gift for one year at the Christmas rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. I understand they will receive a BONUS of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

(For more than two Gift Subscriptions, please use a separate piece of paper.)

Your Own Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....

☐ I enclose payment of $ ....
☐ Bill me

Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

12-5-66

while the Lord works His work. One of the lessons that the aftermath of the Cuban Revolution should have taught her is that our problem is not the lack of political alternatives but rather that the alternatives all seem to wind up heading in a single direction. It may be that to capture the inhumanity and corruption of Batista's Cuba is enough to legitimately ask of any novelist. But Miss de Gámez has chosen to ignore not the truth (which is certainly debatable) but the nature of Orwell's vision (which is not). Death, as Heraclitus wrote long ago, is everywhere, in the voices of all men.

F. M. Esfandiary, the author of Identity Card, is an Iranian who writes in English. A more accomplished novelist, he recognizes certain complexities that Miss de Gámez does not. But the problem with Identity Card is that it has been written too late, in a world that possesses Vietnam as a metaphor for the actual terror in its midst. In an attempt to replace his lost identity card, Daryoush Aryana, the Westernized Iranian intellectual who is the protagonist of the novel, is subjected to a Kafkaesque bureaucracy which seems remarkably commonplace—almost, one is tempted to write, "Edenically innocent."

The book opens with a sentence that must have been written as an intentional echo of the opening of Dostoevsky's Notes from Underground: "I am a confused man. I am a restless man. I don't know what I want." One wonders whether Mr. Esfandiary has not betrayed himself with this beginning. In some ways, to echo Dostoevsky is to falsify the particular nature of contemporary alienation (a statement that seems to me truer for the very adulation we feel impelled to thrust on Dostoevsky). The Teheran through which Daryoush Aryana moves in his quest for escape from the sterile decadence of modern Iran is far more comic than it is threatening. Esfandiary prefaces his novel with a note telling us that his original manuscript was confiscated by security police and that a second copy was then typed and smuggled out of the country by two Americans. "For those who don't know the Middle East," he adds, "it may be well to mention that this is not a work of satire." Esfandiary's Iran is undoubtedly as swollen, as boring, as sterile and Kafkaesque as he portrays it. But as a novelist, it is his responsibility to emancipate that horror and boredom. In underdeveloped and developed countries both, all that the writer possesses is a politics of indirection. Where the human exists, he must celebrate it; where it is absent, he must create it. Esfandiary seems content to record it, even down to its sexual peculiarities, and then to recoil in moralistic anguish.

What is ultimately of greatest value in Esfandiary's story is its depiction of American interests in that part of the world. Once again we seem to be the staunch supporters of a government completely lacking in vision and in popularity. Perhaps the true "Great Leader of Leaders" is our man in Washington, in which case it is far more than bureaucracy that should be troubling Mr. Esfandiary. Kafka is dead—while the birds fly like prophetic minions of doom in our own smog-drenched sky.

Mario Vargas Llosa's The Time of the Hero is the least overtly political of the books under discussion. It is also the best. The translation from the Spanish by Lysander Kemp reads better than the English either of Mr. Esfandiary, which is sometimes artificially clipped, or of Miss de Gámez, whose English seems to be a mental translation from phrases which originally occurred in Spanish. But it is not merely Vargas Llosa's good fortune in a fine translation that makes this as good a novel as it is. From the very first page of The Time of the Hero, we are aware of the true novelist's touch.

Vargas Llosa tells a story which concerns itself with the lives of a group of adolescent boys in a military school in Lima (the real Leoncio Prado burned a thousand copies of Vargas Llosa's book in what must have been the most impressive display of Peruvian military valor seen in quite some time). Its tensions, however, are not merely localized but are truly contemporary. The book brings to mind Calder Willingham's End as a Man, but it is even better. Vargas Llosa skillfully depicts the corruption within the academy, never permitting us to forget that it is an inevitable reflection of the hypocrisy without.

The world of the Leoncio Prado, with its adolescent sexuality, its brutality, its hatred of authority and its suckling to power, is a world in which one learns to survive only by turning oneself into as corrupt a force as the authorities. The only other ways—those of the leader of the students, known as the Jaguar, and of Lieutenant Gamboa, the honest officer—lead to societal disapproval. The Leoncio Prado is a microcosm of the world, and the training of both aristocracy and proletariat within its walls will be readily adapted to the corruption outside. The society, both military and civilian, is interested in maintaining its status. The only politics in evidence is the politics of accretion, more deadly, it seems, than the vast and cumbersome buck-passing bureaucracy that Daryoush Aryana must face.

Vargas Llosa has a great deal to learn, including resistance to his desire to be-

A Special Enlarged
DECEMBER 1966
Issue of midstream
A Monthly Jewish Review

NEGRO-JEWISH RELATIONS
IN AMERICA

An important symposium including such outstanding figures as:

Joel Carmichael
Arthur A. Cohen
Jacob Cohen
Lucy Dawidowicz
Howard Fast
Rabbi Myron Fenster
Leslie Fiedler
Rabbi Roland B. Gittelsohn
Jacob Glatstein
B. Z. Goldberg
Harry Golden
Ben Halpern
Rabbi Arthur Hertzberg
Paul Jacobs
Horace Kallen
C. Eric Lincoln
Will Maslow
Floyd McKissick
Aryeh Neier
Maurice Samuel
Rabbi Steven Schwarzschild
Ben B. Seligman
William Stringfellow
Marie Syrkin
Gus Tyler
Rabbi Herbert Weiner
Rabbi Jacob J. Weinstein

MIDSTREAM is a must for those who seek a more informed understanding of the crucial issues of our time. Don't delay. Take advantage of this Special Introductory Offer and begin your subscription with the current issue of the new-expanded in coverage — monthly MIDSTREAM.

midstream
515 Park Ave., New York, N.Y. 10022

Please enter my subscription to MIDSTREAM at the special introductory rate—1 year for only $4.00 (I save $3.50 on Newsstand Price).

Name: ....
Address: ....
City: ....
State: .... Zip: ....
☐ Payment enclosed ☐ Bill me come a technical innovator in the novel. But what he possesses in abundance is the novelist's willingness to live with complexity and to magnify every minor crack in the world's surface so that we can see what it hides. For the contemporary novelist must become increasingly aware of the possibilities of reconciling both private and public surfaces. As our political life becomes more threatening, the novel offers itself as one of the ways—perhaps the best way—by which we can express exactly where we have failed in the quest for the livable future.

A Tour of the Pops

THE ANTI-DEATH LEAGUE. By Kingsley Amis. Harcourt, Brace & World. 307 pp. $5.95.

TREMOR OF INTENT. By Anthony Burgess. W. W. Norton & Company. 240 pp. $4.95.

THE HEIRS OF CAIN. By Abraham Rothberg. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 318 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT HATCH

After pop art — now giving place to psychedelics and the electronically engineered happening — comes the pop novel. But the nursing ground of the former was America; of the latter it is England. That figures: pop art was laminated out of comic strips and advertising graphics, forms in which the jet-age Yankee clearly excels; the pop novel is an evolvement from the spy thriller, a pastime for which we are indebted to the British. In a sense, the pop novel is a back formation. The thriller diverged from the main course of the novel, distilling from the parent form two elements—pursuit and suspense—and elaborating these until they produced a kind of formal game. Now certain English writers have thought to give the spy tale a twist, whether of symbolism or social relevance, whereby it may perhaps regain the name of novel. In simplest terms, they do this by encouraging their heroes to become introspective: to the classic question, "where is the enemy?" is now added the modern inquiry, "who am I?" It is a question that John Buchan, romancer and servant of the Crown, could not have imagined a gentleman would raise.

Nor could he have countenanced certain aspects of the new hero's behavior. The traditional thriller was as patriotic as a recruiting poster and, with its sibling, the mystery, observed a chastity rivaled in English fiction only by The Wind in the Willows. The undercover men of the prodigally returning novels are sodden with disillusion and they are lechers, one and all. But the authors have devised here a sly trick. The scenes they prepare between their satyric agents and the ladies (frequently) of the opposition are not to be understood as mere pornographic embellishment, the other face of violence. They are ceremonies dedicated to the life force, antidotes to the lethal business on which the protagonists are professionally employed. "Make love, not war" is the slogan implicit in all these works, and they are adept at demonstrating what they mean. This liberal bias both distinguishes the pop novel from the class snobbery of the thriller and bridges over to the somewhat vaguer social pose of pop art.

But I seem not to be getting to the three books which have occasioned these generalizations. The reluctance may be for the reason that I find it difficult to recall very much about them except the outlines of their plots, and plot recitation is a deplorable form of reviewing.

The Anti-Death League by Kingsley Amis, as might be expected from the literary reputation of its author, is the most sardonic of the lot. His principal cast is a group of university-bred army officers seconded to a secret project which pretends to be perfecting a hideous new weapon under the cover of experimenting with a slightly less hideous weapon—the whole charade to be leaked ingeniously to the Chinese as a counter-stimulus to Oriental expansionism. The officers do not for the most part know that they are paper monsters, and the league of the title is subversively fomented by one of them, an alcoholic homosexual with overtones of gallantry. There is on the staff a padre who has been an atheist since adolescence, a security officer who is not quite old-school tie, and an Asian who finds the English enigmatic. In the neighborhood a mad psychiatrist runs a mental home, and a Lady Hazell, having discovered that the only thing she likes about sex is the sex, keeps open house for the officers. A more conventional romance is provided by the nicest of the officers and a divorcée recently paroled from the sanitarium who develops breast cancer early in their affair. Mr. Amis, it can be seen, has arranged matters to his advantage, and the tone of mockery is well sustained.

Anthony Burgess has subtitled Tremor of Intent "An Eschatological Spy Novel," and I have checked to make sure that I grasped the term: it is a theological concept referring to death and judgment, heaven and hell—the science, that is, of the final things. Mr. Burgess, in addition to being a most prolific novelist, is a student of music, a linguist, an explicator of James Joyce, and his book is exceedingly erudite in a playful way. His hero is off on a final mission, in more senses than he realizes; he survives it and escapes nemesis by taking final vows. His sexual partners en route are a teen-age American reader of marriage manuals and an Indian practitioner of scented refinements as delicious as they are unspecified (though I believe the author gives the clues necessary to locate appropriate passages in the secret books). Burgess has a way of equating lust with gluttony which I appreciate but find a little unsettling; he is so insistent upon the parallel as to make it seem less his observation than his problem. Otherwise, his narrative is alive with violent incidents and sudden encounters designed to expose and admonish the killer in us all.

Abraham Rothberg, unlike Amis and Burgess, is not turning from other pursuits to reinstall the spy thriller in the main library. He has been a writer of thrillers from the start, but, as his jacket blurb puts it, now establishes himself "as a serious writer to be reckoned with." The puff also refers to his "probing the heart of darkness," which I suspect would embarrass Mr. Rothberg, but Conrad aping is often what he is about. His gunman, an Israeli agent, is set upon two German nuclear technicians employed by Nasser but vacationing in Switzerland. The senior ex-Nazi is traveling with an Egyptian bodyguard-boy friend (there is one homosexual in each of these up-to-date books) and a daughter subject to spasms of sexuality. The Heirs of Cain operates on two timetables: the cat-and-mouse game in Berne, and the chronicle of the agent's life journey from Poland, through the Nazi extermination net and the pioneering of Israel, to his present role as a killer with Old Testament misgivings. Much of this latter story comes out in remembered interviews with his psychoanalyst, a man patiently determined to convince his patient that on the one hand he need not avenge single-handed all the crimes committed against his people, and on the other that he need not consider himself accursed of God. It is a very wordy process; indeed, all three books are notably loquacious, and that is one final respect in which they show their pop deviation from the spy tale. One feels that all the taciturn agents of international intrigue from E. Phillips Oppenheim to Eric Ambler have simultaneously decided to let down their hair.

If these three books had indeed managed to make it back into the mainstream, there would be certain advantages. For one thing, their return would have restored to fiction the aura of disreputability which made novel reading so peculiarly attractive in the Victorian age. But the fact is that they don't make it back—not by a mile. The novel is a bewilderingly permissive craft, and no one can write its formula. But the one thing it must do is create a world and put people (or at least a person) into it. These books do not create worlds; they provide tours. And they are not peopled; they are merely animated. For all the cinematic detail of their habit and behavior, the characters slide past like figures on the other side of a sound studio window. One reads on to learn, not who they are but what becomes of them, and all their confiding introspection is merely data fed into the ploy they operate. It is odd: these writers are adept at summoning up the geography of their stories; they have been to the places and made pertinent notes. But the effect, nevertheless, is of painted scenery because the characters are paste.

The workmanship, except perhaps for all that solemn chatter, is of high quality. These pop novels pass the time without blatantly wasting it, and one can think of a host of real novels that are not nearly so well made. But few novels that see print are so deformed that they do not somehow confirm or challenge the reader's understanding of human experience. If they don't do that they fail as novels, but the pop novels succeed very well without doing it. They are not built on life, but on a highly stylized formula, and though they flout the conventions of that formula, they never break free. The whole pop movement operates on the beguiling theory that art is play. It is a childlike notion, but it lacks innocence.

ART / Max Kozloff

MANET IN PHILADELPHIA II.

When first glimpsed, the hand list for the Manet show in Philadelphia disappointed me by the absence of so many of what are considered crucial works. How could such a retrospective adequately present the friend of Mallarmé, when it lacked canvases like the "Portrait of Emile Zola" or "The Balcony," many of the plein-air paintings of the late seventies, or the great pictures that first infuriated the salons? Imbalanced and recherché, or so it seemed, the exhibition had little chance to document the full extent of his career and the amplitude of his vision. I had expected to have to piece together the visual fabric of Manet from various odd lots and extras in his production.

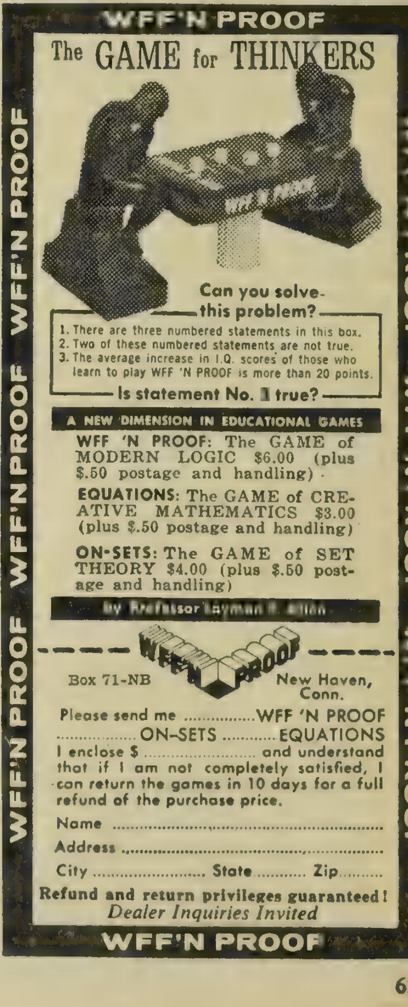
But such a calculation was hardly prepared for the spectacle of brilliance in even the most out-of-the-way slaps of paint. For in effect, there is explicit in each of Manet's pictures that gustatory elegance and disinterested fervor which altered the make-up of energies in modern art. What most illuminates his accomplishment is a certain nervous touch that he could hardly exclude, least of all from works which weren't "ambitious." More than in his greatest contemporaries, Manet's art is an affair of mercurial sensibility whose distinction is that it gives the impression of re-creating itself anew with every picture. This alone is the abiding interest in gathering those of his works that could be brought together for this show.

What tells immediately in such an assemblage is the extent to which Manet is revealed as dependent on a primary drive: his instinctual and unplanned reflexes tightening and relaxing in contact with a shifting environment. The qualities of puzzling improvisation, the minute intimacy of textures, dabs and lines, the spontaneously dashed-in forms, the innumerable formal devices of dissolution, penetration, transience and incompletion: all these sparkle as if perceived by the spectator very close in time to the moment when they originated on the surface. Each image is delivered without the felt or observable intrusion of any process of construction. (Although it is impossible to say that these figurations are chaotic.) In the barely begun "Claude Monet in his Floating Studio" (which can represent only a couple of hours of work), the figures are being whittled capriciously into place by means that waver without priority between linear and tonal. But the very indecisiveness of this process-record seems completely natural and blunt.

By contrast, the early stages of a Courbet or Corot would appear highly rationalized and unaccented. Their pictures await their final scumbles or focusing contrasts in order simply to speak, or rather, to be given voice. With these artists, painting is an act of elaboration and orchestration whose goal of freshness—of a kind of colored quiddity in Courbet, and of atmospheric nuance in Corot—rests on the intensity with which each step in the process is carried out to a foreordained notion of finish.

With Manet, freshness is something that could perhaps be lost, but is more often an organic excitement out of which play various local modulations. It is not that "less" sensory information is finally given in Manet than in his mentors but that it is a declension of this excitement rather than the capstone of a strategy. One has the intuition (which must have been disconcerting to his contemporaries) that there is nothing "behind" Manet's energy, and that, having abandoned the usual apparatus concerned with modeling and placement, he had no choice but to expend all his resources nakedly on the surface (c.f., "The Departure of the Folkestone Boat"). But this was an effusion that he came to study for the properties and characteristics which would imbue the painting with a sense of intactness. Now consciously enhanced, this sense materialized in a redefinition of naturalistic finish, extreme not only because he associated it with the figure before applying it to landscape but because it deliberately required itself to stop short of the commensurable in contour and volume.

Yet Manet could never be mistaken for a mere bravura artist, as that would imply qualities as foreign to his tempera-



WFF'N PROOF

The GAME for THINKERS

Can you solve this problem?

1. There are three numbered statements in this box.
2. Two of these numbered statements are not true.
3. The average increase in I.Q. scores of those who learn to play WFF 'N PROOF is more than 20 points.

Is statement No. 1 true?

A NEW DIMENSION IN EDUCATIONAL GAMES

WFF 'N PROOF: The GAME of MODERN LOGIC $6.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

EQUATIONS: The GAME of CREATIVE MATHEMATICS $3.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

ON-SETS: The GAME of SET THEORY $4.00 (plus $.50 postage and handling)

By Professor Layman E. Allen

Box 71-NB
New Haven, Conn.

Please send me ....WFF 'N PROOF
................ON-SETS ....EQUATIONS
I enclose $ .... and understand that if I am not completely satisfied, I can return the games in 10 days for a full refund of the purchase price.
Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....

Refund and return privileges guaranteed!
Dealer Inquiries Invited

WFF'N PROOF

ment [illegible] self-satisfaction. That he was a supreme tactician of wet-on-wet painting, however, holds the key to his entire form. The necessities of this execution, to which by 1869 he had already pledged himself, were brought on by a quickening sense of the potentialities of oil in capturing the movements of bodies in light, much as time-lapse photography was to trace the same phenomenon on a chemically treated negative. Initially incomprehensible patches of merged tones would thereby quiver in a blur that simulated masses perceived in differentiated spaces. But this could also lead to a muddiness of paint quite opposite to the clarity and lightness of palette to which Manet was also committed. His solution was to load each stroke in such a way that it exhibited the blending powers of the medium in touch with other strokes, but also detached itself from them through its heavy substance and directional push. An image is compounded of an infinite number of these succulent "pushes," sometimes observed in the fleshy definition of planes, but often, as well, in the dissimulation of edges. Manet's method, therefore, encouraged the coalescence of matter at the same time that it compensated for it, or fought against it, in the service of entirely different ends. These are the physical dynamics (of attraction and repulsion) which gave a merely nervous touch its strange electricity.

But other factors contribute to it as well, among the chief of which are Manet's decorative instinct and color sensitivity. The first emerged in agreement with the French tachist tradition of dark spotting, and pictorial relief through high contrast, as exemplified in Decamps and Daumier. This device had materialized in an exaggerated chiaroscuro which had eventually been pushed so far that it had attacked its own origins and begun to flatten out as extended patterns on the picture plane. Manet had the vision to take it one step further and see it as an independent play of pictorial forces in evenly lit and shallowed circumstances. Even a Manet face is a miniaturization of this larger Gestalt, such that Malraux could go so far as to speak of Clemenceau's eyes as musical notes in search of a staff.

The diminution of shadows and the hesitation of the half tones also permitted a concentration on color that was unique. Recognizing that a profusion of hues might deaden one another (except as they may spangle a black in "Lola de Valence"), Manet tended to employ color as he had worked with value. There resulted a heightened sense of the quality of isolated, saturated chroma, set off in a neutralized surrounding, as in the celebrated lemon in the portrait of Duret, or the blue-green sea in "The Battle of the Kearsarge and the Alabama." Moreover, one has always the firmest sense of a color chord in interaction with black and white before 1869, and then in fusion with blue and gray thereafter. By some sleight of hand, the value changes are always quicker than the chromatic transitions, most of which are not transitions at all, but unadulterated responses to the beauty of unmixed pigment. Color is the somewhat acid and glittering locale in Manet's painting where one regains one's bearing. It represents various stoppages in the picture's internal clockwork. And that is why he differs so much from the Impressionists who, in this respect, shred color as a constituent of light, which diffuses it, rather than conserves it from the encroachments of tonality. The major item of tension in Manet, even when he is relaxed and most impressionist in mood, is this intensity of color. It is the single durable, or "immutable" element in a world of fluctuating luminosity. An artist like Renoir decomposes solids into color-constituted reflections; Manet, deliberately restricting his choices from the spectrum, sees color itself as a new form of solid. Both approaches led to an abstraction whose common principles did not yield themselves to synthesis until they were subjected to the imagination of Matisse.

LAMENT FOR A GIFTED MAN

Whatever it was that gave you radiant stillness like a fluttering air, is gone.
You were the recipient once, were the figure that seemed to walk like someone wrapped in light across an agitated bay or lake.
You could not accept the apparition was for our sake, not yours, could not give yourself to it enough to become the radiance you were possessed of.
Now emptied of what is so much bigger than you are, you stumble on,
err, err,
a rower without oars,
and are off course
no matter where you are.

ARTHUR GREGOR

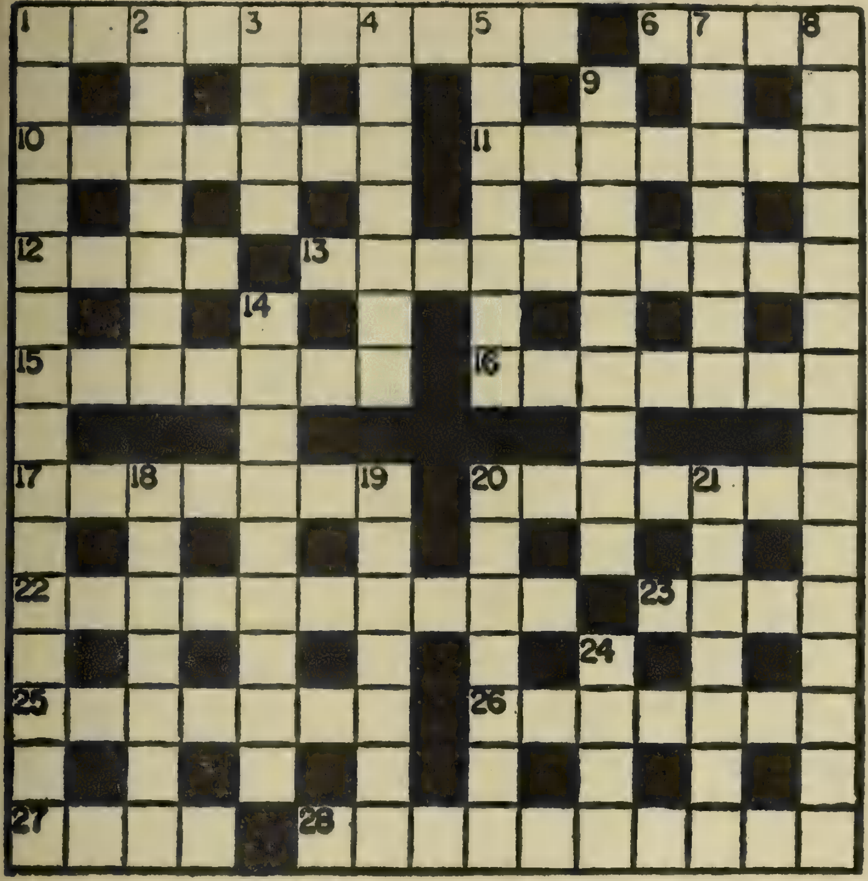
Such is the continuum of "technical questions" in which Manet's subjects fend for themselves in a contsantly alternating series of pleasant shocks. He paints bullfighters and friends, horse races and sea fights, still lifes and executions, concerts and picnics, all as integers of a non-hierarchical panorama of sensations. In this respect, they mean more to consciousness as it differentiates visual stimuli, than to a psyche that may want to organize them in various human relationships or contexts. The "performance" value or character role of a Manet personage is slighted in favor of affirming his presence in its own right. The place in which this individual is found does not characterize him, nor he, it (though they may obviously go together). Rather, the pictorial handling imposes its own absolute character upon reality—no matter how transient the effect. If he is not as daring as the Impressionists in chromatics, Manet was far more radical than they from a psychological point of view. For the personae of the Impressionists were still situated normatively and descriptively in their milieu. That is why the enigma in one of Manet's tableaux arises out of the conflict between the condition of everything being lived out perfectly visibly and unconcealed on the surface, and the anxiety that this only opens, rather than concludes, the aesthetic inquiry. With nothing to hide, the picture still eludes definition. Because he is still very obviously involved in the texture of the social world, the very candor of his icons comes to represent a missing element, that contrived absence by which the modern tradition protects itself against the pathetic fallacy that would otherwise render art a mere adjunct of experience.

The Philadelphia exhibition is a cornucopia of opportunities for scholars, as well as a treasure house of painterly pleasures. It is filled out with the most revealing display of Manet's remarkable drawings and interesting graphics. And it is accompanied by an ambitious catalogue by Anne Coffin Hanson. If the installation was a little glum, I was nevertheless happy to see such unexpected items as "The Escape of Rochefort" and "The Ragpicker," from Switzerland, and "In the Conservatory," from Berlin. As for the pictures from Philadelphia and Chicago, the two museums participating in this enterprise, they never looked better.

JUST PUBLISHED: the complete, unexpurgated
MACBIRD
in CITY LIGHTS JOURNAL No. 3 ($2.50)
CITY LIGHTS BOOKS, 261 Columbus Ave., San Francisco 11
(NYC distributors: Bookazine)

Crossword Puzzle No. 1178

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Bill, when in France, commonly? You might not be so pestered when this is around. (5, 5)
6 In part, the leg of an animal? (4)
10 What one loses in standing up to boxers, for example, but they're probably quite docile. (7)
11 Possible movements on track and slope, but wholly revolutionary. (7)
12 Certainly not 8, at first. (4)
13 Would Stevenson's go well with a rather somber bow? (5, 5)
15 What almost failing students do in report, or what they did if unjustly judged? (7)
16 She had reason not to trust her elders.
17 How to pack a suit in wrinkled state?
20 The old state of blood and iron? (7)
22 What a question! Aren't you stupid for not knowing the answer! (10)
23 In conclusion, one should be a girl. (4)
25 Little square weapons? (7)
26 Mules of the base sort. (7)
27 Understands archeological operations, perhaps. (4)
28 and 14 down Those with etherial aspirations should, but not in the best of health. (3, 4, 3, 4, 5)

DOWN:

1 Sounds like such as Cap'n Flint, by another name, shouldn't be all wet! (Spread so often nowadays.) (15)
2 Praise, when 26, might do it to us.
3 Not the first or second best entertainment! (4)
4 Showing the cobbler's second effort in color stands by itself. (7)
5 Acts like a trapper? (7)
7 Stepped on it, as well, but didn't make 3. (4-3)
8 What New York had to clean up in the fall of '65? (4, 4, 3, 4)
9 Metal, but most is up a compound of it. (9)
18 Having to have exercising, by the sound of it, of the muscles? (7)
19 Poet who is the first of translators in melodious style. (7)
20 Volumes of Shakespeare should be, in a kidding way. (7)
21 Banish? (A good one may be appreciated.) (4, 3)
24 This king should be a board member, by design. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1177

ACROSS: 1 Warships; 5 Big game; 9 and 8 Civil engineers; 11 Serf; 12 Common noun; 14 Creamy; 17 and 10 The day of reckoning; 19 Grasps; 22 Kittiwakes; 26 Levantine; 27 Eared; 28 Salient; 29 Speeder. DOWN: 1 Wicks; 2 and 23 Reverse gear; 3 Hole; 4 Parlor; 5 Becoming; 6 Good nature; 7 Adipose; 13 Impatience; 14 Catskills; 16 Botanist; 18 Estival; 20 Speared; 21 Levels; 24 Rider; 25 and 15 Here and there.

Apology to Mr. Lewis: In the solution to Puzzle No. 1175, the answer to 20 across should have been "palatal" not "palatial." The editors regret the typographical error.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FREE LITERATURE on Buddhist philosophy. Write to: Buddhist Publication Society, Kandy, Ceylon.

FREE! Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

TRAVEL

WORLDWIDE FREIGHTER GUIDE $1.25

Lists: Rates — Routes — Schedules — Accommodations — 700 Passenger Carrying Freighters. INEXPENSIVE — yet FIRST CLASS — Voyages vary from a short 7 days to all the way around the world. Longer voyages average less than $12 a day. Almost as low as staying home, yet you enjoy an ocean cruise, & visit exotic ports, with first class food & accommodations.

TravLtips,
40-21 Bell Blvd., Dept. GC, Bayside, N.Y. 11361

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

EMPLOYMENT OPPORTUNITIES

ONE of the most unique and interesting agencies involved in trying to find solutions to the problems of Appalachia is recruiting for a number of high level professional positions provided for in a new $650,000 grant. These positions include: Director of Program Evaluation and Development $13,800-$16,700; Research Assistant $5,500-$6,700; Coordinator of Staff Development and Training $11,700-$14,200; Director, Neighborhood Organization and Area Action $12,600-$15,300; Assistant to the Director $7,200-$8,700; and, Director, Multi-Purpose Community Center $9,000-$11,000. Send resumé to AAY-Community Development, Inc., Box 3228, Charleston, West Virginia 25332.

PERSONALS

RECENT anti-war films for rental. American, North & South Vietnamese. Write for rates: Free School, 20 East 14 Street, N.Y.C.

OUTSTANDING news stories, features, articles considered for publication. Globe Press International, Box 598, c/o The Nation.

WHO KILLED KENNEDY?

1" button, 10" bumpersticker, 50c. each, ppd. Any 3, $1.00. Quantity Discounts. WHO KILLED KENNEDY? P.O. Box 309, Venice, Calif. 90291, Dept. F.

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

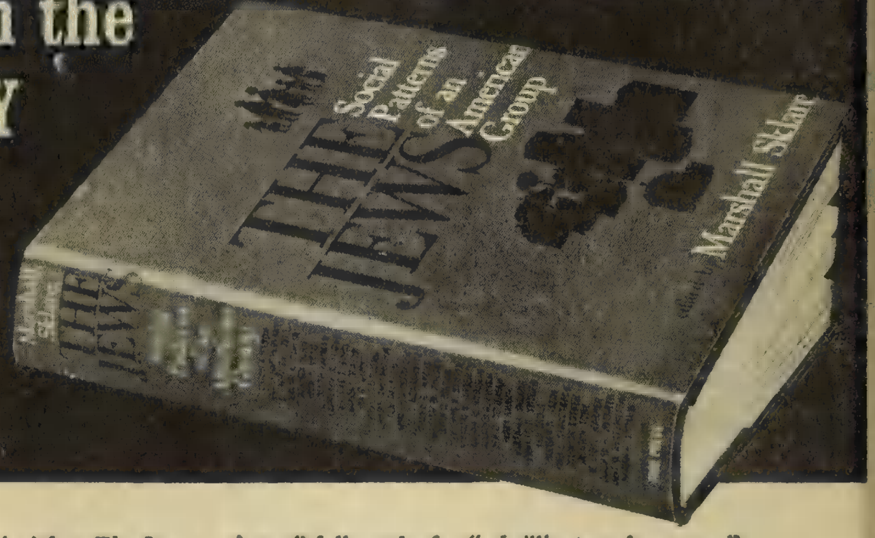
The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
CHelsea 2-8400

NOW-a Jewish Book Club

FREE-this outstanding 800-page report when you join the COMMENTARY LIBRARY

(You need not buy another book unless you wish)



Comprehensive, clear, often startling in its insights, The Jews is widely regarded as the most thoroughgoing and absorbing account of Jewish life in America today. Its bookstore price is $10.00. Yet it is now offered free to introduce you to the COMMENTARY LIBRARY—the new Jewish book club that allows you to buy as few or as many books as you like...the book club without a minimum purchase obligation.

The COMMENTARY LIBRARY is a most exclusive book club. Membership is confined entirely to subscribers to Commentary magazine. For this reason, the books in the COMMENTARY LIBRARY have been deliberately chosen to reflect both the magazine's content and intellectual level. As you probably know, Commentary is the magazine that has won itself a world-wide reputation for the most trenchant and penetrating discussion of all the important issues with which Jews, and, in fact, all thinking Americans are concerned. C. P. Snow calls Commentary "one of the best periodicals in the world." U. N. Ambassador Arthur Goldberg—a loyal reader from Commentary's early days some twenty years ago—ranks it "the very best of magazines."

T. V. commentator Chet Huntley gives this "journal of significant thought and opinion on Jewish affairs and contemporary issues" full marks for "a brilliant performance."

Now, with a year's subscription to Commentary, you may automatically enroll in the COMMENTARY LIBRARY. Your free copy of The Jews will be sent to you. Shortly thereafter you will receive a monthly bulletin announcing new selections and alternates—almost all at substantial discounts on the regular published price, often as high as 40%, and all, without exception, counting toward bonus books that are entirely free.

The COMMENTARY LIBRARY operates like other book clubs, but with an important difference. There is no book purchase obligation. You need not buy another book unless you wish. This means that you can select books of the caliber of The Scroll of Agony, the works of Isaac Bashevis Singer, Kaufmann's The Religion of Israel, and many others, at substantial savings, as you wish, when you wish, without any feeling of pressure or undue restriction of choice.

We believe you will find the COMMENTARY LIBRARY a valuable aid in acquiring the books that you, as a Commentary reader, are most likely to want for your permanent library.

Join today. Your name and address on the coupon will bring you twelve issues of Commentary, your free copy of The Jews and enroll you in the COMMENTARY LIBRARY for future bargains in important books.

Commentary Library

NL-1

165 East 56th Street, New York, New York 10022

I wish to enroll in the COMMENTARY LIBRARY and receive Commentary. Please send me 12 monthly issues of Commentary for $8.00 and at the same time send me my free copy of The Jews (Retail price $10.00). I understand that a new selection will be offered to me every month at a substantial discount—and that I shall receive it automatically unless I choose an alternate or return the card provided to say "No Book" for that month. I also understand that I do not have to buy any books if I don't choose to, but that the books I do buy will qualify me for additional free bonus books.

☐ Do not bill me—check for $8 enclosed.

☐ Bill me and I will pay the additional small shipping charge.

☐ I am already a Commentary subscriber. Just send me my free book.

NAME

ADDRESS

ZIP

YARMOLINSKY & THE CANNIBAL RICHARD STERN

THE NATION

DECEMBER 12, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBRARY
Burlingame, Calif.
DEC 12 1966

Georgia Happening

The Election Nobody Won

SYLVAN MEYER

Big City Slowdown

THE BATTLE OF BUREAUCRACY

BLANCHE D. BLANK

No Fun in Bavaria

C. AMERY

PAPER NEWSP
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

. AGNON: HEBREW LITERATURE & THE NOBEL PRIZE

CURT LEVIANT

LETTERS

what Truman thought

New York City

Dear Sirs: I don't know where Daniel Cohen ["The Russians Faked It," The Nation, Oct. 31] got his knowledge of what President Truman believed in the privacy of his heart; but he certainly is mistaken on facts which anyone can check by looking into the newspaper file. It simply is not true that "the Russians announced they had tested the bomb; U.S. Government scientists confirmed the Soviet test and Truman himself announced it." It is easy to ascertain that American scientists first discovered proof of the Soviet test, and thereupon Truman announced it, rather than letting the Russians spring a surprise announcement on the world at their own convenience. Moreover, if American scientists had intelligence of the Russian test, the reason was that they had been looking for it, and they could not have done that—at considerable expense to the U.S. taxpayer—unless they had first convinced the President and the director of the CIA that such search was necessary, or in other words, unless the President judged the Russians capable of developing atomic weapons. It is one thing to accuse popular magazines of ignoring the evidence, but to drag the President into this is quite unfair.

Henry M. Pachter

New York City

Dear Sirs: President Truman's doubts about the Russian ability to produce the bomb were not exactly held in the "privacy of his heart." They have often been cited by scientists as a classic example of how misunderstood science is by people in positions of power. Of course U.S. scientists knew the Russians were ready to test the bomb, but it simply does not follow as Dr. Pachter seems to think that the President therefore "judged the Russians capable of developing atomic weapons." It is not the first time that a President ignored good advice, nor will it be the last.

Daniel Cohen

good question

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Dear Sirs: Somehow everyone has overlooked a very important local vote that took place in Dearborn, Mich., during the last election. I refer to a question on the ballot in that city asking the voter if he favored an "immediate withdrawal" of American troops from Vietnam.

The results were 14,133 in favor of "immediate withdrawal" to 20,631 against. The New York Times, in the one sentence it gave to this vote, said the citizens showed they were "overwhelmingly . . . against a pullout of troops."

Perhaps "overwhelmingly" is the right word, but . . . over 40 per cent of those voting on the question favored what might be called the most "extreme" dove position: immediate withdrawal. One wonders what the result might have been had the question been phrased in terms of de-escalation.

Stephen Gillers

bedfellows

Joplin, Mo.

Dear Sirs: With reference to your "A Look Ahead" editorial [The Nation, Nov. 28]: What is going to happen, Romney and Nixon will be running against Johnson and Kennedy. This is so because Romney needs Nixon and Johnson needs Kennedy. There is no need to think about Humphrey.

W. A. Seiler

EDITORIALS

Running Hard To Stand Still

American diplomacy was at peak activity in support of the status quo these past weeks on the East River. It scored a triumph in again barring Peking from the United Nations, and this time it bolted the door securely. And on the day after Thanksgiving the American vote was decisive in casting a blame on Israel for its large-scale raid on the Hebron sector of Jordan, thus perhaps saving the pro-Western regime of King Hussein from Arab extremists.

It must have pained Ambassador Goldberg to announce the decision to support a Security Council resolution censuring Israel, without reference to extenuating circumstances. He has been most careful to demonstrate a lack of bias in the Arab-Israeli conflict. However, like other Washington officials, and, indeed, the majority of the Council's members, he was well aware of the double standard applied in the Council to Israeli and Arab complaints. In the same month, the Soviet veto had again blocked a mild condemnation of Syria for acts of terrorism and sabotage in Israel, openly promoted by the Syrian Government. This state of affairs in the Security Council is partly responsible for repeated acts of retaliation by Israel.

But the chain of violence must stop somewhere if a new eruption is to be avoided in the Middle East. The heavy damage inflicted by Israeli armed forces on Jordanian villages was particularly unfortunate in view of the relative aloofness of the Jordan Government from the renewed Arab belligerency against Israel. Mr. Goldberg tried to insert a more balanced account of Arab-Israeli relations into the resolution submitted to the Security Council, but Jordan was adamant. The regime of King Hussein was under attack from the Palestinian Arabs of Ahmed Shukhairi, who, by the strange but not uncommon alliance of extreme nationalism with communism, could lead Jordan away from the shrinking pro-Western camp in the Middle East into the ranks of the militant Left, recently swelled by Syria. The United States decided not to take this risk.

On the Chinese representation issue, those officials in Washington who oppose any change had nothing to fear from the present session of the General Assembly. Clearly, Peking had not gained votes since last year. Its "cultural revolution," its estrangement from Moscow and most Communist parties in the world, and its intransigent attitude toward any negotiated peace in Vietnam had taken care of that. But Washington again made sure. It was helped first of all by the leaders of the Chinese People's Republic who arrogantly reiterated their scorn for the world organization. It was helped also by the unwillingness of many new countries, especially African, to play Don Quixote for a cause in which they are not really interested, against the wishes of powerful and wealthy America. It was helped finally by the ineptitude of an Italian proposal for a study committee. The authors of this dismally unsuccessful suggestion claimed that their purpose was to move the question of Chinese representation off dead center, but they made certain at the same time—with Ambassador Goldberg giving it the kiss of death—that the committee could not communicate with Peking and would report back next year without any new recommendations.

Encouraged by some elements in the State Department, Canada had intended to confront the Assembly with a so-called "two-China" proposal. However, Washington withdrew support after it became apparent that such a procedure was unnecessary to keep Peking out and Formosa in, and that it would be better to hold this idea in reserve as a demonstration of U.S. flexibility at the appropriate time.

The "two-China" concept is academic for the moment, since both Peking and Taipeh oppose it categorically. Its public acceptance by the United States would, however, introduce an important juridical change, whereby Washington would officially renounce the myth that the Nationalist government of Formosa is entitled to represent mainland China. Washington is obviously not yet ready to take such a step, and it may not come about unless and until the conclusion of the Vietnamese conflict brings with it a giant Asiatic negotiation. Meanwhile, the renewed boycott of China has confirmed the incapacity of the UN to deal with Asian problems and further diluted its effectiveness as a force for peace.

Secretary-General U Thant has repeatedly deplored this state of affairs. He has tried to compensate for it by offering a de-escalation plan for Vietnam and convincingly linked his intended resignation to the refusal of the United States to abide by point one: unilateral cessation of the bombings of the North. The fact that U Thant is now willing to stay without any foreseeable change in Washington on this score is another victory for the United States.

ANNE WEILL-TUCKERMAN

Pay Now

President Johnson has been throwing up smoke screens designed to shield the public from shock at the true fiscal situation, while portraying himself as a paragon of economy and, at the same time, the protector of the needy and downtrodden. The reporters came away from his press conference of November 29 in a state approaching utter confusion. In his opening statement Mr. Johnson announced that federal programs budgeted at $5.3 billion were being canceled or deferred, with $3 billion of the total involving "savings" in the current fiscal year. Mr. Johnson virtuously refuses to spend money authorized by Congress in excess of Presidential recommendations; these overages, of course, are almost always pure politics and publicity, intended to display the legislator's zeal in some area deemed to be close to the hearts of the home folks. While Mr. Johnson provided a run-down of the figures by agencies, no details were available, either from him or from the Budget Bureau in Washington, to which some of the newsmen appealed for clarification. They were assured by the President that the reductions would not shortchange "the young, or the needy, the ill or the old." That shortchanging, some of the reporters suspected, will come in the next fiscal year.

One certainty stood out amid the soothing assurances. The estimate of $112.8 billion total spending which was made last January became irrelevant not long after its issuance. Current estimates range from $125 billion up—due, of course to a rise in "defense" expenditures, the de-

JAN 4
~~FEB 13~~
MAR 9
~~APR~~

IN THIS ISSUE

December 12, 1966

EDITORIALS

626

ARTICLES

630 Politics of Equivocation: The Two Faces of the GOP — Milton Viorst
632 Big City Slowdown: The Battle of Bureaucracy — Blanche D. Blank
637 No Fun in Bavaria — C. Amery
639 Yarmolinsky & the Cannibal — Richard Stern
640 Georgia Happening: The Election Nobody Won — Sylvan Meyer

BOOKS & THE ARTS

645 Nobel Laureate of Hebrew Literature — Curt Leviant
646 Don Carlos, Saturday Afternoon (poem) — Arthur Gregor
647 A New England Saint — Sherman Paul
648 Burke's Other Life — William H. Rueckert
649 Games of the Poet — Stephen Koch
651 Theatre — Harold Clurman
652 Architecture — Ervin Galantay
652 Upon Seeing a Frieze of Greek Marbles (poem) — Paul Zweig
654 Salt (poem) — Isabella Gardner
655 Crossword Puzzle — Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor MARION HESS
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON
Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN
Art MAX KOZLOFF
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 20

fense being that of the people of South Vietnam against the Vietcong and their supporters from the north. Since it costs roughly $100,000 to kill one of those miscreants, the budget must be expansible.

If the President is reluctant to give the American people the bad news, the American people are equally reluctant to receive it. The latest Gallup poll shows that 73 per cent oppose a tax increase to help pay for the war in Vietnam, with 8 per cent expressing no opinion. This raises a fascinating problem of fiscal and moral responsibility in a democracy. While few citizens are joyful about this war, only a minority openly oppose it. It is fair to assume, therefore, that a majority of the 81 per cent who are not in favor of a tax increase are in favor of the war, or at least go along with assurances that if we don't fight in Southeast Asia now we shall find ourselves fighting in Los Angeles and San Francisco by and by. But then shouldn't there be a tax increase to defray the cost of operations so vital to the survival of the free world? What kind of citizen is he who finds the war virtuous, or at any rate necessary, but would like someone else to foot the bill? What kind of father is it who prefers to pass the burden on to his children? Or, if this is a roundabout way of protesting against the war, it is surely as cowardly and ineffectual a one as can well be imagined.

The Nation regards the war as a disgrace to our ideals. But as long as it is being fought, let the Administration be candid about the monetary cost and let us pay for it with increased taxes. There is quite enough indecency in the war, without adding to it with financial legerdemain.

Rancherias and Ranchettes

Back in the 1940s, newspaper columnists were forever reminding us that Harry S. Truman was a former haberdasher, but history does not record that the man from Missouri sold any gents' apparel from his Pennsylvania Avenue address. It is odd, then, that so few references are made currently to Lyndon Johnson's activities as a real estate operator—particularly in view of the fact that he has not allowed the distractions of high office to interfere with his land-development projects. Richard Dudman of the St. Louis Post-Dispatch has recently been digging into deed transfers in and around Johnson City, Tex.

In 1961, Mr. Johnson and A.W. Moursund, his longtime business friend and now trustee for his interests, bought from Texas Christian University 4,500 acres of land fronting on Lake Lyndon B. Johnson (formerly Granite Shoals Lake). They paid $200,000 for the parcel but put up no cash, giving instead a 5 per cent note due June 8, 1971. In 1965, Mr. Moursund organized the Comanche Cattle Corp., which does not seem to be primarily in the business of raising beef. Instead, it bought from Messrs. Johnson and Moursund 61 acres of the lake-front property for $250,000 and another 184 acres for $78,661 (both sums payable on June 8, 1971). Thus the fortunate new owners of the university property will be $128,661 ahead of the game on the day when their note comes due, and will still own all but 245 acres of the 4,500-acre tract. The two parcels they sold are known respectively as Comanche Rancherias and Comanche Ranchettes. They are high-class subdivisions; Arthur J. Goldberg has bought a ranchette, presumably as a holiday retreat from the UN, and so has Arthur Krim, national chairman of the President's Clubs. Buyers of lots are reminded that President Johnson goes boating on the lake and are assured that their investments will appreciate by at least 20 per cent as soon as the Texas State Highway Commission completes its bridge across the lake.

Like every President, Mr. Johnson is forever telling us that America is the Land of Opportunity; it may be, though, that no President before him has so graphically demonstrated what he means.

HUAC Eyes the Campus

Although civic organizations tend to tire with age, the American Civil Liberties Union has rather been gaining vigor in recent years. It is particularly to be commended for its forthright statement urging college and university presidents to resist subpoenas by the House Committee on Un-American Activities for membership lists of campus organizations critical of U.S. policy in Vietnam. For HUAC, success in this area spells a new lease on life. For the institutions of learning, it foreshadows a degrading subservience which calls into question their whole reason for being.

The ACLU statement arose from the circumstance that subpoenas were issued during the summer at two universities, Michigan and California. Although faculty and student opposition developed at both institutions, the administrations complied. Michigan's president, Harlan H. Hatcher, voiced the conventional administrative view that "the university must abide by the law. . . . Like HUAC or not, it is a duly constituted arm of Congress." But the powers of a duly constituted Congressional committee are not limitless. Mr. Hatcher was not abiding by the law, he was acquiescing in a demand which he, or his legal advisers, thought might be legal. Conformity was expedient—at least in the short run—so they conformed.

The ACLU letter advocates resistance, and some of the 1,000 college and university presidents who received it will resist. The following actions are recommended:

¶ "Resist, in every possible legal manner, subpoenas seeking membership lists."

¶ ". . . organize student-faculty committees to set specific standards of confidentiality. . . ."

¶ "Issue a public statement expressing concern over threats to academic freedom."

¶ "Safeguard . . . the tradition of free inquiry and debate and resist all attempts to curb dissent."

Speedy action is imperative, because the longer the Vietnamese War continues, the greater will be the pressures for conformity. Nor is the issue confined to the colleges. The ACLU points out the parallel between the current drive and the efforts of state authorities in the South to obtain membership lists of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People. The Supreme Court struck down these probes on the ground of interference with freedom of association. The same reasoning would seem to apply in the case of campus organizations, but timing and concerted action are important. Every institution that yields makes it more difficult for other institutions to resist. Once piecemeal concessions are made, the basis of resistance is weakened.

Nor should the fact that some campus organizations are inclined to laugh at HUAC's efforts at intimidation ease the minds of college administrators. At Texas, an SDS group elected an intelligence agent "honorary chairman" because he came to all meetings and was so attentive that he never missed a word. But the basic situation is far from funny.

What the college administrations must realize is that it is the colleges that are under attack; individuals are only the means toward that end. When performers and writers were singled out by the black-list compilers in radio and TV, individual identity could hardly have been less important. The objective was not to deprive this or that person of a job but to intimidate the networks. The whole McCarthy era operated with this technique, and its possibilities have not been exhausted.

The issues to which the ACLU has directed attention cannot be painlessly evaded. Some administrations have been casting an eye at membership lists and tossing them into the wastebasket, or asking for only minimal information, with the idea of satisfying HUAC without injuring anyone on the campus. "It's hard to subpoena a wastebasket," is the motto. American freedoms were not established in wastebaskets, nor will they be maintained there. If the latest HUAC assault is to be repelled, it will be by those who take freedom of speech and association seriously, and are willing to fight for it.

A Chair for Hoover

The Bobby Baker hearings, by emphasizing the eavesdropping talents of J. Edgar Hoover, have tended to tarnish further his brazen image. Persons who idolize the FBI chief will be grateful, therefore, for information released by Group Research, Inc., of Washington concerning a foundation bearing Hoover's name. Set up to "promote good citizenship and combat communism," the foundation was initially financed by 1,000 shares of Schenley Industries, the gift of Schenley's president, Lewis S. Rosenstiel.

The foundation's incorporation papers reveal plans to expand the J. Edgar Hoover Library on Communism at Freedoms Foundation, Valley Forge, "with the ultimate hope of converting it into the J. Edgar Hoover Center on Strategy and Tactics of Communism."

One of the directors and officers is Louis B. Nichols of New York, a vice president of Schenley Industries and an FBI man from 1934 to 1957, whose oldest son is named John Edgar. A couple of other former FBI men will assist in the foundation's affairs, as will C.D. "Deke" De Loach, assistant FBI director and apparently a strong contender to inherit Hoover's crown.

The three-cornered cooperation of top FBI officials, Freedoms Foundation, and the Schenley interests to set up a still larger tax-exempt conduit for propaganda is chilling—especially when the planners announce that a second major ambition is to create a "J. Edgar Hoover professorial chair at a leading university."

But the chill does not last long. What "leading university" would want to add Wiretapping 302 and Bugging 401 to its curriculum? What leading university could afford the rib-nudgings and winks that would come with a chair endowed in the name of a law officer who has admitted ordering acts that violate the constitutional rights of a suspect? Still, even if he never has his name on a professorial chair, J. Edgar Hoover is teaching the nation a lesson.

Yo Ho Ho!

That most state governments like to be raped by private enterprise is shown by the endless list of tax dodges, depletion allowances and zoning exemptions they sanction. But no state enjoys the ravishment of its natural and unnatural resources more than the great state of Florida, whose government in recent years has been marked by what Miami Mayor Robert King High once described as "pigsty morality." For the benefit of a clique of large farmers, the state has built a water-entrapment system that in one section alternatingly drowns and starves its wild animals by the thousands. For the benefit of the barge industry and a few big contractors, Florida is building a cross-state canal (with federal money) that will destroy one of the finest remaining wild rivers in the nation, the Oklawaha.

A depressing item in Florida's give-away program is the disposition of its sunken treasure. Residents of New York City may drop by the Parke-Bernet Galleries between December 20 and January 15, and see a sample exhibition of this great rape: gold chains, silver medallions, rare coins, which went down in 1715 when a fleet of ten Spanish ships laden with jewelry and bullion from the New World and fine chinaware and statuary from the Orient sank in a hurricane off the east coast of Florida.

Within the past three years a private salvage company, working in collusion with a few state officials, has been stripping these wrecks (see "Florida's 'Lucky' Treasure Hunt," The Nation, March 1, 1965) with more regard for profit than for preserving irreplaceable historical material.

The privateers had no salvaging lease from the state, although the wrecks are in state waters, when they began despoiling the vessels. However, then Governor Farris Bryant (now President Johnson's director of the Office of Emergency Planning) made them honest by issuing a retroactive lease. Thus, instead of requiring the company to surrender what it had obtained without a license, the state gave it a cool million in treasure and invited it to take more, for the wrecks have scarcely been tapped as yet.

Pleas from newspapers and university officials that the state take over the salvaging operation were ignored. The private salvors are supposed to give Florida one-fourth of all that they recover, but state officials require no strict accounting. Nor does the state supervise the salvaging closely, although there have been reports that the crews (who are hardly motivated by the instincts of archeologists) kick the artifacts out of the way to get at the gold.

Many of these priceless objects that should be in museums in Florida and elsewhere will be auctioned by Parke-Bernet on February 4. Many of them will thereafter disappear from public view. Some of the old coins will undoubtedly find a role similar to that given a batch purchased earlier by the Sheaffer fountain pen company: they will be melted down to coat pens and other doodads.

POLITICS OF EQUIVOCATION

THE TWO FACES OF THE GOP

MILTON VIORST

Mr. Viorst is the author of Hostile Allies: FDR and De Gaulle (Macmillan). He is now completing a book on the Republican Party to be published next year.

The election last month amply demonstrated that the Republican Party is not dead: still, it scarcely proved that the party is bursting with health. The crucial question for the American two-party system is not whether the Republicans, in opposition, can win back some offices they once held; the crucial question is whether they have once again become major contenders for power on the national level. Despite GOP elation from Sacramento to Albany, it is by no means clear that the answer is yes.

The Republicans would have us believe that they won an important mandate on November 8. It looks, however, as if they had won nothing more than a significant rearguard action. One cannot emphasize too strongly that their victory left them on the short end of a 64-to-36 division in the Senate and a 248-to-187 split in the House. They now hold more Congressional seats than at any time since 1958, but they do not control Congress and, in fact, hold fewer seats than they did through most of the Eisenhower years. It is probable that the conservative coalition of Republicans and Dixiecrats has been restored to full vigor, but that is an obstructionist not a legislative majority. One can, at best, call the election a tactical victory for the Republicans, achieved by counterattack. It was not a mandate for the Republicans to govern.

For a clue to what the election did mean, one must examine rather carefully individual races in swing districts. They mean more than the raw statistics. The patterns which emerge do not necessarily lead one to conclude that the elections were a repudiation of the Johnson legislative program. Note these examples:

In New Hampshire—where Democratic Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre soundly trounced his Goldwaterite opponent—a former Republican Congressman, Louis C. Wyman, defeated the incumbent Democrat, Oliver J. Huot, in a House contest. Wyman had himself been a Goldwaterite but shifted significantly to a moderate position on economic questions for the 1966 campaign. "I favor an increase in social security payments," Wyman said, "to keep up with the added cost of living resulting from the Johnson Administration's inability to manage the economy of our country without inflation." Thus Wyman could be a critic without attacking the objectives of the Great Society.

In Virginia, William L. Scott, a Republican, defeated George C. Rawlings, Jr., a liberal Democrat, but only after Rawlings had won the primary election from Rep. Howard W. Smith, symbol of reactionary Southern politics. Conservative Republicans took two House seats in Virginia, yet the Virginia electorate, in the primary, had unseated not only Smith but the extremely conservative Sen. A. Willis Robertson. As a result, Virginia's delegation to Washington next year, despite the two Republicans, may actually be a trifle more liberal than before.

In Iowa, where GOP roots go deep, the Democrats lost four of the House seats they took in 1964. It was a severe defeat, but in each case, the loss was to a Republican who had promised not to tamper with the economic reforms of the previous two years. None of the Republican victors seemed to have anything in common with Rep. H. R. Gross, one of the last of the irrepressible reactionaries, and the only Iowa Republican who survived the Johnson tornado of 1964.

The pattern seems reasonably clear. All over the North, Republicans who were elected had either always been moderates or had conducted campaigns that stressed moderation. Even Ronald Reagan, whose Birchite leanings seemed so obvious a year ago, had himself made over into a moderate to catch a sufficiently broad sector of the California electorate. Sen. John Tower, Goldwater's former spear carrier in Texas, moved perceptibly toward the middle in the past year. Whatever the citizens were saying, the Republicans seemed to recognize that they were not commanding a rollback on the legislation of the Kennedy-Johnson years.

This is not to suggest that the forthcoming Congress would enact, say, Medicare, had it not already been enacted. But the electorate would undoubtedly be outraged if the new Congress now sought to take Medicare away. The newly elected Republicans are unlikely to be innovators, but they are even less apt to seek repeal of the economic and social reforms achieved by the past two administrations.

"I got the impression that the people wanted a new team of managers and that's what they elected," said a keen political observer after a tour around the country. Managers can be relied upon not to upset the status quo.

What the electorate really seemed to be saying was that it had grown weary of the pace. In 1952, it was similarly weary and it elected Eisenhower. By 1958, it had become bored and voted once again for political dynamism. Now it seems ready for another rest.

The signs of discontent were plentiful. If the war in Vietnam was not allowed to become a major issue, it has nonetheless generated deep feelings of malaise. If civil rights bills have been enacted by consensus, the rioting and crime that appear to be their concomitant have confused and frightened many voters. If prosperity has never been greater, inflation is profoundly disturbing. If business profits are at record peaks, the farmers feel themselves cheated of their share of the easy money (which, perhaps, explains why the Democrats generally held their own in industrial areas, but lost in the countryside). The mistake that most prognosticators made this year, in foreseeing a much smaller Democratic loss, was the failure to appreciate the depth of the electorate's discontent.

The President is not a popular man. It is impossible to assess the effect of Lyndon Johnson's personality on the voting, but it seems quite clear that the low credibility, the crudity, the complacency, the irritability, the vanity of the President combined to take their toll. John F. Kennedy was far more popular than his program; Lyndon Johnson is infinitely less so. Quite apart from what the Democratic Party represented, the President himself was an electoral liability.

It is also important to note that the Johnson Administration, whatever its achievements in the past two years, had by Election Day run dry of attractive proposals for change. Those disturbed by social inequities felt almost no assurance that a renewal of the Democratic mandate would bring new and vital reforms. Johnson has been so smug about the triumphs of the 89th Congress that he generated no sense of urgency about electing his supporters to the 90th. Liberal Democrats promised little in the next Congress, except some added agitation over Vietnam—which was scarcely what the President wanted. Johnson himself seemed to be giving the cue to relax the process of change. The electorate responded with instructions to modify the pace, though not the direction, of political activity.

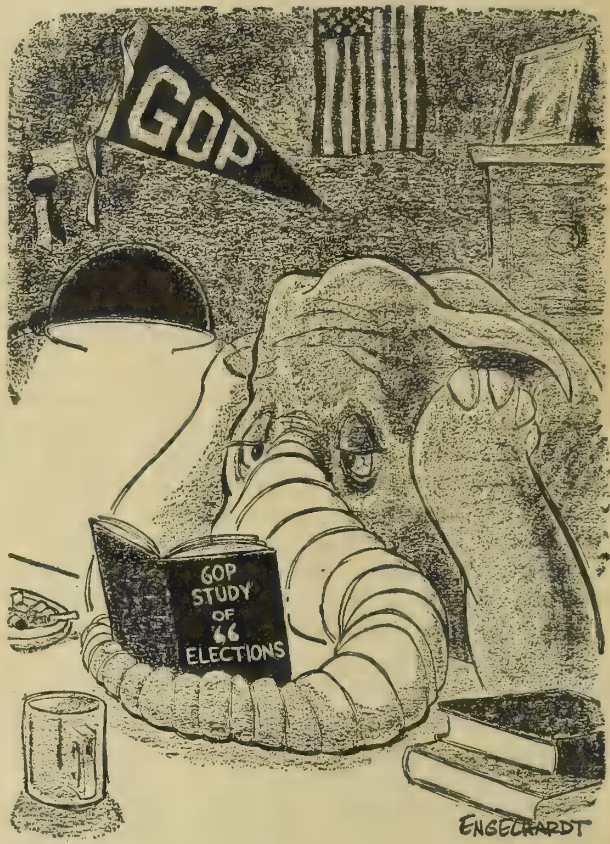
None of this, however, suggests that the Republicans have, since 1964, made themselves ready to resume a genuine two-party struggle for control of the government. Going before the electorate as the party of protest was a perfectly legitimate posture for the Republicans in 1966, but that is not what the voters will expect from a party that will claim the prerogative of conducting the affairs of the nation in 1968.

Since 1964, the Republicans have been working hard to recover from the self-indulgence of running Barry Goldwater for the Presidency. But their manner of going about it has not been to hammer out a new political doctrine sufficiently attractive to compete with the pretensions of the Great Society. On the contrary, Ray Bliss has spent his tenure as Republican National Chairman assiduously avoiding embarrassing doctrinal disputes. He has worked to perfect the party's organization and financing and the results indicate that he has done a remarkable job. He used the services of professional public relations practitioners with impressive skill. But by ignoring the doctrinal differences, or by pretending that they do not cut very deep, he has gone far to create a nonpolitical political party. Whatever his success with this strategy in 1966, it is doubtful that it can shape a party to which a national electorate will give its confidence.

This year, the Republican Party was able to adapt its presentation to the multitude of local conditions that it faced. It could be whatever it chose to be in 435 Congressional districts and thirty-five Senate races, to say nothing of thirty-five gubernatorial contests. It could be segregationist in Georgia and anti-segregationist in Maryland; conservative in California and liberal in New York; hawkish in New Hampshire and dovish in Oregon; defiant of backlash in Massachusetts and receptive to backlash in Illinois; demagogic in Florida and anti-demagogue in Arkansas. The Democrats were identified with Lyndon Johnson and, like it or not, had to fly him on their banners. The Republicans could tailor their slogans to individual circumstances. Under the rules of American politics, this was all quite above reproach, but a party cannot play the game of equivocation indefinitely.

In 1968, the Republicans will have to decide which of the many faces they wore in 1966 will represent the party in the Presidential election. Then the trouble will start. If it's the Goldwater-Reagan face, the Northeast will be lost. If it's the Rockefeller-Romney face, the South will secede. If it's the Nixon-Nixon face, the voters who don't trust Johnson will find no one else more trustworthy. In 1968, the Republicans will have to establish an identity, promote a principle, at least create an image. They will need not only an anti-Democratic but a pro-Republican vote from within the ranks of the uncommitted. They have not shown that they know how to get that vote.

Of course, even Presidential elections have been won on protest votes. It might be argued that Roosevelt beat Hoover that way in 1932. But it is difficult to foresee, even in the Vietnamese War, a crisis comparable to the Great Depression. And Roosevelt was known for a positive approach to government which was thoroughly foreign to the mentality of Hoover. Hoover may have been crushed by votes protesting the depression, but the electorate also knew that from Roosevelt it would get a sharply contrasting political philosophy.



St. Louis Post-Dispatch

Cram Course for the Two-Party System

The Republican difficulty is that the party has still not resolved the problems that appeared so vividly after Hoover's defeat. The electorate has declared, most recently in 1964, that it wants no more of the great engineer's brand of laissez-faire government. On the other hand, the voters have indicated that they take little stock in the pale versions of Democratic programs offered up by Dewey, Willkie, Nixon and the so-called Republican moderates of our own day. Eisenhower, war hero and father figure, was a special case, but his minority Congresses were persuasive evidence that the voters did not have faith in the party he headed. The election of 1966 gave no cause to believe that the public had seriously modified its views.

Back in 1958, the Democrats won a smashing Congressional victory, offering programs which the Republican President had consistently resisted. The electorate showed that it favored the Democratic offerings.

In 1966, what did the Republicans promise, beyond superior management of the Democratic programs enacted since 1958? With good reason, they criticized the management of the economy, the anti-poverty program and the Vietnamese War. But they did not offer a single fresh idea during the entire campaign. Big or small, ideas were absent. And one could not escape the even more troublesome impression that Republicans who recognized problems were making no real search for solutions. The party not only failed to come up with good ideas; it did not even come up with bad ones. Tactically, it conducted a campaign designed to elicit the maximum of anti-Democratic votes; that was the extent of it.

There is good reason to believe, as many have observed, that the conventional liberalism of our day has exhausted its social potential. The Democratic Party, having redeemed the pledges of a quarter-century, is understandably wedded to New Dealism. Under Johnson, it seems to turn its face away from the fresh approaches needed to resolve new problems; nor does it show much will to clean up the vast residue of the old ones. There is plenty of room in Washington for brains, Democratic or Republican.

What of the desperation implicit in the world population explosion, and the parallel crisis in food, both of which are within this country's capacity to affect? Is not the federal system proving to be a strait jacket on the development of urban America, now 75 per cent or more of the population? Is no one frightened that nuclear proliferation becomes more menacing each day, while the government remains embedded in pious clichés? Can the nation continue to stumble along in its international relations, with no clear conception of its obligations to the rest of the world, to say nothing of its own self-interest? Does not the computer threaten the status quo in the 20th century more than did the Black Death in the 14th?

Such is the range of vital public questions, but only a few isolated thinkers discuss them. The Democratic Party, having perhaps ruled overlong, is too complacent about the future to entertain disturbing prospects. In theory, it is the function of the party of opposition, hungry for office, to cry out fearlessly that crisis looms. It is depressing that the GOP, seeking desperately for ways to compete for power, remains haughtily indifferent to the best way of all.

Bold ideas—which are not necessarily the same as liberal ideas—will make the Republican Party a genuine contender for national favor. But bold ideas are a world away from the obscurantism of the Goldwaters and the tepid, managerial liberalism of the Romneys. To be sure, a surge of reaction within the electorate, a nasty backlash, a deep feeling of distaste for an incumbent President—any of these might produce an occasional victory in an election, even a Presidential election. But a victory so achieved would be no more than a chastisement of the ruling party and a mandate to mark time. As explicitly as it can, the Ray Bliss-Richard Nixon party has indicated that it is satisfied with the old ideas and resists a search for new ones. The Republican Party today sees victory as a function of the bumbling of its opposition. However successful in any given November, in the long haul that means sterility and continued decay for the party. To the country, hungry for the stimulation of two-party vigor, it could well bring tragedy.

BIG CITY SLOWDOWN

THE BATTLE OF BUREAUCRACY

BLANCHE D. BLANK

Mrs. Blank was executive director of the Mayor's Task Force on City Personnel in New York. She is associate professor of political science at Hunter College.

Politics is won; administration is simply done. The former is a game that attracts the average citizen as an occasional participant and as a reasonably regular spectator. The latter seems drudgery worth only distant, infrequent and cynical nods. It is hard then to direct public attention to what I have come to believe is the real adversary in the battle for better urban services and creative, healthful urban living. But the truth of the matter is that today's cities move more upon the backs of their bureaucrats than upon the shoulders of their politicians. And the bureaucrats are found wanting fully as often as the politicians.

Unfortunately, even the professional watchdog associations relaxed their interest in bureaucracy once the public service establishments of our largest cities transcended the "spoils system" about a generation ago. With the adoption of the so-called "merit system" (in which employees are largely immune to political whim), the critics no longer saw a chronic danger. They were wrong. The elected officials, to be sure, should provide the spark for imaginative urban policies; but they must have a bureaucratic base that is prepared to ignite. That base is still sodden in most cities. Reorganization (along the lines already initiated by Mayor Lindsay in New York City) takes care of the shape of the bureaucracy—the number of units and their relative position. It is now necessary to introduce positive practices to insure a supply of first-rate personnel and sufficient incentive to keep them primed.

I recently visited one of Mayor Lindsay's most vigorous new commissioners, who after three months in office was almost overcome by the situation in which he found himself caught. "Do you realize I've got a quarter of a million dollars worth of personnel not doing any productive work for this city? I can't put them on a job or off the payroll. They're either under criminal indictment or just totally incompetent." In another department (one of the city's largest and most essential) the men in the bureau of transportation average no more than three and a half to four hours of actual work per week while drawing salaries of more than $100. Moreover, the typical malingerer in this operation has no sense of guilt. He sees the situation as "normal operating procedure" and is quick to point out the complicity of middle management.

The good will, ideas and moral stamina of the much publicized city leadership must somehow be allowed to percolate throughout the entire bureaucracy. At present the system is clogged by poor public relations, budgetary restraints, statutory anachronisms, procedural rigidities and an inappropriate outlook.

In New York City, close to a quarter million civil servants are charged with carrying out the mayor's programs. They currently operate out of ninety agencies and do virtually every known type of work from fence mending to physics. Two-thirds of this group are employed through the City Department of Personnel; not more than 12 per cent are direct political appointees. There are, however, some 16,000 noncompetitive posts (mostly manual jobs, but also about 2,000 at high levels) for which only general qualifications are required, instead of the usual competitive examination score.

The overwhelming majority of these civil servants are able and honorable people. Indeed, the city often gets better than it deserves. But there are other cases in which the recruitment, development and retention of excellence lag. Some of the failure arises from an "image" of city employment that falls far short of actual conditions. Time and again I found people (including some who were professionally concerned with government service) seriously misinformed about the city's bureaucracy. One high-ranking federal personnel officer, for example, thought incorrectly that stenographers in federal agencies were better paid than those working for the city. Similarly, a banker was surprised to learn that in many areas the city pay scale was competitive with wages in his bank.

THIS BUILDING CONDEMNED
2001
249
CONDEMNED CONDEMNED BUILDING
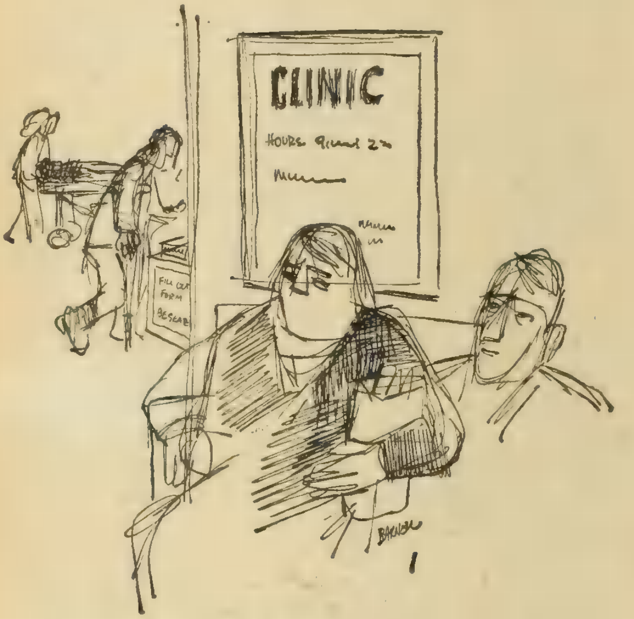
CITY OF NEW YORK
BARNELL

Of course, there are also valid reasons why City Hall does not attract Columbia the way Washington does Harvard. New York City's civil service (like that of most other large cities) needs considerable revision. The most frequent complaint inside the service comes from men at or near the top who feel that they have been asked to do big jobs without being given sufficient power. A new, eager, inexperienced, politically appointed commissioner is likely to see his department as a vast immovable herd of automatons in whom imagination and a high sense of urgency have long been deadened. When he has mellowed he may come to find that all is not as black as he first thought, and that he alone does not have a monopoly on intelligence and virtue. But even if he attains this wisdom (instead of drowning in either bitterness or despair), he will accumulate a set of legitimate gripes, all stemming from his desire to run his own show in his own style and to approach the goals of his assignment.

When you talk to such a man, you discover that the leading devils in his purgatory are the Budget Office and "the system" (the latter being a set of labyrinth procedures reluctantly administered by the City Department of Personnel). To imprint his style, a commissioner needs considerable freedom to use both the carrot and the stick. But in New York City, his carrot (merit increases, promotions, training, compensatory time off) is all but nibbled away by budget restrictions, and his stick (reprimand, demotion, dismissal) is all but broken by legal but ossified personnel practices. On top of this, his reservoir of new blood is considerably thinned by impossible exam procedures and unrealistic eligibility qualifications.

When he blasts out against budgetary restrictions, to take the major adversary first, a commissioner is not likely to be conscious of the fact that in large measure he is complaining about the mayor, to whom he owes his job in the first place. Nonetheless, many of the restraints that chafe him are traceable to policies and personalities that come directly under the mayor's control. Sooner or later, most department heads come to sense (however subliminally) that they must operate by "pull." Indeed, a New York City commissioner needs more "blat" than a Soviet commissar. His pull index, moreover, is a composite measure of his political strength, his professional reputation, his personal connections with the mayor, and his persistence. It is apparent to even a casual observer that some commissioners are more equal than others.

An average commissioner cannot do what he wants with his budget primarily because it is a line-by-line affair that must be agonized over with the Budget Office, and this despite the fact that the new charter in New York appears to have liberalized departmental control over budgets. The city now has a "performance" budget in which presumably a department head need justify only overall amounts and within which he can reasonably juggle his own personnel needs. But the charter also permits the mayor to withdraw this privilege, and that is exactly what former Mayor Wagner did, and what Mayor Lindsay continues to do. There is extant an executive order which allows only specifically named departments to enjoy the new flexibility. Few departments have to date received the accolade (and one which did, was made to feel that it had better not abuse its privilege).



All commissioners, moreover, are prisoners of the "accrual system," again a policy patently condoned by the mayor. Under this procedure no department gets its published budgetary allotment. Instead, it receives that portion left after the Budget Office has subtracted the expenses likely to evaporate during the year by reason of deaths, retirements or other departures. Any personnel replacements must then be newly justified to Budget and will almost invariably be made at the beginning salary level in the department. This naturally greatly reduces a commissioner's personnel leverage, and means that departments are more likely to "fatten up" their personnel requests than search for savings. From the commissioner's viewpoint, in short, the Budget director has his grasp on too many departmental personnel operations: from what positions should be filled and when, to job classifications, merit increases and salary rates for certain posts.

In fairness, however, most Budget men have developed their jaundiced outlook from the depressing discovery that all too few political personalities are ready to buck the unions, or the internal bureaucratic pressure group, or even to restrain their own instincts for patronage. Furthermore, the Budget director necessarily takes an overall view of the city system. It is he, more than any other official short of the mayor, who must visualize the total implications of any individual move in the civil service establishment. To him, a raise or classification change in a particular department is two things: it is a permanent escalation of city costs; and it is a potential trigger to a host of hierarchically related raises and reclassifications.

Moreover, if you ask a budget officer why a department must concoct a phony budget in order to make up for "accruals," he will tell you that the city simply must have uncommitted funds for emergencies. (There is no year without unusual snowfalls, unexpected demonstrations, a blackout, etc.) If you then ask, logically, why the city cannot have a contingency fund written specifically for this purpose, you will be told that such a fund is unthinkable because the unions would see it as an open invitation to come in with wage demands that would reduce the fund to zero in the first week of every fiscal year.

Finally, you may wish to suggest to a Budget man that after all the commissioners are also the mayor's men: why shouldn't they be trusted with personnel decisions? You will then be assured that the mayor does not invariably trust or respect his appointees. Some commissioners may be necessary political payoffs, others unfortunate mistakes. In any event, the mayor can hardly be expected to keep a close eye on as many as eighty "top dogs." By working through Budget, he can keep every one of his commissioners constantly dancing to the tune he himself calls.

Complaints against the Personnel Department are less frequent. The average commissioner tends to look on Personnel with more pity than pique—if indeed, he does not overlook them entirely. A few agency heads, however, do feel checked by this staff arm.

One commissioner contended that a Personnel Department classification officer had withheld a critical reclassification of a title in which his agency had had more than 300 vacancies in three years. He had fought a long, hard, time-consuming and ultimately unsuccessful battle for his version of what was needed in the job specification. Another commissioner charged that the Personnel Department's failure to honor his request for a short delay in the scheduling of an administrative promotional exam resulted in the exclusion of a group of well-trained, younger recruits who needed the extra weeks demanded in order to comply with the experience qualifications. By Personnel's refusal to postpone this test, an "in-group" of older employees (about whom the commissioner was less than sanguine) had this field for promotion to themselves.

In most instances, however, the Personnel Department tries to be an ally to the agency chiefs and is so accepted by them. They generally see eye to eye and are equally distressed by the overelaborate grievance procedures, the laxity of performance evaluations, the prolix exam system and the budgetary rigidities. The effectiveness of the city Department of Personnel as an aide to the commissioners is, however, heavily curtailed by financial, psychological and legal considerations.

Unlike Budget, the Department of Personnel is not at all close to the mayor. It has never had the administrative status, parallel to Budget, as staff arm to the chief executive, and its position vis-à-vis Budget is exacerbated by the fact that it too must depend on that office for its own lines, classifications and other benefits. The department includes an unusual cadre of highly intelligent, well-trained and hard-working men, but they have been the "second team" too long. They are so used to being hemmed in by legalistic restrictions through which they must thread clever and devious routes, that they rarely consider fighting a pitched battle.

In addition to being administrative stepchildren, they are also the official custodians of the Civil Service Law and of the merit mentality. These once fashionable goals are today generally obsolete. The mission is not to keep rascals out but to bring excellence in. It is not enough to be fair; one must also be fruitful. But procedural "fairness," as well as a number of other outmoded objectives, are immortalized in everything from the state constitution through state laws, city ordinances, Civil Service Commission regulations (both state and city), the myriad court decisions interpreting all of the foregoing, and the very habits of the Personnel Department itself.

It is the state constitution, for example, that marries the personnel operation to a well-meant but currently inappropriate competitive examination procedure for promotions as well as entrance. Other sections of state law set up arbitrary qualifications. Welfare workers are now required to be college graduates (though not necessarily with anything in their academic records resembling professional social-work training). Yet much of the work they do is investigatory—some of it routine paperwork—and much better suited to junior college people or even bright high school graduates. But aside from other difficulties that here might stand in the way of reform, the standards are perpetuated by a law which requires a department receiving state aid (about half the welfare budget) to use college graduates. Similarly rigid state requirements concerning registered nurses have received unfavorable publicity.

A recent State Supreme Court decision, to take another facet of the legal problem, questioned the lawfulness of a long-used Personnel Department interpretation that its own rules did not require State Civil Service Commission confirmation. Now, even this limited latitude is in doubt, along with a whole series of past actions taken under that reasonable amplification. Years of pussyfooting among such legal booby traps have made the department understandably cautious. "I'll tell you why we can't do that" is the hallmark of its style.

Much of the difficulty that besets the Department of Personnel in its attempt to cope usefully with the civil service establishment stems from preoccupation with an often spurious type of "fairness." This is presumed to flow from all sorts of devices: entrance examinations, promotional exams, veterans' preference rules, labyrinthine grievance procedures, overweening concern for nondiscrimination policies, and from detailed regulations concerning reprimands, demotions and dismissals. These safeguards are frequently inadequate even to their own narrow limits.

The Personnel Department is asked, for example, to administer about 300 different examinations to close to 200,000 people in an average year. Many of these are entrance exams, and too many are promotional ones. (There are typically six steps from one rung to the next in a promotional ladder and it takes many years to move through them. In one department, the yield from this system was a median age of 55 among the eighty-five persons earning $10,000 per year or more.)

A typical self-defeating "fairness" requirement in the exam procedure is that every civil service test be published immediately after it is used, so that all may see the questions and the acceptable answers and be able to protest any item believed to be unjust. What is the actual outcome of this expensive procedure? A certain number of relatively minor mistakes are caught, while the more serious problem of running out of decently perceptive questions is insured by the publicity. "Cram schools" inevitably build portfolios of potential questions that must at some point be repeated. Indeed, a year or so ago, almost half of those taking a fireman's exam left after only one hour of what was scheduled to be a three-hour test; they had studied precisely this exam in a cram course. I have just been told, however, that this requirement is about to be lifted.

The following case history is typical of the civil service exam procedure. In January, 1964, just before graduating from college, an entirely suitable Hunter senior "filed" for a "planning" exam. The test was held on April 11 (after her application had been scrutinized for "eligibility") at the Abraham Lincoln High School in Brooklyn. A few hundred people from all over the city took the test. After three months she was finally notified of "passing." Later in July she was asked to appear for an oral interview. In August there was a medical exam, and the following November she was required to report (replete with diploma, marriage license and other newly acquired credentials) at a "character exam." From that point on she received no further communication from the city except what she herself initiated. She telephoned in September to find out her status. She was then informed that her "list" had expired the previous July. When she tried to discover whether any appointments had been made from that exam, she could originally get no firm information. Only after a number of subsequent phone calls (many of which were rudely answered) was she able to ferret out that "a few" people had been appointed to three of the five departments in which vacancies were originally announced. She also discovered at this late date that 153 persons had passed the written test.

A story like this should elicit questions. Why is it necessary to cast such a broad net for so tiny a catch? Having once cast it (perhaps on the ground that nothing is too costly for excellence), why bother with oral interviews, physicals and other such expensive folderol except for the few top people who are likely to be ultimately appointed to the handful of vacancies? One might also want to know why (since the exam was an objective one geared for machine marking) it took three months to notify applicants of their fate.

But the really basic questions are: Why should we think that we are likely to get the best of anything when eight months is the average time between filing and appointment for all civil service exams? And why should we cling naively to the hope that objective exams of the sort so often used really elicit the capacities we ultimately need in the service? Would not college grades, the Graduate Record Exam, or some other equally cheap and painless device serve as well? Exams for promotion, it should be noted, offer most of the same disadvantages, plus the fact that they are frequently either confined to an "in group" or designed to favor them.

If getting good people in has its frustrations, getting poor ones out is even worse. Dismissals in the New York City civil service run to less than 1.5 per cent a year. The required proceedings are highly formal, almost like a trial—and generally suggestive that it is the supervisor rather than the employee who is being tried. Appeals from a departmental decision can be taken to the city Civil Service Commission or to the courts. (Just recently, a state judicial decision threw doubts on the proposition that these are necessarily alternative procedures; so it may now be that both avenues of appeal are open to disgruntled employees.) Although both the commission and the courts are more than likely to uphold departmental disciplinary decisions, a sufficient number of reversals are on record to worry most supervisors. In fact, a very high-ranking personnel officer ventured that if the commission or the courts adopted ordinary business management standards, 50 per cent of the grievance procedures now decided in favor of employees would be reversed. Considering, therefore, the risk of the unsettling effects on various segments of personnel, the tremendous consumption of agency time, the heavy cost and the ordinary human reluctance to do unpleasant things, it is remarkable that any dismissals are achieved under present conditions. A former powerful and important executive assistant to Mayor Wagner rated dismissal difficulties as the key morale obstacle in the civil service. Good people are irritated by the retention (and occasionally even the promotion; in a number of instances employees were actually promoted while dismissal procedures were under way) of mediocrity, or worse.

Even the probationary period that follows all original appointments to the competitive civil service provides a dismissal flexibility that is more apparent than real. Civil service rules require that an incumbent must serve the entire probationary period (either three or six months, depending on the post), before he is vulnerable to summary dismissal. Prior to that time he must be given the full-dress hearing described above, even if his conduct during the period is blatantly irresponsible. Moreover, there is actually only one brief day during which it is legal to dismiss him. Eight hours later, if he is not released, he becomes a "regular." Most probationers become full-fledged civil servants almost automatically.

Merit increases, moreover (which a commissioner might think to use as a "carrot"), have in most instances degenerated into automatic increments because of the difficulties attached to stigmatizing an employee with a "below-standard" rating and the almost equal reluctance of supervisors to designate anyone as "superior." The resulting barrage of "standard" scores makes a farce of the whole merit idea.

Still another type of "fairness" that plagues the city's civil service and is necessarily administered by the Personnel Department is the requirement that the city's own employment practices vigorously reflect the state's generally laudatory attempts to prevent discrimination. The most recent addition to the anti-discrimination coverage is the criterion of "age." On quick reading this may seem as beneficial as the race and religion clauses; nevertheless, it is the bane of many city supervisors. In one department, for instance, an exam that was designed to reap a group of vigorous career-minded youngsters, produced instead a crop of 60-year-old widows. Not only was career development impossible with such a group but one supervisor complained that he could not even get his clerical tasks done properly since many of his files required the use of a 6-foot ladder. Another department chief told me that it had been years since he had seen a "healthy youngster of forty." Even the exams designed for bright young college graduates are apt to turn up 50-year-old college-bred retirees from other careers. While there is every reason to provide meaningful work for older (and disabled) citizens, it is doubtful that the city service alone can carry the burden.

What can be done about this civil service situation? Certainly, the forthcoming State Constitutional Convention should give thought to changes in that document. The legislature must also be enjoined to repeal archaic and excessively rigid laws and to revise the role of both city and state Civil Service Commissions so that they become exclusively adjudicatory bodies. But the latest of a long series of reports on this subject—the "Report of the Task Force on City Personnel" submitted to Mayor Lindsay this past May by its chairman, Col. Harold Riegelman—makes it clear that the Mayor must take some direct actions himself. He must give more than lip service to the Charter provisions for performance budgeting. He must issue the directives necessary to assure his commissioners the powers commensurate with their responsibilities. Although this support of the working chiefs would entail inevitable political, possible financial and occasional moral risks, such dangers might be somewhat reduced if the Mayor would simultaneously indicate his readiness to accept resignations where necessary.

The Mayor can also stimulate the use of merit in merit increases, of college graduates, of training programs, and of virtually all the recommendations already on hand or yet to come, simply by his enthusiastic endorsement. The public relations aspect of the city service would be particularly susceptible to improvement through his initiative.

Moreover, it is primarily the Mayor who can come to grips with the eighty or so unions that now do business with the city. A clear-cut acceptance of city-wide collective bargaining (instead of the piecemeal bargaining, interlarded with an obsolete "wage and salary" plan, that is currently in effect) might clear the air. At the same time, the city must insist on some workable arrangements concerning strikes. The right of management to manage must also be preserved in the face of continued union pressures to make everything a bargaining item.

The individual commissioners too have a constructive role to play. While they certainly have the right to ask for the removal of a number of roadblocks, they must also be prepared to use their own initiative and enthusiasm. There are times when it appears that a victory has been won but change is nonetheless thwarted by the commissioners' failure to follow up. For example, after the introduction of the "administrative aide" line (a hard-won battle for the lateral entry of college graduates) commissioners seemed reluctant to buck the possible resentment of their older employees, and equally unwilling to invest the necessary seed money for training these recruits. Indeed, in almost three years of operation, this program can boast only six incumbents. The failure to devote resources to training goes beyond this particular situation; it is a general operational affliction. The present acting personnel director tells of an agency head who complained about the inadequate stenographic help he was getting through the Personnel Department's recruitment and examination procedures. He made invidious comparisons with the secretarial help he found in a nearby banking house. But the truth of the matter, upon investigation by the Personnel Department, was that whereas the bank devoted many weeks to a careful orientation and training program for stenographers, the city agency simply dumped recruits into a stenographic pool without so much as a ten-minute briefing session.

Yet there is a breed of manager who not only survives the current difficult environment, but makes the most of it. At least one ex-commissioner did avail himself of college recruits and lived with them long enough to see certain fruits from his efforts. Another such man in the Department of Hospitals handles the Budget Office this way: "I tell the budget director I'll meet his accruals and then he can keep his hands off me. He'll get his quota and after that I'll run my own show."

As for the Personnel Department, it must decentralize operations, recruit high-quality personnel officers to carry on the work within each department, overhaul examination procedures; introduce systematic auditing for departmental personnel activities, increase its basic research in the areas of examinations and rating systems; and, most important, it must make training a primary duty for the central office as well as the operating agencies. Without proper training and indoctrination, new recruits are lost and older ones deteriorate.

In short, the city has a lot to do if it is going to compete successfully in the strenuous game of getting and keeping superior personnel. But even "the man in the street" can help by simply rejecting all the old clichés about bureaucracy and by giving the civil service a little of his attention and concern.

NO FUN IN BAVARIA

C. AMERY

Mr. Amery is a German novelist and journalist who has done postgraduate work in American universities.

Munich

The Bavarian post-election shindig was held, as befits tradition, in the offices of the Muenchener Merkur, a daily friendly to Franz Josef Strauss. Strauss had won, and won handsomely; but the gathering was not exactly a social success. The drinks were there, the crowds were there, and the faces of the Christian Socialist politicians were duly fashioned into the lines of successful statesmanship. As the returns rolled in from the old strongholds, fake peasant vitality swapped first names and slapped broad Loden-covered backs; but the good old Bavarian fun was slow in coming.

There was the irritating glare of the TV lights, as one local or regional leader after another was interviewed on the old-fashioned, leather-buttoned settee in the corner. There was the disappointment in the faces of the young, sharp Social Democratic politicians, a strong group of intellectuals and trade union professionals, who saw their first-time seats vanish as the totals mounted. The party held its own, but had counted on "comrade trend" to continue the steady growth that had prevailed up until now. There was the glum face of the academic pundit on the screen of Channel 2, mumbling his way through inconsistent computer results from Mittelfranken; and there were, above all, the foreign observers. This obviously was not the old, self-centered house party of previous elections. The great wide world was watching, and the Bavarian, for all his vaunted cosmopolitanism, does not like that.

Canada and Sweden and France and Italy were there and, of course, the United States. Cameras were clicking away, and information was exchanged. "You got Vogel? That the heavy-set fellow? No, the other one over there, with the glasses." Whether Bavaria liked it or not, a new battle had started—and one that bore disquieting resemblance to defeats long forgotten: the defeats of the middle twenties.

It was clear what the foreign watchers were watching: a new bird tagged NPD, National Democratic Party of Germany. And the bird performed on cue. Compared to Hesse, it is true, the Bavarian electorate did fairly well in a democratic way: Hesse, a model Social Democratic state, voted 8 per cent for the new right wing; in Bavaria it was 7.4 per cent. Two factors observed in Hesse were also active in Bavaria: precincts with more than 70 per cent Catholic voters and precincts with more than 40 per cent blue collar were relatively immune to the new virus, and this worked against the National Democrats in Bavaria, which is predominantly Catholic and whose larger cities have become industrial centers of growing importance. But the intricacies of Bavaria's election laws helped to oust the old liberals from the state house and to introduce the right wingers.

Bavarian law stipulates that a party gather at least 10 per cent of the vote in one of Bavaria's seven provinces in order to get proportional representation in the Maximilianeum, the state capitol above the Isar River. And there was one single province which, both to the liberals and to the NPD, could mean success or failure—the province of Mittelfranken (Central Franconia), around Nuremberg. Most of the province was originally a Prussian domain; it is heavily Protestant (the most conservative Protestantism in Germany); it is anti-Munich, and it is socially unstable, with strong groups arising between a struggling small peasantry and the small-town tradesman whose social prestige is receding. The whole NPD question boiled down to this: Would a few thousand voters of a medium-sized Bavarian province stick to their old-fashioned liberalism, or would they follow the Hessian trend? We have the answer, and it provides a big headache for German politics in years to come.

It must be seen against the background of the present Bonn malaise. For the first time since 1948, real decisions are necessary there, and nobody—as yet—seems able to make them. That is the crisis, nothing else, but it scares the politically coddled German middle-class and lower-middle-class voter. Unlike the citizens of established democracies, he is wont to express his dissatisfaction not against the "ruling party" but against the "establishment" as a whole. The opposition SPD is part of the establishment; hence the trend to the right. While the Social Democrats did not lose, they did not gain either: they kept their votes both in Hesse and in Bavaria, but they did not get any new ones (except in certain Catholic areas). As Herr Fassbender of Hesse's NPD boasted: "We stopped the Socialist advance."

WHAT A MESS OUR FATHERLAND IS IN — WE CAN'T EVEN BLAME THE JEWS.
Abu

Abu, London: Ben Roth

This is not Strauss's headache—yet. The Bavarian boss has timed his actions well. With unsurpassed cynicism, he has engineered both Erhard's downfall and Kiesinger's investiture as the new CDU candidate for the chancellery—a victory which is probably short-lived, but was good enough for the Bavarian elections. Strauss could pose for the Bavarian voter as a good fighter against the North German rulers of the CDU, those "Prussians," and as the potential king maker of the Republic. The returns proved him right, as a tactician. He is hankering for an all-out fight with the North German wing of both Christian Unions, still Germany's ruling party.

The CDU presents a woeful picture of dissent, and the CSU victory in Bavaria has added to its misery. The balance of forces within this glued-together construction is completely upset: the "Gaullists" (Strauss and a few others, mostly from the south) have gained momentum against the "Atlantiker" (mostly Schroeder and his friends), with neither group knowing exactly whether either the United States or France is willing to pay the bills presented to them in the name of such friendship. The anti-American bias of the Gaullists is nurtured by the waning prospects of nuclear participation of Germany within NATO, but it is clear that the General does not think of sharing his own force de frappe with Germany. The Gaullists admire France's emphasis on European solutions, but it is obvious that such solutions would always include the acknowledgment of the German status quo and the Oder-Neisse line, a fact that the German Gaullists hide well from the electorate.

All other questions—the unbalanced budget, the economic slowdown, the growing insolvency of urban development—could be handled easily if the central foreign policy questions were solved realistically. It is only a seeming paradox that Strauss's victory has increased possibilities of a complete party switch, an SPD-FDP coalition which would send the Christian Unions to the opposition benches. Even if the Unions could manage a new working majority in Bonn (at the time of writing, nothing is decided), the bickering would continue and would keep hamstringing the necessary decisions.

Emergence of the NPD, the right-wing radicals, has to be seen against this background. It is all very well to say that 7 per cent isn't much; that a strong poujadiste element is present but will soon run its course; that representation in state parliaments will actually hamper this radicalism, as the new men will have to show their hand. If the central political forces of the German establishment, as it functions today, remain hopelessly divided on central issues, and use the tools of parliamentary democracy only as tools, without a spark of reverence for its basic ethics, the resentment against the "system" will continue to grow —and will continue to reinforce the neo-Nazis. It is a time for lovers of democracy to stand together.

Strauss does not think so. He was pleading, during the election party, for a "policy with a stronger national profile"; in other words, he wants to steal the NPD's nationalistic thunder. His wrecking talent and his tactical cleverness are immense; it is a pity that he lacks any understanding of the need for a basic political ethic. This, at present, is much more menacing than the NPD's 7 per cent. Strauss is a political boss of the old machine variety: tricky, vital, power hungry, goaded by a massive persecution complex. Such people are easily digested in a functioning democracy; in Germany, where he is the only one of his genus, he is dynamite.

I left the election party before he came, around midnight. The young men of his entourage, bespectacled or not, in business suits and American postures, were raving about the new southern "power axis," Munich-Stuttgart (Kiesinger's domicile), which would replace the old northern one, between Kiel and Düsseldorf. They seemed unaware of the existence of any political world other than their own, with its internal and external dogfights. The night air outside felt good.

YARMOLINSKY & THE CANNIBAL

RICHARD STERN

Mr. Stern's most recent novel is Stitch (Harper & Row). He has just finished a play, Dossier: Twenty-four Blackouts for the Middle Electric Age.

Chicago

On Armistice Day, the former Special Assistant of the Defense Department, Adam Yarmolinsky of Harvard, spoke in the handsome, bowl-shaped, mock courtroom of the University of Chicago Law School about the relationship of arms and foreign policy. For those of us whose knowledge of Professor Yarmolinsky was limited to the notion that he represented the most temperate—and perhaps therefore ejected—element of Defense Department policy, the hour and a half had its surprises.

Mr. Yarmolinsky was introduced by a fellow defense strategist, the charming and urbane Professor Wohlstetter, who described his first sight of Yarmolinsky in Secretary McNamara's office at the beginning of the Kennedy administration. McNamara was instructing a group of white-faced, wide-eyed generals about the new sorts of questions for which he needed answers. In the back of the room, Yarmolinsky snored away, an obbligato of self-confidence amidst the brass collapse.

Yarmolinsky, a small, bristling man with a cock of gray-specked black hair, said he promised to keep himself awake for the duration of his talk, though he could not promise to do the same for the audience. Then he read a careful, thoughtful paper which went more or less as follows: U.S. options are limited by U.S. power; that is, the United States cannot flare into reprisals as easily as nonnuclear powers. The country's international aims, needs and responsibilities enjoy the backing of a superbly varied armament which is available to persuade, tempt, or occasionally to force the acceptance of policy goals. Only some goals, of course, as no arsenal is unlimited. Since the Second World War, there have been (according to McNamara) 164 outbreaks of violence, less than half of which were related to communism; American armament could not cope with a large fraction of these, even if policy should have dictated it. What then were some possible rules for selected intervention? Yarmolinsky suggested a few: When in doubt about the nature of an outbreak (say, civil war or external aggression) don't intervene; when possible, apply force rather than violence. (The distinction—that of Professor Schelling—has to do with forcibly preventing outbreaks rather than augmenting them.) The third section of the talk contrasted the performance of the State Department with that of its instrument, the Defense Department. The State Department has been content to develop attitudes rather than policies. It identifies nations as hostile or friendly, indicates others that should be contained. It's as if a doctor were satisfied to say that he was hostile to pleurisy and thought measles should be contained.

The speech had begun with the country as a pugilist enjoined by his strength and skill from punching roughnecks in the street and ended with the country as a doctor failing to cure the world's ills. The transition was not, I think, the intended core of Yarmolinsky's speech, but it sank in the hearts of those of us who may not be attuned to the subtler ranges of arms policy discussion.

The question period revealed a still greater distance between the laity and the technicians of armament. Yarmolinsky's face, dark, rapid, ready for engagement, is full of spark and humor. He delights in skirmish, is quick to rebut the naive, sometimes with hints of unquestionable but classified knowledge from the horse's mouth. (In the mock courtroom he joked about hearsay evidence.) He is also quick to spot the lance headed for the theoretical chinks in his armor and to counter it by quick admission. When pressed about the difference, say, between intervening "to prevent a blood bath" in the Dominican Republic and not intervening to prevent a much bloodier one in Indonesia, he shrugged his theoretical shoulders. One can't do everything; there are no formulas, although the State Department had just been rebuked for not working some out. In all, though, Yarmolinsky's wit, energy and confidence were those of the theoretical man turned decision maker; he carried the authority of a wounded veteran in a discussion of heroism.

A student asked him to comment on the present state of what Eisenhower had called the military-industrial complex. Yarmolinsky spent a couple of seconds straightening the question out (the student had said "military-business" complex) and then, his head darting, half-rooster, half-squirrel, he erupted into an odd, even angry response. Eisenhower, he said, had always wanted to do what his master, George Humphrey, had said to do, cut the budget, and he'd tried and tried to slice the biggest chunk of that budget, the military, and failed, because it would have been suicidal to succeed, so he made this farewell address in a fit of temper. As to growing military influence on policy, he could answer as Holmes did, commenting on the power to tax being the power to destroy: "Not while I'm on the court." Not, therefore, with the McNamaras and Yarmolinskys in power would the military-industrial complex call the shots.

But some of us in the mock courtroom felt a glacial shift. Had that fearsome complex to which the puzzled, stymied General-President pointed in his farewell gesture recruited and absorbed the Yarmolinskys, the brilliant planners, so many of whose intellectual discoveries had been made within the bounds of arms policy? Yarmolinsky's not unboastful assertions that policy has nothing to do with morality took him into the dark arena where the natural scientists brought forth their fissioned fruit almost twenty-four years and 1 mile from where we sat. Many of them had spent the intervening years regretting the amoral absorption in the cool frenzy of weaponry. One did not feel that there was as much prospect of such late thoughts from the urbane, learned Yarmolinsky and the fellow social scientists who joined him at the bottom of the bowl to offer congratulations. Out in the cold air along the Midway some of us shivered in the suspicion that the military-industrial complex had acquired a most brilliant war head, and that the cannibalistic monster had further effaced itself into the invisible climate of American life.

GEORGIA HAPPENING

THE ELECTION NOBODY WON

SYLVAN MEYER

Mr. Meyer is editor of The Daily Times, Gainesville, Ga., and former chairman of the Georgia Advisory Committee to the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights.

The courts, the Republicans, the moderates, the city folk and the larger Negro vote have terribly complicated the democratic process in Georgia. You can't be sure any more how an election will come out. You can't even tell if it will come out. Georgians went to the polls three times during the political season just past and still haven't elected a governor. Depending on the courts and the General Assembly, which convenes in early January, they may have to cast their ballots twice more.

It used to be that a governor was elected by a plurality in the Democratic primary, with no run-off and no general election to confuse people. Indeed, under the old county unit system, he could be elected by a minority of the popular vote. Now, the voters have chosen not a governor but a legal enigma and no one today can say what the outcome will be.

Since campaigning began in midsummer for the Democratic primary, "conservative," "liberal," "moderate," "Republican" and "Democrat" have been labels sadly confused. There were Democrats for Howard "Bo" Callaway, a Republican; Republicans for Ellis Arnall, a Democrat. Ultraconservatives abandoned a Goldwater Republican, Callaway, to support a better-certified segregationist, Lester Maddox. Some liberal Democrats declared for a far-Right Republican, and spurned a write-in movement for a progressive Democrat, Arnall, in order to save the state from a reactionary Democrat, Maddox.

All this searching of conscience and splitting of hairs has come to climax in a dilemma. Georgia law requires that the governor be elected by a majority, and 57,800 write-in votes for Arnall, plus possible thousands more uncounted, prevented either Lester Maddox or "Bo" Callaway from winning. Although many Georgians look upon the federal courts as the robed army of a new Reconstruction, a majority is probably pleased as well as amused by a situation that may have relieved them of a choice they never wanted and never expected. The knowledge that popular Gov. Carl Sanders will remain in Atlanta until January 10, and probably for at least several weeks after that, has produced a mood of retrospection among the less emotional students of indigenous history.

The current confusion originated in the fact that Sanders could not stand for re-election. Historically a two-faction if not a two-party state, Georgia fears immediate succession in office, and state law provides that a governor aspiring to a second term must wait four years between tries.

Ernest Vandiver, governor from 1958 until 1962, had spun out the 1963-66 interregnum representing the association of railroads and was considered the leading contender in the 1966 campaign. But he suffered a second heart attack last spring and withdrew, leaving his partisans fumbling for a new champion. For a time, it seemed that Sen. Herman Talmadge would step into the role, but after some days of uncharacteristic indecision, he decided to remain in Washington.

With Vandiver out and Talmadge out, the way was open for a general stampede into the Democratic primary. First on the scene was Ellis Arnall, now 59 but still remembered as the boy-wonder governor of the mid-forties who had defeated Gene Talmadge, established an independent board of regents for the university system, and given the vote to 18 year olds. A prosperous attorney, Arnall enjoyed the immediate allegiance of the middle-aged generation and the "liberals." His chief handicap was twenty years of allegations by his political opponents that after serving as governor, he had lectured across the nation on Georgia's pitiful economic and social conditions. Arnall had indeed done so but in an effort to correct those conditions, not to ridicule them. As it turned out, he compounded this handicap before the September 14 primary and redoubled it again before the September 28 run-off.

Also tempted by the wide-open lottery of the primary was Lester Maddox, former owner of a fried chicken emporium and now a furniture retailer, a committed segregationist given to flashing wild charges, and a regular advertiser in the Atlanta papers where he had interspersed copy extolling drumsticks and French fries with ultra-rightist and anti-Negro polemics. Maddox's political record included unsuccessful campaigns for mayor of Atlanta and for lieutenant governor.

Press, radio and TV commentators repeatedly identified Maddox as the man "who sold his restaurant rather than serve Negroes," thus inflaming the minds of his followers with an image of heroism, white-supremacy style. In truth, Maddox leased his restaurant when the courts found him in violation of the Civil Rights Act and later sold the building for expansion of the Georgia Tech campus, receiving a sum variously estimated from $190,000 to $250,000. Maddox toured the state in a station wagon, claiming to be a poor boy who had battled his way upward only to be denied the fruits of his success by devilish federal powers; he promised a "bigger, better and safer" Georgia. He had no visible district or local campaign headquarters, and reporters searching for balance in news stories complained that they could never find anyone who would admit being for him.

Next came James Gray, Albany newspaper publisher and TV station owner, former State Democratic Chairman, a transplanted Yankee who had also made himself over into a fiery champion of States' rights, meaning (in the code of the region) that he despised civil rights, the Great Society and the boll weevil. Mr. Gray may be dimly remembered as the man who delivered at the Los Angeles Democratic Convention in 1960 the minority report of the platform committee which attacked the majority's civil rights position.

Hoke O'Kelley, a moderately wealthy landowner in his 70s and a perennial candidate, entered the contest for laughs, enjoyed some, and faithfully showed up for TV seminars and fish fries. His personality pleased audiences, but he made no political impression. Garland Byrd, a former lieutenant governor, entered for reasons known only to himself.

And from out of nowhere came a fortyish (but younger-looking) south Georgia gentleman farmer, James Carter, a state Senator with a constructive record in education and none at all in anything else (which was to his advantage, since the others in the race had accumulated extensive demerits with one crowd or another). Senator Carter was discovered, entered and supported by an aware group of citizens generally thought to be close to the Sanders administration; they felt that he was the only Democrat who, having won the primary, could beat the Republican in the general election.

Ever present in the Democratic schemes was the figure of Representative Callaway, Georgia's only GOP Congressman. State law requires nomination by a state-wide primary or, if a party received less than 5 per cent of the vote for governor in the previous election, nomination by petitions signed by 15 per cent of the registered voters. The Republicans accumulated more than 150,000 signatures for Callaway, and it cost the state $7,000 just to certify and count them.

As the Democrats hacked one another to bits in the primary, Callaway taunted them from the side lines. It can be seen in retrospect that Arnall, the favorite, declined steadily in public support. He came through to the public as arrogant and overcertain of victory. He explained little, promised much, and repeated constantly that he would win. After the campaign his closest advisers complained that he would not listen to them.

Carter, building on a campaign that started with ads reading "Jimmy WHO?," gained slowly. No one paid much attention to Maddox except the voters. Barely two weeks before the primary vote, Stokely Carmichael's black-power-oriented SNCC was identified, whether involved or not, in brief but messy Negro riots in Atlanta. The timing seemed deliberately opposed to Arnall's chances and intensified the desire of the Maddox-minded to "show 'em."

On September 14, Arnall led with 29 per cent of a total vote of 787,952, and Maddox beat Carter by 21,000 for 23.5 per cent. The two moderates together had compiled slightly more votes, 50.3 per cent, than the conservatives. However, moderate unity disintegrated as Carterites accused Arnallites of preventing their man from reaching the run-off, and Arnallites accused Carterites of preventing their man from winning without a run-off. Both sides could see that Carter, whose Lochinvar ride began about two weeks late, would have won easily with just a little more time. Needless to say, this had made Carter a genuine factor in future state politics.

Heading for the September 18 run-off primary, Arnall sat it out in supreme self-confidence, campaigning almost entirely by telephone. Maddox continued his frenetic tours of the state, shaking hands, saying little. Choosing sides should have been easy: Arnall, successful professional, counselor for some of the country's largest corporations, liberal, in tune with the general thrust of national affairs; Maddox, a seller of ax handles and super-patriotic pamphlets, prattler against federal centralism.

But Arnall had issued lacerating attacks on Vandiver before the former Governor's heart attack, and these had alienated much of the political power structure. Arnall was known for snatching microphones away from opponents in TV debates, for laughing condescendingly, and for interrupting. He also posted an unfortunate series of billboards, patterned after a famous World War I recruiting poster, in which Arnall's extended finger followed the observer accusingly. One strong Arnall supporter was heard to growl: "If he points that damn finger in my face again, I'll vote Republican."

Unaccustomed to two-party politics, Georgia operates open primaries and has no party registration. Arnall supporters and the Atlanta newspapers accused Republicans of voting in the Democratic run-off for Maddox on the assumption that the bespectacled segregationist would provide an easier target for Callaway. Comparisons of voting totals after the general election indicate that thousands of Republicans did cast ballots for Maddox and without question helped him beat Arnall by a run-off vote of 443,055 (54.3 per cent) to 373,004 (45.7 per cent). But the Republican crossover was only one factor. Arnall had defeated himself.

The Maddox campaign grew more dignified, slicker. His ever-larger newspaper ads proclaimed his shortage of campaign funds, and his signs reading "this is Maddox Country" appeared everywhere. Oddly enough, the statement gained credence, and that perhaps suggests something about Americans' childlike acceptance of slogans.

Arnall remained quiet. Governor Sanders appeared briefly at the Democratic convention in Macon at which Maddox was nominated pro forma, scolded those present for deserting to Goldwater in 1964, and departed before Maddox's canonization. Maddox himself departed after giving his acceptance speech to a partly delighted, partly incredulous assortment of 5,000 party faithfuls, and left the lieutenant governor nominee, who had faced no general election opposition and was assured of his post, with a crowd reduced to less than 300. One observer said: "A heavy air of religiosity lay over the convention. A reporter counted the times Maddox was referred to as a 'God-fearing man of God.' More than a dozen."

Some Georgia Democrats, accustomed to a degree of outlandishness in their candidates for various state offices, began to wonder if Maddox possessed qualities they'd not noticed before. Rural counties, sounded out by newspapers before the primary, reported 60 to 70 per cent estimates in favor of Callaway. But with a segregationist and an anti-LBJ Democrat asking for continued loyalty to the party, Callaway had been outflanked. Maddox's primary votes stayed with him.

The Republican Party, though certainly thinner at the grass roots than the Democratic Party, obtains certain advantages in that it operates as a political, campaigning organization in behalf of candidates, while the Democrats, accustomed to primaries that in the past decided conclusively who would take office, operate what is essentially a primary-holding apparatus not even vaguely oriented toward conducting a campaign in support of a ticket. Democratic committeemen conduct primaries and work at the polls for $1 an hour; they leave campaigning to the candidates.

Howard "Bo" Callaway is affable, presentable. A graduate of West Point, he is one of the heirs to a La Grange, Ga., textile mills fortune and runs the Ida Cason Callaway Gardens at Pine Mountain, a resort founded as a nonprofit family project that has contributed appreciably to Georgia's tourist industry. He defeated a conservative Democrat for Congress in 1964 and voted against the Administration on everything from minimum wage increases to demonstration cities.

Back in 1962, Callaway had supported strongly segregationist Marvin Griffin against Carl Sanders in the Democratic primary. In 1964, Callaway became a Republican. In that year, Maddox was also part of Barry Goldwater's 54 per cent victory in Georgia. So much for political labels and party loyalties. In short, both Callaway and Maddox came into the campaign for the November 8 election as ideal candidates for the conservative, small town and rural vote.

But now a third factor entered the general election campaign—a strong movement for a write-in. The sponsors settled on Arnall as their candidate because he had received 370,000 votes and was well known, and because the leaders of the campaign, mostly liberal Atlantans and Negroes active in politics (some officeholders), believed Arnall to be sufficiently disengaged from the mainstream of the party to acquiesce in the unorthodoxy of a write-in. It was generally agreed that Carter, who had boomed out of obscurity to substantial stature, would have been a more popular choice, but it was feared he would disavow the movement. As a matter of fact, he shortly thereafter said he would support the ticket, holding true to an oath signed by all Democratic candidates when they enter the primary: "I pledge that I will support and vote for the state Democratic nominees in the General Election of November 8."

On the issue of this oath, Atlanta's respected Rep. Charles Weltner, winner of his primary fight for a third term, suddenly abdicated, declaring he could not keep his pledge to vote for Maddox: "I cannot compromise with hate." Weltner's withdrawal from the general election ticket brilliantly illuminated Georgia's moral dilemma, underlined the closeness of Maddox's and Callaway's basic philosophies and boosted the Write-In Georgia movement. Nevertheless, Weltner's supporters at home did not unanimously share the national adulation that followed the Congressman's sacrificial act. They felt deprived of representation when it counted most, and thwarted in their strenuous efforts in the primary on his behalf.

From that point until November 8, agonizing indecision reigned in responsible moderate circles. Some leaders toyed with the write-in, hoping a trial-balloon rally would ignite a fire at the grass roots. When no blaze flared, they split, some deciding to stick with the party and others, unable to contemplate voting for Maddox under any circumstances, beginning to discover redeeming features in Callaway. The Atlanta Journal endorsed Callaway. The Atlanta Constitution analyzed its anguish in a lengthy editorial and wound up unable to endorse either candidate or the write-in. Most smaller dailies, including mine (in an act of rationalization I will still defend), supported Callaway.

The intensity of feeling and interest in the Maddox-

Callaway battle could not be exaggerated. The forthcoming election provided the only conversational topic in the state, at every level of society. To the people who had played political and civic roles in the constructive Sanders administration and to those who wanted to continue the Sanders era of harmony, both Callaway and Maddox were pure anathema. To them, a vote for either bordered on treason, like deciding between Goebbels and Goering. The theme of Write-In Georgia was: "When you choose the lesser of two evils, you are still choosing an evil."

So bitterly were voters wrestling with the angles in a search for honorable decisions that surprisingly little bitterness arose among supporters of the various positions. The factions appeared to appreciate and sympathize, in the main, with one another's introspective struggle. Typifying the general feeling of disaster that confronted Georgians was Martin Luther King, Sr., father of the civil rights leader, who demanded at a write-in rally that Herman Talmadge be drafted as "the only man who can save the state from Lester Maddox."

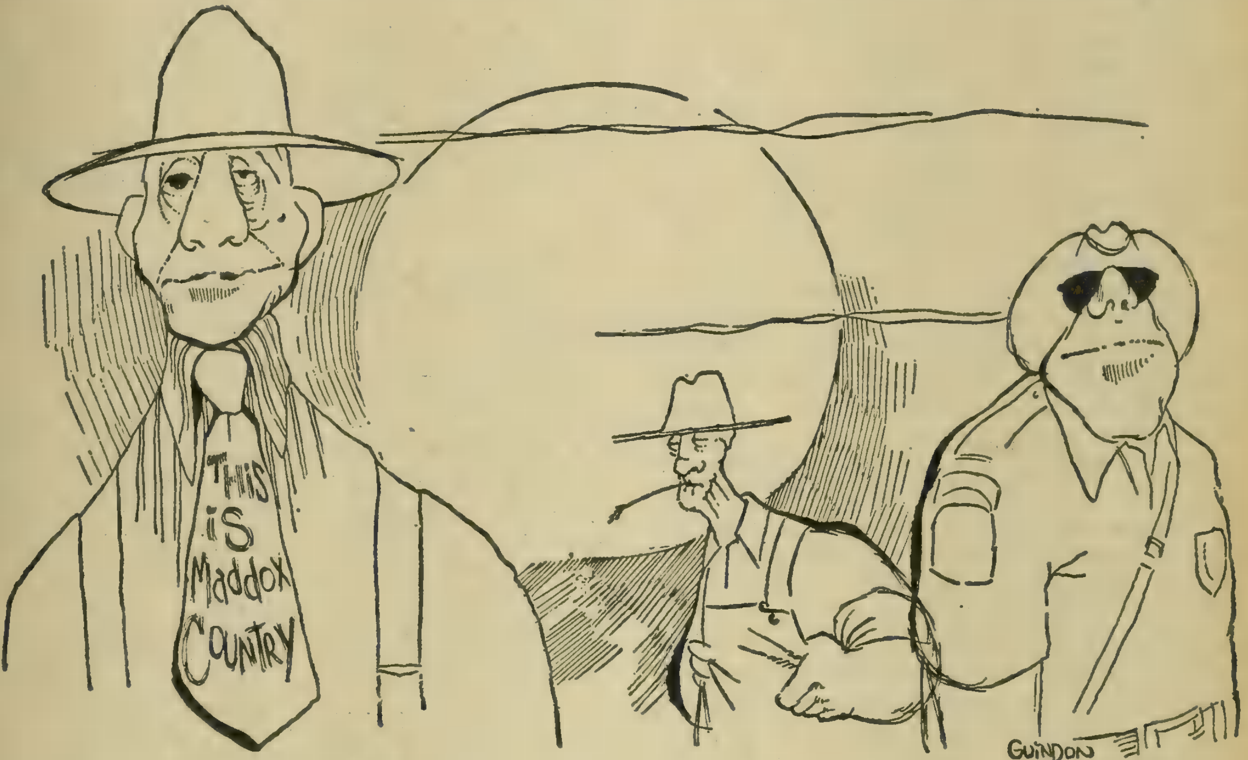
It appeared the write-ins could not win. But according to Georgia law, when no candidate receives a majority there will be a run-off, or according to the state constitution (there is a contradiction here to further bedevil the situation), the legislature will decide between the two top men.

Unless Arnall actually won, it was reasoned, the write-in would either deny votes to Callaway or result in Maddox's choice by the predominantly Democratic legislature. But the write-in enthusiasts worked anyway, standing on the high morality of their position, much to the irritation of those who sympathized with their ideals but felt it more moral to see to the defeat of Maddox.

Various theories ran this way. (1) Maddox would be so bad that the extremist syndrome would be over in just four years. (2) Callaway would have the aid of sound leadership, would be more presentable and was a more stable personality than Maddox. (3) A pox on both their houses; Georgia, unlike Alabama and Mississippi, must show the nation its better image. (4) If Callaway were elected, he would establish a conservative Republican regime that couldn't be dislodged in twenty years.

So a state relatively apathetic during the Democratic primary came down to the November 8 vote with tense excitement.

Voting was a mess. The votomatic machines misfired in Dekalb County, a heavily Republican portion of metropolitan Atlanta, and thousands of ballots were voided. The paper ballot itself, larger than a newspaper page, contained more than twenty constitutional amendments, about fifty names of candidates for various offices in the Democratic column, and only three names in the Republican column.



Counting was tedious and five days passed before it appeared that Callaway had edged Maddox with a score of 450,387 to 448,259. Arnall received 57,834 write-ins, or 6.1 per cent, and it was clear early in the tally that he had captured enough city and Negro votes to deny a decision. Nine of the largest ten counties in the state went for Callaway, but Maddox carried most of the 159 counties. Arnall carried one small county. There were hundreds of write-ins for other candidates from Batman to state Senator Carter. The American Civil Liberties Union, the Write-In Georgia forces and the press collected hundreds of instances of irregularities.

With the general election results still bouncing around, Write-In Georgia and the ACLU moved to the federal courts to prevent the General Assembly from deciding between Maddox and Callaway. The three-judge panel, forbidding the Assembly to follow the state constitutional provision, the one-man, one-vote rule, noted that the legislature might elect (as it probably would have done) the man who had the fewer popular votes, and left further action to the state.

Georgia Attorney General Arthur Bolton immediately appealed to the Supreme Court. He feels obliged to defend the state constitution, but his intimates say that Bolton, a top-notch lawyer and former legislative leader, is looking for a solution to the election standoff, not merely a vindication of the constitution.

There are two major swing groups in Georgia: one is the liberal-moderate group that, allied with the Negroes, has generally prevailed for almost a decade; the other is the racial ultraconservative group. How these would vote in another run-off is anyone's guess. They might even vote the same way for entirely different reasons.

Sanders, in all eyes ever more the competent and constructive Governor, promised to remain at his post until duly relieved by a legalized successor. He has started work on a budget to present to the General Assembly in January. Supporters of both Arnall and Carter smelled the chance for a new go-round altogether. Sanders' friends discussed the possibility that he might remain in office until the 1968 general election. Sanders did not speculate.

By this time it had occurred to the assorted parties that no one really knew how the November 8 election had come out. At least, officially. The state was, and is, dealing with figures compiled by the news media from county returns. The official results cannot be determined until the General Assembly on January 10 unseals and tallies the ballots (unless the courts order them counted earlier). A lawyer close to Governor Sanders guessed that all suits could be delayed as "premature," and action held up until the legislature convenes. Certainly it would be consistent of the court to leave initiative to the legislature rather than present a solution of its own.

Maddox wants the legislature to designate a governor. He carried the most counties and it is inconceivable to him, as it is to everyone else, that representatives of the counties would vote in the legislature contrary to their home mandate.

Callaway, appearing confident, urges that the people be allowed to elect their governor. His partisans want a run-off between him and Maddox, with write-ins barred. Write-In Georgia warns that any attempt to bar write-ins will face action in federal court; and Georgians, still traditionally Jacksonian in outlook, can't comfortably justify barring write-ins even "if they did mess everything up and waste all the elections so far."

Regardless of maneuvers back and forth in the courts between now and the convening of the legislature in January, the sharpest legal interpretations hold that one of two courses is possible:

(1) Either the Supreme Court will uphold the lower court and prevent the General Assembly from electing a governor, or it will reverse the lower court, in which event the legislature will elect a governor and Maddox holds the chips.

(2) If the General Assembly is not permitted to elect a governor, it will call a special election. This would open lists to anyone and give Carter a possibility to come in as everyone's compromise candidate.

The statutory date for a run-off general election has passed, and numerous decisions in the General Assembly and courts affirm that unless an election is held at the time and place required by law, it is a nullity. This may well mean that Maddox and Callaway no longer have official candidate status apart from that of any other hopeful. They're campaigning anyway.

Maddox is in tenuous control of the Democratic Party organization, and the prospect of his leadership of the state delegation to the 1968 Democratic National Convention presents another can of worms for Georgia to untangle. Where a Sanders-led delegation backed the national Administration in Atlantic City in 1964, a Maddox group could move even further right than did the intransigent delegation to Los Angeles in 1960. It could—indeed it would—support George Wallace for President if the Alabama Governor's husband decided to run as a loyal Democrat.

How did Georgia, not quite so pure in heart yet not quite so backward as either its boosters or detractors contend, wind up with the miserable choice between Maddox and Callaway? Happenstances of politics aside, it is possible that the effect is being felt from years of unrefuted yammering about alleged federal encroachment on States' rights, loss of liberty, yielding of "freedom" (to prevent other people from having some) and similar mindlessness. It must be faced that the moderate, constructive people in this country have done a poor job of getting their point of view across. They have allowed the pratings of the witless to go unanswered, never believing that such incredible arguments would gather support. Few have been heard defending the policies that over the past few years have increased prosperity, personal income, educational opportunities and individual rights. So the people, made nervous and unsure by negativism, have decided to change. What they think they are changing from has been ineptly defined by its champions; what they are changing to hasn't been defined at all.

When the write-in managed to prevent, at least temporarily, a victory by either Maddox or Callaway, its adherents claimed they had proved that all the drive toward progress wasn't reversed. One stalwart went further than that. It was, he said, "a redemptive act." But the convolutions of political philosophy and the meaning, if any, of Georgia's torment to the national scene are other stories.

Of all sources, the Georgia Bulletin, publication of the Catholic diocese of Atlanta, summed it up best in a first-grade primer rewrite:

See Lester run.
See Bo run.
See neither win.
See Daddy smile.
Spot goes bow-wow.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Nobel Laureate of Hebrew Literature

CURT LEVIANT

Mr. Leviant teaches Hebraic Studies at Rutgers University, and is a translator and critic of S.Y. Agnon's work. He is the editor and translator of Sholom Aleichem's Old Country Tales (Putnam). One of his short stories is included in Best American Short Stories: 1966 (Houghton Mifflin Co.).

Hebrew and Yiddish literature are unique in that both have flourished over the centuries without geopolitical roots. Whereas in the traditional pattern, nationhood sustains literature, with Hebrew the reverse is true: for the past 2,000 years Hebrew works—both sacred and secular—has sustained the concept of nationhood. Now that Israel exists once more, Hebrew and Israeli literature should presumably coalesce. Although Shmuel Yosef Agnon has lived in Jerusalem since 1924 (he was born in Galicia, Poland, in 1888), he paradoxically is not an Israeli writer in the sense that Faulkner or Sholokhov are American and Russian. Agnon is rather the representative Jewish artist of our time, a Hebrew writer in the universal community of Israel, whose work has little in common with the often cosmopolitan and consciously un-Jewish contemporary Israeli literature.

Most of Agnon's major works were, in fact, composed before the state of Israel was established, and despite the centrality to Agnon's fiction of the land of Israel, the return to Zion, and the spiritual destiny of the children of Israel, the idea of the post-1948 state has little bearing on his work. In this sense, then, Agnon may be said to be a literary expatriate in his own homeland.

For Agnon, writing in Hebrew means writing in lashon ha-kodesh, the sacred tongue, and being committed to the nearly 3,500-year-old linguistic and literary tradition of Hebrew letters. In his works, Agnon summons up the entire usable past: Bible, Mishna, Talmud, Midrash, medieval poets and exegetes, liturgy, Hasidic and pious literature, customs, history, folklore—all of which provide him with symbols and metaphors, allusions and associations that enrich his prose and make it transcend its literal meaning.

Perhaps only a few of his works have been translated into English because translating Agnon's Hebrew, with its multitude of associations, references and ironic glances, is an enormously difficult task. The problems are not only linguistic and musical—to convey the sense of classic prose without sounding archaic, and to preserve rhythm and occasional assonance, alliteration and word play—but cultural as well: to transmit the subtle essence of his allusions so crucial to the narrative atmosphere. His theme and stories, however, are by no means as recondite as his allusions. That he has already been translated into sixteen languages is adequate testimony to the power of his narrative. The Nobel Prize will surely increase his readership all over the world and focus attention upon Hebrew literature as well.

S.Y. Agnon in English

TWO TALES. (Translated by Walter Lever.) 237 pp. $4.95.

IN THE HEART OF THE SEAS. (Translated by I. M. Lask.) 128 pp. $3.95.

DAYS OF AWE. 320 pp. $4.95. Paper $1.95.

ISRAELI STORIES. Contains two major Agnon stories. (Translated by Walter Lever and Joel Blocker.) 256 pp. $3.95. Paper $1.95.

THE BRIDAL CANOPY. (Translated by I. M. Lask.) Coming March, 1967. (All published by Schocken Books.)

Agnon is the literary archivist of Galician Jewry, the preserver of a now destroyed civilization. His works trace the Jewish community from a plateau of spiritual security through its decline in the post-World War I period in Europe, and its simultaneous rise in Palestine. His epic purview and the range of his diversity are displayed in his three major novels, The Bridal Canopy, A Guest for the Night and Days Gone By, which despite differences in form, tone and treatment, are all to a degree related.

The Bridal Canopy describes Reb Yudel and his driver Nuta wandering through early 19th-century Jewish Galicia trying to collect enough alms to dower Yudel's three daughters and, in the process, exchanging countless stories. Depicting these Jews whose world is coherent and complete, Agnon's tone is cheerful and witty, his form elastic: there is time to spin yarn after yarn. In a story-book atmosphere, realism and fantasy are filtered through Agnon's rich imagination; when Nuta's two horses engage in a Talmudic dispute our disbelief is temporarily suspended.

In A Guest for the Night, the narrator returns to the city of his youth in the early 1930s and finds it radically altered. Traditional Jewish life is moribund; the synagogue is empty, a shadow of its former glory. The community's spiritual malaise is symbolically reflected by the appearance of people maimed and physically deformed. In contrast to the exuberant fancy of The Bridal Canopy and its wholeness, A Guest for the Night is a dirge for the fragmented modern Jewish world. At the end of the novel, the narrator, in a pertinent symbolic gesture, takes the key of the synagogue and brings it to the land of Israel, where hope now exists for a dislocated Jewry.

After lamenting exile and waning faith, Agnon turns to Zion. In the panoramic Days Gone By, set in Jaffa and Jerusalem of the early 20th century, the novel's hero, Yitzhak Kumer, a fourth-generation descendant of Yudel of The Bridal Canopy, migrates to Palestine and realizes the dream Reb Yudel had prayed for. But despite Kumer's aliya to the land of Israel, his life is not as spiritually secure as was his great-grandfather's. Though Jews are resettled on the land, they are still not complete, for they lack the faith of Reb Yudel's generation. Agnon's often posed problem concerning the ideal Jewish existence, then, has not been solved: it shifts field, depending upon the reader's and the author's perspective.

A Guest for the Night looks back to the old world of faith and forward to the land of Israel. The Bridal Canopy appears to provide the answer; but viewed from the retrospective stance of Days Gone By, we sense the author's ironic detachment: a halo of legends surrounds former tranquillity. Agnon suggests that Judaism in exile is not complete without Zion, and that Jews in Zion are not complete without faith and Torah (meaning the gamut of traditional Jewish practice). Only the children of Israel thriving with Torah in the land of Israel can create the ideal perfection. But this may only exist in the world of legend and miracles, as it does in "The Tale of a Goat."

Agnon's version of this little Yiddish folk tale is illustrative of his richly textured narrative and symbolic ambience. A she-goat bought by a sick man disappears every few days, then returns with udders full of milk sweeter than honey. Curious to see where the goat goes, the man's son follows it to a cave and discovers a short cut to the land of Israel. The son arrives on the eve of the Sabbath, sends back the goat (with a note in her ear) and urges his parents to come quickly to the Holy Land. The father assumes that the son has died and that the goat is responsible. He kills the goat and then finds the message. But now it is too late for him to take the magic leap out of exile.

Brief as it is, this carefully wrought story, complete with line of action, problem and resolution, is aligned thematically with Agnon's major works. But Agnon enhances this folk tale and its deceptively simple framework with Biblical verses and conscious manipulation of symbols steeped in traditional Jewish lore. On the literal level the story can be read as a folk legend about a man, his son and an extraordinary goat. On another level—through symbolism, allusion, other-speaking—it portrays the spiritual illness of a Torah-less Diaspora, and the tragic aftermath of those who adhere to a literal, skeptical reality. The story's highest vision is the paradisiac salvation attainable via the surrealistic leap of faith, and the beneficence of Sabbath, Torah and the land of Israel.

Agnon consciously embraced classical Hebrew literature and made it a cornerstone of his art at a time when other Hebrew writers thought it fashionable to reject this tradition for a Western one. However, Agnon's allusions from the mainstream of Hebrew writings do not give a conglomerate effect to his prose. To offer a parallel, his writing would not sound like a mixture of Anglo-Saxon, Chaucerian, Elizabethan and modern English. Since Hebrew was a written language for nearly 2,000 years, rather than one spoken continuously in its native land, it did not undergo the radical changes in grammar, vocabulary, pronunciation and syntax of English—although a Hebrew reader can distinguish the various layers within any literary work. Since the Jews have made the study of their classics a religious duty, familiarity with the literature is expected. It is this fund of shared intellectual and emotional experience that Agnon draws upon and transmutes into art.

In applying a classical idiom to the problem of his theme, Agnon achieves an intriguing contrapuntal effect. The serene prose that limns modern man's spiritual vacillation offers an array of ironies and ambiguities. Despite changes in narrative length, form and theme, Agnon's style has remained constant over the years. He has forged the elements of rabbinic Hebrew (2nd-5th century)—his word choice and prose rhythms are basically those of the Mishna and Midrash—the Hebrew of the Hasidic texts (18th-19th century) and some modern Hebrew into a virtually inimitable linguistic instrument that is both poetic and precise.

One of the most notable phases of Agnon's art has been the symbolic story. These brooding, nightmarish tales take place in a surreal world devoid of laws of time and place, cause and effect, and sometimes even life and death. Here modern man is lost in a maze, frustrated in his pursuit of wholeness. Though many of Agnon's stories show the emptiness of man wrenched from his spiritual foundations, in these dream tales even the seeker of religious fulfillment is thwarted.

Agnon often equates piety with wholeness and disbelief with desolation. Yet the symbolic stories, "Edo and Enam" and "Betrothed" (included in the recently published Two Tales), offer an interesting variation. Both of these spellbinding narratives parallel and complement each other; they coruscate with the same devices and themes—the spectrum from eros to theos—that Agnon has explored for the past six decades.

"Edo and Enam" is a despondent tale of a pious hero (here, too, a deformity is symbolic: he is blind in one eye). The story is rich in allusions from Hebrew literature, references to liturgy and devout Jewish communities. But in "Betrothed" —the tale of apparent hope and antipode to "Edo and Enam"—the hero shows no sign of formal religion. Here, Agnon's language is more secular; he alludes infrequently to Jewish classics, more often to Homer, gods and Zeus. Significantly, the story concludes with a re-enactment of a Greek marathon. However, the hint of optimism in the story is provided by a Jewish metaphor. The lovers who have vowed eternal fidelity in "Betrothed" are called Shoshana and Yaakov (Susan and Jacob in the English translation). The fusion of their names, Shoshanat-Yaakov, is a poetic term for the ideal community of Israel. The lovers united in the land of Israel, then, represent the symbolic consummation of the old dream: the people of Israel in the land of Israel.

Shmuel Yosef Agnon, who has delighted two generations of Hebrew readers, is still working vigorously. "If God will grant me long life," he recently told the Swedish Chargé d'Affaires in Jerusalem, "they [the Nobel Committee] will yet see that they did not err in choosing me." At 78, he follows a schedule of writing six mornings a week. His Jerusalem home contains the manuscripts of many meticulously revised stories which have not yet been printed; numbers of brilliant tales and chapters from novels in progress have appeared over the years in Israeli newspapers and periodicals, but have not yet been published in book form.

Because Schocken Books has been providing Agnon with a combination of an annual stipend plus royalties, he has been able to consecrate a lifetime solely to writing and reading, a position which few Hebrew writers enjoy. But Agnon is by no means a public figure. He is neither lecturer, teacher nor critic. He scorns symposia, conferences, conventions, the entire social paraphernalia of the literary life exclusive of the creative act itself.

Besides the works discussed, Agnon has written several shorter novels and hundreds of tales about life in Central Europe, Poland and Palestine, and most recently with the holocaust theme. His total works, honored by Israel's highest literary awards and prizes, comprise eleven volumes, eight of fiction, three of nonfiction. One of the latter is a by now classic anthology, Days of Awe, a collection of high holiday legends, customs and stories, drawn from 300 ancient and modern religious texts. This volume is studied prior to and during the Rosh Hashana-Yom Kippur period

DON CARLOS, SATURDAY AFTERNOON

Alone! Who does not know the meaning of alone? Granted, there is a world outside, houses and streets are wet, people run in and out of cars.
In the story sung on the air each character is in the end alone.
A Spanish prince still loves the woman who has become his father's bride.
A conquering Court attends the saving of fallen Christians at the stake.
Although one hears a lofty gloria,
the prince in prison chains cries out, betrayed, he thinks, by the one he loved and by the friend in whom he believed.

Does it really help that being alone is one condition shared by all?
The drama off-stage is no less complex.
Although one may assume that disparate parts that do not always lock in place are woven by a common thread, the burden is not lessened for all that.
Not lessened by bewildered heads and muffled cries, nor by the fact that the sky's been agitated all day long, that men in raincoats stumble across slippery roofs, and that the very air is dense with wriggling bacteria which show up under a powerful glass.

ARTHUR GREGOR

and has been accorded semi-sacred status by some communities of Jews.

Agnon's frequently quoted statement that he does not read is obviously an ironic pose (as is his supposed naïveté) which journalists cannot penetrate. Agnon's reading is wide; his memory prodigious. He has mastered Hebrew as well as European literature; the former has influenced his language and imagery; the latter his aesthetic form, and he is as much at home with the sages and Hasidic rabbis of Jerusalem as with the freethinking intellectuals.

Agnon has become a classic in his own lifetime. In his nearly sixty years of writing he has realized that adherence to literary tradition which for Western writers has often been a quixotic ideal. By artistically fusing language and narrative, mythos and theme, Agnon has reconstructed a complete civilization and probed the uncharted areas of the 20th century's riven soul.

A New England Saint

THE NEW ENGLAND CONSCIENCE. By Austin Warren. University of Michigan Press. 231 pp. $6.

NEW ENGLAND SAINTS. By Austin Warren. University of Michigan Press. 200 pp. $3.75.

SHERMAN PAUL

Mr. Paul is professor of English at the University of Illinois. His most recent book is Edmund Wilson: A Study of Literary Vocation in Our Time (University of Illinois Press). He is also the author of Louis Sullivan: An Architect in American Thought (Prentice-Hall).

It is not the unassuming character of these small companion volumes but their quality of scholarship that accounts, I think, for their having been insufficiently noticed. Certainly they merit the closest attention. Their author is an eminent critic whose substantial earlier work is current and formative in graduate literary study, and the books themselves treat matters of central importance to the understanding of American character and experience. Unlike most works of scholarship, however, they are direct; they confront and testify. For the deepest source of their scholarship is in the scholar who, as he says of Emerson the self-therapist, addresses the New England in himself and has assimilated and earned his tradition by writing about what he needs to sustain him.

Although they are historical in scope and biographical in nature, richly learned yet spare in exposition, these books are also autobiographical (they give us the author more than any of his books) and personal (intended to reach out, touch, confer). Such fruit of scholarship is the true harvest of a life notable for the virtues of love, care and wisdom. In these books one encounters the teacher so conspicuous in the annals of New England, one of "the literary inciters to the good life."

The good life with which Austin Warren is concerned is the abundant life of the spirit fulfilled in joy. Bravery of spirit is demanded to achieve it, and those who strive to do so are "saints": "My saints are, none of them, canonized; but they are, whether priests, and of whatever 'communion,' men I recognize, and celebrate, as those to whom reality was the spiritual life, whose spiritual integrity was their calling and vocation." This vocation, clearly, involves the urgent conscience—in fact, the books, The New England Conscience, published this year, and New England Saints, originally published in 1956 and currently available, are joined in the first paragraph of New England Saints, where we are told that the New England character "owed obedience first to the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; then to Duty, 'stern daughter of the voice of God,' with conscience as relentless director." In A Recognition of Austin Warren, recently published by his students at the University of Michigan, he says: "To be born a lamb —do you call that a saint? We have dragons, lions, and tigers in ourselves."

New England Saints is a hagiography designed for instruction and edification. Some of the essays in it were first printed in the 1930s, but the book has the intrinsic unity of the author's constant interest and the formal unity of comment by various saints on one another. It includes studies of the early New England poets and parsons, and of such prominent figures (spiritually representative men) as Alcott, Emerson, Father Taylor, the elder Henry James, Charles Eliot Norton, Irving Babbitt and John Brooks Wheelwright. It also covers the large spiritual movements of four centuries.

The essays have various excellences: that, for example, on the 17th-century poets is a fine summary appreciation of the poetry, and especially its Baroque aspects; that on Alcott is unusually fair and responsive; and those on Babbitt, under whom Warren sat, and on Wheelwright, whom he knew, are generous, because perceptive and exact tributes. Other essays—with The New England Conscience in hand, and on second reading—have the force of prefiguring later themes and of speaking profoundly for the author. The essay on the orthodox parsons (neo-Calvinists like Emmons and Hopkins, the "intellectual sons" of Edwards) celebrates a life of learning, ability and goodness, a laborious life not unlike the academic life that Austin Warren has lived. He says of Emmons: "Instead of seeking preferment to Andover or Boston, he educated and saved Franklin, Massachusetts" (this recalls his self-characterization as "an apostle to the midwest"), and when he explains the continuity of teacher and disciple and the way in which the parsonage served as seminary, one remembers his regard for students as "seminarians," young people to be ordained, if found worthy, in "the literary priesthood."

The essay on Emerson portrays a mind like his own, psychologically acute, unacademic, fearless; and the central point of the essay—that "Emerson learned to bear his frailties tolerantly"—looks ahead to one of the lessons of The New England Conscience. The essay on the elder Henry James expresses the author's need "to surrender myself to my fellows, and lose myself in the Lord"; that on Norton, an "apostle to the gentiles," his awareness of responsibility to the community and belief that the "higher" is always the more liberal education; and that on Father Taylor, the most genial and anecdotal, his wish to speak "the truth in love" and be "full of joy in the Lord."

The New England Conscience is a manual of conscience and a critique of an entire culture—an argument with the conscience that was one source of its strength, which the author has personally relied on yet knows must be tempered. Like

PLAYS FOR A NEW THEATER

An exciting collection of avant-garde plays by Corrado Alvaro (Italy), Yvan Goll (Germany), John Hawkes (USA), Robert Hivnor (USA), and Boris Vian (France).

Cloth, $6; Paperbook, $2.95

NEW DIRECTIONS
333 Sixth Ave., N. Y. 10014

New England Saints its lessons apply to contemporary life, both public and private. It has a tighter formal unity, for the essays, written for this purpose, are "case histories," in a double sense, of the pathological or sick conscience. The book charts the change from suffering for conscience, as in the instances of such men of action as Bradford, Winthrop and Garrison (a throwback in this respect), to suffering from conscience, as in the early instance of Wigglesworth, and in those cases described, not necessarily suffered, by such 19th-century authors as Hawthorne, Henry James and Mary Wilkins. Or one might better say that the book pursues the sick conscience, that fussy, overexacting, scrupulous, dutiful servant of Moral Law; and tries to educate it by making it responsive and responsible to consciousness.

Austin Warren is himself a spiritual director of the kind he praises in the essay on Fénelon (New England Saints). Among his prescriptions, inevitably general here, are the following directed to an ethics of possibility. Duty is overcome by assimilating it to the requirements of vocation, by willingly making it one's own —in F. H. Bradley's words, "my duties on the inside answer to due functions on the outside." The conscience is "unhealthy and unhistorical" when it separates itself from "ritual and communal regulations" and doesn't sufficiently respect the outer, for it needs the support of community, the continuity and moral heritage of human history. An imperative need, enjoined by Baron Friedrich von Hügel, is to "move out of yourself, let in God." And especially now, when the New England conscience has survived its earlier functions, its health requires "pleasure, graciousness, joy, love."

Generous with others, Austin Warren is not so generous with himself. He knows that scrupulosity is "partly disease, partly sin"—the sin of pride—and for himself he cannot be satisfied with the "good temporary therapeutic" of humanistic ethics. Of Bradley's ethics, which is his example, he says: "the transcendental, the romantic, the heroic, the religious aspects of ethics have disappeared." The difficulty, and grandeur, of his own moral striving is represented in his attitudes toward Jonathan Edwards, the most saintly and revered of his saints and the prime mover of both books. He admits that Edwards' notion of virtue is not ordinary but supernatural and demands a superhuman effort, yet Edwards' "disinterested benevolence" is what he most desires to achieve —a moral goal, that of all writers on Edwards, he best enables us to understand. He speaks, in the essay on Fénelon, of his own need "to become really humble" and to "love God for Himself alone"; and both books function for him as a discipline of love.

Like Fénelon, who was "spiritualized by adversity," Austin Warren has written books whose effect, with gentleness, is "to humble the intellectually proud and to make all learning nothing save as it ministers to spiritual growth." His religion is ecumenical; his faith, as he says of Hawthorne, is in " 'accepting the universe'—in humility, in loyalty to persons and principles, in love." Spirit and love, the fullness of being, radiate these books which livingly transmit a heritage and give that increase, always rare, "of real wealth, of culture, of character, of influence."

Burke's Other Life

TOWARDS A BETTER LIFE: Being a Series of Epistles, or Declamations. By Kenneth Burke. University of California Press. 219 pp. $4.95.

WILLIAM H. RUECKERT

A professor of English at the University of Rochester, Mr. Rueckert is the author of Kenneth Burke and the Drama of Human Relations (University of Minnesota Press) and Glenway Wescott (Twayne).

Kenneth Burke is one of our great native speculative thinkers. He is an authentic Yankee and belongs, as George Knox has obliquely suggested in his book on Burke, to the Emersonian tradition. Though Burke has mysteriously refused, for nearly ten years now, to release A Symbolic of Motives, a book that may well rank with Northrop Frye's Anatomy of Criticism as one of the few original works of literary theory to be written in English since World War II, he has not been inactive or quiet. He has lectured and taught all over the country; he has been to the Center for Advanced Studies in the Behavioral Sciences; he has written a great variety of essays which have been published in journals representing many disciplines; he has had one new book published, The Rhetoric of Religion (1961), and another, Language as Symbolic Action, this season. Two or three of his other projects are now in the works.

Burke has also been getting back into print, and the occasion for this review is the republication, after thirty-five years, of his novel Towards a Better Life. One is grateful to the University of California Press for making it available again not only because of its intrinsic worth, which is considerable, but because it will make better known Burke's often forgotten, even unknown, other life.

In addition to this novel, Burke's other creative works include: The White Oxen and Other Stories (1924); Book of Moments: Poems 1915-1954 (1955); "The Anaesthetic Revelation of Herone Liddell" (1957), a long story published in The Kenyon Review; "Prologue in Heaven" (1961), a play which serves as the epilogue to The Rhetoric of Religion; a second book of poems, which will probably be published in 1967; and numerous unpublished (often unwritten) songs. As is often the case with things written away from the center of a man's major achievement, these works are very important to Burke. They are serious, necessary endeavors—symbolic acts in Burke's sense of representative and therapeutic verbal action. Burke has said, for example, that he wrote many of his poems so that he could locate and analyze his own image clusters; and both the novel and the long story clearly derive from, record, and fictionally cope with traumatic events in Burke's life. They reveal Burke in a way that the critical, speculative books do not; and the later works, especially, remind one constantly of the fundamental, cranky humanity and earth-rootedness of Burke and his system.

Burke belongs to what is now a well-established American tradition: an experimental, often dissenting, counterthrusting tradition which, since Emerson, has given American literature one of its distinctive characteristics. Like Conrad Aiken's Ushant, for example—Burke's novel has a strange, mixed form. It is a lyric novel which consists, as the subtitle says somewhat contrarily, of epistles or declamations. But the epistles are all unsent letters and the declamations are self-addressed oratory. In one sense, then, the whole book runs counter to the subtitle and reverberates with a profound and deliberately achieved irony of effects. The style is rational, elegant and civilized—almost 18th century—a tour de force in the pure creation of effects, as if the book were merely a technical exercise in virtuoso performance. But Burke's manner is a kind of masquerade, a dance of artifice, which masks a grotesque inner life of great violence and brutality. This dialectic of doubleness is everywhere evident in the novel: in the title; in the divided self of the protagonist, John Neal; in the paired opposites of men (John Neal and Anthony) and women (Florence and Genevieve); in the two basic settings; and in the irony of counter-effects mentioned above.

From the language of doubleness, then, must come the terminology for any full discussion of Towards a Better Life. Polarity, punning, dialectic, otherness, transitional, role playing, acting, drama, irony, ambivalence, ambiguity, paradox, division and rebirth—these are some of the terms one would have to use to apprehend and render the substance and specific life of this lyric novel. Such completeness is not possible in a review; all I can aim for is a brief hortatory rendering of what Burke might call the "gist" of the book.

The novel is about John Neal's progress toward a better life, about his movement away from one kind of self, which is negative and clearly defined, and toward another kind of self, which is positive and only vaguely hinted at. At the center of the novel, controlling the logic of its development, is a purgative and incipiently redemptive pattern of experience. What must be purged are those things in John Neal which make him unable to obey the imperative punningly contained in his name. Burke drives John Neal through a series of terrible reducing experiences, burns him down until all of Neal's other selves have been seared off, and some basic irreducible core remains. It is a painful process and brutal in its cumulative effect. The title seems to have only a cruel, mocking bearing upon the material being presented, until, in the last three chapters, John Neal kneels—spontaneously recognizes otherness—and is ready for the rebirth which will enable him to begin moving toward a better life.

As I read it, this is what the novel is about. However, the form of the last chapter—entitled "'Testamentum Meum' Jottings"—is such that another plausible interpretation is possible. Many of these jottings begin without capitals and are fragments of thoughts. They suggest by their form that, to quote two of them, John Neal is "lapsing into the unformed" and that he is considering "death by one's own hand." Though there is no specific overt suicide to resolve the plot, the last sentence of the novel ("Henceforth silence, that the torrent may be heard descending in all its fullness") suggests that John Neal is speaking of an ultimate silence. According to this other view, then, the logic of the inner form of the novel is not reversible and requires that John Neal go mad and/or commit suicide. (The ending is ambiguous enough to permit either or both readings.) John Neal is thus punished for his sins of pride, and both they and the character enacting them are completely eliminated by Burke. This, of course, leaves a great emptiness at the end; John Neal can then only be understood as a negative example of the title, and the novel as a whole must be understood, somewhat ironically, as pointing the way toward a better life by showing one how not to get there. I have always preferred (and the evidence supports it) the other more hopeful (and Burkean) reading in which the character is retained so that the title may be applied directly to the possibility of John Neal's renewal.

Burke wrote this novel at a time of deep personal trouble and at a point of change in his own development. This, too, is in the novel and gives it another kind of doubleness. Thoughtful readers in 1966 are too sophisticated—thanks in part to Burke—to take the novel solely upon its own terms or to heed too seriously Burke's pronouncement in the "Preface to Second Edition" that "in the last analysis, a work of art is justified only insofar as it can give pleasure." Burke's whole critical system, which liberated so many of us from the emptiness of aesthetic dilettantism, instructs us otherwise. No man is really willing or able to put himself into a systematic critical work in quite the same way as he will put himself into a fiction because the disguises of fiction make certain things possible which are otherwise unthinkable. What we have in Towards a Better Life, then, is an entrance into an early phase of Burke's other life, where one encounters an early and other self of great complexity: the actor who later formulated dramatism, the rhetorician who later became the rhetor, the stylist who later became rather less readable, the artist who became critic. It it a pleasure to have those presences with us again.

Games of the Poet

RIVERS AND MOUNTAINS. By John Ashbery. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 62 pp. $3.50. Paper $2.45.

STEPHEN KOCH

Mr. Koch teaches at the State University of New York at Stony Brook.

John Ashbery's Rivers and Mountains brings to maturity the work of an important modern poet who hasn't yet been given anything like the attention he deserves. Ashbery is a difficult poet: though he always seems to be talking about something specific, we never know quite what it is, and though his quick, unexpected shifts from tone to tone, feeling to feeling, always seem to have their own necessity, this necessity is never explained in the customary ways. These new poems are less opaque than his earlier work, but they remain a fusion of the hermetic and the obvious; their syntax is disjoined; their rhythms, though at a new level of development, are slippery, underplayed, and even confusing; their language is indulgently lush, and yet oddly reflective and dispassionate. All this has gotten him classed with the avant-garde. But the fact is that Ashbery's delicately sophisticated manner bewilders almost everyone. Except for a group of young poets in New York, among whom he's currently much in vogue, his work is scarcely acknowledged.

Ashbery has written two other books: Some Trees, a collection written under the influence and patronage of Auden, and The Tennis Court Oath, which comes as something of a jolt after the suave polish of Some Trees. Less than half its poems are intelligible in any ordinary sense, and even these—which rather mock the influence of Auden—are packed with lines like "when he'd had he would not had he of" that jump off the page like a screech of static. About the other poems in The Tennis Court Oath, one can say only that

Bobbs-Merrill

viet nam in the mud

"A freelance photographer, one of the best, Pickerell has covered the war mainly from the foot-soldier's viewpoint . . . with a sympathetic insight few others have been able to command."—Virginia Kirkus Service.

"In his down-to-earth account, he approves the larger objectives of American policy, but not our political and military tactics . . . This book deserves wide reading."—Library Journal

over 100 photographs

by JAMES PICKERELL

introduction by MALCOM W. BROWNE

Paper $2.25 • Cloth $5.00

Bobbs-Merrill

some are more unintelligible than others. It seems the book was written partly under the influence of the theories of both collage and action painting—Ashbery is also an art critic. Thus, the book's longest but by no means best poem, "Europe," is interlarded with passages chosen at random from what appears to be a boy's adventure novel. (Has anyone ever noticed that the sentence structure of the late Franklin W. Dixon, creator of the Hardy Boys, is exactly that of most pornography, rippling as they both do from one adjectival thrill to the next?)

Thus, though his style is scarcely "spontaneous," Ashbery follows the action painters at least to the extent of claiming for the process of finding his own poetic voice a value quite distinct from the value of the results, "as art." Though "Europe" has moments of a scrappy, lost, but real beauty, it is unsatisfactory as a poem—it is in fact hardly a poem at all, but the poetic notebook of a man living in Europe, cut off from the nourishment of spoken English, and trying to keep the tonalities of the language fresh in his ear despite this impoverishment. As such, the poem shows a certain strength of purpose: that of a poet who will use only language that's still alive for him, and who is—like the disenfranchised deputies who vowed not to give up until they had a constitution—standing firm in the midst of confusion, scavenging the rubbish of language in search of a voice.

The progressively disintegrating poetic in The Tennis Court Oath inconclusively records this search. The completed works of art in Rivers and Mountains vindicate it. The book's first poem—which I think can be read as Ashbery taking stock of himself—announces with unexpected determination:

Much of your time has been occupied by creative games
Until now, but we have all-inclusive plans for you.

In their rather precious context, these lines are startling because they declare a determination to rise to a level of artistic seriousness that Ashbery otherwise keeps hidden behind a veil of playfulness and arcane self-indulgence. He is among a group of artists—it includes Raymond Roussel and Ronald Firbank—who never quite seem fully serious about their plainly serious art. Like them, hiding things is one of his themes; like them, he loves the convoluted, the cryptic and the frivolous. He builds his toy crystal palaces with enormous care, but at any moment they are likely to come tinkling down, poked in by an attack of his quiet petulance. One poem in Rivers and Mountains is only a vehicle for the name of every river the poet can think of. And yet this principle of play and concealed intentions—which in the earlier work often seems to be merely a game—has been given a certain profundity in Rivers and Mountains.

Each moment
Of utterance is the true one; likewise none are true,
Only is the bounding from air to air, a serpentine
Gesture which hides the truth behind a congruent Message. . . .

This odd, delicately evasive sense of the poetic "moment" and its intensity—"that drenched every instant of that being"—lifts Ashbery's work into the realm of true seriousness. Ashbery's commitment to the "moment" is never abrupt; he is never intense in the obvious sense; he will never give you a bang. Instead he plays the force of a momentary intensity against the slow rhythms of meditation and extraordinarily nuanced turns of feeling. His effects are cumulative; it is sometimes amazing what forceful "moments" he is able to generate from the webby substance of the poems. The sudden "drench" of feeling that makes his work so strong is slowly prepared, and it is especially strong for being so underplayed, as it is in this typical ending:

I prefer you in the plural. I want "you,"
You must come to me, all golden and pale
Like the dew and the air.
And then I start getting this feeling of exaltation.

I don't know of any other contemporary poet who can draw out so elegantly and to such length what are, after all, only isolated eruptions of momentary lyric intensity. Among other things this enables him to write what few moderns can write: long poems that can be taken seriously. Easily the best poem in The Tennis Court Oath, "How Much Longer will I be Able to Inhabit the Divine Sepulcher . . ." already gives promise of this, even more than does the longer "Europe." It moves tentatively through numerous idioms: from what sounds like an early Romantic trying to imitate the Elizabethans, to the talk of little boys hiding under the porch, to an attempt at self-explanation, to alternately raw and veiled decadence, and ending with a sudden consolidation of them all:

Am I wonder,
Strategically, and in the light
Of the long sepulcher that hid death and hides me?

Rivers and Mountains contains a long poem as extraordinary as "Europe" is questionable, even though it is something of a companion piece to "Europe." "The Skaters" seems to me the most successful long poem written by an American since Berryman and Lowell wrote theirs. But it is entirely different from the work of these older men. They both relied on narrative to keep things going; both used the rather narrow idiom of an ordinary monologue. Now, there are some elements of narrative in "The Skaters": the poet is considering taking a trip, and he goes on vacation; he talks about his "exile" in Europe and the life of Americans in Paris.

But what happens is entirely secondary to Ashbery's extended, discontinuous meditation on himself, his art, and on the problem of writing a long poem—that is, on the problem of sustaining an intuition through a long process of abrasion in "reality," of maintaining an emotion through the complicated activity of ordering it, exploring it, and bringing it to permanence. And in this poem, Ashbery is far more the virtuoso of language than the older men are; his touch is infinitely lighter. To be sure, he does not explore his idiom as systematically as they do, but what he lacks in system he gains in his astounding swiftness of modulation and his unfailing sensitivity to the odd, unexpected language and rhythms that best fit the constantly changing webs of feeling that the poem brings to order. And this same lightness allows him to bring an astonishingly large and totally disparate array of images into simultaneous focus. There is nothing else in English like it—Allen Ginsberg's comparison of Ashbery to Pope will hardly suit so romantic a sensibility. "The Skaters" and the rest of Rivers and Mountains put John Ashbery among the finest poets now writing.

FOR WRITERS!
Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to
PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

Buy Your Books
through The Nation
Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to The Nation.
THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

THEATRE / Harold Clurman

A sort of home-team spirit has developed among us in regard to the APA-Phoenix Theatre. The APA (The Association of Producing Artists) has maintained its permanent company under Ellis Rabb since 1960, the greater part of its career having wisely been spent outside New York. It was adopted here by the Phoenix Theatre which since 1953 has struggled to establish a popular price organization committed to the presentation of worth-while, chiefly standard, "classic" plays. The joint venture endeared itself to the public with its productions of Man and Superman, War and Peace and most emphatically with You Can't Take It With You.

Now the APA returns to the Lyceum Theatre with two items from its "old" repertory: The School for Scandal and Pirandello's Right You Are. The town—particularly the daily press—has acclaimed them. In part this may be construed as an oblique rebuff to the upstart and more pretentious Repertory Theater of Lincoln Center whose productions at the Vivian Beaumont have thus far failed to please. A more legitimate reason for the APA's advancement is that its essentially modest performances are pleasantly within the scope of its company's capacities, as well as within the audience's comprehension. (Shaw, for example, is by now more acceptable than Brecht; a schematized Tolstoy and an ever-agreeable Kaufman are easier to take than Büchner or Sartre.) So if New York is to have a repertory company—one that has worked faithfully while enduring neglect, one moreover that has risen from obscurity—the APA must be the public's and the press's choice. What else, after all, is there?

The School for Scandal is a perennial delight. Its theme—the pleasures, absurdities and bloodshed of gossip in polite society—is ever fresh. Its writing sparkles with canny good humor, its spirit is wise, its construction solid.

The APA production begins dully; it grows livelier as it proceeds, but there is a lack of real zest, of effervescence, throughout the first half. The settings are on the drab side, the costumes generally unbecoming. Very little of the acting is bad but the only bit of ingratiatingly sustained playing is done by Keene Curtis as Sir Oliver Surface. We hear all the text except when Dee Victor, in an effort to keep up the required rapidity of delivery, becomes indistinct. There are cute though slightly hokey pieces of stage business in Ellis Rabb's direction and acting.

At the outset, Rosemary Harris as Lady Teazle forces her characterization too much. (This may have been due to opening-night tension.) In the later scenes her natural charm and soothing sense of fun make amends for our initial discontent. Helen Hayes gives us Mrs. Candour, the bitch of the bevy, rather more like a provincial American housewife than a lady of 18th-century London high society—a society which was literally "select" because it constituted a very confined circle immersed in a sea of filth.

Despite my reservations I was pleased to see Sheridan's play once more. It shines on Broadway today like a good deed in a wicked world.

The audience's taste for the APA's program is best illustrated by Right You Are. Written in 1917, the play was first produced with Edward G. Robinson in New York by the Theatre Guild some time in the twenties. It was thought to be esoteric, and for that reason was presented at first at special matinees only.

The audience today consumes it like candy. The production is thoroughly lucid: each point is neatly made, each movement, gesture, characterization in Stephen Porter's direction well defined. The setting by James Tilton is pleasantly trim and the acting altogether without ambiguity. This is Pirandello without pain.

Right You Are (or literally translated from the Italian It Is So, If You Think So) is a comedy, but a Pirandello comedy. It plays an intellectual game with a story wrought from anguish. Its philosophic purport is that we cannot know one another, we cannot arrive at the truth in any matter involving the individual mind. We hardly know the truth even about ourselves. Every person sees us in a different light and we remain unknown to ourselves not only because we are in a state of constant change but because we assume different masks for social convenience.

This thought is no longer vitally impressive, but Pirandello was the first to dramatize it—most brilliantly in Six Characters in Search of an Author. He was the first in the theatre to split the atom of the human personality so that in a sense character, a coherent whole with its own inner logic, dissolves.

Pirandello wrote play after play on this theme, most of them intriguingly ingenious, a few of them so strained that they verge on tedium. What holds one's interest most of the time is the melodramatic and necessarily unresolved mystery that Pirandello unfolds. From this dramatic pattern and its concomitant psychologic conundrum he wrings a kind of bitter mirth. The Pirandello "trick" might not engage us if it were not for the subjective suffering from which the pattern emerges. This combination of elements makes Pirandello the pioneer in modern drama of the "tragic farce," the precursor of theatre of the absurd.

No production which fails to retain this duality in Pirandello's work can be said fully to represent him. The APA eliminates the play's hysteria and thus reduces it to the grasp of a simple-minded audience. It is flattered by its easy absorption of a "metaphysical" play which has now become a sort of witty suspense show.

In this vein, the production is entirely satisfying. Helen Hayes follows the director's line loyally and expertly; Sydney Walker is more convincing here than in any of his previous roles. But neither stirs in us anything beyond a respectful assent. There are no surprises: Donald Moffat is crisp, Patricia Conolly is sharp, Anita Dangler in a bit part is funny. A sense of cordial give and take ("ensemble") prevails.

Cabaret at the Broadhurst is a show stunning in its ugliness. Based on John van Druten's I Am A Camera, itself the dramatization of one of Christopher Isherwood's Berlin Stories, it is intended to provide a musical comedy impression of the atmosphere of that town shortly before Hitler's advent.

It was a decadent period and Cabaret purposes that we enjoy the spectacle of that decadence. This is not a misconceived plan, for no matter what we may think of it now, Berlin of the late twenties and early thirties was glamorous. What decayed was an active, complex, sophisticated, cultivated and feverish society. Decay has an aura and where its ingredients are as humanly rich as they were in Berlin the aura glows in hectic hues of an infernal allure. The period produced Erwin Piscator, Ernst Toller, Bertolt Brecht, Georg Grosz, Hanns Eisler,

Kenneth Patchen
HALLELUJAH ANYWAY
A Book of Picture-Poems
Only Kenneth Patchen could have dreamed and done these extraordinary visions in word and image.
Gift Edition, $7.50
NEW DIRECTIONS
333 Sixth Ave., N. Y. 10014

Kurt Weill, Ernst Lubitsch, Emil Jannings, Marlene Dietrich and a host of other artists, actors and entertainers whose various poisons gleamed in the night, smacking of heady and honied wickedness.

The authors of Cabaret—book by Joe Masteroff, music by John Kander, lyrics by Fred Ebb—had a mine of material to steal from. (The creative artist is always a prime plagiarist.) But Cabaret does not afford even a parody of the period. Its tone approximates that of Sweet Charity, which has made something of a real style of Broadway jingle-jangle. In Cabaret very little is successful beyond the box office. Its decadence is the thinnest sort: that of our night clubs.

Sally Bowles and her lover (now an upright, normal American) become in Cabaret subsidiary in interest to the honest landlady (an incipient Nazi in van Druten's play) and a gentle Jewish storekeeper. The lyrics, except possibly for the first one, Welcome (in a medley of languages), are flat, the score gratifies the ear momentarily only when it quotes from old German tunes, the choreography is ineffective except in its occasional grotesquerie, abetted by Joe Grey as the M.C. "Les girls" have been chosen with an eye to their thighs rather than to any other portion of their person.

The fabled Lotte Lenya, our heiress of the period, would still be good if she had occasion to display her own tart contemptuousness, but as the benevolent landlady she must act "nice" and though she never loses her directness this quality alone is not sufficiently fascinating. Jack Gilford, always engaging because of his innocence, has a role without much humor, and humor is the greater part of his gift. Bert Convy sings acceptably. Jill Haworth plays Sally Bowles. In the original, Sally was a pathetic and shockingly spoiled waif in deliberate flight from the stuffiness of English respectability. Miss Haworth is brassy. But in shiny black décolleté her back is beautiful: credit where credit is due.

The triumph of the evening is Boris Aronson's scenery, greatly enhanced by Jean Rosenthal's lighting. He seems to have done the work that should have been done by the whole production staff: writers, director, choreographer, cast. His central setting, the cabaret, is a hot spot, burning in low flame within walls of intimate and insidiously suggestive red, surrounded by the sickly window lights of a depressed town. The boarding house and particularly the friendly Jew's fruit shop breathe a cozy air; they are a little tired looking, quaintly tender with a love of homely beauty which barely recognizes its modest appeal. Boris Aronson's work is never mere ornament; his designs are in themselves a text.

UPON SEEING A FRIEZE OF GREEK MARBLES

They ride their hard bodies through the stone,
Their eyes scooped out, and mouths heavy
With a shattered stillness. An ocean of bitter
Sunlight has been hungry for them. The brown
Marble whose life they are, has fought them
Like a need to kill these riders trapped
Inside it, with their cold survivals that Trail over the earth.
Men ride into the stone
Who have outlived their gods; and this life
That flows through me like a hungry gift
Follows them in the dream, in search
Of that image that will gather it in,
As a woman takes the closed body of her man,
And makes it sing.

PAUL ZWEIG

Still the fact remains that Cabaret invites us to enjoy what it presumably aims to mock and denounce. This makes for a show which, to use the title of one of its numbers, is (in the Yiddish for the thoroughly unattractive) a Meeskite. All that remains to be said is that judging by the applause and the full houses at $12 for an orchestra seat, the audience is enraptured.

Here is a paradox: I couldn't for a moment "believe" in Cabaret, which deals with supposedly serious matters, but I "believed" the nonsense of Woody Allen's Don't Drink the Water at the Morosco. The latter is an anecdote about a caterer and his family from Newark on a visit to a small Communist country. It takes place in an American embassy considerably less "real" than a military musical. How then can I speak of "believing" in such light-headed stuff?

There are funny lines and situations which spring from the reality of odd-ball, carefree, boozy conviviality. Let us tell jokes, helter-skelter. If one of them flops—and a number of them do—we tell another to compensate for the brief lull. Thus: "Years of insanity," shouts the exasperated caterer at the play's frazzled juvenile, "have driven you crazy."

Lou Jacobi speaks such lines as if his life depended on them. For him they contain the most profound truth. He is convinced that their genial foolishness will make life worth living! Thus he wins us. Beside him stands his dryly tolerant but never conceding spouse, played with impassive, nasal tenacity by Kay Medford. The always inept and therefore thoroughly likable ambassador's son, disastrously devoted to diplomatic maneuvers, is engagingly played by Anthony Roberts. If you are prepared to spend a goofy evening at the theatre, Don't Drink the Water will serve. It made me laugh on the right side of my face.

ARCHITECTURE / ERVIN GALANTAY

Mr. Galantay is an associate professor in architecture at Columbia University and practices as a consultant in urban design.

There are few spaces of urban character—as distinct from parks—in this country where one can sit in the sun unassailed by the stench and noise of automobiles. New York's Rockefeller Plaza comes to mind and it is often cited as a phenomenon, possible only in a city with millions of people.

But sitting on the Plaza of Lake Anne Village in tiny Reston, Va., can be equally satisfying. The visual setting is rich and varied. A curved wall of town houses and shops hugs a space focused on an amusing walk-in fountain. One end of the space opens to a calm body of water confined by steps, quays, boat landings, and the eye glides along more row houses to come to rest on a 15-story tower. The tower complements the widening of the lake, which itself sports a 50-foot water jet that recalls Geneva and other cherished memories. Lake Anne is one of seven villages planned for Reston, the New Town of developer R. E. Simon, that lies 18 miles west of Washington, and close to the monumentally dead Dulles Airport.

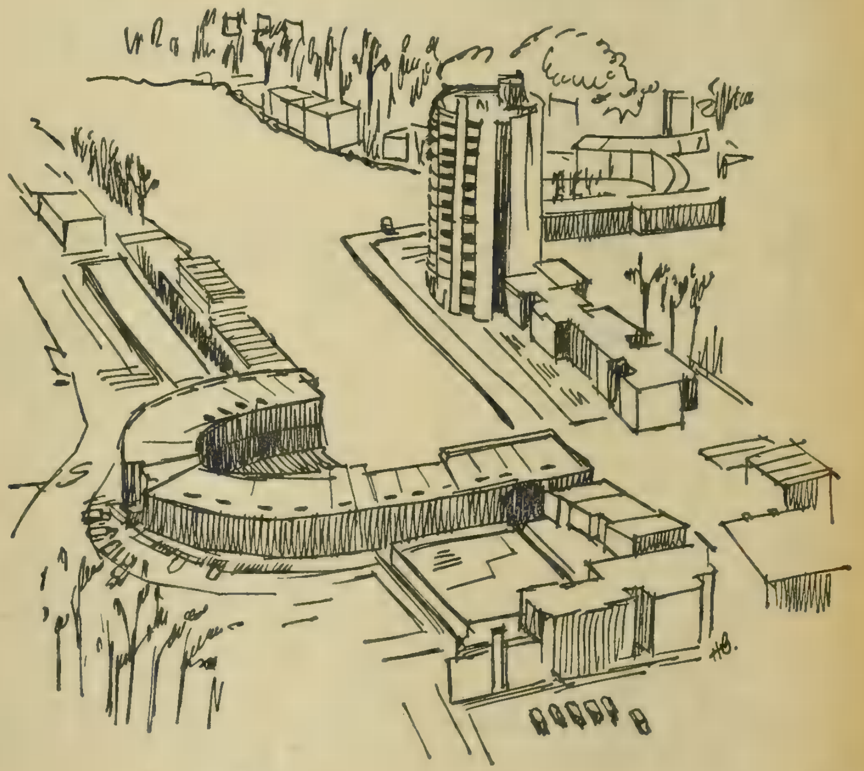
It is axiomatic that an urban space is successful if its shape and scale elements encourage the casual convergence of people and stimulate spontaneous interaction. Such a space provides a "theatre" in which people are both spectators of activities and are seen as actors by others. This reversible actor-audience relationship is one of the secrets of "urbanity" and fulfills a basic psychological need often ignored in discussion between the champions of the efficient city and the formalists. The dearth of such urban spaces is one of the shortcomings of the bedroom-suburbs, one reason for their dullness.

Last summer I was sitting on Lake Anne Plaza, enjoying my drink and taking stock of the visual elements that provide a complete pattern book for urban designers. The space was well used. Handsome young people passed, entered shops or pulled boats along the basin. Chairs under umbrellas were filled with tourists, including Washington bureaucrats entertaining minor foreign statesmen. It seemed incredible that all this activity could occur in the center of a village with an actual population of little more then 1,000 people. Seeing my notes, a jovial man came up and introduced himself as a builder who was putting up a "regular kind" of subdivision not far from Reston. He wanted to know whether I intended to buy a home in the area. In return I asked him what he thought of Reston. He confided that he comes mainly to check on Simon's sales. The architecture made him uncomfortable. "Disneyland," he said, "Simon's folly." I countered that children would be happier in Disneyland than in Levittown. He remained unimpressed. "You can't build more then one such place around here. Simon has captured the entire screwball market," and there can be no demand for another such town since most people want the familiar split levels, ranches, colonials. People who want Europe can take a trip. I wondered whether it had ever occurred to him that people "want" the usual suburb because they have been shown little else. Thus the pioneer deed of Reston may be to expose visitors to a mode of living where buildings are closely clustered to leave generous expanses for recreation, instead of the monotonous spread of identical lots.

Apparently many people think of the New Towns as a newfangled and imported fad like miniskirts and Beatles. Yet the idea has a venerable lineage: New Town policies were practiced in imperial Rome and imperial China, in medieval Europe, as well as in the Americas, until the frontier was settled. In fact, interest in New Towns shows a cyclic pattern and we seem to be approaching the zenith once more, after a slow rise since Ebenezer Howard's "Garden City" proposals of 1902. Although the United States leads in the world phenomenon of suburbanization it lags in the development of wholly planned New Towns, being outdistanced not only by Great Britain, Sweden and France but also by the Eastern bloc countries. The USSR alone has built more than 800 New Towns, four of which have already grown to populations beyond half a million. Unlike their European counterparts the American New Towns are built by private enterprise. There are in the country at present fifty to seventy-five totally planned communities in some stage of design or construction, but few of them would qualify as New Towns as the term is currently understood. Ideally, New Towns are balanced communities that provide jobs for the job holders who will live in them, although some commuting in and out of town is acceptable. Among U.S. developers 6,000 acres seem to mark the limit between a large subdivision and a New Town, and this corresponds to a population of between 60,000 and 100,000 people. The optimal size of such communities is constantly re-evaluated, generally upward. In 1902 Howard considered 32,000 inhabitants the ceiling, but today this is thought far too small a group to support basic facilities like a college or hospital. No less then 100,000 people may be needed to sustain a culturally self-contained New Town, although some planners still favor smaller communities. Constantinos Doxiades, the most influential Greek urbanist since Hippodamus of Miletus, prefers 50,000 people and argues for a complex of only 1,000 acres, the center of which can be reached on foot from any point within ten minutes—as in most historic towns. By comparison, the largest American New Town, Irvine Ranch in California, will spread over 93,000 acres.

In the United States the most rewarding area for the study of New Towns is the Washington-Baltimore conurbation, where at least four can be found in advanced stages of planning or development. The area is one of the fastest growing in the nation, but credit must also be given to Washington's "Year 2000" plan, which proposed an orderly pattern for the growth of the capital along radial corridors separated by green "wedges" and actually pinpointed the desirable locations for New Towns. Among these, Reston enjoys the publicity advantages of a head start, but already its architects, Whittlesey, Conklin and Rossant, are working on plans for a second venture near Germantown. On the same "corridor" as Germantown, the Baltimore firm of Rogers, Taliaferro, Kostritski & Lamb is building Montgomery Village, named thus modestly because it will accommodate only some 35,000 people. The most interesting social experiments are being pursued in the creation of the New Town of Columbia, halfway between Washington and Baltimore, and planned by the Community Research, Inc., of William Rouse.

In my next article I shall use Columbia as a basis for examining some problems in the social planning of New Towns. The example of Reston lends itself better to a



SALT

"If the salt hath lost its savour wherewith shall it be salted?"
—Matt. v. 15

The ocean is salt and the waters of the womb. Sweat is salt, and tears. Pure salt was poured in sacrificial slaughters by high priests of Israel. Salt was the cure for and against corruption of spirit and flesh, salt sprinkled at baptism and burial to make sure that Satan would be reticent. Scots kept their mash from the taint of witches by seasoning the malt.

In Athens, Attic salt gave sage discourse its dash.

My love: Ours was not "a covenant of salt," therefore I rub salt in our common wound to scourge us for our kindred sins and kindred fault.
You rowed me up Salt River; but I'm on dry ground.

ISABELLA GARDNER

---

discussion of land planning and design approaches. With respect to the "Year 2000" plan, Reston is slightly off one of the corridors proposed for intense development and is located in a green-wedge area. Here R. E. Simon assembled 7,180 acres of beautiful wooded land for $1,900 an acre (considered rather high by other developers). Of this land, 1,600 acres have been set aside for parks and recreational use; the remaining area will accommodate 75,000 people at the relatively low density of fourteen per acre. The novel concept of Reston is to provide recreation within the town area. The home owner or apartment dweller will, so to speak, live in his own country club. This eliminates 20 per cent of vehicle trips, and the provision of employment within the town area will reduce essential movement still further. Each of Reston's seven villages will have a distinct character, developed from a hobby or a topographical feature. The first village has its lake; new centers are planned around a golf course, a riding stable, a natural amphitheatre, a hill and a valley. Such organization will give identity to each village but the juxtaposition of villages needs an additional unifying concept. Therefore, high-density housing will not be concentrated in one area, but will form "sinews," continuous linear patterns connecting the nodal villages. These sinews will provide an overall structure for the town, and offer visual guidance. One major discontinuity will remain, since the Dulles Airport access highway cuts Reston in half; it will be difficult to tie the segments together.

A variation of the "sinew" concept is proposed by the same architects for Germantown, where high-density housing will form a ring around central open spaces that contain a community campus and research complex for education and employment. According to Conklin, Reston will provide housing for all income levels, but thus far the population is fairly homogeneous, since houses are priced between $22,700 and $47,500. This deprives the town of some of the dynamism provided by the tension and contrast of a greater income spread. Simon now awaits FHA approval to lower mortgage rates and broaden his market. Meanwhile, tourist traffic contributes to the liveliness of the center and helps to support the shops and such extras as the art gallery.

Reston's land planning offers so many excellent ideas that one wishes the developer and town full success, and is reluctant to criticize any part of it. Yet I find some aspects of the design disappointing. The architecture has been praised as boldly adventurous; to my regret, I find it timid, quaint and eclectic. Lake Anne Center is certainly an enjoyable space, but from its scale and crowding of detail it appears miniaturized. My builder acquaintance was unfair when he called it "Disneyland," but even to me its scale recalls the Belgian Village of Robert Moses' World Fair. This toy quality is what makes it irresistible to children. The buildings around the center, by Whittlesey & Conklin, are the best in Reston. They are coherent both in design and in the use of material, a specially baked buff brick. A critic praised this group as having captured a "truly Georgian" spirit. That is perhaps an achievement, but nothing that is "truly" Georgian can also be "truly" contemporary. Lake Anne Center is a reformulation in modern guise of favorite patterns of the past, an eclecticism that is even more evident in the various housing clusters built by other architects. Chloethiel Smith's colorful town houses along the lake are pure "Portofino." Lou Sauer's cluster at the golf course is faintly Scandinavian. The more austere group by Charles Goodman is a sort of neo-Corbusian. And there is no aesthetic control over individually designed homes. No one should object to visual variety, but at Reston there is no affinity between the various clusters; it lacks the kinship that in historical towns ties together buildings of different vintage.

Far from being adventurous, the grouping of houses is timid. The cluster principle is old hat and there is here nothing to compare with the convincing novelty of the best recent foreign housing schemes—the Swiss terrace housing with cooperative units overlapping one another, the tightly packed patio houses of Halen, or the — admittedly expensive — experimental houses being built for the "Expo" in Montreal. On the defensive, Conklin said that "the range of freedom of planners and designers, although real, is more limited by the nature of society than is usually admitted." Does this mean that our society yearns for eclectic urban design? Does it mean that Reston offers the most adventurous housing that the American market will tolerate? I hope that the subdivision entrepreneurs can be proved wrong and that in subsequent New Towns the range of architectural freedom will extend to housing that projects the future to complement housing that conjures up the past.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

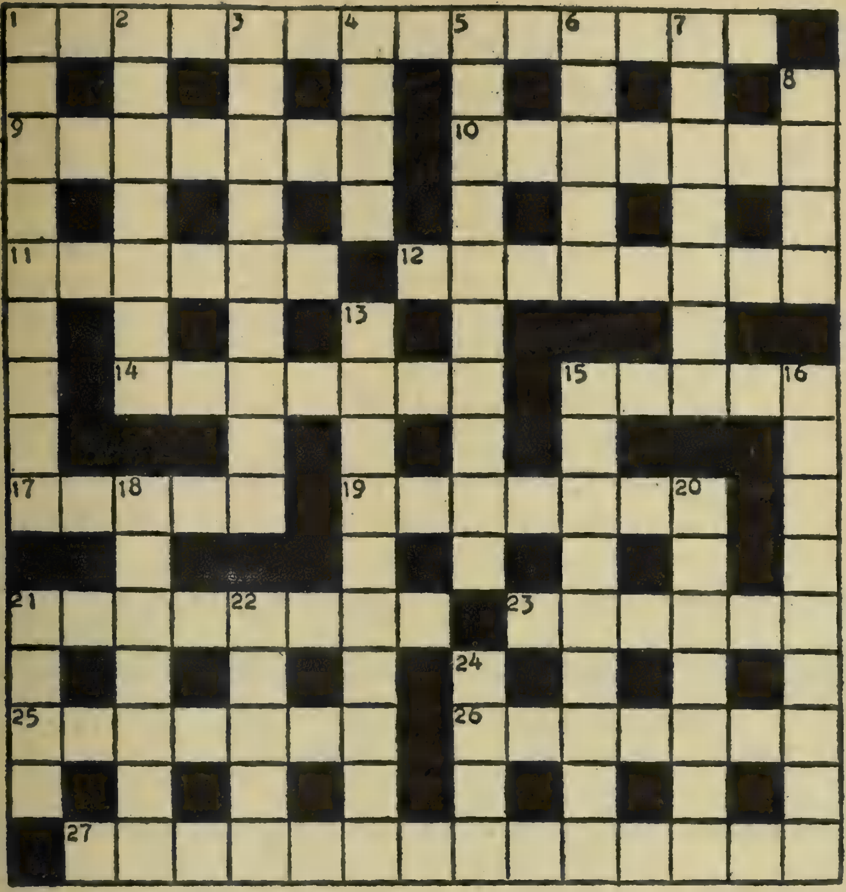
THE NATION 12-12-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage $1 a year extra)

NAME ______
ADDRESS ______
CITY ______
STATE ______ ZIP NO. ______

Crossword Puzzle No. 1179

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Its members might be qualified in case the implication is to forbid contact. (3, 11)

9 and 24 It's unusual for them to be held up in traffic, but they might be difficult to get in to. (7, 4)

10 Operated in the gear shift according to plan. (7)

11 Relatively unblooded? (2-4)

12 Helps do a flower arrangement? (8)

14 Does it depend on Sandy's belt, at times? (7)

15 How Blake came down the valley? (Some notables are on board.) (5)

17 Brinks makes gradual progress. (5)

19 Isolated poetically from a linseed distillation. (7)

21 Worried weather-watchers might, but it could prove a spectacle. (8)

23 Not common in a first-class car, certainly! (6)

25 Well-browned sailor on a blast? (7)

27 Some women pick up their good habits from them. (5-9)

DOWN:

1 Scram before the change is due? (One might find it a blessing.) (9)

2 and 21 down Gangfights with refreshments? One might not have been expected to really stand out in them! (6, 5)

3 Grain superintendent, or his subordinate? (5, 4)

4 and 26 It's the little things that show both chances for success and ultimate goals! (4, 3, 4)

5 A bit insane — confused, at least — obviously not all there! (2, 8)

6 Likely to be an out-of-date brand. (5)

7 Dew, upon settling, it might be admitted. (5, 2)

8 Not phoney money to some oldtimers. (4)

13 Pulls up after getting the sign to go, as golfers might be headed? (10)

15 The animal with fuzz? You might know one as a shepherd. (6, 3)

16 Gives out and passes around Sir Patrick of ballad fame. (9)

18 Millet associated, or might one pick up a little wheat stock? (7)

20 Political leader just about tried to be elected, but got a jail term! (7)

22 Gets ready before the fire, and puts a lot of things on. (5)

24 See 9 across

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1178

ACROSS: 1 Paris green; 6 Calf; 10 Lapdogs; 11 Trotski; 12 Ugly; 13 Black Arrow; 15 Seethed; 16 Susanna; 17 Tunisia; 20 Prussia; 22 Rhetorical; 23 Enid; 25 Trifles; 26 Fulsome; 27 Digs; 28 and 14 Not long for this world. DOWN: 1 Polyunsaturated; 2 Repulse; 3 Show; 4 Resoled; 5 Entices; 7 Also-ran; 8 Fair wear and tear; 9 Potassium; 18 Needing; 19 Ariosto; 20 Playful; 21 Send off; 24 Plan.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

FREE! Booklist for admirers of the adolescent boy. Oliver Layton Press, Box 1504, Cooper Station, N.Y.C. 10003.

THE FIRST TIME I LIVE
by Will Slotnikoff
Discursive Introduction by Henry Miller
A romantic book about the writing of a book and the birth of a writer. Includes an exchange of letters with Henry Miller on the Creative Process in Action.
Paperback, $2.25 postpaid, 238 pp.
MANCHESTER LANE EDITIONS
1409 Nicholson St., N. W.
Washington 11, D.C.
Also available through Gotham Book Mart

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

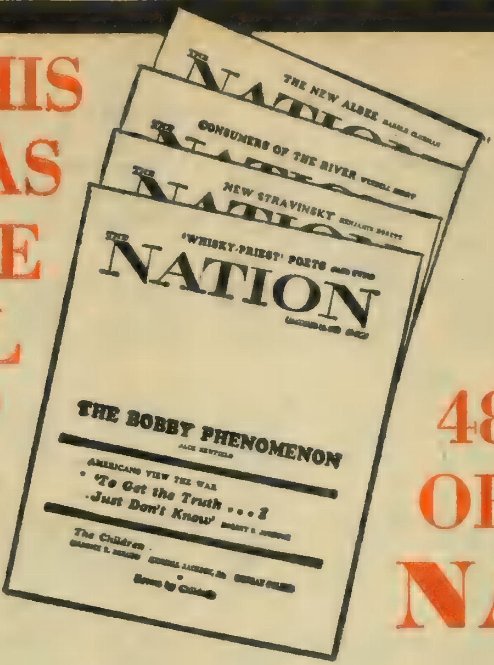
MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

RECENT anti-war films for rental. American, North & South Vietnamese. Write for rates: Free School, 20 East 14 Street, N.Y.C.

Advertising Rates
CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words)
Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)
The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THIS CHRISTMAS GIVE THE THOUGHTFUL GIFT



48 ISSUES OF THE NATION

PLUS FREE BONUS BOOK UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

Here is the perfect gift for a thinking friend. 48 issues of this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion, plus this decade's most controversial book.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material." Science Magazine said UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED "is likely to be the Silent Spring of traffic safety." For anyone who spends any time at all in a car, this controversial book is "must" reading. And it's a bonus absolutely free, when you enter a Christmas subscription to The Nation.

- "A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."

  Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

- "A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."

  Wall Street Journal

- "Deeply disturbing. . . . Exhaustive and persuasive. . . . He cites numerous weaknesses in certain Big Three models of recent years, naming names in each instance and quoting from court proceedings."

  John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER

THE NATION / 333 SIXTH AVENUE / NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a Gift for one year at the Christmas rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. I understand they will receive a BONUS of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

(For more than two Gift Subscriptions, please use a separate piece of paper.)

Your Own Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....

☐ I enclose payment of $ ....
☐ Bill me

Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

12-12-66

AFFLUENCE AFTER ANGER RAYMOND WILLIAMS

THE NATION

DECEMBER 19, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
DEC 20 1966
LIBRARY

FAO:
THE IMPERATIVE OF ALTRUISM

GUNNAR MYRDAL

Life Insurance

The Monolithic Sect JAMES GOLLIN

CHRISTMAS — Lists & Highlights

RANDOM HOUSE DICTIONARY MARIO PEI

•

THE NEW COOKBOOKS HELEN YGLESIAS

•

ART BOOKLIST / CONTRIBUTORS BOOKLIST

•

RECORDS: 1966

BENJAMIN BORETZ

EWSPAPER N
BURLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

what Bundy demanded

Chicago, Ill.

Dear Sirs: The pretense at scholarly objectivity is too often a cloak for unscholarly license. A case in point is Theodore Draper, a typical "anti-Communist" who was the leading apologist for the government's position on Cuba. Draper found himself on the side of the angels in the Dominican intervention, more I suspect because he felt there really was no Communist danger there than because he is against intervention per se. But in the process he tried to indicate that there were some "good guys" in the government (like McGeorge Bundy) who sought a "softer" solution. This would make the intervention a "mistake," rather than part of an inherently false policy.

In The Nation of May 2 I published an article which detailed an understanding between a Dominican Social Christian leader, Dr. Antonio Rosario, and Jose Figueres of Costa Rica, who acted as intermediary with the White House. The understanding provided that some Communists would be sent into voluntary exile, along with top rightist military leaders, and the United States would withdraw.

"But by the time McGeorge Bundy came to Santo Domingo to implement this understanding," I continued, "it had been twisted beyond recognition. Instead of voluntary exile for the Communists he demanded that they be incarcerated in concentration camps. And instead of removing the Trujillista officers simultaneously, he agreed only to sending out the two most hated of them, Wessin and Rivera Caminero."

Draper took sharp exception to this statement, particularly the remark on "concentration camps." Then, after rebuking me—he wrote letters to a number of people, including Rosario, to check the facts!

Here is how Draper summarized Rosario's reply in an attack on me in another publication: "On the main point at issue, Dr. Rosario admits that he cannot vouch for Mr. Bundy's alleged demand for concentration camps because he was not in Santo Domingo in this period and has no first-hand knowledge of what went on in the negotiations with Mr. Bundy."

I have a copy of Rosario's letter, and it says just the opposite of what Draper implies. After confirming as "completely correct," "also correct," etc., other points in my article, Rosario says that while he was not in the country at the time, he did hear "commentaries" confirming what "Mr. Lens, the writer, refers to in the fourth paragraph on page 521 of The Nation of May 2nd [the paragraph quoted above] . . . I should tell you that many serious Dominicans feel Mr. Bundy did make the demand which Mr. Lens attributes to him." (Italics added.)

In Santo Domingo last September I talked with two or three other well-informed men, including a former member of the reactionary Reid Cabral government, who similarly confirmed that Bundy had made this demand.

Sidney Lens

bread and butter

Boston, Mass.

Dear Sirs: I was very much interested in Francis Pollock's comments on the troubles I ran into while producing the South African Essay television programs for National Educational Television ["Junkets to Apartheid: America's Press on Safari," The Nation, Nov. 7]. His list of American journalists who accepted invitations to visit South Africa as guests of that country's Information Service (SAIS) helps me to fill in some of the

(Continued on page 686)

EDITORIALS

The Spirit of '67

President Johnson has moistened his finger and thrust it aloft. The wind blows toward the right. When Mr. Johnson was the candidate for the Presidency, he avowed his undying admiration for Franklin D. Roosevelt; the wind then blew leftwards. There is no reason to believe that Mr. Johnson was insincere at that time—his subsequent domestic legislative program attests to his sincerity. But first and foremost he is a politician, and this is 1967 coming up. Neither the 1966 election returns nor the current polls indicate an irresistible swell of voter enthusiasm for Mr. Johnson and his entourage, and there is always the Vietnamese War which, barring a near miracle, will not make the sledding easier as the new year becomes old.

Yet, though the war will continue to be a political liability for the Democrats, it also affords chances for political maneuver which Mr. Johnson simply cannot overlook. In the New York Daily News (December 3) Jerry Greene, the paper's astute military analyst, remarks on one such opening: "No agency in government affords anything like the opportunity for financial hanky-panky that the Defense Department has to offer." The hanky-panky is not only financial but it can be used to take the heat off Secretary McNamara, who stands in relation to President Johnson somewhat as John Foster Dulles stood in relation to President Eisenhower. One of the outstanding facts of political life in Washington is the unpopularity of Mr. McNamara in the halls of Congress. In a way, the dislike of many Congressmen is to Mr. McNamara's credit: he explicates amiably enough, and tries hard to be modest, but he has made many a legislator look like a fool. But this is incidental. A lot of Republicans and Southern Democrats resent Mr. McNamara's spending practices, which are those of an honest hawk and efficiency engineer, eager to get on with the war and reluctant to spend for the sake of some Congressman's prestige or popularity in his home district. The new military budget will make concessions to these offended members. At the same time it can be justified to the voters on the ground that we are at war and must not let the boys down. The arms budget can be almost anything that Mr. Johnson decides to ask for, and the tax hike that is almost certainly in prospect can be justified in the same way. This is a triple play: deflect the Congressional lightnings from stout McNamara, make the escalating military budget look reasonable, and increase taxes while making protests seem unpatriotic.

So the trend to the right is inevitable. But what of the liberal Democrats, what of the Great Society, what of Sargent Shriver and economic opportunity, what of Bayard Rustin and A. Philip Randolph beseeching for a $185 billion "freedom budget" to "eliminate" poverty over the next ten years? They won't get $18.5 billion on account in 1967, that is certain. Nor will the mayors appealing for aid to the cities be invited to the LBJ Ranch to publicize their needs. It is economy-minded Republicans like Everett Dirksen and Gerald R. Ford (economy-minded when it comes to welfare) who now enjoy the Presidential hospitality. The liberal Democrats can bite their nails at home.

There is danger for the President in this move toward the right, and no doubt he senses it. Once before, in 1960, the liberal, urban segment of the party ditched him in favor of John F. Kennedy; and now Robert Kennedy sits in the Senate and makes headlines. But the danger is in the future, and the difficulties resulting from the recent elections are now. Whatever recriminations and troubles may follow, the President's course for 1967 is clearly set.

The Dearborn Referendum

By the tacit agreement of almost everyone running for office last November 8, Vietnam was the unspoken issue of the campaign. In just one city—Dearborn, Mich.—the electorate was given a chance to say explicitly how it felt about that distant slaughter, still not dignified by the name of war. A referendum placed on the ballot there asked the voter: "Are you in favor of an immediate cease-fire and withdrawal of American troops from Vietnam, so the Vietnamese people can settle their problems among themselves?"

Of those voting, 78 per cent answered the question, 14,133 saying "yes" and 20,621 saying "no." In other words, 40 per cent of the voters in Dearborn who expressed a view oppose the killing in Vietnam—so much so that they support a proposed course of extreme unilateral action.

To some extent, the referendum reflected a class vote. In predominantly working-class precincts the "yes" vote varied from 40 to 51 per cent; in wealthy precincts it went from 30 to 40 per cent. The highest "no" vote, 70 per cent, was cast in a precinct where apartment house dwellers are in a majority. The residents there are for the most part engineers, teachers, librarians; many of them are not married. Looking at the referendum returns from the various areas in his city, Mayor Orville L. Hubbard said: "Where the cars are the shiniest and the homes the nicest and the children fewest, it gets the most 'no' votes. The burden of the war falls on the homes with the most children."

How did the referendum get on the ballot in Dearborn, a middle-class city with a reputation for conservatism and preoccupation with the problems of the automobile industry? It was Mayor Hubbard's idea. Hubbard, who has held his office for twenty-five years, is an ex-Marine and a man given to patriotic utterances on public occasions. He is also not a man of unparalleled saintliness: he runs a hard-boiled political machine, and the Michigan Civil Rights Commission has accused him of promoting racism. But Vietnam is more than he can swallow. He has been quoted as saying: "If I were a young man I would rather spend three years in prison than fight in Vietnam." Mayor Hubbard, it can be seen, does not lack political courage.

The Vietnam referendum received heavy coverage in the press of the area, and on election night Walter Kronkite gave it national publicity. It was indeed a newsworthy event. Can anyone recall another occasion when almost half of an American community advocated that American troops remove themselves without delay or guarantee from the field of a battle? This sentiment will rise as the gold stars proliferate across the country. President Johnson has already made the United States the loneliest country in the world; the day is perhaps not distant when he will perceive that he has become the loneliest man in America.

IN THIS ISSUE

December 19, 1966

EDITORIALS

658

ARTICLES

661 Singapore: One-Party Democracy Alex Josey

663 DRIVE: Teamsters in Politics Terry Eliot Tornek

666 FAO: The Imperative of Altruism Gunnar Myrdal

670 Life Insurance: The Monolithic Sect James Gollin

BOOKS & THE ARTS

675 Salame Is Salami Is Salamis Mario Pei

675 Under Cygnus (poem) Richard Wilbur

676 Affluence After Anger Raymond Williams

678 A Chicken in Every Wok Helen Yglesias

680 Big Books: 1966

681 Records: 1966 Benjamin Boretz

683 Art Max Kozloff

684 Books by NATION Contributors

687 Crossword Puzzle Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS
Managing Editor ROBERT HATCH
Literary Editor HELEN YGLESIAS
Poetry Editor MICHAEL GOLDMAN
Copy Editor MARION HESS
Advertising Manager MARY SIMON

Washington ROBERT G. SHERRILL
Paris ALEXANDER WERTH
Theatre HAROLD CLURMAN
Art MAX KOZLOFF
Music BENJAMIN BORETZ
Science CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well [illegible] their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 203 No. 21

The Draft Run-Around

It is quite a spectacle to see Secretary of Labor Wirtz and Secretary of Defense McNamara reacting to the draft with the impatience and lack of deliberation of placard-carrying collegians. Intelligent men in responsible positions do not participate in protest marches when they are frustrated by inaction; they make public speeches of high imagination and low practical content.

In the past few weeks, Mr. McNamara has spoken out for a lottery as the solution of Selective Service inequities, and Mr. Wirtz has publicly proposed an extension of the "alternate-service" idea to cover all young people. The fact that they are still testing ideas rather than executing them or framing new legislation gives one the uneasy feeling that the attack on the problems of the draft still has no focus. Unhappily, even modest solutions have eluded the normal processes of government for some time now.

¶ In the spring of 1963, Congress passed an extension of the Draft Act with almost no deliberation or debate.

¶ In September, 1963, President Kennedy revised draft priorities to cut down some uncertainties, but it was quickly evident that this was tinkering with the apparatus rather than reforming it.

¶ In the fall of 1963, a highly constructive set of hearings by Senator Clark's subcommittee on employment and manpower showed that military manpower policies should be part of a national manpower policy; nothing seemed to come of the suggestion.

¶ In January, 1964, a Kennedy-appointed task force recommended that the draft apparatus be used to identify rejects early enough for rehabilitation. After almost three years of desultory Executive action, Secretary McNamara finally announced this fall that the armed forces would try to rehabilitate 80,000 first-round rejects per year.

¶ In the spring of 1964, criticism of draft policies by a group of Congressmen caused President Johnson to commission a top-level Pentagon study of the feasibility of an all-volunteer armed forces. The study took a whole year to complete and was not made available to Congress for yet another year.

¶ Early in 1966, the pressure of the fighting in Vietnam once more brought the draft itself under fire. Congressmen who wanted action were referred to their own House Armed Services Committee, which did nothing for four months until the public outcry finally forced the committee to review the status of the draft. The hearings provided a public forum for new ideas, old gripes, countermeasures and reforms, but at the end of June it was announced that no legislative action would be forthcoming.

¶ Meanwhile, Secretary McNamara was stirring hope for some sort of Executive action with his support in May, 1966, of the idea of universal national service. The hope was dampened when President Johnson appointed a new commission to study the plan and report by January 1, 1967. The formation of the Marshall Commission also served neatly to undercut the House hearings, which promptly folded. But then in December the House Armed Services Committee announced that its own advisory panel was studying the subject, presumably for the purpose of giving Congress a position on the draft independent of Presidential recommendation.

¶ Of all the dissatisfaction brought out at last June's hearings, Selective Service Director Hershey seemed most concerned by the suggestion that young men were escaping the draft by staying on in graduate school. He thereupon ordered draft physicals for those over age 26—in apparent conflict with the Pentagon's preference for draftees under 20.

¶ Now, while the Marshall Commission is studying and Congress is waiting to hear from its panel, Secretaries Wirtz and McNamara are still floating trial balloons.

And so goes the perennial draft run-around. Why should the reform of Selective Service be so hard to manage? Probably because the people think Congress is responsible, while Congress thinks it has provided enough leeway for Executive action. The President thinks the Director of Selective Service is in charge, while the latter supposes that all he has to do is to keep the machinery ticking. Nowhere in this chain of responsibility is there any clear provision for a vigorous, imaginative and continuing oversight of Selective Service and a persuasive articulation of its purposes and forms to an increasingly restive public.

It is time for President Johnson to order a reorganization of the administration of Selective Service so that it will be more sensitive to changing times and public opinion, and so that responsibility for changes and reforms will be much more clearly delineated. Until that happens the draft run-around is likely to continue.

The Lost Agency

Whatever happened to the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission? It was set up under the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to administer Title VII, designed to ban discrimination in employment because of race, religion, sex or country of origin. The history of the commission so far offers little hope that these objectives will be achieved.

First, Congress permitted one year to elapse before Title VII could take effect. This was to give the Administration time to "gear up" for the job. The President did not appoint commissioners until May 10, 1965, less than two months before the provision was to take effect. On July 2, the commission opened its doors with only a partial staff and no clear definition of policy.

Last May 11, the commission chairman, Franklin D. Roosevelt, Jr., resigned to try his luck in New York State politics. Stephen N. Shulman was not named to replace him until mid-September. Obviously the commission was still running in low gear.

Richard A. Graham, appointed for one year, left on July 2 when his term expired. Then Mrs. Aileen C. Hernandez of San Francisco resigned. Mrs. Hernandez had given every promise of energetic action. She holds a B.S. in political science from Howard University and an M.A. in government from Los Angeles State College. She has been a teacher, research assistant and publicist for the West Coast Region of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union. As a commissioner, she was earning $26,000 a year, and her appointment was for five years. But she quit after serving only fifteen months.

Mrs. Hernandez departed because she was losing her self-respect. In a then confidential memorandum to her fellow commissioners in September, and in later communications, she asserted that the commission "has not been working as a coordinated team" and that it has not been as aggressive in certain areas as it might have been. The backlog now totals 81,500 cases, about one-third concerning sex bias. President Johnson never acknowledged Mrs. Hernandez's letter of resignation. The President's personnel adviser, John Macy, telephoned, saying that he wanted to discuss the matter further, and that was the last of it. The EEOC is now short two commissioners.

Job discrimination is of vital importance in the whole civil rights movement. Some unions and a considerable segment of management are reported to be eager to eliminate discrimination. Many managements, in the South especially, have real problems with their employees. They need guidance. They have not been getting it, although the commission is said to include some capable staff people, eager to get on with the job.

The basic trouble is in the Executive office. The commission has never as a group met with the President. That is only a ceremony, not a substitute for work, but it has symbolic importance and its neglect is also symbolic. Given adequate funds and capable, energetic people, the commission has great potential in the civil rights field. It deserves the support it has not been getting.

More Furor at Berkeley

Once again the University of California at Berkeley has been in an uproar, with perhaps as many as 5,000 of the 27,000 students staying away from classes (on December 1) and the local and campus police battling student (and nonstudent) demonstrators. The only one who is in a position to gain by the disorder is Governor-elect Ronald Reagan, who has a characteristically simple remedy.

"No one is compelled to attend the university," Reagan argues. "Those who do attend should accept and obey the prescribed rules or pack up and get out." Editorial opinion in general backs up this concept of an absolutist university administration. Chancellor Roger Heyns is commended for "firmness," as if a militant stand on the part of the administration were, in itself, any more a cure for a deep-seated malaise than militancy on the part of the disaffected members of the student body.

Amid all the clamor, the Daily Californian makes some sensible points. The administration should never have allowed the Navy to set up a recruiting table at the student union. This was a location where nonstudents are not allowed to set up informational tables, and an angry protest was sure to follow. The protest, however, could have taken a more sensible form. The objecting students should have set up an anti-military table nearby, and the next move would have been up to the administration. Instead, picketing of the Navy installation gave the administration an excuse for calling in the police.

Neither side proved itself capable of "acting in any situation where there is no immediate gratification of immediate confrontation." The Daily Californian applied this specifically to the campus radicals, but it is equally true of the administration which, one would expect, might show more moderation than its young opponents.

Underlying this particular fracas is the movement for more student participation in university government. At Michigan, students resolutely insist on a say in certain phases of administration. California and Michigan are the two liveliest campuses in the country today, and City College of New York is not far behind. Public attention should be focused not on the histrionics of these situations but on the serious issues behind all the sound and fury.

A Year of Peace

As in previous years, the War Resisters League now offers for sale a 1967 desk calendar which presents on pages facing the calendar pages a splendid collection of poetry dealing with peace and brotherhood. The cover drawing is by Ben Shahn, the preface is by Kenneth Patchen, the verse was compiled by Scott Bates. Copies at $1.50 each (five for $7) are sent postpaid in the United States from the League's office, 5 Beekman Street, New York, N.Y. 10038.

SINGAPORE

ONE-PARTY DEMOCRACY

ALEX JOSEY

Mr. Josey has been a free-lance correspondent in the Far East for the past eighteen years. He is the author of Socialism in Asia and Trade Unions in Malaya.

Singapore

It seems that the Republic of Singapore, Asia's new state, is going to have a single-party Parliament (the People's Action Party), with no opposition, at least until the next general election, sometime before the end of 1968. All the Barisan Sosialis Members of Parliament, the total elected opposition, have resigned (except for two who have gone underground: curiously enough they were given leaves of absence by the Speaker), and in a recent by-election involving three constituencies, three People's Action Party candidates were returned unopposed. Both the Singapore Alliance (a right-wing party which barely exists), and the Singapore United Malays National Organization made excuses for offering no candidates (UMNO is not yet legally registered anyhow); the small Party Rakyat (extreme Left) and the independents, collectively and individually, remained sensibly silent. This means that in a House of fifty-one, the PAP now occupies forty-four seats, with five seats vacant. The government can order by-elections to fill them whenever it feels inclined; there is no time limit.

The only other country I know of in this part of the world whose Parliament consists entirely of popularly elected members from a single party is the Kingdom of Cambodia. To keep his ministers on their toes, Prince Sihanouk, the Cambodian head of state and leader of the Cambodian People's Socialist Party, insists upon having a shadow cabinet named and ready to take office should the existing cabinet falter. This is not possible, even if desirable, in the Republic of Singapore, where President Yusof is above politics, and Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew considers his real challenge to come from the secret Malayan Communist Party which has an underground movement in Singapore.

The Prime Minister would prefer to have a tough, constructive opposition in Parliament, but the Barisan Sosialis (which the government says is a Communist front) has announced its intention, instead, to take the struggle to the people in the streets—thereby, remarked Lee, committing political suicide and inviting jail if its members become lawbreakers. Dr. Goh Keng Swee, Minister for Defense and Internal Security, promptly warned he would "wallop" them if they used violence. Since then, starting on the eve of President Johnson's visit to Kuala Lampur, more than thirty Barisan leaders have been put into prison without trial.

Does a one-party Parliament mean that democracy in the Republic of Singapore is finished? Not so long as there are provisions for elections at which voters may reject the PAP by supporting other candidates. Not unnaturally, the PAP government says that no other candidates are available at the moment because they all know they would be defeated by the PAP. The government claims that by and large, the people of Singapore are satisfied with the state of things. Critics may argue that the public is forced into acquiescence by the highly efficient propaganda machine which the present government operates, including radio, television, an abundant weekly supply of Ministry of Culture free public film shows, and magazines in four languages; and by the PAP government's expensive public service arrangements which include handouts to the poor and aged, well-run community centers (television, cooking classes and other facilities), the People's Association (all kinds of sports), the Work Brigade, the Leadership Institute, and so on. Lee Kuan Yew's brief answer would be that if the PAP government were inefficient or oppressive, the people would very quickly seize all opportunities, including by-elections, to chuck it out of office.

And I would say also that they are not very much interested in parliamentary democracy. They want good government. They want an outlet for protest, and they have it. Both the party organization and the government invite complaints and criticism, and when these are brought forward they are always most carefully considered. The Prime Minister has issued a standing instruction to all civil servants that letters to the press must be answered by a responsible official of the department under attack. Thus, the Commissioner for Inland Revenue, N.V. Casey (an Australian), is a fairly regular participant in the correspondence exchange of the national newspapers: income tax is as unpopular in Singapore as it is anywhere else.

Some observers contend that the PAP's integrity and efficiency, supported by a monopoly of all propaganda media, has been largely responsible for the single-party Parliament, but that the party did not seek this situation, and does not particularly like it. There are other factors. For one, there is not much room on this small island of 2 million people for more than a single good non-Communist party. Lee Kuan Yew's brand of socialism is so embracing that progressive employers find it as acceptable as do the trade unionists. Nowhere in the state are there serious injustices, areas of intense discontent, which demand remedy and which other parties or pressure groups might exploit. That is partly why the Barisan quit Parliament: its members found to their chagrin that cunning Lee Kuan Yew always appeared to have covered every aspect of every problem in advance of complaint, leaving them scant material for criticism. Besides, they realized that their parliamentary speeches would inevitably be cut drastically to "fit safely" into the radio's parliamentary report. Knowing the Communists well, having worked with them when the PAP was a united front against colonialism, and being in addition a brilliant debater, Lee has been able to dominate the House so completely that the Barisan saw his eminence as another reason for getting out. In brief, they were no match for him. By any standards, they were a poor opposition. Dr. Lee Siew Chou, the Barisan leader, lost his seat in the 1963 elections. He was known in Parliament for his marathon and very dull speeches.

While the PAP is not acutely worried about a single-party Parliament, its leaders have thought it well to explain their views on the matter. They have issued a statement saying that now that the Barisan has abandoned its constitutional role of opposition, "it becomes the responsibility of the government to act as its own critic. But the ultimate test of any system of government is whether it continues to give the people a better life and a secure future. There are far more serious problems ahead for Singapore to tackle than the antics of Barisan Sosialis street mobs. The police will look after that. It is to problems affecting our economic and political survival that the government, Parliament and people should now devote their serious attention."

In a talk to the Democratic Socialist Club at the University of Singapore, S. Rajaratnam, the Foreign Minister and party theoretician, said Singapore's problem "is not whether the people are free to elect a government of their own choice, but whether they can be relied upon to elect an effective opposition." He added that interested Independents had pleaded with the PAP not to contest certain constituencies. Save democracy, they cried, by letting others win a by-election or two. The Foreign Minister confessed he had never heard of this test of democracy before. In practice, he said, it meant that democracy in Singapore was the right of all political parties to contest elections except the PAP because they would win them all if they did. But what about the wishes of the voters? This new concept of democracy ignored them. What is democratic about compelling the voters to elect an opposition candidate when they would prefer someone from PAP?

Mr. Rajaratnam suggested that Parliament lacked an opposition because political parties in Singapore have never studied their potential strength in that role. In the past, every political party concentrated upon being a governing party. But in a democracy, a political party has a dual role: to be a potential government and also an opposition. "Until you start thinking deeply about that aspect of the problem, I say we are not going to have an opposition ever." Mr. Rajaratnam considered that the Barisan Sosialis was a natural opposition to the PAP, but went wrong by being exclusively destructive, as well as by espousing indefensible causes. Nobody was interested. "Consequently the Barisan have reduced themselves to a street gang."

In principle and practice, the Foreign Minister considered an effective parliamentary opposition necessary; he doubted that one would emerge in the next general election, but thought it might in the election after that. He gave an assurance that the PAP was not going itself to create an opposition by leaving constituencies uncontested. "We will fight every election and concede victory to an opposition which has got the mettle, got the guts, got the intelligence, to outwit us. Then they deserve to inherit from the PAP."

Backbenchers, meanwhile, are being called upon to ask questions and to go through the motions of moving reduction in votes to permit debates. This does not produce an interesting Parliament, and any government which has to rely upon academic criticism instead of the fierce challenge which makes ministers wince and do their homework is bound to get complacent, if nothing worse—even though in this case the specter of the Malayan Communist Party may hover outside the House.

But real problems can be self-agitating, and they exist without an opposition. Lee Kuan Yew does not give the impression that he considers an opposition in Parliament a current necessity, as long as the Republic of Singapore continues to be a developing state in a troubled area which includes Vietnam and China. What is provided in Singapore is sound government, opportunity for public protest, and facilities for the peaceful removal, should the people demand, of the government of the day. The Prime Minister is well aware of the dangers of success. His attitude is that single-party Parliament has happened, and the PAP can cope with that situation.

DRIVE: Teamsters in Politics

TERRY ELIOT TORNEK

Mr. Tornek, a senior in the Woodrow Wilson School for Public and International Affairs, Princeton University, worked last summer with the DRIVE program.

The Teamsters' union, more often feared than frightened, is worried—and with good reason. It is not Bobby Kennedy or the National Association of Manufacturers that scares the largest trade union in the world, but an anti-labor Congress. The Teamsters' answer is DRIVE — Democrat Republican Independent Voter Education.

Historically, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters made a point of avoiding politics wherever possible in the years of the New Deal and up into the 1950s. Teamster presidents Tobin and Beck had excellent relations with their counterparts in the White House, but the union rank and file was never organized politically. However, after the passage of Taft-Hartley (1947) and Landrum-Griffin (1959), Teamster leadership realized that it would have to make the presence of its vast membership felt in the political balance or risk losing benefits painfully won over the years.

Convinced that Congress has a consistently anti-labor bias, the Teamsters decided to fight punitive legislation through effective lobbying and highly visible political activity at the grass-roots level. These two operations are interdependent, for the desires of a single organization are expressed through lobbying, which in turn has its greatest impact when supported by votes.

Landrum-Griffin forbids the use of union funds in federal elections, an imposing financial handicap for DRIVE. In the last two years the Teamsters seem to have found the answer—"Operation Checkoff." Since union meetings are not generally well attended (save at contract time) DRIVE goes directly to the people on the job. The selling approach is simple and direct. The solicitors review the benefits the men derive from their union and then explain that Congress can sweep these benefits away at any time. This past summer Congressional efforts to quash the airline strike provided a particularly vivid illustration of the threat posed by an anti-labor Congress.

The next step is to explain the function of DRIVE. The men are told that as DRIVE members they will receive a copy of the DRIVE Reporter, a magazine designed to tell them who their friends really are in Congress, explain the effect that pending legislation may have on their jobs and families, and keep them apprised of what DRIVE people in Washington are doing to safeguard their interests. It is emphasized that no one will try to order them how to vote, that DRIVE is partisan only to labor, that it is not wedded to the Democratic Party and that in fact one of every three candidates it endorses is a Republican.

Regarding disbursement of the funds being solicited, the men are told that half the money will remain with their local DRIVE chapter to support pro-labor candidates of their choosing, conduct educational seminars, and finance motorcades to Washington. The other half goes to National DRIVE to pay for the magazine and other educational material and to support field workers.

The program is presented as a cheap form of insurance—protection against loss of desirable union benefits through political means. The DRIVE agents make clear that the program is purely voluntary, but it sells well. More than 90 per cent of the men who are approached join up.

Once the members sign the authorization slip, $5 is automatically deducted from their wages annually (hence "checkoff") unless they revoke the authorization. This fee entitles the Teamster to a family membership—a fact of great importance, since it is the Teamsters' wives who really make the program go. DRIVE was kicked off in 1961 through a series of thirty-two luncheons given around the country by Mrs. James Hoffa, and today DRIVE

Ladies' Auxiliaries (DLAs) outnumber DRIVE chapters by 140 to 128. Why this emphasis on women? Sidney Zagri, Teamster legislative counsel, lobbyist and DRIVE executive director explains: "150 determined women can elect or defeat any Congressman." DRIVE relies on the women to staff local political programs because the men may not be enthusiastic about canvassing or manning telephones after driving a truck for eight hours, while their wives have both the time and the inclination to participate in this type of activity. They feel that they are helping to safeguard their husbands' livelihoods and protect the welfare of their families. Also, DRIVE activities are designed to have social as well as political appeal: bake sales, potluck suppers, dances, etc. And there are the motorcades.

DRIVE motorcades have brought 15,000 Teamster wives from forty-two states to Washington, D.C. The women arrive via bus or airplane (making it a jetcade), are handed a fat fact book on pending legislation which may affect them and their families, are primed with questions and turned loose on their Senators and Representatives. The effect can be devastating.

Consider the plight of the hapless Congressman, who has voted "wrong" 90 per cent of the time, when he is confronted by ten or fifteen irate Teamster wives. They are all from his district, all registered voters, all familiar with his voting record and pending legislation, and all unhappy about his past performance. Later, when Zagri comes to see him about a particular piece of legislation and informs the shaken lawmaker that there are several thousand more DRIVE members, all registered voters, in his district, he may re-evaluate his position. At the least, he will be more attentive to Zagri's presentation.

Vice President Humphrey has said the motorcades were the greatest lobbying job he had ever seen, and at the Teamsters' convention in Miami last summer films showed nine Senators congratulating the ladies on a job well done. Such testimonials indicate the importance of the motorcades as a lobbying device, but their impact on the female participants is even greater than on the Congressmen visited. When the Teamsters' wives return from Washington, they are filled with enthusiasm for DRIVE and are living advertisements for the program. They have been to the capital and actually talked to their Congressmen and Senators on equal terms. This gives them stature in the eyes of their home-bound girl friends, who want to know how they too can get to D.C.— thus recruiting new volunteers.

Yet the junkets are not an unqualified success. Motorcade participants may be enthusiastic about DRIVE when they first get home, but the enthusiasm wanes quickly. This happens to a large extent because a program designed to hold their interest has not been sufficiently developed, and it raises the broader issue of DRIVE's overall problems.

Despite Zagri's emphasis on coordinating grass-roots field activity and Washington lobbying, the fundamental difficulty confronting DRIVE is the split between national and local forces. With the notable exception of the motorcade program, where national and local interests mesh beautifully, there is too little coordination between Washington and the field. For example, the local people may endorse a challenger for a Senate seat when Zagri has established excellent relations with the incumbent, or they may ignore his request for a letter-writing campaign or a new educational program.

Part of the difficulty arises from the very newness of DRIVE. Though started in 1961, it has begun to pick up steam (through checkoff) only in the last year or two, and is still clearly in its formative stages. One reason for this limited development is lack of funds. The checkoff is well received, but it does not produce a huge bank roll, and the millions of dollars sitting in the Teamsters' treasury are of no value to DRIVE, thanks to Landrum-Griffin. The program must operate with a skeleton crew. Zagri yearns for an education director, a membership director, a motorcade coordinator—people to whom he could delegate responsibility while himself retaining overall control.

The result has been a crash program for new members and more money. But absolute numbers and the dollars they represent are not an accurate measure of DRIVE's success. There must also be thorough follow through in the form of steward and DLA seminars, more motorcades, voter-registration drives—programs that will hold the interest of new members. In the long run, the tactic of "five bucks and good-by" may alienate more people than the money is worth.

Underlying these financial restrictions, however, is a far more difficult problem. It is suspicion, and it operates on three levels.

Teamster leadership is composed primarily of tough men who have struggled to get to the top. They are proud of their achievement and wary lest someone usurp any of their power. These men may enjoy being courted by a local politician, but they think politics a dirty business and would like to have as little as possible to do with it. However, Hoffa has committed the Teamsters to an active political stance, with their consent. They realize that some sort of political program is essential to the continued good health of the union, and are willing to cooperate, often grudgingly, with DRIVE. At the same time, they do not like the idea of a non-rank-and-file type, like Zagri, building a strong organization "of his own" and "getting in good" with Hoffa. Some of them feel that DRIVE meddles too much in their private kingdoms and will not issue it an entrance visa at all. In other locals, DRIVE programs are in reality completely controlled by the leadership on the spot and Zagri's directives from Washington are ignored. Local autonomy, a basic tenet of Teamster philosophy, is a great obstacle to a cohesive, centrally directed, political program.

Suspicion operates in much the same way down at the business-agent level. Since agents are only a step above the rank and file and may face a real struggle for re-election every three years, they are far more sensitive to an outside challenge than are the relatively well-entrenched higher-ups. Many are suspicious of anyone talking to their boys about anything. Some will not permit even the formation of a DLA, lest a wife become so political-minded that she try to elect her husband business agent.

The attitude of the agent is of paramount importance, for without his cooperation the program has almost no chance of success. If he refuses to go around with the DRIVE director or crash-program team, or undercuts them by grimacing, yawning or dozing during the spiel, few memberships will be sold at that particular truck dock or barn. The men look to their business agents for leadership and direction, for they are even more unfriendly to outsiders than he is. And it is at this third level, the rank and file, that suspicion is most debilitating.

The average Teamster is not well educated. He is also not often registered to vote. He hates politics and politicians even more than his officers do, and the thought of giving his money to a politician outrages him. Selling the rank and file is DRIVE's toughest job, yet where it has been permitted to try, and afforded even a minimal amount of cooperation, it has done remarkably well.

To achieve any real success, DRIVE must motivate a poorly educated, generally apathetic blue-collar worker to register, read enough material to discover who labor's friends are, and vote accordingly. This is no mean task. The DRIVE Reporter is thumbed through quickly. Men who do not attend union meetings are even less likely to show up at something as abstruse as a DRIVE meeting where a politician is to speak. And, since politicians are all crooks anyway, what's the difference who gets elected?

The truck driver must be made aware of a direct threat from the political quarter before he will appreciate DRIVE's purpose. The secretary-treasurer of an Ohio local tells of how 1,000 Teamsters in a car-hauling local ignored the program until a "pro-railroad" legislature put all but 250 of them out of work. Now they discuss politics in depth at their regular union meetings. According to this union official: "Some people have to be knocked down and stomped on before they wake up—but when they do, watch out!"

DRIVE is attempting to arouse the rank and file before they get stomped on, but in view of the obstacles it is remarkable that it has enjoyed any success at all. Still, there are hopeful signs:

¶ In Cleveland, DRIVE was the only organization a long-term Congressman had behind him in a primary race that he finally won by a razor-thin margin of 244 votes.

¶ In Cedar Rapids, DRIVE was responsible for the reelection of the only large county Republican state Senator to survive the 1964 Goldwater debacle.

¶ In Michigan, DRIVE elected a Teamster wife to the State Assembly.

Such scattered examples do not prove that DRIVE has successfully mobilized 1,780,000 Teamsters. They do show that its potential is great.

This is by no means the first time that labor has tried to assert itself politically. The AFL-CIO's Committee on Political Education (COPE) is older, more widely known, and has enjoyed a significant measure of success. DRIVE is different from the larger organization in several important ways. It does not have to contend with inter-union frictions. Unlike COPE, it is truly bipartisan. Most important of all, DRIVE is actively attempting to reach down to the grass roots, whereas the COPE approach is characterized by some DRIVE personnel as a "paper program."

Nearly 2 million Teamster votes, when combined with the votes of wives, relatives and friends, is quite a formidable array of political firepower. If given the cooperation it needs from the Teamster hierarchy, and directed by men who understand the local union scene, DRIVE can succeed. Says the director of Minnesota DRIVE: "You come back in three years. Eighty per cent of the men will know what DRIVE is and the Congressmen that aren't afraid of us now will be." His timetable may be wrong, but his dream may very well come true.

FAO: The Imperative of Altruism

GUNNAR MYRDAL

Mr. Myrdal is professor of international economics at the University of Stockholm. His latest book is Challenge to Affluence (Pantheon). The material in this article was originally presented as an address to the FAO Biannual Conference in 1965.

When the charter establishing the Food and Agriculture Organization (FAO) was signed at Quebec in October, 1945, a few months after the end of World War II, the organization had a membership of forty-four countries. At that time, very few of the underdeveloped countries in Asia and Africa existed as independent political entities. Huge China—thousands of years old—was free from the fetters in which the great powers had held it for a century, and so was little Thailand; Latin America had the same political structure as today; India's political independence was anticipated; but all the other underdeveloped countries were colonial dependencies of one appellation or another. The present membership of more than 110 countries, the great majority of which are underdeveloped, reflects in this UN organization the decolonization that has avalanched across the globe.

But at Quebec, and at the other early conferences, Asia and Africa did not exist as problems of FAO; they were problems for the colonial powers and it was not considered proper for an intergovernmental organization to probe into them too deeply. It was thus possible for the nations to discuss agriculture without giving very much thought to the needs of the poor peoples of the world. They were the responsibility of the colonial powers, who for obvious reasons were not eager to account for them before a world body; nor were the non-colonial powers eager to share the burden. If any of the colonial powers had asked for assistance in its task of meeting the needs of its colonies, the help would have been considered as given to the metropolitan power and apportioned accordingly. Since this seldom, if ever, happened, FAO could be viewed in 1945 as an organization for gathering statistics about crops, trade and related matters, and for technical consultation.

I point to this tremendous difference between the world in 1945 and today because the full impact of what has happened is seldom realized. There is much to criticize in colonial rule; I know it better than the average man because I have been laboring for nine years on a study of South Asia, where almost a quarter of mankind is struggling to survive and develop. But colonial rule also implied colonial responsibility and both have disappeared together. The former colony is now on its own, and the burden it has to carry is often almost unbearable, if it must carry it alone. The disappearance of colonial responsibility has created a vacuum into which the intergovernmental organizations were bound to move. At the same time, the population explosion—which is mainly a post-colonial event not foreseen in 1945—makes all the economic problems of the poor countries much more difficult to solve.

Under the pressure of these world trends, all the technical intergovernmental organizations in the UN family have changed their character and became increasingly operational agencies for aiding underdeveloped countries. Though for good reasons they wish to maintain their multilateral structure—where every country, even the poorest, is a contributor and every country, even the richest, is a potential beneficiary, with trivial exceptions—the foods are made available by a small minority of rich, developed countries for the benefit of the underdeveloped countries. In this process the UN organizations have come to handle and transfer funds—made available in their budgets and in other ways—which are many times the size foreseen in their early years.

As an economist, I consider this great change in the role of the intergovernmental organizations a shift in the right direction. We should deceive ourselves, however, if we believed that the funds spent for development and the activities financed by these funds would make more than a dent in world poverty. Even if to the funds sluiced through the intergovernmental organizations we add the sums given by rich countries unilaterally, the total is grossly inadequate from a world economic point of view. At the same time, the actual sacrifices made in the rich countries to carry out this aid activity are really insignificant. One per cent of national income—that is, only a fraction of the yearly increase of national income in the rich countries (which are all really "developing" countries)—has been set as a goal. It is seldom reached, despite the fact that statistics on aid usually include not only grants and concessional loans but also all financing by governmental agencies and private sources, much of which is just good, profitable business.

None of the rich countries contributes to the development of underdeveloped countries to anywhere near the extent they are prepared to pay for important national purposes. A frequent comparison is with the costs for war preparation. For the world as a whole, these must now be considerably above $200 billion, if we include what the economists call the opportunity costs; that is, the loss of income by the men who are drafted, not to speak of the national sacrifice of having so large a part of the scientific and engineering personnel tied down in nonproductive activity.

Contrary to expectations a decade ago, not only grants and concessional loans but also the total flow of financial resources from developed to underdeveloped countries have leveled off in the past several years. As far as private long-term investment is concerned, this is partly a reaction to the slowing down of development in underdeveloped countries during the first five years of the sixties—which was declared in a unanimous UN resolution to be the Development Decade. It is also partly caused by boundary struggles and internal political instability in many underdeveloped countries.

In addition, the governments of the rich countries are moved to a restrictive attitude toward all financial outflow by the exchange difficulties into which they have brought themselves by overexpansion and a lax fiscal policy. The preservation of internal and external balance in the economic development of rich countries does not, in my opinion, constitute an unsolvable technical problem. It is a field in which policies are dangerously lagging behind our available knowledge.

This situation has also made the rich countries unwilling to do anything substantial to help the poor countries improve their precarious international trade balance by permitting them to increase their exports. On the whole, such an increase of exports from underdeveloped countries would be in the interest of the rich countries, too, as the exports would mainly compete with sectors that should shrink in any rationally planned development. What the underdeveloped countries can demand is not only freer access to markets but a discrimination in their favor which would only tend to restore a measure of world balance. The important thing that happened in last year's world conference in Geneva on trade and development was that the great majority of underdeveloped countries succeeded in joining together to formulate their demands for a change in the world structure of international trade. If accomplished, it would help them much more than any aid program that is at present within sight. Initially, the positions taken by the rich countries have not been encouraging.

When I am traveling, meeting people and following the press in many different countries, I feel a growing popular apathy to a more generous policy toward the poor countries. In a sense, those of us who recognize the seriousness of present trends, and the paramount importance of much more international solidarity, have been too successful in spreading our knowledge and simplifying it to the extent that it has become coined into commonplaces. It is now heard as a sort of Sunday sermon, divorced from weekday practical life. Public men, teachers, preachers, leaders in all sorts of organizations, journalists, authors and, of course, politicians on solemn occasions all repeat it: The mass poverty in underdeveloped countries is almost beyond the grasp of our understanding; there is disease and illiteracy; the income gap between developed and underdeveloped countries is not only very wide but continually widening; in recent years development has tended to slow down instead of speed up; as many as two-thirds of the people in underdeveloped countries suffer from malnutrition; food production in recent years has not kept pace with the population increase in Latin America, Asia and Africa; regardless of whatever progress there is in the spread of birth control, the increase in world population between now and the end of this century will equal or exceed the current population and this increase will mainly occur in the underdeveloped nations. The recording of these facts is commonly accompanied by declarations that the ideal of social justice makes international action to overcome the plight of underdeveloped countries a binding duty.

In the rich countries there must by now be few persons with even an average interest in public affairs who have not had these facts and that moral judgment impressed upon them time and again. They incorporate them in their world outlook, but ordinarily they do not translate them into a willingness to take action, least of all action that would imply real sacrifice. Nowhere in the rich countries is aid to underdeveloped countries today dealt with as a major social and economic issue, or in terms other than, on the one hand, relatively small-scale charity and, on the other hand, national interest, either political or commercial. Politicians, in particular, have to watch the attitudes of the electorate, and they are conspicuously abandoning the Sunday religion when it comes down to practical political actions.

Most people live in a narrow world and are crudely egoistic for themselves and for those with whom they identify. Among the fairly well off, even the needs of the poor in their own lands are a strain on loyalty; they feel even more indifferent to the fate of the distant poor. They are aware, moreover, of the harsh and, as a rule, increasing economic inequality within most of the underdeveloped countries and feel that the spokesmen for the poor countries, who for the most part belong to the privileged strata, should attempt some equalization at home before appealing for more international solidarity. There is—particularly in the United States, which has had the most experience in the field of large-scale aid ever since the Marshall Plan—a growing conviction that foreign aid earns little gratitude and sympathy. Often, a sort of historical analogy is applied by recalling how the present rich nations had to struggle for development through sacrifice and hard work without any outside aid. Why should not the underdeveloped nations of today have to follow this same path? It would also do them good morally. This analogy is false, of course, since initial conditions are so vastly different, mostly to the great disadvantage of countries now underdeveloped. But when that is pointed out, people may turn to the other extreme as a reason for lack of concern: aid to underdeveloped countries is a hopeless task, however much one might be prepared to give. These are rationalizations, but their effects are real enough: for the time being, none of the rich nations is prepared to put aid to underdeveloped countries on a par with other, "really important" items on the national budget. There are individuals and groups who would be prepared to do it, but they do not influence any political party or government. Similarly in the field of international trade, even if it were clear to the economist and the perspicacious politician that concessions to the underdeveloped countries would be in a rich nation's long-term interest, vested interests oppose such concessions and they are powerful, particularly when they can appeal to nationalist feelings.

DON'T MOVE OR WE'll LOSE OUR POLITICAL STABILITY...
$

Rius, Siempre (Mexico City)

What then can be done to change these attitudes? As a seasoned professor, I cannot be expected to underrate the gradual and ultimate effectiveness of enlightenment. The Freedom from Hunger Campaign has already accomplished a certain amount, if only by getting such a great number of those who write and speak to repeat its main slogans. Aside from education, the rich countries have a number of problems which they should be able to overcome. They should do it in their own interests but it would also make possible a greater generosity in their policies toward underdeveloped countries. As I have already said, the advanced nations should be able to organize the international monetary system among themselves in such a way that there would not in future be need to discourage the flow of funds to underdeveloped countries for foreign exchange considerations. The financial problems of underdeveloped countries are of a totally different nature. These countries are bound to be short of foreign exchange. Wanting to develop while being so short of resources, they must in general control the use of the foreign exchange they can dispose of. It is neither logical nor practical to mix the two types of quite different problems together, as unfortunately has been done in many of the schemes worked out for monetary reform. This is often done for the good purpose of securing more financial funds for the poor countries and is often applauded by their own spokesmen. It is an illusion to believe, however, that more financial aid could be smuggled through by that type of confused scheme; the rich countries will not fall for it.

In the same way, the international trade problem is totally different in the poor and the rich countries, and there are reasons for what I have called a "double standard of morality" in regard to commercial policy—for once a double standard to the advantage of the weak. The rich countries should now take the consequence of their comparative strength—as Britain did more than a hundred years ago when it led the world in development—and open their boundaries to the flow of commodities as well as capital, among themselves and from the poor countries. They could do it, if they kept their economies in balance. During this approach toward free trade, they should abolish tariffs and other restrictions on imports from the poor without expecting reciprocity. The poor countries cannot possibly abstain from protecting their sprouting industries.

At the same time, there is much the underdeveloped countries could do themselves to break down the reluctance of the rich countries to come forward with more assistance. A few months ago George D. Woods, the president of the World Bank, in an address to the bank's governors where he noted that "the level of development assistance has been stationary for several years," said bluntly that "it is useless to attempt to sugar-coat the fact that in many of the underdeveloped countries, economic performance can be greatly improved." After having illustrated what he meant, he went on to stress that "it is the effectiveness of internal effort which to a large extent is going to determine the future of international development assistance."

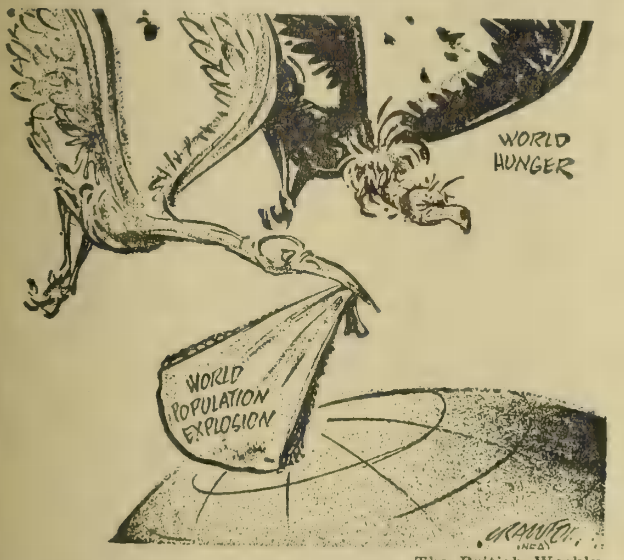
For my own part, and thinking particularly about the popular resistance in rich countries to substantial sacrifices for the assistance of underdeveloped countries, I would urge increasing social discipline and the rooting out of corruption, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, a better compliance with the ideals of social and economic equality to which all underdeveloped countries are solemnly committed. Such internal reforms would also greatly improve the chances to speed up development, particularly in agriculture.

The urgency is considerable. Statistics on trends presented in FAO's Third World Food Survey two years ago and the recently published The State of Food and Agriculture 1965, together with all we know about the tremendous economic and social inhibitions and obstacles to agricultural reform in the underdeveloped countries, lead to the conclusion that, whatever the prospects for a substantially increased agricultural production in the somewhat longer run, the immediate prospects are gloomy. We must face the fact that, as a prominent American agricultural economist, Prof. Earl L. Butz, expressed it: "The world is on a collision course." He continued:

> When the massive force of an exploding world population meets the much more stable trend line of world food production, something must give. Unless we give increased attention now to the softening of the impending collision, many parts of the world within a decade will be skirting a disaster of such a proportion as to threaten the peace and stability of the Western world.

The threatening world food crisis would already have broken out in several very big countries like India and Pakistan and in many smaller ones had it not been for large-scale food imports without exchange compensation, mainly under P.L. 480, from the surpluses in the U.S. If the lid of production restrictions were lifted, food production could rise very steeply in the United States; Canada, Australia and a few other countries are in a similar situation. But we should not expect these countries to carry the financial burden alone. It was easy to vote billions for P.L. 480 in Congress, when the United States was ridding its market of awkward food surpluses; it will be different when the surpluses have disappeared and agricultural policy becomes directed toward an increase of production instead of a limit on production. Other rich countries will have to share the financial burden, but they will do so only if this food aid is internationalized; they will not pay contributions into the United States Treasury for a United States activity. Therefore, it is fortunate that an international agency, The World Food Program, working under FAO auspices, is already in operation on an experimental scale, and that according to unanimous opinion it has been run economically and effectively.

But internationally organized food aid cannot possibly be a permanent solution; it is merely an emergency bridge. As Lester R. Brown, a staff economist in the U.S. Department of Agriculture, has recently pointed out, the increase in grain consumption by 1980, estimated on the basis of the expected population increase and a modest rise of 10 per cent in per capita consumption, would boost grain production requirements by almost as much as the current output of North America and Western Europe combined. A similarly forbidding calculation could be made of the shipping facilities needed for an extensive food aid program. The inescapable lesson of that glimpse into the future is that, even if for a short time the first shocks of the food crisis can be met by aid from the rich countries, the very great increase in agricultural production that is urgently needed to avert disaster must begin to take place in the vast underdeveloped regions themselves.



The British Weekly

How this is to be accomplished is the main business of the agricultural ministries in underdeveloped countries, and of the FAO. Even if reforms can have their full effects only in the somewhat longer run, it is urgent that they be undertaken without delay and that they be so planned that they will show maximum results as quickly as possible. As a matter of fact, I am much less concerned about how things will look at the turn of the century. In the long run, much will happen: we shall perhaps have entirely new techniques to produce the foods; the world situation will be different. Long-term forecasts are bound to be proved wrong. It is the years of this decade and the next about which I am worried. Our short-run forecasts are more reliable, and they point to danger of world calamity.

About the policy measures to be undertaken I shall restrict myself to a few brief observations. First, contrary to experience in developed countries, what increase of food production has been achieved in the underdeveloped countries has mainly come about from an extension of the cultivated area: the yields per acre have hardly risen at all. This is true even in India, which has a very high man/land ratio and very low yields. Virgin cultivable land is becoming scarce or else the costs of cultivating it are forbiddingly high. But since yields are generally very low, there is reason to hope that improvements in agricultural technology will raise them substantially.

Second, while much technology is available, much more still needs to be invented. There are two reasons for this. For one thing, most of the underdeveloped countries are in the tropical and subtropical zones and there has been very little specialized and localized practical research in those regions. Moreover—and this is too often overlooked even by agricultural experts—while from the beginning agricultural technology in the now-developed countries advanced in a context of decreasing farm labor, most underdeveloped countries will have to adjust their technology to an agricultural labor force that for a generation will rise in numbers about as fast as the present very rapid population increase. This point deserves a few words of explanation.

Fortunately, the road seems now to be opening for a much more determined policy of spreading birth control among the masses. But we would deceive ourselves if we counted on a rapid decrease in fertility. Also, the relatively greater numbers of children, which is a reflection of the rising fertility up to now, means that the population increase has a tremendous momentum. This does not say that a decrease in fertility would not always and immediately improve income and living levels per head, but it does imply that the birth curve will not be lowered as fast as if the age distribution were that of a stable population. Finally, the effects on the labor force are delayed for at least fifteen years and will be very inconsequential for a whole generation. The future workers are already born or will soon be born.

With this comes the fact that industrialization in most of the underdeveloped countries, even if it proceeded much faster than it has thus far, will not for decades absorb much additional labor. Under certain circumstances industrialization will even displace more labor from traditional industry and craft than it employs under the new conditions. This is no reason for not trying to industrialize as fast as possible: when once a higher level of industrialization is reached, industry will increasingly employ more labor. Meanwhile, however, a swelling flow of refugees from the countryside to the cities will not be productive.

All this comes down to the fact that agricultural technology must try to increase yields per acre by putting to more effective work a labor force which is already severely underemployed and which will rapidly increase for decades. This new, labor-intensive technology has yet to be developed.

My third observation is that a substantial and rapid increase in agriculture yields has rarely, if ever, occurred in traditional self-sufficiency farming, where illiteracy is prevalent and the relation between the farmer and his land is such that he has little possibility and little incentive to exert himself. Among the several institutional problems raised by this point, I would give high priority to the need for land reform in the broadest sense of the word. Its details would differ from country to country with different systems of ownership and tenancy and it must be accompanied by other induced changes in regard to education, marketing, availability of credits, etc. It will often be costly if it is to raise yield substantially, and we should begin to consider whether international credits, which would have to be on a rather large scale, could not be extended to underdeveloped countries that undertake land reforms and all the other measures necessary to render such reforms really productive. But that assumes that these countries, or rather the political leaders in these countries, will begin to take seriously the urgent need for reorganizing the relations between the toiler and the land he tills. It is tragic—and a contributory cause of no small importance to the grave situation we face today—that local vested interests have made a sham of land reform in so many countries. FAO has for many years labored courageously and competently for land reform, and in recent years it has produced a resolve in some countries to solve the problem; but other countries still try to forget about it and focus public attention only on the more technical problems.

We all of us stand in danger of becoming accustomed to living on happily and attending to the business of the day, while not giving much thought to the possibility or probability of the unthinkable ahead of us. We seem to take this pattern from the entirely rational way in which we as individuals live on from day to day, working and enjoying ourselves, though we know we are soon approaching the personal catastrophe of death. Otherwise life would be unbearable; nothing can be done about it, and our nations and mankind do not perish with us. But this attitude is dangerously irrational when we take it as members of a nation and of mankind. Social catastrophes are different from the certainty of death for the individual; they can and should be averted. And if we do not use foresight and take measures against them, we shall all perish and there will be no posterity.

LIFE INSURANCE

THE MONOLITHIC SECT

JAMES GOLLIN

Mr. Gollin sold life insurance for more than eight years and is still active in the insurance industry.

In our society, life insurance is as ubiquitous as death itself. Indeed, last year the 21 million insurance contracts sold outnumbered deaths by nearly 10 to 1. It's obvious from these figures that a basic American dream—that of outwitting death—is far from losing its grip on the American psyche. Another way to measure the power of this dream is simply to note that by the end of 1966 we were insuring our lives for more than $1 trillion: one and a quarter times our total national income.

Although 130 million Americans own life insurance, and though insurance men and their ways have long been part of the folklore, most of us know little about our insurance and nothing at all about the industry that supplies it. So palpable is this ignorance that when the publisher of a national newsweekly was asked to address a life insurance advertisers' convention last fall, the first thing he did was scribble a puzzled memo to his aides: "Why is there not more public communication about life insurance?"

Why not, indeed? After all, life insurance is an intriguing subject. In an obvious sense, an insurance policy is the sum of what our entire civilization has learned about the interrelations of life, death and money. Further, the American life insurance industry, which sends its representatives into almost every cranny of society, is itself a kind of natural wonder: the biggest, richest (controlling assets of more than $160 billion), and in some ways the strangest of all our private enterprises.

Most Americans hear only about "the miracle" of life insurance. They listen to what their agents say about this ingenious legal and social contract that magically "creates an estate" for the family whose breadwinner would otherwise die penniless. They are sobered and impressed to learn that in 1965, life insurance companies paid out nearly $5 billion in death benefits; and because the need for life insurance is self-evident, they are eager to believe what they're told.

But the process of selling life insurance taught me that most people really didn't want to know much more than that about what they were buying. And eight and a half years in this business has taught me something else: in an era when other industries have begun to learn that it pays to deal openly with the public, the life insurance industry still thinks it needs to conduct its business behind tightly closed doors.

In short, I came to understand that because Americans share some strange ideas and some curious uncertainties about life, death and money, our society has nurtured a vast institution that we like to believe can prolong life, abolish death, and even make us rich. All we have to do in return is pay money and not be too inquisitive. So today Americans buy $100 billion worth of new life insurance every year, pay $40 billion in annual premiums—and do so without any real awareness of the implications of their behavior.

The inner workings of my own industry had come to fascinate me, and this particular perspective on life insurance proved so irresistible that after two and a half years of research and thirteen months of writing, I published earlier this year a book about life insurance in America. (Pay Now, Die Later, Random House.) As the next pages will make clear, the life insurance industry's official reaction to this publication is a continuing final chapter to the book itself.

As soon as the publication contract had been signed, I called the senior public relations executives of the insurance company whose policies I had been selling for several years. After outlining my project to these men, I warned them bluntly that I intended a profile of the industry, "warts and all." To their personal credit, these executives (like officials in dozens of other major life insurance companies) offered their help. For their subsequent cooperation, I was, and I still am, extremely grateful. So too am I grateful for the aid given me by The Institute of Life Insurance. After a brief meeting, the officers of this leading trade association made available its excellent library and research facilities.

I cite these facts to make two points: my book was written with the knowledge of high life insurance officialdom; and it was written from inside. The only restriction was that I not present my findings as the reflection of any official viewpoint. (Voluntarily, I made it a rule to protect the anonymity of my informants.)

A single event was enough to change the atmosphere. In his column of January 26—seven months before the book was published—Walter Winchell said: "Pay Now, Die Later by James M. Gollins [sic] will make life-insurance people turn white." My journalistic honeymoon with the life insurance industry was over.

Five days later, two of the executives I had already spoken with dropped in unannounced on Random House, to see if my editor would mind giving them a look at my manuscript. When he refused, they left, after threatening to see to it that the book "was kept out of the hands of as many life insurance agents as possible."

Not quite a month later, the industry's trade press began to speak. In The National Underwriter (February 26), Henry W. DuBois, an agent for the Northwestern Mutual Life and president of the Dallas, Tex., Life Underwriters Association, noted Walter Winchell's mention of Pay Now, Die Later and went on:

> First of all, we can't legitimately bring any pressure to bear on the publisher, and I doubt that we would want to even if we could. . . .

Mr. DuBois couldn't have known—or could he?—that an effort to "bring pressure to bear" had already failed. He went on:

> We can look with pity on anyone so uninformed or so downright stupid as to write such a book. . . . There is no way that a man who believes in God can prove anything to the satisfaction of an atheist, or that a patriot can justify himself to a coward, so why be drawn into an argument?

In other words, ignore the book.

Next, the April issue of the Life Association News carried a letter written by John M. Hazlitt of South Bend, who was also worried about the possible effect of my book. Although he led off, "I have not seen the book and have no idea of its contents," Mr. Hazlitt characterized Pay Now, Die Later as "a smear . . . written and published to make money for someone." Hazlitt's message, delivered at some length, was that insurance men should punish the greedy author and publisher by not buying the book.

I followed these comments with keen interest: If you're an author, there's a special flavor to seeing the reviews before the manuscript has even left your hands. Furthermore, Messrs. DuBois and Hazlitt were giving me a valuable foretaste of what lay in store.

On September 16, Pay Now, Die Later was officially released; and what I had to say about the American life insurance industry became, naturally and properly, fair game for the press, the public and the industry. As I had hoped, several of the issues I raise in the book have attracted attention.

For instance, in my examination of the agency system by which life insurance is distributed, I made a statistical point. According to my evidence, the life insurance industry's 1,700 companies recruit approximately 110,000 men and women as salesmen every year. Of these, about 90,000—nearly 90 per cent—leave the business within ninety days of being hired. And by the end of each full year, another 5,000 to 10,000 have dropped out.

"True," I added in the book, "these aren't the figures that circulate within the industry. According to official sources, the 'turnover ratio' among salesmen is much lower. Some of these sources estimate the ninety-day turnover rate as 65 per cent, and The New York Times . . . cited surveys that give this rate as 50 per cent. . . . But whatever the exact percentages are, it's absurd to quibble about the statistics of disaster."

The point, of course, is that such commercial manslaughter costs everybody dearly: the failed agents, the companies, and the policy-buying public.

The first member of the industry to deal publicly with my statistics was Bernard Bergin, an insurance agent who manages a sales agency for the Madison Life Insurance Company of New York. He and I were guests together on Barry Gray's New York radio show of September 15. Mr. Bergin said that in his agency the turnover of salesmen was "only about 10 per cent." Then he observed that new life insurance agents were "90 per cent subsidized": that is, paid advances against future commissions. He added that it cost "I believe somewhere in the neighborhood of $10,000 to train a new man." His argument seemed to be that since life insurance companies spend a lot of money to attract new sales help, they don't want to encourage failure.

In response, I cited statistics gathered by the Life Insurance Agency Management Association (an industry fact-finding organization whose name will recur in the next several episodes). They were reported as follows in The Wall Street Journal of August 15:

> High turnover plagues life insurance companies. Of 22,700 new full-time agents hired in the U.S. and Canada last year, 15,000 had quit by year end, the Life Insurance Agency Management Association reports. One reason: inadequate training. New agents got an average of less than three hours a week instruction during the first six months of employment.

Even though these turnover figures were much less critical than my own, Mr. Bergin rejected them. "I don't think the statistics are true. I don't believe it is so." Then he said, "I admit that there's a large attrition. There must be."

I agreed with Mr. Bergin. The industry's attrition is very large.

In the October 15 issue of Sales Management Magazine, an article discussing Pay Now, Die Later ("a bristling . . . sometimes-overstated indictment of the entire U.S. life insurance business") again cited the Life Insurance Agency Management Association. "Massive turnover in the life insurance sales force continues apace (60% of all salesmen quit or are dismissed in any given year, according to the Life Insurance Agency Management Association)."

In this same article, Raymond Dry of the LIAMA was given a chance to comment. The magazine quotes him as saying, "some managers do operate as Gollin suggests . . . [but] such practices are no help to the company." I had never said they were, and Mr. Dry neither affirmed nor denied his own organization's statistics. As for mine, by this time they had been lost in the shuffle.

Sales Management's editors sent a copy of this issue to Blake T. Newton, president of The Institute of Life Insurance (in whose library I had spent seven months doing research). In answer to the magazine's request for comment, Mr. Newton wrote: "If you had checked with us . . . you could have avoided the substantial error of reporting that 60 per cent of life insurance salesmen are dismissed or quit in any given year." Mr. Newton then gave some statistics of his own. He first stated that "departures from the sales force . . . from all causes involve only about one-fifth of our agent group." He went on: "The fact is that there are about 200,000 life insurance agents in this country. . . . In addition . . . the industry hires about 40,000 new inexperienced recruits each year."

Mr. Newton's letter also contained the statement that the editors of Sales Management had "accepted at face value the sometimes misinformed, sometimes deceptive arithmetic of one of our ex-agents who was unsatisfied with his career in our business and blew up to book size his bitterness about his failure as a salesman." In fact I was a success as a salesman, and although I no longer sell life insurance, I am still active in the industry.

The salesman-turnover question took on its strangest tinge during a radio debate I had with Milton Goldberg, assistant vice president and actuary of The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States. I quote from the transcript, with deletions only for brevity:

> GOLLIN: Could you tell us the Equitable's agent turnover last year?
>
> GOLDBERG: Well, you'll be surprised to learn this, Mr. Gollin. I didn't come prepared to give a lot of figures to the public and burden them. . . .
>
> GOLLIN: Why not?
>
> GOLDBERG: I'll tell you why not. We place no credence in these so-called turnover figures. We don't even like to use the word "turnover."
>
> GOLLIN: You don't like the Life Insurance Agency Management Association's . . . you don't believe in their statistics, is that correct?
>
> GOLDBERG: Right. I think that is the greatest institutional organization in agency management supported by the life insurance companies. I've been identified with them for many years, I served on a number of committees—committees which you say have not accomplished anything—
>
> GOLLIN: As a matter of fact, I do know about your [LIAMA] studies and, in further point of fact, let me repeat my question: although you've been very active in LIAMA affairs, Mr. Goldberg, you still don't place much credence in their turnover statistics, is that correct?
>
> GOLDBERG: I will tell you exactly what I've told them. With all respect to them—and I have every respect for them—the figures they put out, averages for the industry and so forth, can be very misleading.
>
> GOLLIN: Oh, I see.
>
> GOLDBERG: Yes . . . [Mr. Goldberg went on to say that once an agent becomes "experienced," he generally stays in the industry.]
>
> GOLLIN: The biggest problem the industry has in selecting and training and recruiting agents is in the selection, recruitment and training of new agents?
>
> GOLDBERG: You and I agree on that.
>
> GOLLIN: Right. Then let me ask you this: how many agents did your managers hire during 1965?
>
> GOLDBERG: Er, roughly—now I didn't bring figures with me—
>
> GOLLIN: No, I understand—
>
> GOLDBERG: —but I can produce anything you want—about 1,800.
>
> GOLLIN: How many of them survived a full year?
>
> GOLDBERG: All right, I'm going to answer that by saying we don't even keep track, from the standpoint of pertinence.
>
> GOLLIN: You don't know how many of your first-year agents are left?
>
> GOLDBERG: Oh, I can give you the figure but it doesn't mean anything to us—
>
> GOLLIN: You don't care.
>
> GOLDBERG: —We're interested in how many men we take on who stay with us one year, two years, three years and make a decent living.
>
> GOLLIN: So that you're not concerned about the dropouts.
>
> GOLDBERG: No—no, not per se.

Mr. Goldberg then explained that the Equitable's "Manpower Development" program would "reduce what you call these exorbitant turnover rates." Later, I asked Mr. Goldberg about my own statistics.

> GOLLIN: The figures as they stand now are correct, is that not right?
>
> GOLDBERG: I'm not going to justify those figures, but I will say this: those overall averages don't mean a thing to me.

Thus, my effort to have at least one industry spokesman be precise about the career expectancy of the neophyte insurance agent was unavailing. But I felt that the audience might have heard enough to make it wonder about some of the industry's behavior patterns. For instance: the life insurance companies maintain a research branch, LIAMA, expressly to gather and study the statistics of such problems as agent failure, but they then publicly repudiate the statistics as "misleading" and even meaningless. And again: the big problem in life insurance, "manpower development," is that of attracting and training brand new agents. But the companies that claim to be the most progressive about developing manpower don't really care at all about the new recruits they attract, only about the few who survive to become "experienced."

And while it appears that the industry, its Institute, and its official research arm are somewhat at odds about their most critical problem, no one has yet come forward either to refute my statistics or to challenge my contention that "failure . . . overtakes the huge majority of those who enter the life insurance business."

Another set of issues I raise in Pay Now, Die Later centers on the financial operations of life insurance companies. In a chapter on the industry's investment making, I noted that "many close students of life-insurance-industry economics feel that most companies are far, far richer than they need to be." Citing a study by James E. Walter (The Investment Process as Characterized by Certain Leading Life Insurance Companies), I concluded that:

> (1) Company reserves are worth at least 10 to 15 per cent more than even the most stringent state laws require; (2) surplus funds (those kept on hand in addition to legal reserves) are in turn worth an additional 10 to 15 per cent of the reserves themselves (substantially in excess of requirements); and (3) investment income, year by year, is running at least 30 per cent higher than is necessary to maintain company financial coffers at their present overfull levels. . . . This same cushion, moreover, is built into . . . the premium rate structure to make sure that the future picture will remain unaltered. . . . Taking the industry's total assets as in excess of $150,000,000,000, our life insurance companies have evidently accumulated a treasure of $45,000,000,000 that will never be needed to pay claims and will never be returned to us or our beneficiaries.

Alden S. Wood, Director of Communications of the New England Mutual Life Insurance Company, headlined his review of my book in The Boston Traveler (September 21): "'Exposé' of Insurance Not Based on the Facts." Among other things, Mr. Wood reported a number of "irritating inaccuracies." He mentioned only one:

> On page 125, the author discusses a conclusion reached by . . . "a Harvard School [probably the newspaper's own ellipsis] professor, James E. Walter." The Business School told us that Walter was an associate professor and that he left Harvard four years ago. Why can't Gollin get such important facts correct?

In 1962, when the Harvard Business School published his book, James E. Walter was associate professor of finance at the Business School. My information about Professor Walter was taken from the dust jacket of the book, which I read in May, 1965. I have since learned that Professor Walter has joined the faculty of the Wharton School of Finance at the University of Pennsylvania. In his review, Mr. Wood does not mention my reason for citing Walter's book, although I am sure he would agree that the facts—and the complex ramifications, political, economic and social—of the life insurance industry's financial operations are also of some importance.

Mr. Wood also took strong exception to another point I raised. I wrote, in Chapter 1, "the industry openly argues that as long as it functions effectively, it owes the public no explanations." Calling this statement an "astonishing allegation," Mr. Wood countered by saying that "the life insurance business is subject to the closest legal regulation."

To begin with, there's an enormous difference between the "explanation" I feel this industry owes the public and the formal exhibits each insurance company must prepare for the technicians and lawyers who staff the insurance departments of the fifty states. Indeed, the so-called "Convention blank," the financial report form that companies submit yearly to state insurance authorities, has long baffled even expert financial analysts from outside the industry. To the general public, such documents might as well be written in Sanskrit.

But the real issue lies much deeper: How effective is present-day state regulation of life insurance? As Mr. Wood undoubtedly realizes, this question can have more than just one answer.

The answer of Mr. Wood himself and of his counterparts throughout the industry would be that because life insurance is subject to "the closest legal regulation," the public is completely safeguarded. My answer, which Mr. Wood never mentioned, can be summed up by two comments from my book. First: "life insurance companies are so powerful that they help write the laws under which they're regulated." Second: "the prime concern [of both the industry and of the state regulatory bodies] is that companies be unassailably solvent."

This jointly held piece of orthodoxy was succinctly expressed in a speech that Henry Root Stern, Jr., Superintendent of Insurance of New York, gave in September at the Continental Assurance Company's Chicago conference on "Trends in Life Insurance Regulation and Taxation." As reported in the trade paper Best's Insurance News, Mr. Stern "emphasized . . . that, insofar as New York State is concerned, 'no domestic life company has come to grief, with financial loss to policyholders. . . . [My Department] intends that this exemplary record shall continue.'"

No responsible person ever wants a life insurance company to come to grief. But in an industry whose assets exceed $160 billion, some authorities feel that matters other than solvency are the critical regulatory problems today. For example, Dean E. Sharp, assistant counsel of the United States Senate Antitrust and Monopoly Subcommittee, also delivered a speech at that conference in Chicago. It went unmentioned by Best's Insurance News.

Mr. Sharp expressed the subcommittee's alarm about certain industry practices. He mentioned, for instance, endowment insurance policies sold as "savings plans documented by passbooks . . . [in] well-planned sales promotion efforts having the complete sanction of the companies involved." He cited the case of the "millions of borrowers . . . overcharged some $700 million [for credit life and health insurance coverage] since 1959." Mr. Sharp then asked:

> How can [state] regulation be expected to meet present and future challenges when:
>
> ¶ So many states have inadequately staffed departments who fail to look behind formal statements and reports and to make adequate, intelligent and frequent examinations?
>
> ¶ So many state departments inadequately and ineffectively handle complaints by policyholders and those in the business?
>
> ¶ So many states so jealously guard their own prerogatives . . . that effective coordination between and among states is . . . impossible?
>
> ¶ So many obviously conflicting and divergent regulatory philosophies, laws, interpretations, and enforcement practices hopelessly hinder the present structure's effectiveness?

This, then, is still another answer to the question of how well the public is protected by the existing network of state life insurance regulations. Mr. Sharp's speech is entitled, "It's Too Late To Defend The Status Quo." And yet, as my book makes clear, I feel that the men who run life insurance will defend the status quo—at our expense—for a very long time to come.

Thus we come to a final point: communication. The inability of this immense industry to understand communication is in a way the special theme of this article, as indeed it is a major theme of my book. Milton Goldberg's agile elusiveness, Blake T. Newton's imputation of motives, Alden S. Wood's lack of focus are not only attempts to sidestep the real issues but symptoms of an underlying malady: a stubborn refusal to speak clearly—and listen carefully—to the industry's vast public audience.

Whether this refusal is due to arrogance or indifference I am not certain, but it seems to me that the "communications block" is an industry problem even more serious than that of the agency system. And yet this industry could change dramatically if its chieftains ever discovered that —like advertising and publishing—life insurance is by definition a business of communication. Indeed, the insurance policy itself is not a tangible item but a message.

Unfortunately, I see little sign that such sensitivity to the real nature of insurance is growing within the industry's executive ranks. In support, I could cite countless examples, from life insurance advertising to the hundreds of thousands of letters that the industry sends its luckless customers every day. But perhaps the most revealing example I have yet seen is the following review of my book. It is by Chester C. Nash, editor of Insurance News, and it appeared in the issue of October 15:

> Pay Now, Die Later . . . is a senseless tirade that should be of no interest to anyone within the business and a total, confusing bore to any casual lay reader.
>
> This review was delayed because the publisher twice refused to give a revue [sic] copy, but the book was secured and has been read—with great effort.
>
> The best summary is from the author's own words towards the end, "Nothing in this indictment of the industry is new." An understatement. . . .
>
> The book is particularly boring from a public standpoint because the first 202 pages are devoted to an analysis of the mechanics of the business—agent selection, training, management, company direction, investment operation, underwriting practice, etc.—all from the point of view of a totally disillusioned insurance man. Companies are pictured as robber barons, managers as crude opportunists, agents as dumb misfits, underwriting as a process of discrimination, investments as crude gambles made by sharpies.
>
> Fortunately for the business . . . the author so fills his pages with venom and hate and massive overstatement that the picture is unbelievable to even the lay reader. The only conclusion apparent is that Mr. Gollin, while he was an agent, must have suffered greatly. . . . It is only to be hoped that the book is not too autobiographical, especially when he comes to his list of "Eight ways agents can cheat you." But truly, he must have lived in a miserable dream world those years he was selling, judging by his total lack of understanding of the world he moved in.

Clearly, this is not a book review. Nor, for all his energetic effort, is Mr. Nash merely trying to discredit a book by the common stratagem of discrediting its author. Rather, he is performing an act of exorcism. For his select audience, he's uttering an incantation that is to make me and my dangerous ideas disappear. It's an interesting phenomenon to discover in the trade press of a vast American industry.

Like all the other verbal rituals of life insurance (those canned sales pitches about the magic of insurance, for example), this one tells the listener something that the charts and statistics can't possibly reveal. Mr. Nash is actually saying that the life insurance industry is not only a commercial monolith but also a sect. To the buyer of life insurance, it may not mean much that every policy sold perpetuates the sect's power and prestige. But to the citizen, it should be disquieting that this particular sect tolerates no discussion of its tribal practices and its lore; and permits no communication except the drumming of the true believers.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Salame Is Salami Is Salamis

THE RANDOM HOUSE DICTIONARY OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE (The Unabridged Edition.) Illustrated. Random House. 2,059 pp. $25.

MARIO PEI

Mr. Pei is a linguist, teacher and author of numerous books on language.

It can never be sufficiently stressed that one does not and cannot review a dictionary, particularly one of this size and heft, with the same criteria and methods used in reviewing other books. With works like Oxford, Webster III and Random House, the proof of the pudding lies in the eating. It is only after months and years of use and consultation that one can pass final judgment. You find or do not find the words you are seeking. The definitions are or are not clear. The etymologies are or are not satisfactory. But all this takes time and use. All one can do at first glance is to cover broad, general areas, usually in the field of one's special interests and inclinations, and voice an opinion that is necessarily tentative and subject to revision.

Judged by these standards, the Random House offering is good, particularly for the price. It could have been better. It is an impressive work, with over 260,000 entries (as against about 450,000 for its higher-priced competitor, Webster III). It includes a great deal of material that is, strictly speaking, extraneous to a dictionary, though suitable for an encyclopedia or atlas. It omits, or rearranges in a less satisfactory way, such items as biographical data, literary works and given names, which older dictionaries (Webster II, for instance; or Webster Collegiate) used to present in separate sections, where they served a useful purpose because they could be studied together and compared.

Random House's type is clear and legible; it never strains your eyes. Its definitions are, on the whole, understandable. Its etymologies, though perhaps too brief to suit a language specialist, are generally correct. Its system of transcription to indicate pronunciation is far more accessible to the layman than is that of Webster III. Its linguistic philosophy will prove far more acceptable to all those who questioned Webster III's doctrine of usage. Random House does not hesitate to make what the descriptive linguists scornfully qualify as "value judgments"; it plainly tells you that a word is slang, substandard, vulgar, colloquial, avoided by the best writers and speakers. Random House displays far more "residual prudishness" than does Webster III; it omits far more four-letter words. It is almost as though the editors had been as much preoccupied with "good taste" as those of Webster III were with "usage."

Random House's list of consultants and consulting editors is impressive. They have done their work well. Not so well, however, as to make the offering "completely up-to-date," as claimed by the publicity, or to avoid such minor inaccuracies as the twice mentioned Spanish bomba de fuega (for bomba de fuego), in the Introduction and under bomb. It is easy to see how a work of more limited scope would omit del credere, which Webster III offers, or poorthink, which might be labeled a quasi-nonce-word. Credibility gap was not in use when Webster III appeared; it may not even have been in use when Random House was given its final touches. But there is hardly any excuse for the omission of Cosa Nostra, which has been with us since Valachi gave his testimony before a Congressional committee several years ago.

When I reviewed Webster III at the time of its appearance, I criticized the omission of don in the sense of "a don of the Mafia," and an Italian-American supernationalist criticized me in turn for bringing it up, because, according to him, the Mafia was just a figment of the imagination of American newspaper writers. I should have been happy to agree with him, but the Valachi testimony, and the Appalachin meeting shortly thereafter, unfortunately proved that I was right and he was wrong. Random House handles the issue with consummate diplomacy; one of its definitions for don is "a person of great importance," with which neither I nor my critic can take issue.

This diplomatic sense appears in other connections. Spaghetti, for instance, is given no plural form, but its Italian plural status is precisely described. Ravioli is stated to be in English either singular or plural, but again with a precise Italian derivation. Even salami is stated to come from an Italian singular salame whose plural is salami, more than one stick of the substance. By way of contrast, Webster III declares spaghetti and salami to be English singulars, with plural in -s, but shows inconsistency in stating ravioli to be an English plural, regardless of the fact that the same people who say spaghettis also say raviolis.

There is occasional compromise with usage. Rout, for example, is given the

---

UNDER CYGNUS

Who says I shall not straighten till I bend,
And must be broken if I hope to mend?
Did Samson gain by being chained and blind?
Dark heaven hints at something of the kind,
Seeing that as we beat toward Hercules
Our flank is compassed by the galaxy's,
And we drawn off from our intended course
By a grand reel of stars whose banded force,
Catching us up, makes light of all our loss,
And dances us into the Northern Cross.

Well, if I must surrender and be gay
In the wrong pasture of the Milky Way,
If in the Cross I must resign my Sword
To hang among the trophies of the Lord,
Let my distinction not consist alone
In having let myself be overthrown.
It was my loves and labors, carried high,
Which drove the flight that heaven turns awry,
My dreams which told the stars what they should tell.
Let the Swan, dying, sing of that as well.

RICHARD WILBUR

single pronunciation (rout), but route is given (root, rout), with the traditional pronunciation first, the confusing one second. Double-dome, labeled "slang," is defined as "egghead"; the latter, in turn, is labeled "informal" and equated with intellectual. I miss my own creations intellectuous and intellectuosity (for fake and pompous varieties of intellect), which I believe would serve the purpose of a useful distinction; but give them time. In most disputed cases, however, Random House minces no words and makes few concessions to substandard and confusing usages. Its discussion of disinterested and uninterested, at loggerheads with Webster III's permissiveness, deserves framing. Bimonthly for semi-monthly bears the clear label "loosely," which is possibly not strong enough. The discussions of ain't, and of like (for as) will meet with as much favor from traditionalists as their counterparts in Webster III met with criticism.

It is natural for a younger girl to be more attractive than an older woman, all other things being equal. In like manner, a younger dictionary has a natural advantage over its older counterpart. Random House tells you about escalating a war, where all that Webster III could tell you was escalating prices to compensate for certain factors, or escalating goods by lifting them in a mechanical conveyor. Under garbage, you will look in vain in Webster III for the specialized meanings the term has in spacecraft and in computer science. Even Random House hasn't gotten around to the latter (bits of information disgorged by the computer, but not in line with the purpose for which it is being operated); but it does have the former.

Because I have a special interest in foreign words and expressions, and the criteria by which such words are finally deemed to have become naturalized and no longer printed in italics, I tried to figure out the system used by the compilers of Random House. (In this connection, Webster III simply ignores the problem and treats every word alike, no matter how outlandish, again attesting to the equalitarian tendencies of its compilers.) Sadly, I have to report failure. Random House duplicates Webster III in using no italics for such expressions as ma foi, ba'al shem, queue fourché (is the incorrect agreement, from the French standpoint, proof of English naturalization?), quetzal, trompe l'oeil, rigatoni, seguidilla, force majeure, Rosh Hashanah, and even Rosh Hodesh. But then we fall into a series of inconsistencies. Why Luftwaffe but Wehrmacht? Why Yom Kippur but Yom Tov? Why carabinieri but bersaglieri? Why double entente but double entendre? Garçon and Kamerad are in italics, but garbanzo and kamikaze are not. And Sehnsucht is overlooked by both dictionaries, despite "Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt," which most singers prefer to "None but the lonely heart," and which is listed in all available dictionaries of foreign terms and expressions. Webster III, by the way, omits Luftwaffe, though it has Wehrmacht, but I notice this only now, illustrating what I said in my opening paragraph.

The last 400 pages of the Random House are devoted to things that do not, strictly speaking, pertain to a dictionary. There are lists of colleges and universities, both here and abroad. There are rather comprehensive and well-done two-way vocabularies of French, Spanish, Italian and German. There are major dates in world history, and there is a colored world atlas that gives, among other things, all the national flags (quite a boon in these days when the number of independent nations, and their banners in the UN Plaza, seem to multiply without end). And this is followed by a gazetteer that enables you to spot cities on the maps of the atlas. This is all to the good, but I still miss the old biographical sketches (now scattered in the text) and, above all, the derivations of personal and geographical names that appeared in the older works.

When dictionary compilers go too deeply into specialized fields, they run the risk of boners. The inside cover of the Random House presents a table of Indo-European languages which is, in the main, accurate. One could take issue with the placing of Latin between Oscan and Umbrian, or of High German between Anglo-Frisian and Low German-Dutch, as well as with the apparent derivation of Pashto from Avestan. The spelling Letish is obviously a misprint. The boner consists in reversing the position of the Goidelic and Brythonic languages under the Celtic heading, so that Welsh and Breton appear under Goidelic; Irish, Scots Gaelic and Manx under Brythonic; while Cornish, miraculously, appears under the correct Brythonic heading, but in the wrong company. Since Goidelic and Brythonic are very correctly described in the dictionary itself, it seems a pity that the compilers did not take the precaution of submitting the table to their expert consultants before consigning it to the presses.

Constant reference to this dictionary will doubtless bring to light other failings as time rolls on. But it will also bring to light hidden merits, as was the case with the earlier Webster III. Everything considered, the Random dictionary is an excellent buy and will prove a good and faithful (though not perfect) servant both to the layman and the specialist.

Next week, Mr. Pei will review Modern American Usage by Wilson Follett.

Affluence After Anger

RAYMOND WILLIAMS

Mr. Williams is a Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. He is the author of Culture and Society, The Long Revolution, and two novels, Border Country and Second Generation.

The conversion of reality into research material is now so rapid that I suppose I shouldn't really have been surprised when I was asked by a visiting scholar: "Whatever happened to that English cultural generation of the 1950s?" True, it was asked with a suggestion of melancholy and nostalgia, and this impression was deepened by the fact that I was being addressed as one of the relics or survivors. But it was also asked with a desire for an answer, and this has stayed in my mind.

The first and obvious answer, of course, is that most of them are still around. The names that come first to mind—John Osborne, Arnold Wesker, Kingsley Amis, John Braine, John Wain, Richard Hoggart—have in no way disappeared, and their work continues. And yet, I suppose that nobody any longer thinks of them as a generation; or, if they do, it is as a generation of the past. A comparable case is the generation of the thirties, which was described at the time in much the same way. Auden and Spender and Day Lewis are all alive and still writing, but what they have in common exists only in that past, a full generation ago. As writers develop, they separate out as individuals, and the sense of a movement is lost. It should not be surprising that the writers who were new in the fifties have gone through the same process.

Still, looked at another way, the problem is a real one, in cultural history. Many people now see the thirties in England through that surviving sense of a generation: the volunteers in the Spanish war, the Left intellectuals, the direct response in literature to fascism and the depression and the hunger marches. And it is generally believed that all this ended in the Second World War: a generation and its memorable structure of feeling were dispersed. Now people are beginning to see the fifties in much the same way: the new working-class writers, the attacks on the Establishment and the English class system, the questioning of affluence: there, in that period, were the issues and the writers, indissolubly linked. What has happened, if not to the writers, then to the issues? What cause of dispersion is the historical equivalent to World War II?

We shall not get an answer by simple parallels. We shall not get agreed answers at all, because the questions lead us into the important contemporary controversies. But I will give my own tentative answers, even though I am aware that for me this reality isn't yet research material with clear guidelines, but still lived and confused. I think that the fifties represented a general cultural shift in ways that the thirties did not. If you listen to some of the men from that older time, now comforting themselves with lecture tours, television programs and memoirs, everybody in England was then much like the movement: that is to say, everybody (except perhaps Neville Chamberlain) was politically on the Left, involved with the hunger marches and the fight against fascism. In fact—the records on this are quite clear—such people were a very small minority. By any test you care to make—the vote for the Labour Party, the membership of the Communist Party, the circulation figures of left-wing writers—the thirties were much less of the Left in England as a whole than any subsequent decade. Both the forties and fifties, to say nothing of the sixties, moved very much more that way. For the thirties, the sense of a left-wing literary movement has to be related, from the beginning, to the fact that literature was very markedly a minority interest. Within this essentially small world, the marked shift of emphasis in writing and opinion took on an importance which later historians, consulting only the more obvious written records, undoubtedly exaggerated. The perpetual and understandable tendency to judge the directions of a society by the color of what seems its avant-garde has in that sense been fully worked through.

The fifties, in important respects, were different. The public for literature had grown substantially. But two other factors made a much greater difference. First, there was a real educational expansion: not so much in the population as a whole, where for three-quarters of the children it amounted to little more than one extra year in schools simply renamed secondary schools; but it was critical for one important group, the grammar-school boys—the children of working and lower-middle-class families who could now get through to the universities more easily. Most of the new writers came from these social groups, by sharp contrast with the writers of the thirties who were mainly from upper-class boarding schools, and who were occasionally joined by working men writing short stories and reportage. In the fifties, almost all the new writers were conspicuously mobile, socially, and they were only the visible tip of the emergence of a whole new group who for the most part constituted their supporters and readers. But, second, English society was in the first years of a more general cultural expansion through new media: television and records and paperbacks, especially, were greatly widening the potential audience. These two factors acting together made a difference.

Thus it is clear, as soon as we name them, that they were ambiguous factors. Many people, at the time and since, explained the anger of the new writers as a temporary irritation caused by the difficulties of their mobility. Once they were successful, it was widely and cynically said, they would settle into the Establishment they had attacked. It hasn't happened quite like that, and the few cases I can think of where it has are not especially important. But it is undoubtedly true that as the dust settled it became evident that the targets these writers had in mind, the new experiences they were essentially representing, were in fact various. By the early sixties there was as much complaint against the stupidity of most ordinary people as against the meager and class-ridden educational system which might have caused it. For some, liberation meant radical social and cultural change; for others, it meant new sexual conventions and the imperatives of personal experiment. There was some overlapping, but the tendencies of the sixties—both in new creative work and in criticism—showed major divergences and new hostilities and conflicts within what had been taken, too hastily, as a single new group. The bases of this had been present from the beginning, but it was not only publicity and enthusiasm that overrode them; it was also, for a time, a genuine recognition of a new group, with important experiences and tones in common. As these have become absorbed, by the very fact that the writers were the outriders of a more general change, there is no longer anything very identifiable to use as a pointer to a movement. The men are still there, and writing, but in a society which in important ways has changed in their own directions and overtaken them.

The cultural expansion which was the means of this overtaking is still deeply ambiguous. In a way it is true to say that the beat groups and their young audiences were the successors to the new writers of the fifties. Certainly, by the time they had arrived, there was not much left of the old conservative England which had been known abroad: the careful underdressing, understatement, rigidity, of the old ruling class. Was this then the new Britain, with Wilson's Labour government as its formal recognition? A year or two ago, many would have said so. I doubt if anybody who is really thinking and watching would say it now.

The other way of describing the cultural expansion is all too clearly there. It doesn't sound as nice as a literary or cultural movement, but it is what is happening. The name is capitalism, in the stage at which investment in entertainment and fashionable culture becomes profitable. The new voices, the new sounds, the new social experiences and backgrounds, which had marked the new writing of the fifties and, in a simpler way, some of the new groups, were very rapidly exploited in a new and massive commercial enterprise. And suddenly the movement wasn't writers or groups any more; it was a new commercial lingo—a "commercial" sound, as people started saying of records—and behind it money was racing into position, to take these new audiences and attach them through advertising to a powerful reorganization of the whole society around selling and quick consumption. The avant-garde, suddenly, were the pirate stations, the fashion merchants, the Sunday supplements. And the Labour government, among its other changes of course, started to see the future in these empty ways. Some said it was the arrival of Americanism, and in films and television—for financial reasons—this is already literally so. You can perhaps date the change from the moment when the film of Lawrence's Sons and Lovers—a book which had stood as a kind of source for the fifties—used a good young American actor to play the English miner's son. The commercial calculation had begun to exert its imperatives.

So what happened to the cultural generation of the fifties? We are mostly still here, mostly successful, and the things we were against are still implacably with us: a class society, a meager educational system, a mock affluence. The sense of a movement and a generation has been dispersed by the simple device of its being turned to profit, in its most superficial terms. Some of us, perhaps more than I think, are still fighting what is happening, still supplying a demand which the system can't satisfy, and knowing that we can't go back, even if any of us wanted to. A democratic culture and a commercial culture have touched, overlapped and become confused. But now suddenly, in these last months, the differences between them, and so the need to choose, have become very apparent. That is why the reality isn't yet quite research material, why we have to stand up again and be counted, through a new crisis. By the spring, perhaps, we shall know who we were, and how many, and what has really happened to a generation.

A Chicken in Every Wok

HELEN YGLESIAS

The Christmas edition of The Wonderful World of Cookbooks, a 63-page catalogue of a staggering number and variety of nothing but cookbooks, would seem to emphasize the fact that there are quite enough cookbooks on the market already. This hasn't interfered in any way with the publication of a new crop. Among the big books designed for gift giving, some of the biggest are cookbooks; of these, some are beautifully produced; some are fascinating to read; some are special in the service they render, and some combine a blend of these qualities.

The Art of Cuisine, Maurice Joyant's collection of Toulouse-Lautrec's recipes and design illustrations for menus, makes its appeal as an art book as well as a cookbook. I don't know that it's greatly successful on these levels, but it is on another: the recipes are splendid reading. Joyant, an art dealer and gallery owner, was a close friend of Lautrec, as well as his executor. Joyant apparently kept a record of the recipes invented by Lautrec, and others they both gathered from skilled cooks; he also collected the sketches Lautrec produced as decorative menus for his dinner parties.

The book makes much of a simple-minded analogy between the art of painting and the art of cooking, and misuses both by an inept superimposition of sketches and recipes. The full-page color illustrations have a tired familiarity, as if we had been viewing them on billboards for months. As a result, the most touching reproduction in the book is by Vuillard: the frontispiece portrait of Lautrec standing before a kitchen stove.

A further irritation is the foolish introduction by M. G. Dortu and Philip Huisman in which Lautrec is made to come on as the character played by José Ferrer. I lost patience when they describe Lautrec sharing with Joyant "a horror of excess," followed immediately by Lautrec's feeble constitution giving way to "excesses of work and pleasure." The introduction also plays on Lautrec's touchstone recipe ("he would say of people he scorned: 'They are not worthy of ring doves with olives' "), but the index fails to list such a recipe. Instead we have "young wild pigeon with olives."

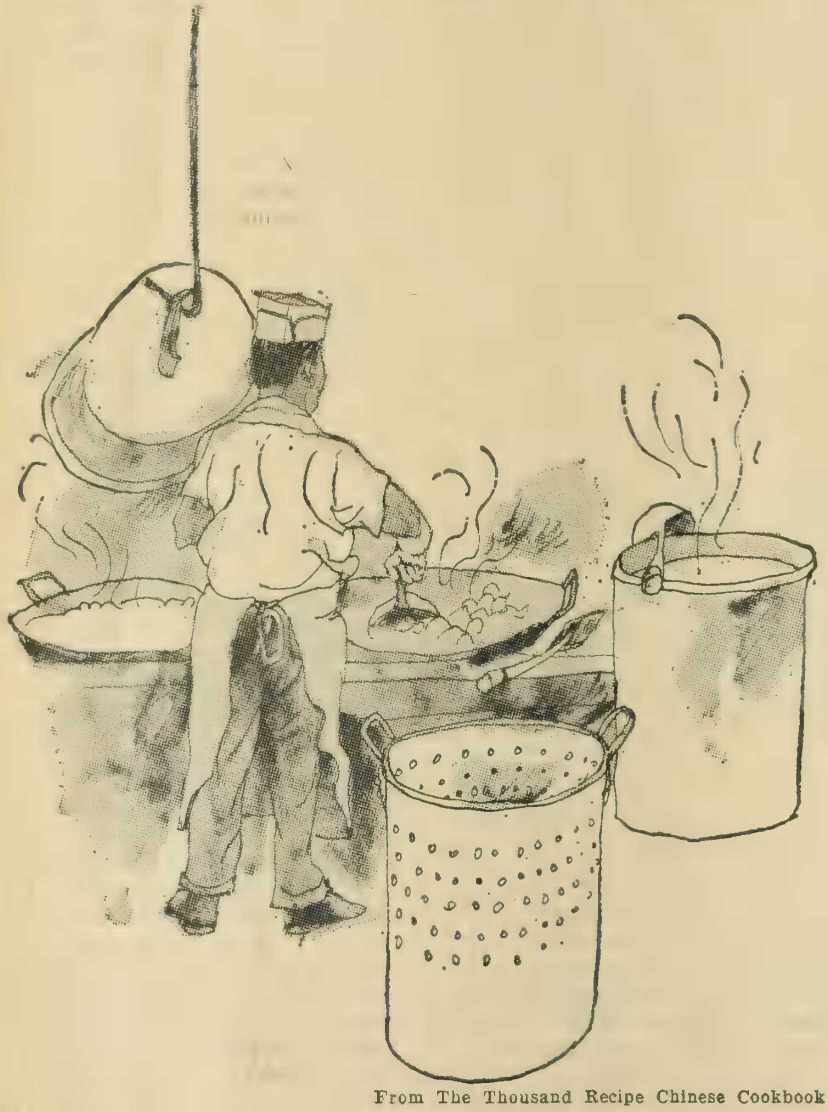
There are many workmanlike recipes in the book; but Lautrec is something of a de Sade of the kitchen and quite as fascinating, witty and sensual. Game particularly arouses his most outrageous appetites. Here he is on Roast Snipe:

> Having killed some September snipe, eat them quite fresh when you come back from the shoot. Pluck but do not empty them, push one or two peppercorns into the anus, surround them with a thin slice of bacon and put them on spit in front of a light wood fire. Under the birds to be roasted, lay slices of stale bread. . . . Ten minutes of a brisk fire should be enough to roast the snipe. The flesh should stay bloody . . . cut the snipe quickly into four portions, mash the entrails onto the bread, press the carcasses . . . moisten with a small glass of cognac . . . let the bread slices flare slightly, then arrange the snipe and the heads together with some grilled bacon slices.

And here his advice for tenderizing a chicken:

> . . . take them out of the hen-run; pursue them into open country, and when you have made them run, kill them with a gun loaded with very small shot. The meat of the chicken gripped with fright, will become tender.

The last revived an early childhood memory of a sacrificial ritual practiced by religious immigrant Jewish housewives, called shlogen kapores. Between Purim and Passover, two chickens destined for the soup pot (we were a large family), lived in the house for an hour or so before my mother seized them, tied their legs together, whirled them about her head with an appropriate prayer, clearing off the sins of the household, and slaughtered them. The procedure no doubt had a tenderizing effect as well, but neither this nor Lautrec's method is the sort of thing the average cook is apt to put her faith in. Nor will a dessert which combines in a pastry shell sugar, cinnamon, eggs, cream, butter and beef marrow, find favor even among ardent beef-marrow fanciers, among whom I count myself. But voyeur cooks (male) should be enchanted with this book.



From The Thousand Recipe Chinese Cookbook

The Lautrec-Joyant approach is a vivid reminder that we are only one level of abundance beyond cannibalism. They make the vegetarian view comprehensible. Lelord Kordel's Cook Right—Live Longer is not vegetarian, but it is in the same spirit. It's a book for those whose gratifications are fed in the gesture that sweeps white sugar and white flour off the shelves to make way for blackstrap molasses, sea salt and dry seaweed. The chapter headings give the show away: "Refined Is A Dirty Word," "How To Avoid Nutricide In Your Kitchen," "Yogurt, The Almost Perfect Food." Mr. Kordel issues the usual warnings: don't peel vegetables with a knife, don't overcook, don't overseason. He suggests the usual products: safflower oil, wheat germ, sunflower seed, soybean. But the curse of wholesomeness is nicely taken off the book by a liberal use of garlic and herbs and by the variety of delicious foreign recipes, all simply explained and easy to make. There are no illustrations, but a number of useful lists to guide the novice through this special cuisine. The author even tells you how to grow fresh sprouts from beans, seeds and grains in your kitchen. The sample cake sent out to book editors by the publisher's publicity department was an excellent, light and moist fruit cake with a pervasive fig flavor which proved easy to make at home. Naturally, it's good for your health.

The Classic Cooking of Spain, a modest work of impeccable taste, is a little gem, right down to its price. The great Spanish dishes (zarzuela, paella, gazpacho, flan, tortilla, cocida) are here arranged in sections devoted to the regions in which the dishes originated. The photographs convey a sense of the sharp differences of Spain's separate areas, and Jeannette Aguilar has included excerpts from Spanish classic literature by Vives, Cervantes, Pío Baroja, José María Espinas, Lorca, Antonio Machado and others. This presentation makes a charming book effect, but is not perhaps the most efficient way to handle the recipes. Spanish omelettes (no relation to the cafeteria version) would be better described in one place, including all regional tortilla variations, instead of appearing as three distinct recipes in different sections of the book. This is also true of the variable local stews (cocidas). But the index sorts them out correctly under single headings. I think also that a book for North Americans might make a point of the essential difference between Spanish, and Mexican or Latin American cuisine, which is often jumbled together.

But this is carping about a gentle book that anyone should be delighted to own, if only for the wonderfully simple recipes of Gambas al ajillo (shrimps with garlic) and Sopa de ajo (garlic soup). The latter, made of water, garlic, bread and eggs, and eaten with a wooden spoon, deserves at least the international reputation of onion soup.

From Modern French Culinary Art

Henri-Paul Pellaprat's Modern French Culinary Art tells how to make onion soup more than one way, and in its 1171 pages of over 2,000 recipes and 400 photographs, a great deal more than that. It is all worth knowing, whatever French cuisine teacher is now on your shelf, because it seems to be the clearest and best organized work on this most exacting and elaborate method of cooking. If Pellaprat is not as entertaining as Larousse or as Alice B. Toklas, he offers other virtues. He is simpler than Larousse, Escoffier or Alice B. Toklas. Pellaprat, one of France's great chefs and teachers (he taught at Le Cordon Bleu), has been translated for use in American kitchens by Avanelle Day. As true as the blurb says, "novice or seasoned gourmet can reproduce the world's most superb dishes in his or her own kitchen," and what's more, by studying the photographs and reading the detailed directions on serving, he or she can knock the company out with the way the food looks as well as tastes. The larger-than-life color photographs are not my dish; I lost my appetite at the first glimpse of "Turkey Breast Mercure," a cone-shaped mold covered with sliced turkey, dressed with truffles and set in the hollow created by two kneeling horses whose heads and forelegs have been sculpted from 2 pounds of chilled butter. Modern French Culinary Art also tells how to make chocolate-covered candies and how to arrange them on a dish. Indeed, it seems to tell everything about everything: sauces, hot and cold hors d'oeuvres, soups, fish, meats, poultry, pâtés, salads and desserts; and includes a splendid illustration of how to peel and slice an orange with a knife and fork, continental head-waiter fashion, a method which somehow makes it taste like pineapple. It looks easy, but it's harder to do than a quiche lorraine.

THE ART OF CUISINE. By Henri de Toulouse-Lautrec and Maurice Joyant. Illustrated by Toulouse-Lautrec in color. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. 168 pp. $15.

COOK RIGHT—LIVE LONGER. By Lelord Kordel. G. P. Putnam's Sons. 443 pp. $5.95.

THE CLASSIC COOKING OF SPAIN. By Jeannette Aguilar. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. Illustrated. Black-and-white photographs. 160 pp. $4.95.

MODERN FRENCH CULINARY ART. By Henri-Paul Pellaprat. World Publishing Co. Illustrated. 422 photographs, 284 in full color. 18 drawings. 1171 pp. $22.50.

THE THOUSAND RECIPE CHINESE COOKBOOK. By Gloria Bley Miller. Black-and-white illustrations by Earl Thollander. Atheneum Publishers. 926 pp. $20.

The Thousand Recipe Chinese Cookbook does for another great cuisine what Pellaprat does for the French. Gloria Bley Miller is an American who understands that she must start from the beginning. She defines the nature of the ingredients, the cooking and serving utensils and the methods of cooking. She manages to do this in an attractively simple manner, and Earl Thollander's suggestive sketches are charming in a way that is entirely missed by the gluttony of full-color illustrations.

Every highly cultivated cuisine has its excesses, and it goes without saying that the stranger the custom the more excessive it seems. Chinese haute cuisine contains some of the most shocking. (Far Eastern travelers' stories of being served delicacies such as the eye of the cow or being invited to extract nerve tissue from the brains of still living monkeys are legendary, but true.) But at a more normal level, which is where Mrs. Miller stays, both the preparing and eating of Chinese food convey a gratifying illusion that one has approached the question of feeding in a civilized fashion. That is, the best possible flavors have been extracted from the ingredients with a respectful concern for the nature of the ingredient as well as its effect in the whole design. What accounts for this harmonious balance of asceticism and physical well-being is unclear to me (the thought of Mao?). But some of it seems to be mysteriously bound up with the use of fresh products cooked so quickly that their naturalness is undisturbed, as well as with advance kitchen preparation so meticulous that what is served is perfectly sized for eating without the need to cut, tear or otherwise act like a beast at table. At any rate, an aura of virtue surrounds Chinese cuisine, not unlike that connected with vegetarianism or calorie counting—with the difference that all the sensual needs of eating are also met.

Mrs. Miller has provided the essential information for entering this new world. I tried a five-course dinner for nine people, with a handicap of no special equipment and only a few special ingredients (soy sauce, water chestnuts and bamboo shoots, available at any supermarket), and had a clear success. For those who want to go the whole way, The Thousand Recipe Chinese Cookbook's 900 pages and splendid index will tell you all about woks, thousand-year eggs, winter melon, stir-frying and all the exotic works. If you have any notion of spending $20 on a cookbook this Christmas, spend it here.

Big Books: 1966

The books listed below are a small selection from the many gift books published this season. They are chosen on the basis of special interest to Nation readers.

CHINA. By Emil Schulthess. Viking Press. 172 pp. 100 black-and-white illus. 60 color plates. $25.

A photo-journalist's record of China today, examining the remarkable contrasts of its geography and people, with additional text by Edgar Snow, Harry Hamm and Emil Egli and an introduction by Hans Keller. Egli addresses himself to changes in geography and climate; Snow analyzes the factors which led China to adopt communism; Hamm discusses current Chinese problems. An aid in evaluating the changes that have occurred in China during the last two decades.

THE THREE BANNERS OF CHINA. By Marc Riboud. The Macmillan Company. 216 pp. 100 black-and-white illus. 50 color plates. $12.50.

Text and photographs, the result of a four-month, 16,000-mile trip in China in 1965. The Three Banners of the title are The People's Communes, The Great Leap Forward and the new General Party Line. Riboud was accompanied by K. S. Karol, a journalist, whose relationship to the work is not indicated. Of special interest is an excerpt from the writings of Mao Tse-tung and the translation of a death penalty notice which appears in one of the photographs.

THE GREAT PILGRIMAGE OF THE MIDDLE AGES. By Vera and Hellmut Hell. With an introduction by Sir Thomas Kendrick. Clarkson N. Potter. 275 pp. 190 illus. 10 color plates. $17.50.

Photographs of the Romanesque and early Gothic buildings and art works along the road to, and including, St. James of Compostela in the beautifully preserved medieval city of Santiago, in the north of Spain. The text and introduction describe the legend of St. James, as well as the history of the pilgrimage.

THE GUELL PARK OF GAUDI: A MINIATURE UNIVERSE. By Carola Giedion-Welcker. Wittenborn & Co. 140 pp. 43 black-and-white illus. 35 color plates. $15.

Detailed color and black-and-white photographs of the Barcelona children's park designed by Antonio Gaudi, illustrating the strange, playful quality of this unique architect's bizarre, almost art nouveau effects. A four-language text (Spanish, German, English and French) places Gaudi as a Catalan sculptor in the Le Corbusier tradition. The English is faulty and inadvertently amusing.

LONDON, FLOWER OF CITIES ALL. By Richard Church. Illustrated by Imre Hofbauer. The John Day Co. 208 pp. $15.

A combined literary and pictorial assessment of the history, pageantry and visual beauty of London, illustrated in black-and-white drawings and four-color reproductions of paintings.

CAMBRIDGE. By Michael Grant. With an introduction by Noël Annan. Photographs by John Marmaras. William Morrow & Co. 192 pp. 90 black-and-white illus. 16 color plates. $15.

An account of Cambridge as a cultural and artistic center. The photographs show the city, the colleges and their treasures. A distinction is made between the merely quaint and picturesque and the good and first-rate.

AN ILLUSTRATED HISTORY OF GERMANY. By André Maurois. Translated by Stephen Hardman. Viking Press. 296 pp. $22.50.

Forty full-page color plates and many more black-and-white illustrations dramatize the author's words, which attempt to see German history in the light of its art.

DAUMIER: MAN OF HIS TIME. By Oliver W. Larkin. McGraw-Hill Book Co. 245 pp. 100 black-and-white illus. 8 color plates. $9.95.

A full-length treatment of Daumier the man, the social and political satirist and the artist. The chronology of his oils, water colors and drawings are an indication of how he developed as a creative artist from youth to old age. The author is a Pulitzer Prize winner.

DAUMIER. By Robert Rey. Harry N. Abrams. 160 pp. 78 black-and-white illus. 48 color plates. $15.

Daumier in lithographs, drawings and paintings.

THE MAN FROM M.A.L.I.C.E. Caricatures by David Levine. With an introduction by Malcolm Muggeridge. E. P. Dutton & Co. 120 pp. $4.95.

A collection of more than 200 contributions to the New York Review of Books, Esquire, Atlas and The Washington Post, by a brilliant caricaturist of the political, social and literary scene.

THE GRAPHIC WORK OF PHILIP EVERGOOD. By Lucy R. Lippard. Crown Publishers. 160 pp. 176 black-and-white illus. $10.

The first extended study devoted to Evergood's graphic work. Predominantly social comment by an American artist who combines explicit realism with fantasy.

ECCE HOMO. By George Grosz. With an introduction by Henry Miller. Grove Press. 104 pp. 84 black-and-white illus. 16 color plates. $15.

A volume of reproductions by the German-born artist, originally published in 1923 and condemned at that time as "an insult to public morality." Corrosive portraits by an artist at war with the society he depicts. Grosz's work is well described by Henry Miller "as naked and ugly, as beautiful and eloquent, as truth itself."

TWO GREAT MASTERS OF UKIYO-E: FIFTY-THREE STAGES OF THE TOKAIDO. By Utakawa Hiroshige. THIRTY-SIX VIEWS OF MOUNT FUJI. By Katsushika Hokusai. Both edited by Ichitaro Kondo. English adaptation by Charles S. Terry. Boxed set. East-West Center Press. 212 pp. $24.50.

Full-color wood-block prints of Hiroshige's work which first made its appearance in 1834, and Hokusai's views of Mount Fuji, produced between 1823 and 1835.

2,000 YEARS OF CHRISTIAN ART. By Eric Newton and William Neil. Harper & Row. 318 pp. 200 black-and-white illus. 17 color plates. $9.95.

A collection of anonymous Byzantine artists and architects, as well as great masters of the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. A study of iconography, structure and technique as they vary in different epochs and adapt to changes of Christian attitudes.

BIRDS OF THE NORTHERN FOREST. By John A. Livingston. Paintings by J. F. Lansdowne. Houghton Mifflin Co. 247 pp. 57 pencil sketches. 56 color plates. $20.

A comprehensive and beautifully illustrated study of the birds of Northern America and Canada.

—Literary Editor

Records: 1966 / Benjamin Boretz

In this annual listing, the "Records of the Year," are those conjunctions of performances and works that would constitute major musical events in any context. Following these, a number of other recordings released during 1966 that make worth while, if somewhat more limited, contributions to the recorded literature are listed according to their aspect of greatest interest: as adequate performances of important literature previously unavailable or inadequately represented on records; as responsible performances of frequently performed literature; as reissues of historic performances; or as reissues of more recent recordings lately out of print. Dates in parentheses refer to Nation issues in which relevant discussions have appeared; records not previously reviewed will in most cases be discussed in forthcoming issues.

I. Records of the Year

BOULEZ: Le Marteau sans maître. Jeanne Deroubaix, alto; Severino Gazzeloni, alto flute; Georges van Gucht, xylorimba; Claude Ricou, vibraphone; Jean Batigne, percussion; Anton Stingl, guitar; Serge Collot, viola; Pierre Boulez, cond. Turnabout TV 4081/TV 34081S.

BRUCKNER: Symphonies Nos. 4, 7, 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D4L 342/D4S 742.

DAVIDOVSKY: Synchronisms Nos. 1, 2, and 3. Efrain Guigui, clarinet; Harvey Sollberger, flute; Sophie Sollberger, flute; Stanley Drucker, clarinet; Paul Zukovsky, violin; Robert Martin, cello. SOLLBERGER: Chamber Variations (1964). Group for Contemporary Music at Columbia University; Gunther Schuller, cond. CRI 204/204SD.

DVORAK: Symphonies Nos. 7, 8, 9. The Cleveland Orchestra; George Szell, cond. Epic SC 6065/BSC 155.

FINE: Symphony 1962. Irving Fine, cond. Toccata Concertante; Serious Song for String Orchestra. Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2829.

GLUCK: Orfeo ed Euridice. Shirley Verrett, Anna Moffo, Judith Raskin, vocalists; Instrumental Ensemble of the Collegium Musicum Italicum and The Virtuosi di Roma; Renato Fasano, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6169.

HAYDN: "Theresien" Mass. Vienna Boys' Choir; Vienna Konzerthaus Chamber Orchestra; Ferdinand Grossman, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2854.

JOSQUIN DES PREZ: Motets. Capella Antiqua of Munich; Konrad Ruhland, cond. Telefunken SAWT 9480-A.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 9. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Das Lied von der Erde. Mildred Miller, mezzo-soprano; Ernst Häfliger, tenor; New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Bruno Walter, cond. Columbia D3L 344/D3S 744. (10/24).

NEW MUSIC FOR PIANO. (including, notably, works by Babbitt, Berger, Miriam Gideon, Earl Kim, George

New England Saints

AUSTIN WARREN

There are two strains in the New England character—the Yankee trader and the Yankee saint. This book is devoted to the saints. The Puritans used the term saint to designate members of their church, but Mr. Warren's uncanonized saints are often a complex of scholar, priest, and poet—men whose spiritual integrity was their calling and vocation. This book brings to life New England spirituality from the Puritan poets to Irving Babbitt.

200 pages $3.75

The New England Conscience

AUSTIN WARREN

The extreme rigor of the New England Conscience, that exaggerated sense of duty and obligation, caused psychological deformities but also helped assure the survival of the struggling colonies.

Austin Warren, himself a New Englander, examines the characteristic theological, psychological, historical, and literary manifestations of conscience through four centuries of New England history. Professor Warren offers this unique regional portrait with a rare blend of compassionate sympathy and critical detachment.

244 pages $6.00

AVAILABLE IN PAPERBACK:

Rage for Order

AUSTIN WARREN 174 pages $1.75

Richard Crashaw:

A Study in Baroque Sensibility

AUSTIN WARREN 272 pages $1.35

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN PRESS

ANN ARBOR

Perle and Mel Powell). Robert Helps, piano. RCA Victor LM/LSC 7042.

PUCCINI: Turandot. Birgit Nilsson, Franco Corelli, Renata Scotto, soloists; Rome Opera Chorus and Orchestra; Francesco Molinari-Pradelli, cond. Angel (S) CL-3671.

STRAVINSKY: Le Baiser de la fée. Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6203/MS 6803. (11/21).

STRAVINSKY: Pulcinella. Irene Jordan, soprano; George Shirley, tenor; Donald Gramm, bass; Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6281/MS 6881. (11/21).

VERDI: Don Carlo. Renata Tebaldi, Grace Bumbry, Carlo Bergonzi, Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, Nikolai Ghiaurov, soloists; Chorus and Orchestra of the Royal Opera House, Covent Garden; Georg Solti, cond. London A 4432/OSA 1432.

WAGNER: Lohengrin. Sándor Kónya, Lucine Amara, Rita Gorr, William Dooley, Jerome Hines, Calvin Marsh, soloists; Chorus Pro Musica of Boston; Boston Symphony; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6710.

II. LITERATURE OF SPECIAL INTEREST

BACH: St. John Passion. Kurt Equiluz, Max von Egmond, Jacques Villisch, Bert van t'Hoff, Siegfried Schneeweis, vocal soloists; Wiener Sängerknaben; Chorus Viennensia; Concentus Musicus, Vienna; Hans Gillesberger, cond. Telefunken SKH 19. (10/10).

BARTOK: Violin Concerto. STRAVINSKY: Violin Concerto. Joseph Silverstein, violin; Boston Symphony Orchestra; Erich Leinsdorf, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2852. (5/9).

BEETHOVEN: Missa Solemnis. Gundula Janowitz, Christa Ludwig, Fritz Wunderlich, Walter Berry, soloists; Wiener Singverein; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Herbert von Karajan, cond. DGG LPM 19208-9/SLPM 139208-9. (N.B. Another new recording of this work, conducted by Otto Klemperer [Angel 3679 (S)] is also available but has not yet been received for review.)

BOULEZ: Le Soleil des eaux. MESSIAEN: Chronochromie (with Koechlin: Les Bandar-Log); B.B.C. Symphony Orchestra and Chorus; Antal Dorati, cond. Angel (S) 36295. (5/2).

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 1. Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Eugen Jochum, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 19131/SLPM 139 131.

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 9. Te Deum. Maria Stader, Sieglinde Wagner, Ernst Häfliger, Peter Lagger, soloists; Chorus of the Deutschen Oper, Berlin; Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra; Eugen Jochum, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 19 19117-18/SLPM 139117-18.

BYRD: Consort Music. LAWES: Consort Music. Leonhardt Consort; Gustav Leonhardt, cond. Telefunken SAWT 9481-A.

CAMPION, Coperario, Gibbons, Locke and others: Florid Song and Viol Music in England, 1610-1660. Studio for Early Music; Concentus Musicus, Vienna. Telefunken SAWT 9472-A.

COPLAND: Dance Symphony (with Gould: Spirituals for Orchestra). Chicago Symphony Orchestra; Morton Gould, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2850. (5/2).

COPLAND: The Tender Land. (Abridged Version). Joy Clements, Claramae Turner, Richard Cassily, Norman Treigle, Richard Fredericks, soloists; Choral Art Society; New York Philharmonic; Aaron Copland, cond. Columbia ML 6214/MS 6814.

DALLAPICCOLA: Canti di Prigonia (with Dallapiccola: Two Choruses of Michelangelo; Peragallo: De Profundis; Petrassi: Nonsense); Monteverdi-Chorus, Hamburg; Jürgen Jürgens, cond. Telefunken SLT 43095-B.

DONIZETTI: Don Pasquale. Anna Maccianti, Mario Basiola, Ugo Benelli, Augusto Frati, Alfredo Mariotti, soloists; Orchestra and Chorus of the Florence May Festival; Ettore Gracis, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 18971-2/SLPM 138971-2.

DONIZETTI: Lucrezia Borgia. Montserrat Caballé, Ezio Flagello, Alfredo Kraus, Shirley Verrett, Giuseppe Baratti, Robert El Hage, soloists; RCA Italiana Opera Orchestra and Chorus; Jonel Perlea, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6176.

DVORAK: String Quartet in A-flat, Op. 105 (with: Smetana: String Quartet); The Guarneri Quartet. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2887.

ELGAR: The Dream of Gerontias. Janet Baker, Richard Lewis, Kim Borg, soloists; Hallé Orchestra and Chorus; John Barbirolli, cond. Angel (S) B 3660.

FINE: Fantasy for String Trio. COPLAND: Trio: Vitebsk. CARTER: Woodwind Quintet. PISTON: Serenade (with works by Beethoven, Brahms and Mozart); Boston Symphony Chamber Players. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6167.

GOUNOD: Messe Solennelle Ste. Cécile. Irmgard Seefried, Gerhard Stolze, Hermann Uhde, soloists; Czech Sängerchor; Czech Philharmonic Orchestra; Igor Markevitch, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 19111/SLPM 139 111.

HAYDN: The Creation. Ingeborg Wenglor, Gerhard Unger, Theo Adam, soloists; Berlin Radio Chorus and Orchestra; Helmut Koch, cond. Heliodor H/HS 25028-2.

HONEGGER: Symphonies Nos. 2 and 3. Czech Philharmonic; Serge Baudo, cond. Crossroads 22 16 0009/22 16 0010.

IVES: Symphony No. 2. The Fourth of July. New York Philharmonic Orchestra; Leonard Bernstein, cond. Columbia ML 6289/MS 6889.

MAHLER: Symphony No. 10 ("performing version" by Deryck Cooke). Philadelphia; Eugene Ormandy, cond. Columbia M2L 335/M2S 735. (10/24).

MONTEVERDI: Mass in Four Parts (1651) (with: Laudate Pueri; Ut Queant Laxis; and Mass in Four Parts (1640); The Choir of St. John's College, Cambridge; George Guest, cond. Argo ZRG 5494.

MOZART: Music for Solo Organ. "Mozart" Organ, Haarlem; E. Power Biggs, organist. Columbia ML 6256/MS 6856.

RACHMANINOFF: Symphony No. 2. London Symphony; André Previn, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2899.

RAMEAU: Hippolyte et Aricie. Janet Baker, Angela Hickey, Robert Tear, John Shirley-Quirk, soloists; St. Anthony Singers; English Chamber Orchestra; Anthony Lewis, cond. L'Oiseau-Lyre (S) OL 286-7-8.

DE LA RUE: Requiem. Funeral Music, 1500-1550 by Brumel, Vaet, Senfl and others. Capella Antiqua, Munich; Konrad Ruland, cond. Telefunken (S) AWT 9471-A.

RUGGLES: Sun Treader (with Helps: Symphony No. 1); Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Zoltan Rosznyai, cond. Columbia ML 6201-MS 6801. (3/7).

TALLIS: Tudor Church Music (Lamentations of Jeremiah; Videte Miraculum; Lesson; Sancte Deus); Andrew Davis, organ; Choir of King's College, Cambridge; David Willcocks, cond. Argo ZRG 5479.

VARESE: Arcana (with Martin: Concerto for seven winds, percussion and strings); Chicago Symphony; Jean Martinon, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2914.

III. PERFORMANCES OF SPECIAL INTEREST

BACH: Three Flute Sonatas. Elaine Schaffer, flute; George Malcolm, harpsichord. Angel (S) 36337.

BEETHOVEN: Piano Sonatas Nos. 11 in B-flat, 13 in E-flat, 27 in E minor;

Wilhelm Kempff, piano. DGG LPM 18 939/SLPM 138 939.

BRAHMS: Liebeslieder Waltzes. Saramae Endich, Florence Kopleff, Seth McCoy, Theodor Uppman, vocal soloists; Claude Frank and Lillian Kallir, pianists; The Robert Shaw Chorale; Robert Shaw, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2864.

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 7 in E major (with Wagner: Siegfried Idyll; Prelude to Lohengrin); Columbia Symphony; Bruno Walter, cond. M2L 290/M2S 690.

BRUCKNER: Symphony No. 4. London Symphony Orchestra; Istvan Kertesz, cond. London CM 9480/CS 6480.

DONIZETTI: Lucia di Lammermoor. Anna Moffo, Carlo Bergonzi, Mario Sereni, Ezio Flagello, soloists; RCA Italiana Opera Orchestra and Chorus; Georges Prêtre, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6170.

HANDEL: Messiah. Judith Raskin, soprano; Florence Kopleff, alto; Richard Lewis, tenor; Thomas Paul, bass; Robert Shaw Chorale and Orchestra; Robert Shaw, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 6175.

HAYDN: Symphonies Nos. 88 in G; 104 in D. The New Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel (S) 36346.

LISZT: The Operatic Liszt. Hexameron (Variations on the March from Bellini's I Puritani by Liszt, Thalberg, Pixis, Herz, Czerny and Chopin); Réminiscences de Norma. Raymond Lewenthal, piano. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2895.

MENDELSSOHN: Violin Concerto. TCHAIKOVSKY: Violin Concerto. Erick Friedman, violin; London Symphony Orchestra; Seiji Ozawa, cond. RCA Victor LM/LSC 2865.

MOZART: The Abduction from the Seraglio (with Bastien and Bastienne) Erika Köth, Fritz Wunderlich, Kurt Böhme; Chorus and Orchestra of the Bavarian State Opera, Munich; Eugen Jochum, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 19 213-15/SLPM 139 213-5.

MOZART: Symphonies Nos. 29 in A; 33 in B-flat. New Philharmonic Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel (S) 36329.

RAVEL: Concerto in D for the Left Hand (1930-31). Concerto in G for Piano and Orchestra (1930-31). Monique Haas, piano; French National Orchestra; Paul Paray, cond. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 18988/SLPM 138988.

RAVEL: Daphnis et Chloë. Choeurs de la Radio Romande, Lausanne; Orchestre de la Suisse Romande, Geneva; Ernest Ansermet, cond. London CM 9456/CS 6456.

SCHUBERT: Four-Hand Piano Music. Paul Badura-Skoda, Jörg Demus, piano. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 39107/SLPM 139107.

SCHUBERT: Die Winterreise. Six Songs. Dietrich Fischer-Dieskau, baritone; Jörg Demus, piano. Deutsche Grammophon LPM 192OL-2/SLPM 139201-2. (5/9).

SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 1 in B-flat. "Manfred" Overture. New Philharmonia; Otto Klemperer, cond. Angel (S) 36353.

STRAVINSKY: Perséphone. Vera Zorina, Michele Molese, vocalists; Ithaca College Concert Choir; Texas Boys' Choir; Gregg Smith Singers; Columbia Symphony Orchestra; Igor Stravinsky, cond. Columbia ML 6319/MS 6919. (11/21).

VIRTUOSO: (virtuoso piano arrangements by Moriz Rosenthal, Leopold Godowsky, Rachmaninoff, Liszt, Tausig, of works by Chopin, Strauss, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Kreisler, Bizet); Charles Rosen, piano. Epic LC 3912/BC 1312.

IV: Reissues

BACH: Magnificat. PURCELL: Music for the Funeral of Queen Mary. Ilse Wolf, Helen Watts, Richard Lewis, Thomas Helmsley soloists; Geraint Jones Singers and Orchestra; Geraint Jones, cond. Seraphim 60001.

BEETHOVEN: Seven Bagatelles, Op. 33. Six Bagatelles, Op. 126. Bagatelles, "Für Elise," Fantasie, Op. 77. Artur Schnabel, piano. Angel COLH 66.

BRAHMS: Variations on a Theme by Haydn. HINDEMITH: Nobilissime Visione. Philharmonia Orchestra; Otto Klemperer, cond. Seraphim 60004.

PISTON: Quintet for piano and Strings. Earl Wild, piano; The Walden String Quartet (with Hovhaness: Khaldis); Helioder H/HS 25027.

MAHLER: Songs of a Wayfarer. Kindertotenlieder. Christa Ludwig, alto; Philharmonia Orchestra; Adrian Boult and André Vandernoot, conds. Seraphim 60026.

SCHUMANN: Concerto in A minor. Etudes Symphoniques. Myra Hess, piano. Philharmonia Orchestra; Rudolf Schwartz, cond. Seraphim 60009.

STRAUSS: Alpine Symphony. Bavarian State Orchestra; Richard Strauss, cond. Seraphim 60006.

WEILL: Der Jasager. Joseph Protoschka, Lys Bert, Willibald Vohla, soloists; Dusseldorf Children's Chorus and Chamber Orchestra; Sigfried Kohler, cond. Heliodor H/HS 25025.

ART

MAX KOZLOFF

It is already a commonplace to speak of the seriousness that underlies the levity of that marvelous aesthetic fourflusher and Fancy Dan, Saul Steinberg. With great relief, after contenting ourselves so long with his books and magazine cuts, we can now see a comprehensive show of his drawings at a sparkling two-gallery exhibition (Janis and Parsons.) Yet Steinberg, he of Chrysler Building moderne and Wurlitzer baroque, seems curiously out of date, at least in the topical expectations made by the context of satire. Even his current work still somewhat recalls the perforated wing-tip shoe and chromed tail-fin aggressions of the America he took affectionately to task in the fifties. But, of course, we are dealing with a displaced European sensibility; Steinberg is at once a refugee from the old world, however imbued he is with its traditions, and a nostalgic alien in the new one, however slangy his lingo. Like Nabokov in his cosmopolitanism, he also functions enigmatically between our normal images of caricature and art. This combination of clever culture and dainty whimsy perhaps distills that strange evasiveness which is the lasting flavor of the drawings on display.

I mean not the evasiveness of someone incapable of facing his responsibilities, but rather that of a person whose large talents are forced to seek a self-depreciating tone. That Spencerian doodling out loud, those oddly placed juvenilities, that casual sleight of hand are, it seems to me, various devices or strategies of an artist who finds the tongue-in-cheek the only appropriate response to an overwhelming Surrealist legacy. The urbane and bourgeois triviality of the New Yorker cartoon, therefore, turns out to be the coy cover-up of a rather Byzantine artist who has something more substantial to tell us.

With provocative glee, Steinberg is really kicking up his heels about the vagaries and ambiguities in the act of representation. His elaborate signatures, his unreadable official stamps, usually given in a vortex of narcissistic flourishes, may register as an unintended parallel to Abstract Expressionism, but his fascination with Cubism, its morphology and structure, revealed in the present drawings, probes his own identity as a creator.

A man who may indicate a room space by three simple lines can also discombobulate that space by writing upon it, or pasting gummed labels or drawing pictures or word balloons in total defiance of the cavity he has actually created. Needless to say, this is a sophisticated rather than a childish activity. And yet Steinberg will hold on to his retarded angularities in an almost self-protective manner. To see in them farfetched analogies with Cubist facet-planes, as he does, is really to put wit on the defensive. But additionally, it is to camouflage certain processes, now far removed from the spirit of parody. The famous New Yorker cartoon, in which a lady asks of a semi-Abstract painting, "What does it represent?," only to be answered by a figure in the picture itself jumping out to ask her, "What do you represent?," is very much to the point here. One of Steinberg's typical motifs is the spectator looking upon pictures from whose images he himself seems to have fled. It constitutes a major theme. Another prominent subject is that of the man who draws himself, or is it possibly the drawing who is drawing the man? (So much, at times, do they intertwine.) Both conditions lead somehow back to that of the artist who originally draws the real, as opposed to the "pictured," drawing. Occasionally, in fact, Steinberg seems to be drawing himself into a corner, or whirling off from a spiral or into a crossword-puzzle labyrinth. The cat whose tail imitates the French curves is not nearly as important as the spectacle of the man about to swat the question mark. Steinberg is running, to quote an old aphorism by Lichtenberg, "a little business in obscurantism." Those spidery reveries on other people's identities are evidently his own quests after himself. Such irreverencies as the palm tree in the Cubist landscape emerge as elements in a larger furor to create the artist's own terrain, and to populate it with authentic fantasies and pertinent comments.

Indeed, Steinberg, if he cannot be said to possess any one style, impresses as having a quite distinct personality. The ability to see microcosms in a macrocosm, to make notations in five or six highly variegated coded scripts, to utter large stage whispers: all these are aspects of a remarkably unique mind. Perhaps one of its most singular qualities is his talent in visualizing aural phenomena—it would be hard to call them precisely words or language—by a completely graphic metaphor. Often this concern appears in the tactile quality of lines proper. A scratchy or nervous, or overly fluid, staccato or dotted form of calligraphy constantly invokes sound, in differing matrices of pitch and rhythm and timbre. It is a twittering or squawky articulation for which Steinberg owes the most obvious precedent, of course, to Klee. But he can also materialize the hum of a voice, and even such things as social hypocrisy, by piling up mountains of verbiage emitted by a mouth shaping a mammoth cloud of the word "NO." Here Steinberg invites comparison with no one but himself and his own potentialities in extending and enriching the peculiar sarcasm of his inventions. I find his elegant sensitivity to the static and noise of the local surroundings one of his signal achievements. It prevents him, finally, from being overly illustrational, or too emphatically abstract. That this position has been purchased by the avoidance of all political content does not seem to have been too great a price to pay (even if political coloration had ever been his aim). Rather than the fey diableries of Ronald Searle, or the vulgar doggerel of Osborn, Steinberg speaks with the feral accents of a self-aware—and contained—artist.

Recently, with the addition of watery patches of color, he has moved toward consolidating the substance of his dream. Not merely has the formal effectiveness of his wiry lines been enhanced by contrast with his light brushy touches, but that larger lightness also, which is the aspiration of a truly playful imagination. The buoyancy that his discreet liquidity sometimes lends his subject may be best illustrated by a production called "Mask of Landscape." Four horizontal rows of five, post-card sized, blotted water-color landscapes are arranged in a chart formation. The eye shifts across from left to right, and then from top to bottom: river bank, flat plain, rocky shore and finally, mountain vista, the whole sequence rolling by panoramically. In each tableau there is a perfectly accurate equivalent of a sensory impression, rendered through nothing more controlled than a faint blur. The mind is startled by this staggering implication of its own omniscience, as if it could overleap very definite barriers to its perception of time and place in a cramped, discontinuous format. And yet this perception is dealt out straightforwardly, if miraculously, like four very lucky hands at poker. Along with that other unforgettable image from the earlier collection called "The Passport," of a fingerprint substituting for a man's face, this "Mask of Landscape," denying definition at certain vital points, becomes a cipher in the search for identity. Only here, the identity is the coherence and integration of faculties which are simultaneously harassed and flattered by the simplest pictorial maneuvers, or better, displacements. Altogether, Steinberg offers an entertainment so rare as hardly to be seen in a gallery, but also so touching as to give a glimpse of his own vulnerability.

Books by NATION Contributors

We are pleased to list below books published in 1966 by writers who contributed to The Nation during the past year. This compilation—a regular year-end feature—includes books published in England, showing equivalent prices in dollars, available on special order from most booksellers.

V. L. ALLEN. Militant Trade Unionism. Merlin Press (England). $1.75.

JOHN BEECHER. To Live and Die in Dixie. Red Mountain Editions. $5. $2 paper.

ERIC BENTLEY. Manual of Piety (translation of Die Hauspostille by Bertolt Brecht). Bilingual edition. Grove. $10.

Edward II (translation of Bertolt Brecht). Grove. $1.45 paper.

JOHN BERGER. Corkers Freedom. Panther (London). 70c paper.

The Success and Failure of Picasso. Penguin. $2.25 paper.

HAROLD J. BERMAN. Soviet Criminal Law and Procedure: The RSFSR Codes (with James W. Spindler). Harvard University Press. $11.95.

The Nature and Functions of Law (with William R. Greiner). Foundation Press (2nd edition). $9.75.

ROBERT BLY, editor. The Sea and the Honeycomb. Sixties Press. $2. $1 paper.

A Poetry Reading Against the Vietnam War. Editor (with David Ray). Sixties Press. $1 paper.

ELISABETH MANN BORGESE. The White Snake. MacGibbon and Kee (London). $4.20.

T. B. BOTTOMORE. Elites and Society (reprint). Penguin. 85c paper.

Classes in Modern Society (American edition with postscript). Pantheon. $2.95.

EDWARD J. BROWN. Stankevich and His Moscow Circle, 1830-1840. Stanford University Press. $5.

KEITH BUCHANAN. The Chinese People and the Chinese Earth. Bell (England). $3.75.

RICHARD CARTER. Breakthrough: The Saga of Jonas Salk. Trident. $5.95.

Superswine. Trident. $3.95.

CURTIS W. CASEWIT. How to Get a Job Overseas. Arco. $5. $3 paper.

Accent on Treason. Venice Publishers. 50c paper.

Fred J. Cook. The Corrupted Land. Macmillan. $5.95.

The Secret Rulers. Meredith. $6.95.

Richard Hauer Costa. H. G. Wells. Twayne. $3.95.

Vern Countryman. The Lawyer in Modern Society (with Ted Finman). Little, Brown, $13.

Mina Curtiss. Letters of Marcel Proust. Vintage. $1.95 paper.

David Cornel DeJong. The Squirrel and the Harp. (Juvenile.) Macmillan. $2.95.

Isaac Deutscher. Stalin, A Political Biography. Penguin (England).

Ironies of History. Oxford University Press. $5.75.

William Eastlake. Castle Keep (reprint). Fawcett. 75c paper.

Robert S. Elegant. A Kind of Treason. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. $3.95.

Richard M. Elman. The Poorhouse State: The American Way of Life on Public Assistance. Pantheon. $5.95.

F. M. Esfandiary. Identity Card. Grove. $4.95.

Clayton Eshleman. State of the Union (translations of poems of Aimé Cesaire). Caterpillar Press. 75c.

The Chavin Illumination (poem). La Rama Florida (Lima). $3. Both distributed by Asphodel Bookshop, Cleveland, O.

Bernard B. Fall. Viet-Nam Witness, 1953-1966. Praeger. $6.95.

Hell in a Very Small Place. Lippincott. $8.95.

Lawrence Ferlinghetti. Starting from San Francisco (poems, new edition). New Directions. $1.95 paper.

Edward Field. Stand Up, Friend, With Me (reprint). Evergreen. $1.45 paper.

Daniel Ford. Now Comes Theodora (reprint). Avon. 75c paper.

Jean Garrigue. The Animal Hotel. Eakins. $3.95.

William H. Gass. Omensetter's Luck. New American Library. $5.95.

John Gerassi. The Great Fear in Latin America. Collier. $1.50 paper.

The Boys of Boise. Macmillan. $5.95.

Federico G. Gil. The Political System of Chile. Houghton Mifflin. $4.95. $2.95 paper.

David J. Gordon. D. H. Lawrence as a Literary Critic. Yale University Press. $4.75.

Anne Halley. Between Wars & Other Poems. Oxford University Press. $2.80.

Smith Hempstone. A Tract of Time. Houghton Mifflin. $5.95. Fawcett. 60c paper.

Sandra Hochman. The Vaudeville Marriage. Viking. $3.95.

Frederick H. Hoffman. The Mortal No (reprint). Princeton University Press. $2.45 paper.

The Little Magazine (photo-offset reprint). Evans. $18.

Jeffry Kaplow. New Perspectives on the French Revolution. Wiley. $6.95. $3.95 paper.

Henry S. Kariel. The Promise of Politics. Prentice-Hall. $1.95 paper.

Simon Karlinsky. Marina Cvetaeva, Her Life and Art. University of California Press. $7.25.

Galway Kinnnell. Black Light. Houghton Mifflin. $3.95.

Edward A. Kolodziej. The Uncommon Defense and Congress: 1945-63. Ohio State University Press. $7.50.

Hilda Kuper (co-editor with Leo Kuper). African Law: Adaptation and Development. University of California Press. $7.50.

Alexander Laing. Clipper Ships and Their Makers. (Young adult.) Putnam's. $3.95.

Sidney Lens. Radicalism in America. Crowell. $8.95.

Curt Leviant, translator. Old Country Tales by Sholem Aleichem. Putnam's. $5.95.

Richard G. Lillard. Eden in Jeopardy: Man's Prodigal Meddling with his Environment—The Southern California Experiment. Knopf. $6.95.

Desert Challenge: An Interpretation of Nevada (reprint). University of Nebraska Press. $1.60 paper.

A. Walton Litz. James Joyce. Twayne. $3.50.

Roy Lubove, editor. Social Welfare in Transition: Selected English Documents, 1834-1909. University of Pittsburgh Press. $8.

Jacob A. Riis, The Making of an American, editor. Harper & Row. $2.75 paper.

Reece McGee (with Theodore Caplow). The Academic Marketplace. Doubleday (Anchor edition). $1.25 paper.

David Markson. The Ballad of Dingus Magee. Bobbs-Merrill. $4.

Harold Mendelsohn. Mass Entertainment. College and University Press. $5.95.

Jonathan Mirsky (with others). Peace in Vietnam. Hill & Wang. $3. 95c paper.

Barrington Moore, Jr. Social Origins of Dictatorship and Democracy: Lord and Peasant in the Making of the Modern World. Beacon. $10.

Terror and Progress USSR: Some Sources of Change and Stability in the Soviet Dictatorship. Harper Torchbooks. $1.95 paper.

Stanley Moss. The Wrong Angel. Macmillan. $4.95.

Jack Newfield. A Prophetic Minority. New American Library. $4.75.

Joyce Carol Oates. Upon the Sweeping Flood. Vanguard. $4.95.

Albert Parry. The New Class Divided: Science and Technology Versus Communism. Macmillan. $8.95.

Sherman Paul. Randolf Bourne. Univer-

Special Issue

SOVIET JEWRY

Report and Analysis by Moshe Decter

Findings and Judgment
by Ad Hoc Commission on The Rights of Soviet Jewry

CONGRESS
A Journal of Opinion and Jewish Affairs bi-WEEKLY

20 cents on newsstands or order from

15 East 84th Street
New York, N. Y. 10028

sity of Minnesota Press. 65c.

Mario Pei. How To Learn Languages and What Languages To Learn. Harper & Row. $5.95.

Glossary of Linguistic Terminology. Columbia University Press. $6.50.

Language of the Specialists, editor. Funk & Wagnalls. $7.50.

Invitation to Linguistics (British edition). Allen & Unwin.

Story of Language (revised edition). New American Library. 95c paper.

David Ray. From the Hungarian Revolution. Cornell University Press. $4.95.

A Poetry Reading Against the Vietnam War, editor (with Robert Bly). Sixties Press. $1 paper.

Charles Roberts. LBJ's Inner Circle. Delacorte. $5.

M. L. Rosenthal, editor. The William Carlos Williams Reader. New Directions. $7.50.

A Primer of Ezra Pound. Grosset & Dunlap. $1.45 paper.

William H. Rueckert. Glenway Wescott (reissue). College and University Press. $1.95 paper.

Edward W. Said. Joseph Conrad and the Fiction of Autobiography. Harvard University Press. $4.95.

James Schevill. The Black President and Other Plays. Swallow. $2.50 paper.

Michael Silverton. Battery Park. Thing Press. $2.50 paper.

Harold P. Simonson. Francis Grierson. Twayne. $3.50.

Writing Essays. Harper & Row. $1.95 paper.

William Stafford. The Rescued Year. Harper & Row. $3.95. $2.25 paper.

Harvey Swados. The American Writer and the Great Depression. Bobbs-Merrill. $7.50. $3.45 paper.

May Swenson. Poems To Solve. (Young adult.) Scribner's. $3.50.

John Tagliabue. A Japanese Journal (poems). Kayak Press. $1.50 paper.

Robert Theobald. The Guaranteed Income: Next Step in Economic Evolution. Doubleday. $4.95.

William C. Thiesenhusen. Chile's Experiments in Agrarian Reform. University of Wisconsin Press. $3.

Saul Touster. Still Lives and Other Lives. University of Missouri Press. $3.50.

Martin Tucker, co-editor. A Library of Literary Criticism: Modern British Literature. 3 vols. Frederick Ungar. $35.

Moulton's Library of Literary Criticism, editor. 4 vols. Frederick Ungar. $45.

W. Warren Wagar. H. G. Wells: Journalism and Prophecy (revised edition). Bodley Head (London). $5.90.

Franklin Walker. The Seacoast of Bohemia: An Account of Early Carmel. The Book Club of California. $20.

Jack London & the Klondike. Bodley Head (London). $4.90.

Alexander Werth. De Gaulle, a Political Biography. Simon & Schuster. $7.50.

Ruth Whitman. An Anthology of Modern Yiddish Poetry. October House. $7.50. $2.95 paper.

Elie Wiesel. The Gates of the Forest. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. $4.95.

The Jews of Silence. Holt, Rinehart & Winston. $4.95.

Raymond Williams. Modern Tragedy. Stanford University Press. $5.50.

The Long Revolution. Harper & Row. $2.25 paper.

Culture and Society. Harper & Row. $2.25 paper.

Sol Yurick. Fertig. Trident. $5.95.

The Warriors (reprint). Pyramid. 60c paper.

Howard Zinn. New Deal Thought. Bobbs-Merrill. $7.50. $3.75 paper.

Harriet Zinnes. An Eye for an I. Folder Editions. $3.75. $2 paper.

Paul Zweig. Les Violences du Narcisse: le Comte de Lautreamont. Lettres Modernes (Paris). $1.25 paper.

LETTERS

(continued from page 658)

missing pieces of the jigsaw puzzle. For example, the appearance on this "guest list" of Thomas R. Waring, editor of the Charleston (S.C.) News and Courier, explains the seemingly unusual attention given to our program by Mr. Waring's paper:

> Most of the material used by ETV in this state has been first rate. . . . Unfortunately, the ETV network dropped a ball Friday night in presenting the first part of a two part series entitled "The Fruit of Fear." The producer of the program is Henry Morgenthau, grandson and namesake of one of the early leaders of the New Deal. The program purported to be a fair analysis of conditions in the Republic of South Africa. It was completely slanted against that anti-Communist country. . . .

The SAIS in New York has distributed reprints of an editorial in the Phoenix Gazette (Nov. 4) whose editor, Edwin A. Fitzhugh, was on the 1966 "guest list." I quote in part from this editorial "thank you note":

> While Africans in Guinea attack the U.S. embassy and defile the American flag, Arthur J. Goldberg schemes in the United Nations to hand a vast slice of southern Africa over to just such people. . . . (He) could have stopped the irresponsible Afro-Asian bloc from pushing through the General Assembly a resolution proclaiming that the mandate held by the Republic of South Africa over the old German territory of Southwest Africa was at an end. . . . We say "ridiculous" in the hope that the resolution will prove to be only that, and not a tragedy for the world exceeding in gravity the American involvement in Viet Nam. . . . The risks are such as no American should wish to invite, particularly since right seems more on South Africa's side than otherwise."

My thanks to The Nation and Mr. Pollock for focusing attention on an area of the world which gets less attention than it deserves from "independent" U.S. journalists. Henry Morgenthau III consolations of piety

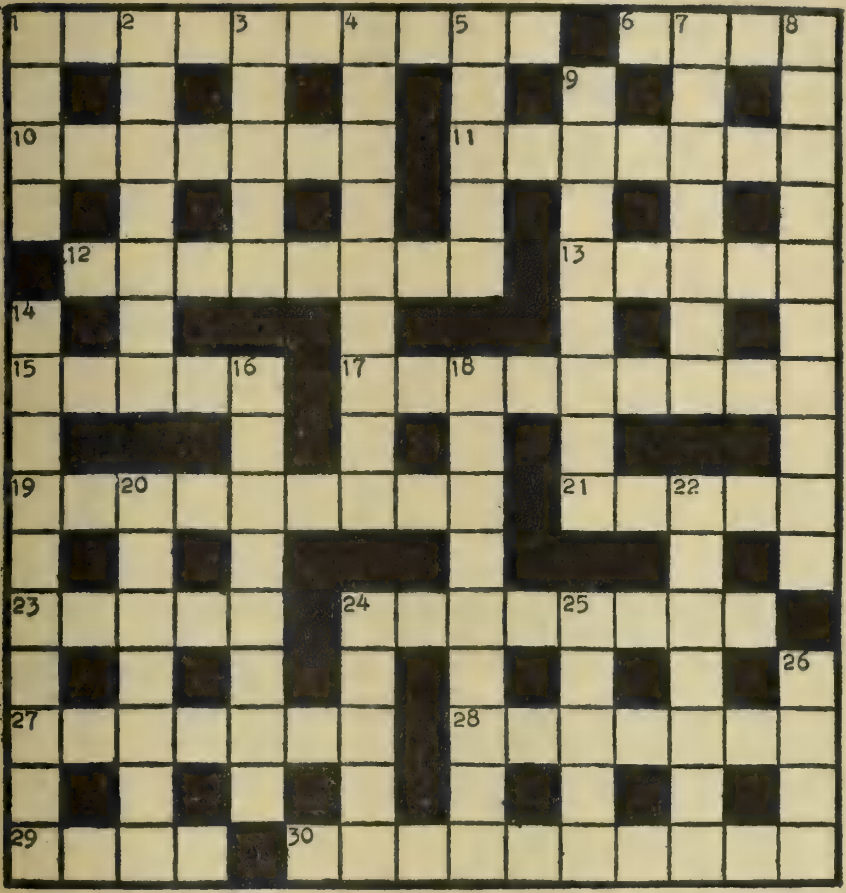
Rochester, Mich.

Dear Sirs: One does not know whether to rejoice or to cry over the recent statement of American Catholic bishops supporting the war in Vietnam provided it does not exceed reasonable moral limits. Does that mean that Catholics can now feel quite free to drop bombs, napalm, kill peasant children, sanction torture and produce illegitimate babies in Vietnam, but must regard themselves as in a state of sin if they practice contraception? . . . It is quite true that nothing will ever supplant the consolations of piety. Harold Fromm

Crossword Puzzle No. 1180

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 Such an unusual shade is not affected by shock. (10)
6 It may be the end of the choir, and perhaps even shows it. (4)
10 State briefly what some crazy people do inside a boat. (7)
11 and 29 A rising spot implying a fighting period in China to the baker. (7, 4)
12 You might not be pleased with her to see it rain hard! (8)
13 Bible town in France? (5)
15 It takes footwork to sell something, by the sound of it. (5)
17 New teashop to provide for one with some practice. (9)
19 This might help you along with a light "boom"! (9)
21 Sobriquet for Mac, paired with the last of 4. (5)
23 Proficient at making a little division of the business? (5)
24 Even the less experienced constabulary might so serve! (2, 1, 5)
27 In the end, vice has to be proven! (7)
28 Watch out for the position of the bishop! (7)
29 See 11 across
30 Do they also serve on the distaff side?

DOWN:

1 and 26 Quality, when of Triumph and Cunning? (8)
2 and 18 A fair share of the activity of a revolutionary scout? (4, 3, 4, 5)
3 What this was in reply to Captain Corcoran's statement of health? (5)
4 The dark loaf's on the table, intended for one course. (5, 4)
5 Is he made tipsy when he is wined? (5)
7 A broken headstone marker, astringent when coming up in the garden. (7)
8 One of two classes reputedly touched by the heat of twelve? (10)
9 General retreat might be implied by a cut under the nail. (8)
14 and 24 down What Columbus was looking for was certainly novel! (1, 7, 2, 5)
16 They were reputedly struck several hours later than those referred to in 8.
18 See 2 down
20 One might have to in return, if accounts raise skepticism. (7)
22 Cuts in. (7)
24 See 14 down
25 Hardly a good name for an Amazon.
26 See 1 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1179

ACROSS: 1 Bar Association; 9 and 24 Armored cars; 10 Arrange; 11 In-laws; 12 Asphodel; 14 Sporran; 15 Piped; 17 Edges; 19 Enisled; 21 Eyeglass; 23 Scarce; 25 Tantara; 27 Dress-designers. DOWN: 1 Beatitude; 2 and 21 down Rumble seats; 3 Straw boss; 4 and 26 Odds and ends; 5 In absentia; 6 Torch; 7 Owned up; 8 Real; 13 Greensward; 15 Police dog; 16 Dispenses; 18 Gleaner; 20 Durance; 22 Loads.

PUBLICATIONS

For latest developments in CHINA'S CULTURAL REVOLUTION subscribe now to PEKING REVIEW (in English) airmailed weekly $4. Also China Pictorial, China Reconstructs, and Chinese Literature @ $3 each seamail. Write for our free catalog of 700 imported publications in English from China. CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS, 2929 24 St., San Francisco, California 94110.

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

SIGNIFICANT PUBLICATIONS on the changing society from I.C.R. Press. Free catalogue. The Institute for Cybercultural Research, Box 86-N, New York City 10021.

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

RECENT anti-war films for rental. American, North & South Vietnamese. Write for rates: Free School, 20 East 14 Street, N.Y.C.

END the draft before it ends you. Write: International League Against Conscription, 250 N. Loop Dr., Camarillo, Calif. 93010.

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF

The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

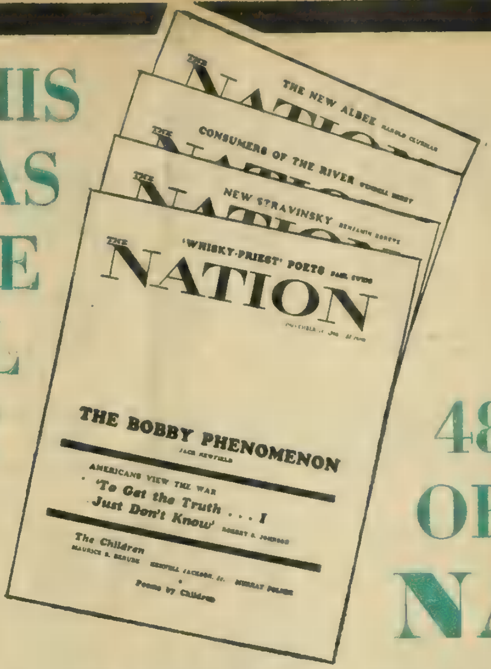
Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Composition by R.C.R. Publication Printers Corp., N.Y.C.

THIS CHRISTMAS GIVE THE THOUGHTFUL GIFT



THE NATION
THE NEW ALBEE
CONSUMERS OF THE RIVER
NEW STRAVINSKY
'WHISKY-PRIEST' POETS
THE BOBBY PHENOMENON
AMERICANS VIEW THE WAR
'To Get the Truth . . . I Just Don't Know'
The Children
Poems by Children

48 ISSUES OF THE NATION

PLUS FREE BONUS BOOK UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

Here is the perfect gift for a thinking friend. 48 issues of this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion, plus this decade's most controversial book.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material." Science Magazine said UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED "is likely to be the Silent Spring of traffic safety." For anyone who spends any time at all in a car, this controversial book is "must" reading. And it's a bonus absolutely free, when you enter a Christmas subscription to The Nation.

- "A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."
  Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

- "A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."
  Wall Street Journal

- "Deeply disturbing. . . . Exhaustive and persuasive. . . . He cites numerous weaknesses in certain Big Three models of recent years, naming names in each instance and quoting from court proceedings."
  John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER

THE NATION / 333 SIXTH AVENUE / NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a Gift for one year at the Christmas rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. I understand they will receive a BONUS of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

(For more than two Gift Subscriptions, please use a separate piece of paper.)

Your Own Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
☐ I enclose payment of $..........
☐ Bill me
Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

12-19-66

KOSYGIN IN PARIS ALEXANDER WERTH

THE NATION

DECEMBER 26, 1966 35 cents

BURLINGAME
DEC 31 1966
LIBRARY

Speech Without Assembly?

THE COURT v. THE DEMONSTRATORS

THOMAS I. EMERSON

Arkansas Prison Farm

THE WHIP PAYS OFF

ROBERT PEARMAN

Profits of War

The Putsch Against McNamara

H. L. NIEBURG

ENGLISH . . . AMERICAN STYLE

MARIO PEI

OLD CITIES & NEW TOWNS

SEYMOUR J. MANDELBAUM / ERVIN GALANTAY

ER NEWSPA
URLINGAME PUB LIBRARY
URLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

LETTERS

anger in Australia

Mt. Pleasant, Western Australia

DEAR SIRS: I would like the people of the United States to know how resentful many Australians were over President Johnson's visit. We were due to have a nation-wide election in just four weeks' time, and considered your President's coming here a blatant and unscrupulous attempt to influence public opinion in favor of returning to office the Holt government. Most of your readers will be aware of the subservience to Washington of Mr. Holt and his ministers, a subservience which has caused them to send Australian youth into the illegal and immoral undeclared war in Vietnam. J. A. Kane

'not mad, sweet heaven'

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Is Johnson mad? We all know his faults, but is he also mad? He is a bully, more so when frustrated, but is he also mad? As his war continues, as his pride is being wrestled with, as his respect is being withheld . . . will his actions become mad? Whose other fingers are on the button besides those of one who may become mad? What arrangements have been made to prevent bells from ringing when he who may be mad presses the button? Is our whole world in thrall to Lear? . . .

Philip Siekevitz

Spanish aid

DEAR SIRS: Salvador de Madariaga, who shares with Pablo Casals the honorary chairmanship of Spanish Refugee Aid, is now 80 years old. He is a great humanitarian and fighter for freedom, a scholar and diplomat whose voice and pen have long been used in the service of intellectual truth and political democracy throughout the world. In his honor, Spanish Refugee Aid has established a scholarship fund for the benefit of the children of Spanish Republican exiles.

In the past few years we have given help to an increasing number of students. The fathers of many of these students are dead or else ill and handicapped by years of war and exile. These small scholarships, ranging from $150 to $350, cover the cost of books, lunches, carfare and clothing. Through the Salvador de Madariaga Fund we hope to raise $10,000. I hope your readers will join me in honoring this good man in a meaningful way by contributing what they can to this fund.

Hannah Arendt, Chairman
Spanish Refugee Aid
80 East 11 Street
New York, N. Y. 10003

Eleanor Roosevelt

DEAR SIRS: For a book on Eleanor Roosevelt, I would appreciate unpublished stories or anecdotes from anyone whose life she touched. Stella K. Hershan 67-66 108th St., Forest Hills, N.Y.

correction

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Miss Patricia Blake, one of the editors of Antiworlds, points out an unfortunate error in my review ["Yevtushenko and the Underground Poets," The Nation, Nov. 21]. I mentioned Robert Lowell as one of the translators who contributed to Antiworlds. In fact, no translations by him appear in that volume, and I am sincerely sorry about the mistake. Simon Karlinsky

EDITORIALS

A Dirty Business

The current controversy over wire tapping, in which FBI chief J. Edgar Hoover is pitted against Sen. Robert F. Kennedy, is somewhat like the fights between wild animals which the late Frank Buck used to stage for the movies. Both animals ended up dead, which is what the movie company figured the public wanted. The outcome will not be lethal in the current rhubarb, but that either man can come out unscathed is next to impossible. On the face of it, Hoover has more to lose. He has built himself up as the superman of crime busting, the paragon who stands between the American people and its enemies, foreign and domestic. The image is now likely to be tarnished, and as the two redoubtable in-fighters have at each other, the public may get a valuable education in practical politics.

Hoover's vulnerability stems from the recent history of wire tapping and bugging. The activities of the FBI in these fields are notorious. No one but Hoover could have survived such revelations as the 1961 bugging of Joseph Schipani, which resulted in a reversal of a conviction for income tax evasion; the cases of the Las Vegas gamblers, in which the federal government was arrayed against the state of Nevada; the tapping of the Dominican Embassy's telephone lines (but it is only fair to point out that this was done with the sanction of three Presidents: Eisenhower, Kennedy and Johnson); and the current Fred B. Black and Bobby Baker instances. (See "Snoopers and Tappers: Law-Enforcement Underground" by Fred J. Cook, The Nation, December 20, 1965.) Whatever Hoover's men may have learned in their electronic forays, the number of cases, past and pending, in which the prosecution's efforts have been nullified by tainted evidence is the most impressive feature of their work.

Hoover, under fire, is not one to cower behind a personal Maginot Line. He comes out shooting, and Robert Kennedy is his target. Hoover's letter to Rep. H. R. Gross of Iowa, accusing Kennedy of being fully aware of the FBI's illicit activities while he was Attorney General, has all the earmarks of a carefully rehearsed offensive. Not only Kennedy but practically all the Attorneys General of recent decades have let themselves in for this kind of attack, whenever Hoover chose to launch it. Everyone who knows Washington at all knows that Hoover has been his own boss, only nominally under the jurisdiction of the incumbent Attorney General. On the basis of the table of organization, these officials were responsible for Hoover's actions, but one and all took good care not to cross him or to know too much about what he was doing. Only the President was Hoover's superior—and not much superior at that.

Like his predecessors, Robert Kennedy did not press for information in the area of bugging and wire tapping. The revelations of William G. Hundley, chief of the Justice Department's organized crime section under Kennedy, say, in effect, that he didn't tell Kennedy what was going on because he wanted to spare Kennedy possible embarrassment. For his part, Hoover went his imperious way, patronizing the Attorney General of the moment and taking precautions against having to take the rap himself if things ever went wrong.

Things have gone so wrong now that a showdown cannot be avoided. President Johnson is very much involved in the current complications, but he is in the happy position of being, in theory, above the battle. Hoover and LBJ are old friends. LBJ and Bobby Baker are not friends now, but they used to be. LBJ and Bobby Kennedy are not friends now, and never were. Hoover is surely aware that blaming the wire taps on Robert Kennedy cannot but please the President. By the same stroke, disclosures which might be embarrassing to the President—were Baker tried on the larceny, tax evasion and conspiracy charges under which he has been indicted—have probably been foreclosed by the FBI's eavesdropping on Fred Black, Baker's associate. As far as the President is concerned, things could scarcely have worked out to better advantage.

As far as the public is concerned, the one bright spot in the picture is Sen. Edward V. Long's announcement that he means to get to the bottom of the whole wire-tapping and bugging machinery and the federal government's role in what that quaint, old-fashioned liberal, Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes, called "a dirty business."

South West Africa

On October 28, 1966, the General Assembly voted by a striking 114 to 2 (South Africa, Portugal) to end the authority of South Africa to administer the mandated territory of South West Africa. The Assembly also set up a Committee of Fourteen (including the U.S. and the USSR) to recommend no later than April, 1967, "practical means" by which to carry out the intention of the resolution to have the United Nations itself assume administrative authority. Not even the most optimistic legalist supposes that South Africa will comply with the decisions; not even the most militant African nationalist believes that the United Nations is prepared at this stage to use force.

What, then, does the resolution purport to do? Is it only some weird game of verbal symbols? Such questions cannot be answered in any very assured way. However, the resolution clearly represents African aspirations rather than states their realistic expectations. It is a part of the long process of mobilizing the international community to support the new nations' insistent demands that the situation in the southern African countries of Angola, Mozambique, Rhodesia, South West Africa and South Africa be changed—through military force if necessary.

The United States needs to come to terms with the choice that must be made. Up to now, we have denounced the South Africans for their racial policies, but avoided giving support to any move toward sanctions. What is more troublesome, the United States has taken no steps to prevent or even discourage American trade and investment with prosperous South Africa. In fact, over the last decade many large United States concerns have made heavy investments in South Africa. A conflict of interest is thus being allowed to grow more severe as the verbal demands of the world community grow more insistent.

The inability to do anything effective about South

IN THIS ISSUE

December 26, 1966

EDITORIALS

690

ARTICLES

693 Kosygin in Paris:
Differences Within Amity
Alexander Werth

696 Profits of War:
The Putsch Against McNamara
H. L. Nieburg

701 Arkansas Prison Farm:
The Whip Pays Off
Robert Pearman

704 Speech Without Assembly?
The Court v. the Demonstrators
Thomas I. Emerson

BOOKS & THE ARTS

709 English in Its American Fashion
Mario Pei

711 "U.S. Offers Condolence and Aid to Vietnamese Bombed in Error" (poem)
Michael Hamburger

712 Return to the Bush
Edward T. Chase

713 More and More Alike
Seymour J. Mandelbaum

714 Architecture
Ervin Galantay

716 Agit-Prop Pop Opera
James O'Connor

717 Theatre
Robert Pasolli

719 Crossword Puzzle
Frank W. Lewis

JAMES J. STORROW JR. Publisher

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Managing Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Poetry Editor
MICHAEL GOLDMAN

Copy Editor
MARION HESS

Advertising Manager
MARY SIMON

Washington
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Paris
ALEXANDER WERTH

Theatre
HAROLD CLURMAN

Art
MAX KOZLOFF

Music
BENJAMIN BORETZ

Science
CARL DREHER

The Nation is published weekly (except biweekly in July and August) by the Nation Magazine Company and copyright 1966 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y., 10014. Tel.: CH 2-8400. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Foreign and Canadian postage: $1 extra per year.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give four weeks' notice and provide their old as well [illegible] their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION

Volume 203
No. 22

Africa's policies in South West Africa has led the African states to frustration and anger. South West Africa is not a sovereign state, or even a colony that can claim domestic jurisdiction; it is a territory that enjoys the status of an international mandate. That is, it enjoys an international status the essence of which is that the welfare of its inhabitants is a matter of direct responsibility for the organized international community. And yet this mandated territory with its 80 per cent black population is being administered as a colony in accordance with the crude racist policies of South Africa.

African anger was whipped to fury by the decision of the World Court on July 18 that Ethiopia and Liberia were without legal standing to complain about the conditions prevailing in South West Africa. The vote was 8 to 7, and the majority was white, Eurocentric, and quite "colonialist" in spirit. The Africans felt betrayed once again.

The resolution is the direct aftermath of their anger. It may be an unwise step. South Africa may use the resolution as a pretext for annexing South West Africa, and thereby harden their commitment to maintain control. Furthermore, the General Assembly may have undermined its own ability to obtain judicial relief in the future. The World Court has been made more liberal by the recent election of five new judges; it would be likely to decide a future case differently than it did in 1966. But if the General Assembly now has authority to control the mandate, there is no proper defendant any longer; and if the Assembly lacks the authority there is no organ of the international community on behalf of whom the mandate might be upheld. Perhaps this is only a logical difficulty. In any event, South Africa would be foolish to submit to a second judicial test unless purely as a dilatory tactic; and whatever else, South Africa is not foolish.

The future of South West Africa is clouded by uncertainty. There is no prospect of an internal uprising. The pass system, the widespread use of native informers, and the cruelty of the oppressive regime make it difficult to organize an insurgent or liberation movement. As there is also no prospect of a community intervention under the auspices of the United Nations, it does not appear likely that the inhabitants of South West Africa will be in a position to throw off the shackles of South African rulership for years to come. The Resolution is an appeal to conscience, which Ambassador Goldberg found eloquent words to support. It remains to be seen whether deeds will follow.

No News

Madison Square Garden in New York seats just under 18,000, and by eight o'clock on the evening of Thursday, December 8, late-comers were scouring the balcony and main floor in search of single seats. SANE had sold out the house for a pre-Christmas peace rally dedicated to ending the pointless and heartless killing in Vietnam. There were a number of speakers—some of them men whose names are instantly recognized all over the Western world: Gunnar Myrdal, who had flown from Sweden to attend the meeting, I. F. Stone, Norman Thomas. Pete Seeger sang; Ossie Davis took the microphone and coaxed a collection out of the crowd.

Next morning, some copies of the late edition of The New York Times carried a 2-inch notice of this occasion on page 32. To people who phoned in protest, the Times explained: "Nothing new was said." Well, perhaps not. It is difficult to find new ways to describe what the United States is doing in Southeast Asia, impossible to find new ways to appeal to the reason of President Johnson and his adherents, almost futile to call upon their honor and humanity. There was no news in Dr. Myrdal's meticulous recitation, nation by nation, of America's utter friendlessness in the world today, and the Times probably knew (though to the audience it came as a small extra shock) that Sweden has placed the United States on a list of irresponsible countries to which it will sell no implements of war. Pete Seeger led the whole house in the singing of Peat Bog Soldiers, and you could feel a wave of shame and sorrow sweep the huge space—but that is not precisely news.

However, when close to 18,000 New Yorkers gather on a midweek evening to let it be known that they are sickened and driven to despair by the horrors committed in their name, it would seem that a "newspaper of record" should take due notice of the fact. Or do the editors of The New York Times think it a common practice for Americans to gather in a great assembly and cry out that their country is wading deep in abomination?

Only in Georgia

If the nation should follow the example of Georgia (which God forbid), elections could become a primary source of litigation, exceeding even automobile liability cases. The confusion attending the Georgia gubernatorial election has been duplicated, even more improbably, in Gainesville, the city in the northern tier of the state which bills itself as the "broiler" capital of the Southland. This poultry town held an election for mayor and one member of the city commission.

Excitement was scarcely at fever heat. Gainesville boasts a population of about 25,000 (that must be greater Gainesville, for reference works give it only about 16,500) and the total vote was 1,348. Worse ratios have been known in other strongholds of democracy, but the striking feature of this election is that the two candidates for city commissioner finished in a dead heat—674 votes each. Howard James, an insurance executive, and Joseph Stargel, office manager for a construction firm, were both willing, able and eager to serve the town, but neither could claim he had been elected. A recount was ordered, then another. There was no getting around it: 674 votes had been cast for James, 674 for Stargel—and there is no provision in the city charter for a run-off election.

What is Gainesville to do? Go to the Supreme Court of the United States, as the state of Georgia had to do in the Maddox-Callaway trouble, or toss a coin, or what? Deciding by lot would probably be illegal, and might subject the city fathers to severe penalties.

As the story got on the press wires, some joker had put the name of Batman on a write-in ballot, and the city attorney suggested that Batman be asked to choose between the Messrs. James and Stargel. Reverting to a more lawyerlike attitude, the attorney confessed he didn't know what to do, nor had he found anyone who could advise him.

But what about the mayoralty? This turns out to be the only happy part of the election. Mayor John Cromartie, president of the Georgia League of Municipalities and an executive in the broiler industry, was unopposed. However, he was in Las Vegas attending a convention, and could give no help in resolving the deadlock.

The High Cost of Imprisonment

When a person is sent to jail, it is not only he—and his family—that suffers. The taxpayers are punished as well as the prisoner, and this is only one aspect of a generally botched penal situation.

The problem of "crime" involves much more than law enforcement, about which currently there is much talk. The other side of the problem—what to do with those offenders you succeed in arresting and convicting—normally gets less attention. Fortunately, the President's Commission on Law Enforcement and Administration of Justice, whose overall report is due for release in January, has taken a broad view of its assignment. Its task forces have been working in five divisions: assessment of the crime problem, police and public safety, administration of criminal justice, corrections, and effects of science and technology.

Pending the presentation of the complete study, the President's Commission has released a report prepared for it by the National Council on Crime and Delinquency. The economic aspect alone is disquieting. State and local governments (exclusive of the extensive federal system of penitentiaries and law-enforcement agencies) are spending about $1 billion a year just to keep convicts locked up—and less than $200 million in efforts to rehabilitate them. Dr. Elmer K. Nelson, a University of Southern California professor who heads the corrections task force, remarked that this portion of the report surprised him by revealing "how heavily committed we are to just holding onto people." It is almost as if the criminal population were a precious component of society—giving employment, a sense of superiority, and other benefits of a sort to the respectable elements.

Contrary to the general impression that we "coddle" offenders, the fact is that we rely much more on imprisonment than do other Western countries. We impose, in general, longer sentences, both for major and petty crimes. We "overuse imprisonment" in the attempt to rid ourselves of the expense and danger of confirmed criminality, and the results are costly and inefficient. Although much of the pioneer work in probation was done in the United States, the Council's studies indicate that it is not used nearly enough, and that we are underemploying suspended sentences, fines in lieu of imprisonment and similar measures. The evidence shows that such devices can be used without danger to the public—notably so when probation departments are adequately staffed with well-trained personnel. Probationers do as well as, or better than, released prisoners. The effects of imprisonment tend to be harmful rather than corrective. (See article p. 701 for a striking example.)

On an average day some 1,220,000 persons are under the care or supervision of state and local agencies. Included are some 141,000 in city and local jails, usually for terms of less than a year. Of these, between 60,000 and 70,000 are chronic alcoholics, many of whom no doubt are in jail for custodial care rather than serious misdemeanor. More than 2,550,000 persons move through the prison system each year. One reason for this multiplier effect is that 90 per cent of all persons working in state and local correctional institutions are administrators and guards, while less than 10 per cent are engaged in treatment, academic or vocational work. Adequate guidance and supervision for parolees and probationers are said to be "sadly lacking." The only conclusion one can draw from what has been released in advance of the definitive reports is that American penology as a whole is in need of a major overhaul.

KOSYGIN IN PARIS

DIFFERENCES WITHIN AMITY

ALEXANDER WERTH

Paris

It would be an exaggeration to say that Premier Kosygin aroused in France as much interest and enthusiasm as General de Gaulle did in the Soviet Union last summer. When I was in Russia in July, a month after his visit, people still talked about the "tremendous reception" he had been given everywhere. To the Russians de Gaulle was a symbol of all that France stood for; he was the man who had cocked a snook at the United States and had cleared out of NATO—the man who, alone among Western leaders, had openly condemned the war in Vietnam.

Mr. Kosygin, by comparison, was colorless, an haut fonctionnaire, as it were, not very different from Mr. Gromyko or dozens of other more or less poker-faced Soviet top diplomats and functionaries. True, although he is only head of the government and not head of state, he received head-of-state treatment, de Gaulle driving to Orly airport to welcome him. But to those remembering the 1960 visit of the ebullient Mr. Khrushchev (who could always be expected to say something unexpected, and even outrageous), Mr. Kosygin's performance was a bit disappointing. However, as we shall see, he did once or twice depart from his habit of saying merely the "correct" thing.

Though practically the last (and youngest) active survivor of Stalin's Politburo (the other survivors, like Shevernik, Voroshilov and Mikoyan, are very old; or, like Molotov, Malenkov, Kaganovich and Khrushchev, have been pensioned off and ordered to keep quiet), Kosygin was never a Stalinite in the real sense. Under Stalin, he was never more than a competent technician who dealt with a variety of economic problems, such as the evacuation of industries to the East during the war and their reorganization once the war was over. Oddly enough, after Stalin's death, he suffered a temporary setback; though remaining a minister, he was removed from the Politburo, and was not re-elected until 1960. His relations with Khrushchev appear to have been rather strained: he condemned the Cuban venture, was more than critical of Khrushchev's management of Soviet agriculture, and deplored his failure to do anything about the first American bombings of North Vietnam. He disliked Khrushchev's garrulousness during trips abroad, and such demonstrations as shoe-banging at the UN.

Kosygin is clearly more than a mere technician today; he is a man with a "world policy," even if that policy has little to do with ideology. Unlike Khrushchev, he did not write off the Chinese as utterly hopeless: he attempted, in February, 1965, to resume some kind of cooperation with Mao Tse-tung; and if he failed in this, he at least made it clear that the Soviet Union could not remain indifferent to the war in Vietnam. Since then, he has steadily insisted that if Vietnam could not be given more effective help, it was because the Chinese were preventing the constitution of a vast Socialist bloc whose sheer weight would force a different policy on the United States. But that Russia—independently of the Chinese—was still a great political force in Asia Kosygin effectively demonstrated when he brought about the India-Pakistan settlement at Tashkent.

There is nothing Kosygin would like better than "peaceful coexistence" with the United States (he said so again in Paris), but that is impossible as long as the war in Vietnam continues. There is, on the other hand, no doubt that he believes firmly in closer bonds with Western Europe, especially economic bonds, and he includes Britain in Western Europe. His regard for France is realistic, rather than sentimental. De Gaulle represents for him a certain "neutralist" current which is not altogether alien; Russia has had, at times, its own "neutralist" undertones. Although he does not, perhaps, take literally de Gaulle's concept of an "Atlantic to the Urals" Europe, Kosygin sees in it certain long-range possibilities for a much closer economic cooperation between East and West, for a gradual disappearance of both NATO and the Warsaw Pact and, most important in the long run, for a definitive "European" settlement of the German problem. That this problem has become more urgent than it seemed even a year ago may be seen from Kosygin's pointed references to the ominous revival of a Nazi party in Western Germany. Kosygin and de Gaulle do not see eye to eye on every aspect of the German problem. The Russians are eager that the Western powers should recognize the accomplished fact of the "two Germanys" and give de facto, if not de jure, recognition to the East German Republic which (Kosygin remarked) demonstrates, today more than ever, the advantage of having at least one part of Germany free of Nazi influence. De Gaulle, on the other hand, while recognizing the Oder-Neisse frontier, sticks to the principle of self-determination and continues to taunt the Russians with having created an "artificial satellite" in East Germany. He believes that Germany should be united, and form part of a unified Europe that is to be free, as far as possible, of any military blocs, and with "ideological frontiers" reduced to next to nothing. All this, of course, implies that the united Germany should live within the territorial status quo, and certain precautions would be taken by all concerned against a new German aggression. Russia, and Britain for that matter, could see no objection to this; the Nazi revival, as Kosygin remarked, must have reminded the English of the London blitz!

There is no fundamental disagreement between France and Russia on the principle of the nonproliferation of atomic weapons, but whereas the Russians would like a definite, signed international treaty, de Gaulle, as a newcomer in the nuclear club, still seems to have certain inhibitions about the dotted line. As Le Monde remarked: "France's opposition to proliferation goes without saying, but the Russians would still prefer her to say it." On the subject of that great conference on European security which the Russians would like to call, Kosygin merely declared that it would be for the members of this conference to agree on the agenda; also, it was for them, he said, to decide to what extent and in what form they should try to secure American participation in the talks and an American guarantee for the "European security settlement" that might result.

So Kosygin's visit to France has not produced anything world shaking; plenty of good will, but no agreement, so far, on nonproliferation, or on Germany, while the European Security Conference, though originally de Gaulle's brain child, is still left suspended in mid-air, subject no doubt to a great number of bilateral preparatory talks. Kosygin differed more sharply with de Gaulle on Germany than on nonproliferation ("a solution," he said, "will ultimately be found to this"—obviously with American support); he said flatly that the West Germans (and everybody else, for that matter) should "realistically" accept the existence of two Germanys; "no outside force can change this situation, either now or later."

At the lunch given him by the diplomatic press, Kosygin was asked awkward questions, but unlike Khrushchev who would certainly have flown off the handle, he remained courteous and wholly unruffled. Trotsky? No, there would be no rehabilitation of Trotsky, since Trotskyism had done the Soviet Union the greatest harm. "Why are no French newspapers other than the Communist Humanité read in Russia?" Here Kosygin quibbled: "Our people prefer to read Humanité but, of course, there might be other papers they'd like to read, too; but that depends on you, gentlemen of the press." This was pretty clumsy, considering that in Warsaw Le Monde and many other French papers are available on the bookstalls.

However, Kosygin did not dodge another question that was also obviously meant to embarrass him. An American correspondent referred to the fact that "many Jewish families had been separated by the war; some members were in the Soviet Union, others abroad; could they ever meet, as Greek and Armenian families in the same position had met?" The question was put cautiously, and seemed to refer to possible reciprocal visits by members of the same family; Kosygin took the whole problem in its broader aspects. While making the usual denial that the Soviet Union practiced anti-Semitism, or any kind of discrimination against Jews, he made the rather startling statement that not only was there no objection to members of the same family meeting one another, but also "for those who wanted to leave the Soviet Union the door was open, and there was no problem whatsoever."

In Russia Under Khrushchev, a book I published a few years ago, I had a chapter on "The Two Jewish Problems in Russia." I showed that there was a minority of old-fashioned, orthodox or Israel-conscious Jews who resented the Soviet measures taken against their specifically Jewish or Yiddish culture, which the Soviets considered archaic, bourgeois-nationalist and denoting "split loyalties" (to put it mildly). On the other hand, a much larger group of Jews objected to the obstacles placed in the way of their complete assimilation with the Russians or Ukrainians, to the fact that even if they changed their name to a Russian name, they still were called "Jews" on their passports and were subjected, in certain cases, to prejudice, if not outright discrimination.

The question that really arises, after Kosygin's statement, is whether the Soviets will welcome the departure of the "unassimilated" Jewish minority of perhaps not more than 500,000 people, and whether, as against this, they will authorize the complete assimilation of those approximately 2 million Jews who do not, in the main, want to rank as Jews, and many of whom hold highly responsible positions in practically all fields of activity—industry, science, journalism and theatre, the cinema, music, etc.

Kosygin was also asked questions on Vietnam and China. On the former he said he could do nothing but respect the conditions for a cease-fire laid down by Hanoi and the Vietcong; as for China, he merely referred his questioners to the article published in Pravda on November 27.

I read this very long article carefully and, oddly enough, it reminded me of something I had read in the Soviet press eighteen years ago: Mao Tse-tung was being treated much as Tito had been treated in those days. In one respect the resemblance was particularly marked. Just as the Russians had asserted that there were, in 1948, many good Marxist-Leninist Yugoslavs who were loyal to the Soviet Union and were being persecuted (and even murdered) by Tito, so now there were said to be Chinese Communists who agreed with Moscow and wholly disapproved of Mao's "anti-Leninist" line.

All the fury of the "cultural revolution"—Mao's creation—was really directed not against American imperialism but against the Soviet Union. By branding "revisionist" the Soviet Communist Party and practically all other Communist parties, Mao had isolated China. The Pravda article clearly suggested that the Stalin "personality cult" was child's play when compared with the cult of Mao, who "placed himself above Marx, Engels and Lenin." Moreover, this Maoism was not merely an internal matter, since the "cultural revolution" had strong international pretensions. Without recalling that the Russians stopped their economic help to China as long ago as 1960, Pravda taxed the Chinese with black ingratitude.

Much is made in Pravda of the "Leninist cadres" of the Chinese Communist party who (like Zujovic and Hebrang in Yugoslavia) are now being persecuted; the Red Guards (whom Pravda curiously calls "the Red Okhrana") are supported by the police and the army; the purpose of the cultural revolution is to complete the divorce between China and Russia and, if possible, to bring about a war between the Soviet Union and the United States. Pravda even talks about "collusion" between China and the United States. It also draws attention to the violent anti-Soviet broadcasts in Russian that are sent out by a dozen hard-working Chinese wireless stations. Despite Chinese claims to the contrary, the Russian paper asserts that Mao has no following outside his own country (a point virtually conceded by the Albanians, recently, with their boast that "Mao is not afraid of being isolated").

But the paper's main argument, of course, is that China is disrupting the international Communist movement, is thus hampering truly decisive help to Vietnam, and is chauvinist and anti-Russian.

Even more interesting than this Pravda attack on Maoism is the account given in Izvestia for November 22 of a visit made to China by a Russian delegation from the Soviet-Chinese Friendship Society. The trip had to be cut short because everywhere they went the Russians were insulted as "revisionists" and likened even to the Nazis! When the visitors talked of improved living standards in Russia, the Chinese cried "bourgeois degeneration"; one Chinese factory director said to them: "Piecework is substantially selfish and is the essence of revisionism." And one of the Russian delegates commented: "The odd thing is that, having got rid of their capitalists and landlords, the Chinese seem to be glorying in poverty which they seem to want to perpetuate! What a caricature of Marxism!"

The delegates were astonished when they went to a concert at a workers' club. The girls' choir sang quotations from Mao Tse-tung, and followed this exercise with a dance performed to the accompaniment of additional extracts from Mao's works. Their "most painful moment," one delegate reported, was when they visited a children's home. Here a toddler of 3, on being told that they were Soviet comrades, said (insofar as he had learned to speak at all): "Soviet revisionists, bad people." Then these young citizens broke into a chant about imperialism, Soviet revisionism, etc. A delegate asked the teacher if they ever sang about chickens and rabbits: "No, songs about Mao, and political slogans were more important." What makes all such stories so striking is not that they prove the political or even ideological differences between the Russians and the Chinese but that they show a profound psychological incomprehension between the two peoples. That was the point made to me by many Russians during my last visit to Moscow: "We seem to have a common language with West Europeans, even with Americans; with the Chinese we have no common language, no mutual understanding. And that is much more tragic, in the long run, than any political disagreements."

What then of the Chinese "Zujovics and Hebrangs"—those pro-Soviet Chinese Communists—to whom Pravda refers? Are they a real political force in China, or are they, like the pro-Stalin Yugoslavs of 1948, mere rare exceptions who cannot in any way alter the course of history? The impression one gets is that Russians are at least as puzzled by what is really going on in China as we are.

The Russians, now relatively rich (thanks largely to major changes in agricultural policy since Khrushchev; they have had a bumper harvest this year) find Chinese egalitarianism and the austere cult of poverty particularly baffling—and embarrassing. It is scarcely surprising that Kosygin should have preferred not to discuss all this in front of bourgeois audiences in France. Would he not also have had to say that if the Chinese were at present impotent in their world-revolution ambitions, the Russians were really not interested in world revolution at all, for all their talk about "proletarian internationalism"?

Not that Kosygin was (as has been suggested by some papers) standoffish or unfriendly to the French Communists. He had a "fraternal" meeting with their leaders during his "pilgrimage" to the small flat where Lenin once lived, but during his visit to aircraft factories (at one he saw the still uncompleted Concorde), he merely smiled and waved at the workers, and spent all his time talking to the French directors and top technicians. The fact, an irony of international relations, is that while the French Communists want the Gaullists defeated in the March general election, Kosygin would much prefer de Gaulle and the Gaullists to continue their rule of France. This great display of Franco-Soviet friendship (Pompidou is shortly going to Moscow) is not entirely unrelated to the French election; de Gaulle hopes to get for his supporters quite a number of Communist working-class votes.

PROFITS OF WAR

THE PUTSCH AGAINST McNAMARA

H. L. NIEBURG

Mr. Nieburg teaches political science at the University of Wisconsin (Milwaukee). He is the author of In the Name of Science (Quadrangle) and Secrecy and Foreign Policy (Public Affairs Press).

Little noticed during the Vietnamese escalation has been the quiet coup of defense and air-space contractors against the reform efforts of Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara. The main salient of the coup came in mid-1965 with the muzzling of the General Accounting Office (GAO), Congress' own "Inspector General." Now a new curtain of secrecy has fallen.

However controversial his foreign policy role, McNamara's conduct of the Department of Defense (DOD) has won admiration among all except those who have been beneficiaries of the system of power and special privilege built up by two decades of cold war and permanent crisis. From the start, he set about the difficult task of finding new contract yardsticks. He applied a program of cost/effectiveness analysis to all budget requests and placed future budgeting on a five-year "program-package" basis. To correct the military propensity for rushing into large-scale contracts on the basis of inadequate information, he adopted a step-method of moving from program definition and feasibility studies through gradually larger research and development (R&D) and hardware contracts, attempting to weed out duplication and unpromising efforts at as early and inexpensive a stage as possible. McNamara played an important role in formulating the Administration's new code of ethical practices and the recommendations of the 1962 Bell Report (on administration of R&D contracts), forcefully implementing these in the DOD. In 1962, he announced "Project 60," which aimed at consolidating DOD's control of all defense procurement, eliminating the unruly, fragmented and refractory decentralization which had resulted in service duplication, competition and evasion of DOD authority.

McNamara's efforts were initiated in the first months of the Kennedy administration and reached heights of success and promise just before the Vietnamese escalation. In early 1965, President Johnson extended the "method" to the entire Administration, ordering all agencies to be operating on the new system by fiscal 1967. It seemed that the main battles had been won and that, despite huge war spending in Vietnam, the gang of contractors, grown fat and sassy at taxpayer expense, would now be in for leaner days. Backed by a team of tough and knowing scientific managers and managing scientists, McNamara had by 1965 humbled the Air Force, unified procurement, and initiated administrative controls which, for the first time, made possible top-level discipline of the sprawling contractor-military empires.

However, the forces of the "Contract State" did not become loyal soldiers in the President's war against waste. Rather, they demonstrated determination, durability and undiminished political and economic power. The very reforms were subtly converted to enhance the system, utilizing every loophole, the inertial resistance of the lower bureaucratic echelons, the intervention of influential Congressional committees and the President's need to win support for new welfare programs and Vietnamese policy.

The McNamara regime has used the General Accounting Office as a real management tool, matching the GAO itself in enthusiasm for efficiency and economy. As a result, a great majority of legislators have manifested growing annoyance and disillusionment with the GAO. Where Congress had previously used GAO charges primarily as a lever for political bargaining with the Administration, they now faced the prospect of genuine action to eliminate waste.

The spokesmen of the contractor community have made clear that their real concern is with the impact of the McNamara reforms, aided and abetted by GAO audits. Boeing's Howard W. Neffner declared:

> As a result of its expanding role within government, GAO has become intimately involved in the daily activities of many government agencies. In the exercise of its more recently acquired right to audit contractors, GAO is attempting a similarly deep penetration of industry. The promising nature of GAO criticism, and the efforts made to enforce its recommendations are already dominant factors in procurement policy and practise.

H. M. Horner, chairman of United Aircraft, stated: "Increased Congressional guidance of GAO is needed to make sure that that agency does not, through its wide powers, seek to impose unwise policies on the executive agencies, which may lead, among other things, to increased defense procurement costs and to undermining the integrity of government contracts." Contractors went so far as to promote a passive resistance campaign against the GAO, closing their doors and their books to the auditors of the comptroller general.

Department of Defense reforms based upon GAO reports were seen by contractors as representing a philosophy fundamentally subversive to "free enterprise": They constituted, in the words of Lockheed's president, "a contrary philosophy that contractors whose business is primarily with the government are, in reality, agents of the government rather than private businesses. . . ." A trade association officer declared that, in the comptroller general's view, defense industry was "analogous to a regulated industry and hence profits on negotiated defense contracts are to be limited in somewhat the same fashion as utility company profits are limited by regulatory commissions."

In a 1965 inquiry into GAO practices, members of the Holifield subcommittee (House Government Operations Committee) behaved like prosecuting attorneys toward GAO officials: Instead of Lockheed, GAO was investigated. While vigorously and scathingly inquiring into federal grants and contracts to universities, Congressmen tend to treat government contractors with deference, sympathy and an elaborate ritual of manners.

In the middle of that investigation, Comptroller General Joseph Campbell resigned "for reasons of health." He had been a valiant comptroller for almost ten years, pursuing the tough auditing practices which enabled Congressmen to pose as defenders of the nation's purse, an attitude that often served the public interest. In 1965, however, the forthright style of GAO reports was not appreciated, and the cross fire Campbell faced certainly made it plausible that his heart condition prevented him from defending his honor and his agency in that hostile atmosphere.

His departure permitted legislators to select a comptroller general more understanding of the new mood of Congress. The choice fell on Elmer Staats (he assumed the post in March, 1966) who, as deputy budget director during the Eisenhower years, had cultivated close and effective liaison with Democratic legislators and was widely considered one of their key men in the Republican administration.

During the year which intervened between the subcommittee's investigation and the report to the House, dickering over guidelines went on quietly and with perfect effect. The report describes and justifies the new guidelines. The key revisions (as stated by Acting Comptroller General Frank H. Weitzel):

Deletion of names and specifics. Specific "deficiencies" of contractors and contracting agencies would no longer be reflected in public GAO documents. The agency was "modifying our practices to provide that the titles of our reports to the Congress be couched in constructive terms rather than in the terms of the deficiencies being reported." Detailed comments would be couched "in as constructive a vein as possible." Emphasis would be shifted from specific instances of fraud, wrongdoing and mismanagement to "the corrective measures needed." Reports would focus on "basic causes of adverse conditions." Individual examples of waste or inefficiency ". . . will serve as indications of, and will be used in our reports as illustrations of, the need for management improvements rather than necessarily the subjects of individual reports to the Congress." The agency has "discontinued the practise of (1) disclosing in our reports the identities of individuals immediately responsible for actions or operations we are criticizing and (2) including in our reports recommendation for disciplinary or other personnel action."

Such information "when warranted or requested" would be conveyed to "appropriate agency officials and to interested Congressional committees or members by separate letters."

Recovery left to others. Weitzel noted that in audits of cost-type contracts, GAO had often taken the position that a prime contractor had failed to exercise "due care" in protecting the government's interest, "and we therefore recommended a recovery on the basis of common-law right." This was in accordance with the Armed Services Procurement Regulations which recognized "due care" as a criterion for determining reasonable and therefore allowable costs. The procedure would now be dropped, and instead GAO would recognize that "the authority for determining the reasonableness of costs rests with the contracting agency." In the future, recommendations for recovery of excess costs would be submitted to the contracting agency "for consideration as a matter under the contract rather than on the basis of common-law right. . . ."

Referred cases to be secret. Discovery of outright fraud or other law violation would continue to be referred to the Justice Department, but in camera. "In view of the possible adverse effects that such public disclosure might have on the individuals or company involved, we have decided that such referrals, when made, would not be mentioned in our reports to the Congress." During the period from 1958 to 1964, forty-one such instances, involving most of the contractor giants, have been reported and referred to Justice. More than half of these have resulted in "voluntary refunds," an admission of guilt and a token expiation. Only a handful of cases have gone to court, there to be feebly prosecuted and usually lost; the balance have been pigeonholed on the grounds of insufficient evidence or reluctance of the agency concerned to press the case.

"Good Conscience and Equity" recoveries. Noting that "The Truth in Negotiation Act" provides that contractors certify cost estimates and that all negotiated cost-type contracts contain a clause for adjustment of increases "resulting from inaccurate, incomplete, or non-current data," the GAO would hereafter refrain from seeking voluntary refunds on contracts entered into prior to the law's effective date (December 1, 1962) "except in unusual instances." In citing this policy, the GAO smuggled in a sharp indictment of contracting practices:

> We have observed and reported many cases of excessive prices resulting from unrealistically high cost estimates submitted by the prospective contractor for negotiation purposes. . . . Often it was our view that the prices proposed were unrealistically high considering the information available at the time as to the probable cost of production. Sometimes the available data indicated a cost substantially below that included in the composition of the price proposed. . . . At other times the contractor refused to furnish cost information, but the proposed price greatly exceeded the anticipated cost plus the rate of profit normally allowed. . . . In those cases . . . we recommended that the agency seek an adjustment . . . on the basis of good conscience and equity even though there was no legal liability. . . .

Release of reports to the press. GAO audits have protected the public interest primarily through publicity resulting from direct release of reports to the press. "We have been concerned with a few complaints from contractors that they first become aware through news media of the issuance of final reports on contracts with them." To avoid this embarrassment, the agency would "insure delivery of the reports to Congress, the agencies, and contractors concerned before distribution to others. . . ." The contractor's position would ordinarily be made a part of the report, although he might not be identified therein.

The agency would also demonstrate more respect for contractor demands that reports omit information which might disclose "trade secrets and other proprietary business information."

Withheld payments. During the inquiry, three cases had developed in which GAO audits revealed such gross irregularities that the agency in question was compelled to order withholding of payments to the contractors. The committee report noted that "after these issues were reviewed and discussed at the hearings," the matter had been reconsidered and "the Comptroller General decided that further withholding of payments would not be necessary in the three cases. . . ."

Finally, the GAO declared that it would review the organization and function of the new Defense Contract Audit Agency (DCAA) of the Department of Defense in order to "avoid unnecessary duplication of effort. . . ." This innocent statement conceals a device which Congressional leaders show signs of using to undermine completely the authority of GAO to demand access to contractor's records, books and pricing data in cost-plus contracts.

Judging by the report, the Holifield committee has succeeded in convincing GAO that "a large part of the responsibilities for policing the Truth in Negotiation Act necessarily falls to the Defense Contract Audit Agency." However, while the law gives GAO this power, it has not given DCAA a similar right. The report notes that "if the Department of Defense is to acquire the access privilege on a sustained or permanent basis, it probably should be a matter of Congressional rather than administrative decision." Having seriously undermined GAO's will to use this power, the Congress has made no move to empower the DCAA to assume this essential responsibility. In fact, the committee paused in its report to justify reluctance to act on the matter:

> While it appears at first glance that there can be no objection to granting contractual privilege of access to company books and records in public contracting, knotty questions will arise when contractors are compelled to assert this privilege against sub-contractors who are also competitors in other respects.

The muzzling of the GAO by pressure, subterfuge and gentlemen's agreement was accomplished silently and smoothly, with almost no repercussions and only token protest. I failed to find a single mention in a survey of nine of the nation's most responsible newspapers, including the reproving and respectable New York Times.

The Congressional spanking produced results well before the Campbell resignation and the end of the inquiry. In regard to cases referred to the Justice Department for recovery of overcharges or for criminal prosecution, the committee notes that "the backlog . . . has been reduced" and that "no new cases have been referred by the GAO to Justice." In regard to GAO's intention to refrain from recommending voluntary refunds, "even when it believes prices charged by the contractor were excessive," it is disclosed that "since July 1965, none of the reports issued by the GAO have recommended voluntary recoveries from contractors, except in one instance where the DOD concurred."

This "broader and more positive" approach has resulted in a precipitous drop in the number of GAO reports. For the last half of calendar year 1965, total reports were less than one-quarter the number published in the last half of 1964. In addition, fifty-seven reports were "indefinitely postponed" during the period September, 1965, through March, 1966. Twenty-nine other investigations would not be issued as final reports. Staats announced in August, 1966, the preparation of a generalized report, based upon the audits of 242 negotiated prime contracts and subcontracts, having a dollar value of more than $600 million and involving eighty-five primes and eighty-nine subs. This "constructive" analysis of a general problem would serve, he said, more effectively to aid the Congress and the public than the multiple separate and specific reports of the past.

A number of Congressmen have expressed dissent, inserting minority views in the committee report. Congressman Jack Brooks (D., Tex.) declared that > . . . many of the recommendations contained in the report, in my opinion, will deter rather than encourage improvements in GAO audit procedures. . . . I do not subscribe to the endorsement of policies limiting access of the press and the public to information in the GAO reports, particularly with reference to the referral of matters to the Department of Justice.

He charged that the committee disclosed little discussion, cited only three examples, and gave no evaluation or classification of deficiencies in specific GAO audits. Nor, he added, "is any significant evidence of this type found in the hearings." The conclusions of the report "can only intensify the difficulties confronting the GAO in maintaining an effective contract audit system. . . ." Congressmen John W. Wydler (R., N.Y.) and Clarence J. Brown, Jr. (R., Ohio) endorsed the report but with qualification: "While we approve generally of GAO's 'self-appraisal and improvement' we do not wish to imply any endorsement of decisions in derogation of the public's right to know." Congressmen Robert Dole (R., Kan.) and Donald Rumsfeld (R., Ill.) wrote that the report "could tend to place the GAO on the defensive in its future contract audit operations." They called for the appearance of Comptroller General Staats before Congress to present his personal evaluation of the guidelines, concluding "the GAO is an arm of Congress. Let's not disarm it."

Two other Congressmen later added their voices. Rep. Richard H. Poff (R., Va.) told an aerospace journal he did not approve of any effort to "gag and sterilize" the investigative arm of Congress, especially when the party in office has such big majorities in both Executive and legislative branches. Rep. James A. Haley (D., Fla.) called for a public outcry against the Holifield committee which, he said, was trying "to diminish GAO's effectiveness and cover-up information the public has a right to know."

The real tendency of the GAO muzzling became clear in July, 1966, when the agency was forced to play a shabby role in an effort by the House Armed Services Special Investigations Subcommittee to attack and discredit the whole McNamara cost-reduction and reform program. In July, 1965, the Secretary of Defense had issued a third annual report on the cost-reduction program, claiming savings from actions during the 1964 fiscal year of $5.3 billion and predicting a rate over $6 billion by 1969.

In 1966, Rep. Porter Hardy, Jr. (D., Va.), opened an investigation of these claims and clearly demonstrated a disposition to dismiss them as either imaginary or as a factor directly compromising the combat effectiveness of U.S. troops in Vietnam. (The contradiction between these two interpretations failed to trouble him.) The hearings did not support either conclusion, since GAO representatives, set to work on McNamara's figures, found only minor discrepancies in the reported savings (some of which, indeed, turned out to have been understated). The testimony made clear that a reasonable man might quarrel with some of the standards employed to identify and define savings, but even here it was clear that top DOD leadership was striving to improve the criteria and was aware that separate services were inclined to interpret figures so as to make the most of reported savings.

The overall effect was to dramatize the difficulties which beset McNamara's attempt to impose a degree of administrative integrity over the sprawling and refractory agencies of his domain. In spite of this, the Armed Services subcommittee managed to construe every scrap of negative information in a way to support their attack, and to justify their drastic recommendations. In a prologue to its recommendations, the report sought to overcome the weakness of evidence in its case:

> The sprinkling of a few true savings actions in a pot containing many which are either invalid or questionable does not turn the mixture into pure gold. Instead, the de-> based result could make the whole program suspect, causing it to lose its value and force as a powerful aid to real economy.

Among other things, the committee called upon McNamara to "reduce the pressures of the present quota system, to lessen the possibility of defense judgments being made on an economy basis rather than a military basis." To beef up its charges, the subcommittee implied that much of the story remained classified and that real shortages had occurred as a result of Defense management. One may search the actual testimony in vain for some general indication of the impact of the alleged classified information.

The events attending the GAO muzzling are secondary to underlying problems of public contracting which cut to the heart of the evolving nature of American society. Government functions at all levels are being put out on contract today at an unprecedented rate, and contracting for space, defense and science has become a method not merely for procuring goods and services but also for social management, the allocation of national resources, and for the pump-priming of jobs, income and the production level of the economy. Federal contracts have become a significant part of the general patchwork of subsidies (for consumer industries, transportation, education, welfare programs, etc.). Public contracting has always been a patronage tool ("honest graft") which raised difficult and sensitive conflict-of-interest and management problems. Today, the scale and scope of the system give a new urgency to these problems. What is to be done?

Claims made in behalf of "free enterprise" by defense, aerospace, science, road-building and other companies that subsist and grow entirely on public funds are specious and serve only to protect them from adequate public supervision. It is nonetheless clear that some kind of partnership between private enterprise and government is desirable and inevitable. Government responsibilities are too broad and manifold to be conducted entirely by civil servants in a vast bureaucracy. The pluralism provided by the private economy, at least in those areas where the profit motive and competition still operate, is an excellent safeguard. It constitutes a kind of outrigging for the social system which maintains its resilience through checks and balances not merely in government but also between government and all kinds of more or less independent organized interests (social, economic and political). The present system has much to recommend it and methods are available to control or rectify its dangerous tendencies.

An American ombudsman? The DOD's new Central Audit Agency can do an important part of the job which the GAO heretofore has performed alone, giving the civilian leadership of the department greater access and control over the negotiated procurements, now at $30-plus billion a year and certain to grow larger. But the new agency is neither government-wide nor independent of the Defense Department. After McNamara, its role may be drastically altered and the newly unified DOD powers distributed again among the parochial and self-serving armed services. The sole government-wide agency is the Bureau of the Budget, which has only incidental post-audit responsibilities, and of course lacks independence from the ongoing interests of the Administration. In spite of Congressional interest in GAO as a weapon of political bargaining, its indispensable role is to provide Congress and the public with information on government expenditures from a source independent of the Executive and of the agencies of the vast federal establishment.

However, the "Inspector General" function should be protected from the vicissitudes of politics and from inordinate control by any parochial agency, Congressional bloc or transitory aberration of public opinion. Theoretically, Congress represents many conflicting regions, blocs, interests and parties. However, its pluralism has been severely eroded by the unexamined institutions of the Contract State that have sprung into being with war and permanent diplomacy. The stake that almost every member has in the distribution of federal largess tends to undermine and corrupt independence and to restrict criticism to rare Congressional outsiders whose main motivation is that they and their constituents are not sharing in the loot. Thus the Inspector General requires a legal basis of independence similar to that of federal judges.

Perhaps the institution of the ombudsman, a Swedish invention, should be tried. The word translates as "a man who represents the little people." Sweden incorporated the institution in its constitution of 1809, primarily to guarantee civil rights. England adopted it in 1966 as a means of giving the people another route of representation in the growing number of government-operated industries. Michigan recently appointed an ombudsman of sorts on an experimental basis, and last June Nassau County, New York, appointed a retired judge as Commissioner of Accounts with ombudsman duties in such areas as road repair, snow removal and street lighting. The ombudsman provides the public with a servant who does not depend upon their votes for early re-election and presumably will not look toward special interests for eventual reward.

The contract-auditing function can work exactly as did the GAO at its best, prior to April, 1965. But its independence must be vouchsafed by granting the comptroller general a term at least two years longer than that of the longest elected term of federal office (that is at least eight years). The GAO staff must enjoy secure civil service status, adequate salaries, high standards and the prestige which appointment of a respected senior statesman, industrialist, labor leader or other distinguished professional to the top post might induce. Full public disclosure of all audit investigations must be guaranteed.

Such a system, however carefully designed, would be subject to corruption, and there will always be a temptation to create one more watchdog office or agency to police the last one created. This argument does not destroy the ombudsman notion. It is stupid to trust no one, just as it is puerile to assume that the ombudsman will relieve the Congress, the Defense Contract Audit Agency, the Defense Secretary, the President, the leaders of both political parties, the spokesmen of organized interest and pressure groups, or any other would-be active citizens from the perennial challenges of life in a democratic society.

The need for yardsticks. It is also essential that government have within its capabilities a yardstick for contractor costs and performance. Where genuine competitive pricing and open bidding (without collusion) are practiced, the law of supply and demand provides a measure sufficient to protect public interest. But in the ever-larger areas where government is the sole customer, where there is no civilian market for comparison, or where quasi-monopoly and administered prices prevail, the government must create and conserve a yardstick of its own. For example, in the area of road building, both federal and state governments can maintain a full complement of road-building crews in the status of civil servants, reserving samples of highway construction projects in selected areas of the nation for "in-house" pricing purposes. Similarly, in defense, space and science, we must halt the decline of real in-house capabilities, and must maintain government arsenals, navy yard shipbuilding programs, university-administered lab and testing facilities, federal labs and factories.

Public disclosure of conflicts of interest. In June, 1966, the DOD required that generals, admirals and top-level civilian employees disclose all their financial holdings and outside employment. In addition, lower ranking civilians and officers must file such statements if their duties involve procurement or contracting. This conflicts with traditional standards of privacy but when coupled with an upgrading of career government employees in salary, advancement opportunity and assignment of authentically important and challenging work, it may be a minimal step. And it is not too farfetched to liken the position of major government contractors to that of career officers and civil servants, and to require of them a similar disclosure. Access to books and records of corporations engaged in government work of an annual value above, let us say, $100,000, might go far toward changing not merely the name but also the substance of the game.

Something might be done also to organize bodies of citizens representing functional groups, skill groups and interest groups that have a direct concern with some aspect of activities undertaken by government and its contractors. Such citizen groups might be given an advisory role similar to that which Sargent Shriver has sought for the poor in the management of poverty programs.

Doubtless other protections will suggest themselves. The key requirement is to build checks and balances on all levels of those activities primarily public in character and conducted with public funds to carry out politically agreed-upon public objectives. If this requirement is not met, the McNamara system will prove a mere temporary inconvenience to the beneficiaries of the Contract State, who will merrily go marching on.

ARKANSAS PRISON FARM

THE WHIP PAYS OFF

ROBERT PEARMAN

Mr. Pearman is a reporter on the Kansas City Star who writes frequently on state penal problems.

After O.E. Bishop, superintendent of the Arkansas state penitentiary, has sentenced a man to be whipped, he sits at his desk and waits until the punishment is carried out. If the door is open, he can hear the sounds of the strap falling in a room just down the hall, but Captain Bishop (in Arkansas all wardens are called "Cap'n") never watches the whippings. He has no stomach for such things.

"I'd just rather see anything other than that," says the superintendent, who took over his present job last January, after seventeen years as sheriff of Union County. "I know you have to have some means to cope with the things that happen here. That's why I want to build the facilities for solitary confinement. I just think it would work better."

The Arkansas state penitentiary is really two massive prison farms, the Cummins farm near Grady and the Tucker farm, several miles to the north. The whipping of inmates has been a way of life at both farms for as long as anyone can remember. Inmates have been whipped for "not digging a ditch fast enough"; for "missing some cucumbers" or "overlooking okra" while picking them in the fields; and for complaining about being whipped.

Last September, James Howard Cobb, 31, of North Little Rock, a prisoner in California, brought a damage suit because, he charged, he was subjected to "willful and malicious beatings" while in the Arkansas state penitentiary. "On two different occasions plaintiff was harnessed to a plow along with seven other inmates and made to pull the plow from 5 A.M. until 5:30 P.M.," Cobb's petition charged. It alleged that he and the others were then whipped and made to pull harder.

The sting of the lash has been felt in more than one prison in the United States, but since last January the whip has enjoyed a new status in the Arkansas penitentiary. It is now legally sanctioned and officially recognized. In no other state, prison officials believe, is whipping thus "officially approved."

Both the Cummins and Tucker farms are unhappy institutions. Last August, Gov. Orval Faubus directed drastic personnel and trusty changes at the Tucker farm after receiving a state police report of wrongdoings there. The Governor said the investigation revealed that the rules of punishment were not being observed; that money was being extorted from inmates by prison personnel, and that liquor was being allowed to reach the inmates. He dismissed all three wardens at Tucker, and fifteen trusties were transferred from Tucker to Cummins.

Trouble broke out a month later at Cummins when 144 inmates sat down in their barracks and in the fields to protest the food and the working conditions, and to demand more privileges. At least, that was what prison officials said the strike was about. A letter, painstakingly written in pencil, smuggled out of the prison, and printed in the Arkansas Gazette, told a different story. "We are worked from sunup until sundown at times in rain, cold, snow, until we are soaking wet or half frozen. Like human machines we are talked about, humiliated, beaten, half fed, and when we complain we are told we were sentenced to hard labor and there is nothing illegal in what they are doing." The letter added that young prisoners are sometimes forced to commit homosexual acts with the trusties.

Captain Bishop broke up the strike with the state police and tear gas. The men were denied application for parole and the leaders were taken out and whipped. The letter commented: "And 10 men, after we were finally forced out, whom they considered our leaders, were charged with insubordination and refusing to work and given 8 lashes apiece with a strap, better known here as the hide. All because we ask to be treated like human beings and men and not animals, which here we have been treated much worse than animals."

Winston Talley, one of three inmates who first forced the issue of the whip into the federal courts, charges that inmates were punished by a needle being stuck a half-inch under their fingernails. Of the strap he testified in federal court: "You feel like somebody is pouring hot grease on you. It leaves your hide purple and black." Talley testified that he had been whipped about seventy-five times in four years. Once, he said, Mose Harmon, a 300-pound field warden, "hit me until he got tired and fell up against a truck and grunted."

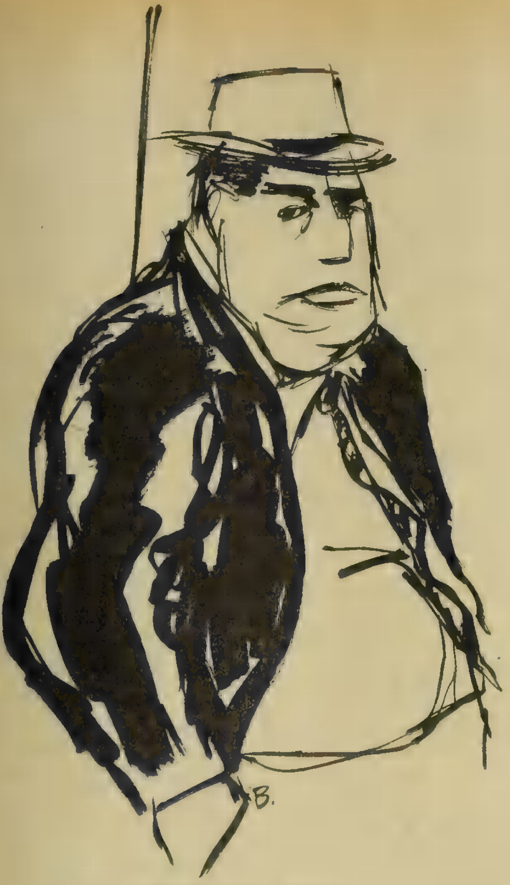
On the morning after he testified, Talley was back at the Cummins farm. All parties later agreed that he was at once called from the fields and lashed again. Talley stated: "Cap'n Harmon call me out of the field on the morning following the hearing, approximately 7 A.M. Cap'n Harmon said: Get down, I'm whipping you for lying yesterday. I think I still owe you about twenty-five and I might as well get started right now. He asks me if I was counting these after he had hit me eight times. I answered 'No, Sir.' He then hit me once more and said get away."

But Harmon said that he had whipped Talley because he was openly agitating that the prisoners not work, and that while he, Harmon, had remarked that this might teach him not to lie in court, he had not punished the convict for his testimony or for filing the petition.

The judge who heard Talley's testimony did not ban the whip in the Arkansas state penitentiary, but he said the whipping must not be excessive, must be inflicted as dispassionately as possible, and must be inflicted under recognized regulations. Until the rules were drawn up, the judge stipulated, there were to be no more whippings.

The state penitentiary board went right to work to draw up the rules: Whipping in the fields was forbidden. Whippings were limited to ten lashes. Inmates (trusties) were forbidden to whip other inmates. A Board of Inquiry was established to decide how many lashes should be given. The offenses for which an inmate could be whipped were listed: homosexuality, agitation, insubordination, making or concealing weapons, refusal to work when medically certified as fit, and participating in or inciting a riot.

Supt. O. E. Bishop



Warden Mose Harmon

Said Captain Bishop: "I read the new regulations to the men myself, and they were pleased with them."

Use of the leather strap—4 feet long, half an inch thick, with a wooden handle—isn't the only thing that distinguishes the Arkansas state penitentiary. In many ways it is the most peculiar prison in America.

There are no walls or fences at either farm and only the convicts carry arms. The guard on the road is a trusty, the men who carry shotguns and rifles to watch the men in the fields are trusties, the men who stand duty in the towers and patrol the prisons at night are trusties. None of the wardens carries a weapon, but they oversee the trusties who do.

Every morning when the men go to work the fields, the armories at either end of the main prison building are opened and the trusties are handed shotguns and rifles and ammunition for them. There are two riflemen and four shotguns to each "long line" (working party). In the fields white trusties guard white work lines; Negro trusties guard Negro work lines. In the mess hall, white inmates eat at one end, Negro inmates eat at the other. About 43 per cent of the inmates are Negroes. The men with the shotguns stay 50 to 75 yards from the convicts in the fields. The convicts with the rifles are from 100 to 150 yards away. They have a twofold function: They protect the men with the shotguns should they be rushed by the line, and they are a deterrent in case the shotgun man tries to make a break or runs amok with the weapon.

There are 15,000 acres at the Cummins farm and 4,500 acres at Tucker. The land is flat and mostly treeless, and there is a kennel of bloodhounds. Of course, the men with the best opportunity to escape are the trusties. Sometimes they take their weapons with them. "That usually gets them killed," one warden says candidly.

"These boys do have a certain amount of authority . . . and sometimes we do have problems," Captain Bishop admits. "Sometimes one of the men more or less resents having an inmate tell him what to do, but it's not a big problem."

The factor that is a problem, that underlies the whippings for "overlooking okra" and the convicts patrolling with shotguns tucked into their arms, is money. Back in 1897, a law was passed to acquire the Cummins farm and to establish there a "self-supporting" institution. Today the Arkansas penitentiary pays for itself, and in years of good crops and prices it makes money. In the fiscal year 1964, it showed a net profit of $431,481.75 after major expenses of $91,237.74 to feed the prisoners, and $56,656.78 to feed the livestock.

There are 1,900 prisoners at the Cummins and Tucker farms, and only thirty-five salaried employees, including the superintendent and his staff, an executioner, two chaplains, two doctors, bookkeepers, a chief warden and eighteen field wardens. The budget could never balance if there were a salaried guard force. For example, in Missouri, a state whose prison staffs are notoriously underpaid, the 300 guards at the state penitentiary at Jefferson City are paid $1.5 million annually to keep watch over approximately the same number of prisoners as are incarcerated at Cummins and Tucker.

The convicts who perform the labor in the fields—who in fact are sentenced to do so by the Arkansas courts—are paid nothing. A man in the Arkansas state penitentiary may earn money in only one way: he may sell his blood for $5 a pint, of which $1 goes to the inmates' dress-out fund.

There are no shops or prison industries. The men learn trades by doing the prison housekeeping or they work in the fields. Good tractor drivers are always in demand when it comes time for parole, Captain Bishop asserts. "We're training cotton pickers," said Grady Woolly, of El Dorado, a member of the state prison board. It takes 600 men working six days a week for three months to pick the cotton that machines could pick in a few days.

The only men at the Arkansas prison who do not perform labor are those condemned to death. Last spring there were twelve men, eleven Negro, one white, awaiting execution in the isolation cells at the Tucker farm.

Although Arkansas politicians have often sold the "self-supporting" aspects of the prison system to voters, the whippings were called off only three times—always during heated election campaigns—in the long tenure of Governor Faubus. But each time, the Governor said, the prison superintendents restored the punishment. And today Captain Bishop argues some form of discipline must be available to him to keep the prisons in check. At Tucker there are isolation cells but at Cummins there are none.

Governor Faubus, who will hand over the reins of state government to Winthrop Rockefeller next January, asserts that he has always left the question of the strap to the decision of the penitentiary board and to the prison superintendent. But Faubus himself has some definite ideas about what a penitentiary is for and how it should function. The purpose of a penitentiary, the Governor has said, is to punish, not to rehabilitate, the inmates.

"Punishment is the greatest deterrent to crime," the Governor said, adding that the law and the courts recognize this when they sentenced the men to hard labor.

Dan D. Stephens, who preceded Captain Bishop as superintendent, held similar views. "Rehabilitation isn't something you can teach a man," Stephens said. "It's a state of mind that can come to a man in the strangest places, even in the middle of a cotton field on a prison farm."

To penologists the principal horror of the Arkansas system is not the use of the strap—although all professionals condemn that too—the real horror is the arming of 300 convicts to keep watch over the others. It is a cardinal rule of prison administration that no inmate should ever be allowed to exercise control over another. In Arkansas some inmates have the power of life and death.

But there are growing indications that many people in Arkansas are not happy with the prison and that the new Governor may try to do something about it if he can convince the legislature to provide the money.

Some time back, the prayer chairman of the Baptist State Women's Missionary Union added the conditions at the state penitentiary to her list of things requiring some prayerful attention.

Captain Bishop sees a need for change: "People who want to criticize this institution, this way of operation, are perfectly welcome to do so," he said. "But at the same time, I think that any time you keep 2,000 of these guys down here and don't have any more trouble than we have, then I think this operation has some good things about it. It could be better, I know. We could improve it if we had more paid personnel."

In early October the state prison board, which had actively resisted and resented any criticism of the state prison system, began to do some criticizing of its own; it called for a change in the law that provides for confining prisoners at "hard labor" and does not call for rehabilitation. Board members even talked about taking advantage of federal aid to set up psychiatric service to screen convicts.

And although they, like Governor Faubus, have long prided themselves that the prison is "self-supporting," they began to call for a departure from the concept. Charlie Adams of Hughes, a board member, pointed out that the hard-labor provisions ruled out any educational or job training program.

He is entirely right. In his campaign, Rockefeller promised to hire a professional penologist to run the state prison system. But that implies a tremendous outlay of funds to hire officers, to set up vocational training, and to provide adequate counseling and rehabilitation. None of that is possible as long as countinghouse standards are applied to the penal system. The Arkansas prison would have to stop making money and start remaking men.

SPEECH WITHOUT ASSEMBLY?

The Court v. the Demonstrators

THOMAS I. EMERSON

Mr. Emerson is Lines Professor of Law at the Yale Law School. He is the author of Toward a General Theory of the First Amendment (Random House).

The recent decision of the Supreme Court in Adderley v. Florida upheld, by a 5-to-4 vote, the conviction for trespass of a group of Negro students demonstrating on the grounds of the Tallahassee jail. The case is the first in which the Court has sustained a conviction, under Southern police laws, of peaceful demonstration for civil rights. In this respect it undoubtedly reflects a change in attitude, both of the country and of some members of the Court, toward the "direct-action" tactics of civil rights and other groups. Had the Court been willing to stretch in the other direction, as it has on previous occasions, it could certainly have resolved this particular controversy in a different way.

But the case is also significant for another, perhaps more fundamental, reason. It raises serious questions concerning the legal foundations of the rights, embodied in the First Amendment, to assemble peaceably and to petition for a redress of grievances. More particularly, the decision casts disturbing doubt upon the right of the citizen to use public open places for purposes of assembly. In order to understand the importance of the decision in this respect, it is necessary to recall some facts concerning the right of assembly, and to review prior decisions of the Court that established the legal framework for the exercise of this right.

The constitutional right of peaceable assembly—or demonstration, in modern parlance—has long been recognized as the common man's chief mode of making his presence felt in the conduct of political and other affairs. Lacking access to the mass media, and deprived of direct influence in higher places, the ordinary citizen seeking to communicate with his fellows is forced to take his case to the streets, parks and other public open places. It is his principal way to reach an audience, and it is a major tactic in any effort to keep Establishment politics halfway responsive to common needs.

Justice Black, nearly two decades ago, emphasized the crucial importance of public assemblies in the effective functioning of a democratic society. Dissenting in a case in which the majority had upheld a city ordinance prohibiting the use of sound trucks that made "loud and raucous noises," Justice Black pointed out that "public speaking" was an "instrument of communication" of equal importance with, though serving a different function than, the "press, radio or moving pictures." He went on:

> There are many people who have ideas that they wish to disseminate but who do not have enough money to own or control publishing plants, newspapers, radios, moving picture studios, or chains of show places. Yet everybody knows the vast reaches of these powerful channels of communication which from the very nature of our economic system must be under the control and guidance of comparatively few people. On the other hand, public speaking is done by many men of divergent minds with no centralized control over the ideas they entertain so as to limit the causes they espouse. It is no reflection on the value of preserving freedom for dissemination of the ideas of publishers of newspapers, magazines, and other literature, to believe that transmission of ideas through public speaking is also essential to the sound thinking of a fully informed citizenry.

Actually, public assemblies possess important advantages for effective expression that are not found in other forms of communication. They permit face-to-face contact between the speaker and his audience, and thereby enhance the power of the message. For the participants they invoke feelings of solidarity and mutual support. For the onlookers they evidence the intensity and dedication with which expressed views are held. For the community as a whole they may be sufficiently upsetting to force reconsideration of the issue in controversy. All in all, the public assembly has a direct impact that is achieved by no other form of communication.

It is therefore not surprising that, throughout the years, the public assembly has been an essential technique for propagating new, minority, or unconventional opinion. In England it figured prominently in political reform movements from the 17th century on, as well as in the activities of such groups as the Salvation Army and the suffragettes. In the United States, the insurgent colonists, the abolitionists, the suffragettes, and many minority political parties have relied heavily on various forms of public assembly to advance their viewpoints. Without public assembly, the labor movement could hardly have won its struggle for public acceptance and political support.

The public assembly retains its vitality. In recent times the civil rights movement has developed novel types of public demonstration, and the peace groups have found such forms of communication indispensable. So have housewives protesting high prices, and the outraged home owner battling bulldozers intent on putting the newest superhighway through his living room. It should be also remembered that many groups representing the conventional order of things, from political parties to fraternal organizations, make extensive use of public assembly.

There is no doubt that the public assembly entails some risks and some discomforts to society. The mere congregating of large numbers of people, especially in tense situations, may set the stage for violence or disorder. The face-to-face encounter of speaker and audience diminishes the likelihood of fully considered action or reaction. And public open places have many other uses, to which the public assembly has to be accommodated. But these perils must be faced, and the inconveniences endured, unless a vital aspect of free expression is to be lost.

The task of the courts, and particularly the Supreme Court, is to establish the constitutional ground rules by which a vigorous and viable system of public assembly can function. At the heart of such a system is the basic right of citizens to assemble peaceably in public open places.

If such a constitutional right does not exist, then the government can cut off at will all meetings, parades, demonstrations, canvassing, picketing and similar activities that utilize outside public space. Or, if the government chooses to permit such use, it can limit the privilege in any way it sees fit, provided it does not act arbitrarily or show discrimination.

A constitutional ruling to that effect would leave the citizens with only a shadow of the right to assemble peaceably. By and large, there does not, and cannot, exist any constitutional right to meet or demonstrate on private property without the consent of the owner. There are exceptions to this rule, as in the case of company towns, and there are situations where consent may be implied, as in the sit-ins at lunch counters. But generally speaking, private facilities are foreclosed except by the grace of the owner. Nor is the right of public assembly adequately served by any right to meet in public closed places, such as town halls or school buildings. Even if a constitutional right to use such facilities were to be recognized, the indoor meeting does not alone answer the needs of an effective system of public assembly.

The importance of firm adherence to a positive right to assemble in public open places is somewhat lessened, but by no means eliminated, by constitutional doctrines of equal protection. It is clear that, to the extent the government may decide to make public open places available, it must make them available on a nondiscriminatory basis. And it has been suggested that since the government will not undertake to prohibit all meetings and parades—American Legion and Sons of St. Patrick included—it will have to afford equal facilities to unorthodox groups as well. In normal times or circumstances that might be the case. But the system must be geared to meet abnormal conditions. And it is quite likely that a community under tension —in Mississippi or Alabama, for example—would elect to cut off all public assemblies, at least for a time.

Moreover, the rule against discrimination presumably would not prohibit "reasonable" differentiations. It would forbid distinctions based on race or political views. But it might permit certain "educational" or "religious" forms of assembly while prohibiting "political" forms. Thus, much dissenting expression would be eliminated.

The legal rules must, of course, make some provision for resolving the various issues which arise from an acceptance of the right to use public open spaces for assembly. They must establish the point at which the public assembly no longer involves expression but action, and therefore becomes subject to control in the interests of order. They must also establish the means by which a community can maintain other uses of its open spaces, and therefore accommodate competing interests. And they must lay down the principles under which permit systems or other methods of administering the rules can function effectively without choking off the basic right.

But all these are matters of regulation. To deny the right itself is to give the government the power of prohibition. It is the equivalent of authorizing the government to deny citizens any right to publish a newspaper, print a book, make a movie, or broadcast over the air waves. It would, in short, allow the government to suppress one major medium of communication, the one most vital to the minority or submerged sectors of the population.

The Supreme Court first addressed itself to these issues in Davis v. Massachusetts, decided in 1897. In that case a Boston ordinance provided that no person "shall, in or upon any of the public grounds, make any public address, discharge any cannon or firearm, expose for sale any goods, wares or merchandise . . . except in accordance with a permit from the mayor." Davis was convicted for making a speech on Boston Common without permission of the mayor. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction, saying: "For the legislature absolutely or conditionally to forbid public speaking in a highway or public park is no more an infringement of the rights of a member of the public than for the owner of a private house to forbid it in his house."

The Davis rule, equating public and private property, flatly denied the right of public assembly. But four decades later, in 1939, the Court took another look at the issue. The case involved a suit by the CIO to enjoin Mayor Hague from interfering with the holding of public meetings and the distribution of leaflets on the streets of Jersey City. The Supreme Court refused to follow the precedent of the Davis case and upheld the CIO. Justice Roberts, speaking for himself and Justice Black, said: "Wherever the title of streets and parks may rest, they have immemorially been held in trust for the use of the public and, time out of mind, have been used for purposes of assembly, communicating thoughts between citizens, and discussing public questions. Such use of the streets and public places has, from ancient times, been a part of the privileges, immunities, rights, and liberties of citizens."

While there was no majority opinion in the Hague case, it was generally assumed thereafter that the Roberts statement embodied the law and that a constitutional right to use public open places for public assemblies did exist. Other statements of the Court during the 1940s tended to confirm this position.

Thus the matter stood when the first case to raise the issue in the context of a civil rights demonstration reached the Court in 1963. In Edwards v. South Carolina, a group of 187 Negro students marched to the Statehouse in Columbia, S. C., and walked through the capitol grounds, carrying placards protesting segregation. When ordered to leave, the students refused. Instead, they sang songs, clapped and stamped their feet; one of their leaders made a speech. Although a crowd of 200 to 300 whites gathered, showing some hostility, there was no violence or disorder. The students were charged with breach of the peace. Their convictions were overturned by the Supreme Court, Justice Clark alone dissenting.

Justice Stewart, who wrote the Court's opinion, did not expressly deal with the question of whether the students had a constitutional right to use the capitol grounds for their demonstration. But he did say that the demonstration was a clear exercise of "petitioners' constitutionally protected rights of free speech, free assembly, and freedom to petition for the redress of their grievances." He then went on to hold that the South Carolina breach-of-peace statute, construed to prohibit the conduct involved, was so "vague and indefinite" as to violate constitutional rights. The general view taken of the decision was that the Court was accepting the Hague rule.

But two years later, in Cox v. Louisiana, serious doubts were cast. In this case the Supreme Court reversed convictions of the Rev. Elton Cox for leading a mass demonstration of some 2,000 students who marched from the Old State Capitol building in Baton Rouge to the courthouse, where they sang, prayed and listened to a speech. They were protesting the arrest of some fellow students who were confined in the jail, located in the courthouse building, for picketing stores which maintained segregated lunch counters. A large crowd of whites was present, but again there was no violence or disorder.

The conviction of the Reverend Cox for breach of the peace was set aside on the ground that his conduct did not actually amount to a breach of the peace and that the breach-of-peace statute was too broadly drawn. In this respect the Court closely followed the Edwards case.

But Cox was also convicted on a second charge, that of obstructing public passages. The Supreme Court did not consider the obstruction statute to have the defect of vagueness, which had been fatal in the breach-of-peace statute. Moreover, strictly applied, the obstruction statute effected a total prohibition of the use of the streets for public assemblies. In this phase of the case, therefore, the basic right to use public open places appeared to be involved.

Nevertheless, Justice Goldberg, writing for the majority, held it unnecessary to decide the question. He found that the obstruction statute had not been strictly enforced; that some meetings and parades had been allowed; and that this delegation of uncontrolled discretion to the Baton Rouge authorities to permit or prohibit assemblies violated First Amendment rights. This disposition of the matter created no new doctrine.

More significant was Justice Goldberg's introductory sentence: "We have no occasion in this case to consider the constitutionality of the uniform, consistent, and nondiscriminatory application of a statute forbidding all access to streets and other public facilities for parades and meetings." He thus expressly refrained from affirming the doctrine of the Hague case and deliberately left the matter open.

Justice Black, concurring in the Cox case, did deal with the question left open in the majority opinion. It was his view that the First and Fourteenth Amendments took away, from federal and state governments respectively, "all power to restrict freedom of speech, press, and assembly where people have a right to be for such purposes." (Justice Black's italics.) "This does not mean," he went on, "that these amendments also grant a constitutional right to engage in the conduct of picketing or patrolling, whether on publicly owned streets or on privately owned property." Thus Justice Black squarely took the position that the government could ban, provided it did so without discrimination, most forms of assembly in public open spaces.

The Adderley case resembled in many ways the Edwards and Cox cases. A group of about 200 Negro students from Florida A. and M. University in Tallahassee marched from the university to the county jail, about a mile away. They were protesting the arrest of fellow students, then confined in the jail, for attempting to integrate public theatres the day before. The group entered the jail driveway and went up to the entrance. When a deputy sheriff requested them to move back, they did so. They then "stood or sat, singing, clapping and dancing, on the jail driveway and on an adjacent grassy area upon the jail premises." When the sheriff arrived he ordered the students to leave and, when some of them did not, arrested them for violating the trespass statute. Here also there was no violence or disorder.

Justice Black wrote the opinion for the majority of five who upheld the convictions. He distinguished the case from the Edwards and Cox cases primarily upon the ground that those decisions had rested on the vagueness of the breach-of-peace charges, whereas no such flaw inhered in the trespass statute. Reaching the central issue, the opinion declared, in language reminiscent of Davis v. Massachusetts: "The State, no less than a private owner of property, has power to preserve the property under its control for the use to which it is lawfully dedicated." And it concluded: "The United States Constitution does not forbid a State to control the use of its own property for its own lawful nondiscriminatory purpose."

Justice Douglas, joined by Chief Justice Warren and Justices Brennan and Fortas, delivered the opinion for the dissenters. "The jailhouse," he pointed out, "like an executive mansion, a legislative chamber, a courthouse, or the statehouse itself . . . is one of the seats of government whether it be the Tower of London, the Bastille, or a small county jail. And when it houses political prisoners or those whom many think are unjustly held, it is an obvious center for protest." Stressing the significance of the right to assemble and petition, in much the same language that Justice Black had used in the sound-truck case, Justice Douglas went on:

> There may be some instances in which assemblies and petitions for redress of grievances are not consistent with other necessary purposes of public property. A noisy meeting may be out of keeping with the serenity of the statehouse or the quiet of the courthouse. No one, for example, would suggest that the Senate gallery is the proper place for a vociferous protest rally. And, in other cases it may be necessary to adjust the right to petition for redress of grievances to the other interests inhering in the uses to which the public property is normally put. . . . But this is quite different than saying that all public places are off-limits to people with grievances.

The reach of the Adderley decision is by no means clear. It could mean a total withdrawal from Justice Roberts' (and Justice Black's) position in the Hague case. That is to say, the Court may be stating that the use of public open places for assembly purposes may not only be regulated but may be totally prohibited. Taking into account Justice Black's views in the Cox case, it seems fairly certain that that is what he means. And the dissent of Justice Douglas seems to read the majority opinion in this way.

If the decision carries this far, it can be described only as a disaster. For reasons already explained, a major portion of the constitutional structure protecting freedom of assembly rests on the basic right to utilize public open places. To abandon the Hague doctrine is to leave the legal system incapable of assuring any health or even life to the common man's medium of expression.

It is quite possible, on the other hand, that some of the Justices on the majority side did not mean to go that far. They may have had in mind merely to carve out some public areas to which the right of assembly does not extend. Thus Justice Black notes that a jail "built for security purposes" is different from the capitol grounds.

If this be the purport of the decision it is less alarming. The system of public assembly is not destroyed by a rule prohibiting demonstrations on jailhouse grounds. But even from this viewpoint the decision remains disturbing.

The concern arises over the method by which the Court reaches its conclusion and the implications of its reasoning. As Justice Douglas points out, a jail is, historically and currently, "an obvious center for protest." In the case before the Court the conduct of the students involved no violence or threat of violence, created no disorder, resulted in no obstruction that could not have been rectified by the authorities present, and brought no danger to the security of the jail. Why then prohibit such a demonstration?

The majority's answer is simply to rely upon the trespass law. But the trespass law is based exclusively upon the concept of ownership. It merely reiterates that ownership entails the right to keep uninvited persons off the premises. As already noted, this fact of ownership, so far as public open spaces are concerned, ought not to operate by itself to prevent exercise of the right of assembly. In terms of the basic requirements of a system of free public assembly, that factor is irrelevant.

If the Court had intended to preserve the Hague rule, it should have approached the issue in a different manner. It should have considered those factors which are relevant to appropriate regulation. This would have involved an appraisal of the specific circumstances of the demonstration: the time it occurred; the extent to which it interfered with other uses of the space; the threat in the situation of violence or disorder. Had it done this, as the minority did, one can hardly believe the majority would have reached its same conclusion.

In short, resort to the trespass rule, based wholly on the ownership factor, is consistent only with a theory of total prohibition. The failure of the Court to take the other approach suggests that repudiation of the Hague doctrine is indeed far advanced.

One other trend, discernible in recent treatments of the right of public assembly, is equally alarming. In support of his view that public property could be wholly closed to demonstrations, Justice Black took the position in the Cox case that "patrolling and marching" are "conduct" [action] and not "speech," and hence are not included within the protection of the First Amendment. Justice Goldberg expressed similar views in his opinion for the majority. He "emphatically" rejected the proposition that the First Amendment afforded the same freedom to "conduct such as patrolling, marching, and picketing on streets and highways" as it does to those "who communicate ideas by pure speech." The point was not mentioned in the Adderley case.

Such a doctrine drastically narrows the scope of the right of public assembly. Actually, taken to its logical conclusion, the argument would remove virtually all forms of assembly from the protection of the First Amendment. Why, for instance, does the holding of a street corner meeting involve any different kind of conduct than patrolling with placards on the same corner? (Labor picketing, which automatically evokes economic coercion, is a different matter.) Moreover, even the elimination of "patrolling and marching" would cut deeply into the rights protected.

It is difficult to see how these views of public assembly can be justified. The First Amendment, in express terms, guarantees not only freedom of "speech" and of "the press" but also "the right of the people peaceably to assemble." Obviously this right of assembly contemplates more than "pure speech." Any adequate interpretation of the First Amendment requires that the Court bring within its protection those forms of conduct which are integral parts of, and essential to, exercise of the right of expression. Surely "patrolling and marching" are essential to make effective the right of assembly as a vital "instrument of communication." Here also the Court, while not yet fully committed to the new doctrine, seems headed in the wrong direction.

The Supreme Court in the Adderley case undoubtedly was concerned that demonstrations and direct action not deteriorate into the settlement of political issues through violence on the streets. This concern is shared by the whole country. The community possesses adequate power, however, to deal with violence or other forms of action. Moreover, it must be remembered that all important social and political movements in this country have been accompanied by strain on local law and order. The tensions between change and order cannot be totally eliminated, but they can be accommodated, among other ways, by an effective system of free expression. One leaves the Adderley decision with the unquiet feeling that the constitutional foundations of such a system are being compromised.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

English In Its American Fashion

MODERN AMERICAN USAGE: A Guide. By Wilson Follett. Edited and completed by Jacques Barzun, in collaboration with Carlos Baker, Frederick W. Dupee, Dudley Fitts, James D. Hart, Phyllis McGinley and Lionel Trilling. Hill and Wang. 436 pp. $7.50.

MARIO PEI

Mr. Pei is a linguist, teacher and author of numerous articles and books on language.

Wilson Follett, essayist, editor and teacher, left at the time of his death in 1963 an unfinished manuscript, more than two-thirds completed which, by the words of his own 1958 prospectus, aspired "to do for the America of 1960 what Fowler did for the England of 1926." The unfinished manuscript was edited and completed by Jacques Barzun in collaboration with the distinguished group listed above.

Despite the confidence inspired by this impressive roster of names, the reviewer is faced with a release issued by Follett's widow. This states in part:

> . . . readers . . . [who] are familiar with Mr. Follett's editorial and critical writing, will be struck by the disparity between the qualities of this posthumously edited work and the style, rhetoric, linguistic exactness, and editorial workmanship that distinguished Mr. Follett's work while he was living. . . . For the benefit of such readers, some of whom will wish to determine for themselves whether they are or are not reading Follett, and as a matter of record that I think no more than the just due of an uncommon editor, writer, and teacher of writing, I shall shortly ask Harvard College and the Library of Congress to accept copies of the original 175,000-word manuscript from which Modern American Usage was prepared. . . . Meanwhile, the availability of the original manuscript will in part rectify the oddness of an edited work that variously and vaguely attributes authorship to one dead writer and seven living ones and documents neither the contribution nor the editing of any one of them.

The question of individual responsibility thus becomes a matter of exegesis, to be slowly and accurately worked out by future scholarship. Meanwhile, we are faced with a marketable book which must be reviewed on its collective merits. The reader must be reminded at the outset that whatever is said about the work applies to the book itself, and is not to be interpreted as a judgment on either Follett, or Barzun and his collaborators, at least until such a time as individual contributions are thoroughly established.

The philosophy underlying the work is set by Follett himself, in his prospectus of 1958:

> My book is not going to be written to bless the uses of language that I find no better than tolerable. In this respect it is at the opposite pole from general dictionaries, which exist to record whatever is and rest on an assumption that what is good enough for many is good enough for all. I am not interested in language on this permissive basis—in diction that is merely allowable or defensible. Never mind what can be endured: my objective is what is really good, what is best. . . . It is time we had an American book of usage grounded in the philosophy that the best in language—which is often the simplest—is not too good to be aspired to. Let who will define good usage as what a swarm of folk say and write by reason of laziness, heedlessness, or plain ignorance: Modern American Usage will tacitly define it as what the judicious say and write as a result of conscious discriminations.

Practically nothing in the work itself contradicts this basic point of view. In the introductory section the point is made that change does not necessarily mean life, but may mean death too, as proved by the fact that modern science arrests "natural" change, such as the spreading of cancer cells, by "artificial" and deliberate devices. Conscious purpose and reason interfere with "nature," and the result is embodied in the written tradition. Language does not consist of "speechways" alone, and the written, literary tongue, which some extremists among descriptive linguists refuse to dignify by the name of language, has its rights.

Further along, issue is taken with the descriptivistic doctrine, and normative grammar is defended and upheld. "Prose is not necessarily good because it obeys the rules of syntax, but" (Joyce and his admirers to the contrary) "it is fairly certain to be bad if it ignores them." The hostility to Latin among linguists and educators is described as "perverse" and is properly castigated.

This sets the volume in an anti-descriptivistic, anti-untutored-usage category which is altogether at variance not merely with the advocates of "Leave Your Language Alone!," but even with such half-reasonable apostles of popular usage as Bergen Evans. To what extent does this conservative philosophy of usage tend to duplicate Fowler's? There are sections of the book which are reminiscent not merely of the recent, watered-down versions of that writer's Modern English Usage produced by Margaret Nicholson and Sir Ernest Gowers but even of the earlier, infinitely prescriptive The King's English which Fowler prepared in collaboration with his brother in 1906.

In that work, the Fowlers presented long lists of quotations from the greatest English authors, from Chaucer down to Dickens and Thackeray, and labeled their usages "incorrect" on the basis of their own arbitrium. Follett tells us: "The argument from mere precedent which takes the form 'if it was good enough for Thackeray, it's good enough for me,' could make one's writing a mere concentration of solecisms, since every good writer has resorted to expressions without which he would have been a better writer." Again, in connection with the use of like for as, we are reminded of "the futility of the argument from history." Yet history, in the person of Byron, is cited only two pages before in connection with the distinction between lie and lay, whose overlapping forms are said to "cause more trouble than they are worth, and trip up even careful speakers."

This is a bit confusing. Even more confusing is the Appendix on shall (should), will (would), where the Follett volume starts off by taking issue with the Fowlers' snippy pronouncement about what is right and wrong (only southern Englishmen really know how to use those forms, according to the English authors), but then goes on to restate, at a cost of over 20 pages, nearly all of the Fowler prescriptions, including such natural ones as the proverbial stricture on "I will drown! Nobody shall save me!," and such unnatural ones as "He said he should be too busy to come today" (use should, not would, because in direct discourse you would expect shall, not will). Follett concludes by advising us that "with a little effort, 'anyone' can gain a command of the principles" (the quotes around 'anyone' are mine).

So far, with the single exception of the one surprising bit of permissiveness about lie and lay, prescriptivism is in the saddle. There is another concession to modern times in the toleration and even encouragement of the split infinitive. But as against this, we have a mass of examples which even a linguistic conservative like me would tend to regard as unnecessary quibbles; for instance, the distinction between This is not a very good book and This book is not very good (the first is said to imply that the writer had been led to believe the book was good; the second is said to express the writer's own conclusion). Despite the 2 pages devoted to distinctions between although and though, the only one that really makes sense to me is that though may be used at the end of a sentence and although may not. The distinction between chivalric and chivalrous is perhaps too finely drawn, as is that between personage and personality and even, for modern times, that between less and fewer, when we consider that more is the opposite of both.

Like Evans, Follett objects to a number of cliché expressions which have by now become second nature to American speakers. Some of Follett's aversions are compared with; if and when (yet it is conceivable that when may come into legitimate play once the condition presented by if has been fulfilled); the use of the suffix -ful in meaningful, suspenseful, flavorful, which are classed right along with such monstrosities as insightful, characterful, resultful; on the other hand (here Follett seems to imply that this is justified only by a previous on the one hand); in whole or in part (precisely what is objectionable in one-fourth of the school districts are already integrated in whole or in part?); as per your memorandum (is the business world not entitled to its jargon?); personal guidance (is there no such thing as mass or group guidance?), language laboratory (Follett calls it a misnomer, and would prefer language gymnasium).

Follett joins Fowler in advocating the use of that as a defining or restricting relative pronoun, of which as nondefining. For this there is no historical, etymological or literary justification, and the distinction between "restrictive" and "nonrestrictive" clauses is tenuous at best.

Follett objects to the use of the suffix -wise in such forms as marketwise, percentagewise, and calls it a sample of "inarticulate" English. He evidently fails to recognize that English, having largely discarded traditional case-endings, occasionally experiences the need to restore them, and that the -wise suffix supplies a perfect parallel for the Latin ablative of manner or specification, just as the -ward of skyward gives us a limit-of-motion case. But there is no mention in Follett, even under the heading "Danglers," of the ugly current ellipsis represented by So far as the new taxes, I'm in favor of them. (Even the late President Kennedy was occasionally guilty of this solecism.) As between saleswise and so far as sales, unfollowed by are concerned, I should prefer the former, which also saves time and space with no detriment to meaning.

In view of the book's strongly prescriptive tendencies, it is surprising to find the current repetition of the conjunction that receiving what amounts to absolution: He said that if you came today that I should give you this book. In addition, there are several omissions of general malpractices. Gobbledygook is nowhere mentioned (the nearest censured relatives are scientism, vogue words and "the pseudo-science of the ologists"); but senior citizen comes in for a deserved drubbing. Under "Uses of the possessive," we look in vain for the type of remote possessive that is glorified in the writings of one of our most prominent descriptive linguists (The girl I was telling you about yesterday's father), or, under other appropriate headings, for those other gems of language: Somebody left their books on this table and Forget about you haven't had your lunch yet, similarly quoted with warm approval by the same descriptivist, Robert A. Hall, Jr., in his Introductory Linguistics. Under -ability, we are told about the two endings -able and -ible, but it would have helped the cause of good usage if lists of common words where the endings are confused had been provided.

Not too much reference is made to foreign languages, but we wonder about the literal translations of à fond as "to the bottom" and au fond as "at (the) bottom." Canti fermi is labeled as Latin, but unless fermi is changed to firmi it qualifies much better as Italian. In England the Foreign Office would be more likely to secretise than to secretize. Diction is equated with vocabulary or choice of words rather than with delivery, despite its etymological derivation from dico, "to say." Imply is etymologically explained as "to fold in," but infer is presented in the same sentence as "to draw from," which makes one wonder whether etymology or usage is the criterion. Reaction is said to be "by definition" (whose definition?) "automatic, unconscious, uncontrolled." Why is uncontrollable the only possible form? (incontrollable has been in use since 1599). Now is said to have gone into an eclipse in the face of currently, presently, etc., but a current radio-TV ad features the now car.

Euphemisms (listed under "Genteelisms") justly include, among other words, disturbed, adjust, backward and underdeveloped. Follett's "Vogue Words" include forms to which semantic time-bombs have been attached, such as discrimination and collaborator. Other misused words are available (a magazine's This article is unavailable to us, accompanied by a rejection slip); communicate (used in dozens of different ways where speak, say, tell would serve equally well); contact as a verb; to implement; to process (Your check is being processed, a euphemism for is being held up); to structure (and how about the military destruct where we already have destroy?); the ineffable exciting, now used à tort et à travers; and, of course, hopefully as a loan-translation of German hoffentlich, whose rapid march into widespread and indiscriminate usage is such that we cannot even "hopefully" hope to halt it. There is togetherness, tracked down to Khalil Gibran (may his tribe not increase!). Under up we miss the vogue phrase, to point up, beloved of editors.

The final section on "Punctuation" starts off with a basically accurate statement to the effect that the modern system flouts both the ear and the eye. One wonders why stylistically minded copy editors have to interfere with a writer's own consciousness of what he wants, in accordance with his own sense of logic and voice-spacing. Why has the hyphen been all but banished from the printed language? It would so simplify Follett's problem of fishing-hat, or of speech-form and father-fixation. Why can we no longer have it after non-, or semi-, where it seems to serve a useful purpose? Once, when my non-national came back in proof as nonnational, I wondered, for a few brief seconds, whether I had created by implication a new noun, nonnation, and a new verb, to nonnate.

But then Follett insists, with some copy editors, that there should be a comma before and in a series such as France, Spain, and Italy, and claims that only reasons of space justify its omission. Yet there is no such break of the voice after Spain as there is before, unless one is speaking very emphatically. The comma is condemned in such a line as and, behind us, crept the night; but it is recommended for the states east of the Mississippi, where weather conditions are favorable, if one wants to imply that he is speaking of only some of those states; and the question arises, if a distinction must be made, why not say those states instead of the states? Under "Informal

'U.S. OFFERS CONDOLENCE AND AID TO VIETNAMESE BOMBED IN ERROR'

New York Times, 9/29/66

1

There is rejoicing at Hombe:
Only thirty-five persons died,
Only seventeen were injured
As compared with a hundred and sixteen thatch and wattle homes destroyed.
This means that most of the people
Must have been out of the hamlet
When the Marine pilots
Made their little mistake,
Bombing not reds but allies,
Members of the militia force, their wives and children.

2

There is rejoicing at Hombe:
Each dead person's next of kin
Has already received
The standard condolence payment,
Four thousand piastres or about thirty-four dollars,
And lesser amounts
Went to the wounded, depending Upon the extent of their injuries.
Furthermore, survivors
Are expected to sue the United States
For additional compensation —
A standard procedure, virtually,
In such circumstances,
Circumstances virtually standard by now.

3

There is rejoicing at Hombe:
Never before have the villagers
Made a profit out of the death
Of a nearest relative. Never
Has the richest of them supposed
That a life could be worth so much money
Or that governments could be sued
For what, after all, must happen sooner or later.

4

There is rejoicing at Hombe,
Mingled with dissatisfaction:
Bomb us again, they beg,
Our protectors, our liberators,
We still have people to spare
But not enough rice to feed them,
Now that the fields are churned up.
Let the survivors be few,
So that cousins and uncles and nieces
May earn them wealth more like yours,
Whose corpses in funeral parlors
Lie radiant, as good as alive,
Or frozen await resurrection.
Let them leave the site, then, for ever,
And the ghosts of kin they had loved.
Blast Hombe out of your maps and our minds.

MICHAEL HAMBURGER

Colon," an "informal" usage is recommended which strikes me as quite unusual: Then he wondered How the devil did I ever get into such a fix? Would not colon and quotes be better? Or indirect discourse?

The relative position of closing parenthesis and period is left to the writer's discretion and the logic of the situation (one feels like saying: "Tell it to the copy editors!"). But then we are told: "The period goes inside the closing quotation mark." Why, if it is the logical conclusion of everything that has gone before, including what is not contained in the quotes?

Perusal of Follett and earlier manuals of usage leads to certain considerations which bear upon the language in general and its vagaries. In the matter of pronunciation, Follett gives [illegible] the sole plural of alga a pronunciation -jee for a written form algae; -ee for alumnae, -eye for alumni. This is somewhat on a par with British paytuhr and maytuhr for Latin pater and mater. Ought not more respect be shown for the original Latin? Webster III, for all its modernism, gives the Latin as well as the British public-school pronunciations.

Follett distinguishes carefully between masculine bourgeois and feminine bourgeoise, but offers bravo as the sole operatic exclamation of approval. Again, Webster III, along with Fowler, gives the correct feminine brava.

English is replete with confusing pronunciations, spellings and meanings. It might not take too much effort to straighten out the most glaring cases, were it not for the fact that we have no Voice of Authority, such as a Language Academy. Take the case of forgo and forego, pronounced alike, but not to be confused. The for- of forgo is an intensive prefix akin to German ver-, while fore- is temporal, and from the same root as before (German vor-). One means "to do without," the other "to precede." Or take the utter confusion that prevails in the case of fulsome. Follett and other manuals of usage imply that it should appear only in the sense of "disgusting" or "nauseating," but the Oxford dictionary, among others, presents it in the primary historical meaning of "abundant," "plentiful," "full," "plump." All etymologize fulsome from full, but it seems likely to me that somewhere along the line there was a merger of fulsome from full (Anglo-Saxon full, later ful) and fulsome from foul (Anglo-Saxon ful, pronounced as in fool, later ful), which would account for the discrepancy in meaning. Take, as a third horrible example, viable, which is derived from French vie (in turn derived from Latin vita) and has to do with life, but tricks even etymologists into thinking it comes from Latin via, "way," with the result that many use it as a synonym for "passable," "something for which a way can be found, or a road built."

Prof. Parry Moon of MIT once undertook a project to standardize scientific terms in various languages so that they would have similar forms and uses (as a single example: chemical binary compounds, which in English bear the -ide suffix of iodide, sulphide, have in Italian the suffix -uro, as in ioduro, solfuro; it was Moon's idea that either English should accept -ure, or Italian should accept -ido, so that we would have ioduro and iodure, or iodido and iodide). But far more than scientific terms seem to call for standardization in this age of expanding international communications. Both Follett and Fowler issue fulminations against transpire in the sense of "to happen." In the Romance languages, the root of transpire means "to sweat," as it once did in English, so that where we have perspiration, French has transpiration. Constipate, which etymologically means "to press together," is primarily used in English for a condition of the bowels, but in the Romance languages for a state of the nasal passages. As a boy of 8, fresh from Italy, I can recall the guffaws that went up in class when I explained my previous day's absence because of a head cold on grounds of "constipation." Would there not be a way of standardizing these usages internationally, and thus doing away with hundreds of deceptive cognates and "false friends"?

Logic goes out the window, Follett implies, when we speak of unbending and to unbend. He might have added the opposite meanings of cleave (to cleave to; to cleave in two). Of course, all language and all languages are illogical. But English is among the worst offenders in this respect. When Follett tries to outline the uses of transitive and intransitive verbs, he glosses over that enormity, unparalleled in any other language I know, whereby English uses a verb in the passive with a direct object following, and a grammatical subject which is logically the indirect object (I was given this money; He was told this story). From the standpoint of logic, it seems to me that this is just a little worse than even Spanish Se me dió el dinero ("The money gave itself to me"), or Se mató al hombre ("It killed itself the man," meaning "The man was killed"); and no amount of rationalization by Jespersen will convince me of the contrary.

The use of the -ly suffix, normally adverbial, but often adjectival, is another sore spot. Go slow or Go slowly? The dog wagged its tail in a friendly manner, but hardly The dog wagged its tail friendlily.

In conclusion, manuals of usage, while they serve a purpose, are not the panacea imagined by some of their worshipers. Neither are they the diabolical devices described by some descriptive linguists (one of the latter recently compared them to quack cancer cures). There is in them, as in the language they attempt to describe and prescribe, an arbitrary element which is inherent and, one is almost tempted to say, indispensable. There is also a perennial clash between historical etymology and current usage, and no manual writer so far, to my knowledge, has attempted altogether to eschew the one or the other. When history and present-day usage are blended, it is a little like mixing oil and water. Shake well, and you get not a solution but a suspension of particles of one liquid in the other.

Return to the Bush

SOUTH OF THE MOON: On Stanley's Trail Through The Dark Continent. By Blaine Littell. Harper & Row. 300 pp. $6.95.

SOUTH WEST AFRICA: The Last Pioneer Country. By Thomas Molnar. Fleet Publishing Co. 160 pp. $4.

EDWARD T. CHASE

Mr. Chase is a frequent contributor to Book Week, The New Republic, Harper's and other publications.

The dominating question about the Third World, le tiers monde that comprises the emerging states of Latin America, Asia and Africa, is: can it sustain workable governments and economies based upon the consent of the governed? Here is a prediction about sub-Saharan Africa by Blaine Littell:

> What is happening is a steady, inexorable return to the bush. . . . It is an almost imperceptible movement, this return to the past, and those who are looking for masses of marching men accompanied by martial music and ringing proclamations will never see it. Rather it is a quiet drift, but the trail is clear, marked as it is by abandoned cars which need only gasoline to make them run again, by discarded radios requiring only batteries to bring them back to life, and by vanishing roads and crumbling, vine-choked plantation homes. It will not take nature long to obliterate these final reminders of the white men's occupation of this land. . . . I do not see anything on the horizon, I can imagine nothing which will halt or even slow this return to the bush.

Thus does ex-C.B.S. foreign correspondent, erstwhile New York Herald Tribune reporter, writer for The Reporter magazine, Yale-Columbia alumnus write off Africa in South of the Moon. It is at the close of his account of his five-month re-creation via Land-Rover of Sir Henry M. Stanley's three-year journey of 1874-77. Mr. Littell's book arrives at a time when intensified tribal warfare, assassinations, the United Nations uproar over Rhodesia and over the South West Africa cases bespeak a continent in disarray; so perhaps Littell's pessimism would seem unremarkable. But in fact it derives from private ruminations after months of direct observation "in the bush," far away from the headlines.

It is particularly unsettling to see that Littell's view now coincides with the traditional outlook of cynics like Thomas Molnar, who proclaim that, given independence, the African must fail, at least for as far as one can see into the future. Mr. Molnar is an outspoken admirer of apartheid and he shares with Mr. Littell the capacity to make portentous inferences from the sight of abandoned automobiles, left by indolent savages to rot on the veld. To Molnar's credit, however, he, like Littell, has traveled to Africa to see for himself. His special value as an observer is that he has just been to South West Africa, that most remote of immense areas, the size of France and Great Britain combined. His reporting helps to make comprehensible some of the bewildering claims and counterclaims now being made at the United Nations.

So at this stage in the adventure of African independence, now ten years after the emergence of a free Morocco and Tunisia (and Ghana in 1957, Guinea in 1958), these two new books struggle again with the white man's perennial anxiety: is the Negro inferior? In the fierce controversy about what is possible as well as probable in Africa, ultimately one always gets back to this hoary issue. No matter its apparent impertinence, the reality is that the race question cruelly shapes every prognostication about Africa's future. No matter that undigested abstractions are tossed about in such debates. Ideas that prevail, whatever their lack of merit, have their consequences in thousands of decisions, large and small. Embraced by a sufficient multitude, the very idea of Negro inferiority can project a bigot into a governorship in Georgia, or certify the sense of righteousness among the Rhodesian white minority or, more subtly, demoralize the black man even where he now holds sway. Recently in Tanzania, for instance, I asked the white lady managing the store at a state-owned camping lodge why a "native," most of whom are desperate to be part of the tiny wage-based economy, did not have the job. Their own leaders know they can't cope with money, she replied. (This, incidentally, after misquoting to me the prices for film and then giving me the wrong change for my purchase.)

To be fair, Littell's is an account sympathetic to the Negro, but the brunt of his anecdotes stresses Negro unpredictability, irrationality and inadequacy. Many of his stories are wonderfully funny, some are horrifying. He concludes, in his embarrassing final pages, that the African reverted to the bush is somehow the better for it: "The jungle; the bush; the open savanna. It was here, where he was born, that the black man would return to slough off the imperfectly grafted skin of civilization, to regain his sense of superiority. Yes, here he was superior—to the animals he stalked and to the white man who had stalked him."

Littell's approach is impressionistic; Molnar's is a show of "logic." Molnar denounces the liberals sympathetic to South West Africa's freedom as irresponsible ideologues, ignorant of both the "incredibly complex situation" created by the ten tribal groups and primitive level of the natives, and of the wisdom of South Africa's harshly disciplined, paternalistic running of the country. He sees the Negroes as benefiting from their forced restriction to workers' compounds in the Police Zone, six men to a room, on their yearly exile from their families on contract jobs in the diamond mines. To illustrate how benevolent the white managers are, Molnar reports that "14 menus are worked out so that the same dish cannot appear on the table more than twice a month." The 600,000 Negroes should be grateful for whatever exploitations they are subject to by the 80,000 whites, Molnar suggests, since, as he so strongly emphasizes, until the Germans came in 1907, the black man lived under the constant threat of death from his fellow blacks.

Molnar has much to say, mostly negative, about the United States, some of it curiously ambivalent. He is still outraged over our treatment of the Indians and scores American hypocrisy with this anecdote: "A round table was called together in 1964 in Washington by a self-styled 'peace promoting' organization, which shall remain charitably unnamed. The announced objective was to invite various people knowledgeable on Africa, and some South Africans as well, and discuss ways and means to 'help' South Africa get out of its 'tragic situation.' The hypocrisy of the whole affair was in itself sickening; but the scandal cried to heaven since we gathered at the Cosmos Club where no black man was admitted to enter!" O.K., touché.

The American, Ernest Gross, chief counsel in the South West Africa cases before the World Court, is his bête noire. Despite his sensitivity to hyprocrisy, Molnar, however, never discloses throughout his long account of the cases the substance of Mr. Gross's charge: that in the forty years South Africa has run South West Africa no native ever has been qualified in law, medicine, engineering, nursing; none can be employed in a skilled occupation; none can join a union or move without permission or have a say in government or administration, or live except where one is told.

This would appear to have a bearing on the opening question of whether sub-Saharan Africa can sustain a viable government based on the consent of the governed. Are Littell and Molnar so wrong in their doubts? The only honest answer is "not necessarily." What cries for emphasis, rather, to put this into perspective, is to consider how desperately difficult it has been for peoples throughout most of the world to achieve this condition, some with states centuries old. Consider Europe in the 1930s and '40s, and much of the rest of the non-African world today. The American has trouble digesting the notion of the single-party state. But in a brand-new country, divided by ancient tribes in which the strongest nationalist movement in effect has become the state, is it reasonable to ask for a traditional two-party system? The happiest development and an immensely significant precedent is in Tanzania where the brilliant Julius Nyerere has devised the scheme of authorizing the single party to put up two candidates locally. The result has been political competition, a real choice for the voter.

The gravest doubts about Africa's future must arise from the economic situation. The populations of sub-Saharan Africa's countries are 90 per cent rural, with less than 20 per cent of the labor force in a wage economy. The agriculture worked by 80 per cent of the population is low in productivity, severely limiting the surplus on which greater diversification could be built through trade—where 80 per cent of families are farming, the market for food is only 0.25 of a family per farmer. Not until only 40 per cent are in farming does the market become 1.5 families. And whatever economic growth is attained tends to be undermined by a population growth of 3 per cent yearly.

Littell "can imagine nothing" to halt a reversion to the bush. Maybe. Yet Kenya already has accepted the principle of state-supported birth control. Other nations will follow suit. And the prodigies of mid-20th-century technology—which rebuilt a war-devastated Europe in a decade—surely hold out at least an imagined solution for these lands, now so accessible, thanks to the new technologies of jet air travel, instant communications and modern teaching tools.

More and More Alike

AS A CITY UPON A HILL: The Town in American History. By Page Smith. Alfred A. Knopf. 332 pp. $6.95.

SEYMOUR J. MANDELBAUM

Mr. Mandelbaum teaches at The Annenberg School of Communications, University of Pennsylvania. He is the author of Boss Tweed's New York (John Wiley).

Page Smith's study of the small town in American history is essentially a deeply felt critique of urban society and culture. The city, he laments, encourages men to choose friends who have common interests, backgrounds and aspirations. "The result has been a progressive constriction and narrowing of personal relationships and their progressive impoverishment. Like accentuates like; boredom and ennui are bred by the homogeneity of subgroups with the larger community; and often a spurious heartiness masks a coldness of response and the careful maintenance of defences against unsolicited or unwelcome intrusions."

The city, he insists, is "depersonalized." Its values and controls "are increasingly developed outside the community by the vast industry whose business it is to produce in their laboratories synthetic values that are presented as 'entertainment' and as 'education,' and that are in truth as ephemeral as the daily paper." The freedom of the city has weakened local orthodoxies but has put in their place national dogmas which "have to be honored even more wholeheartedly and certainly more unanimously than before."

That's the moral guts of the book—not its subject. Smith's substantial theme is contained in the observation that up until the first decades of the 20th century most Americans lived in small country towns. A great many of these towns—how many is not clear, but more than we commonly imagine—were relatively homogeneous in their social composition, and enjoyed a sense of common purpose of identity. In its earliest forms, this sense was expressed in a formal church covenant; later, implicit secular covenants defined the nurturant boundaries of successful social units. These towns developed men who were inner-directed, untroubled by their own identity, and secure in their values. Launched in the world, they were unusually creative in fields which required independent judgment, patience and moral earnestness: the ministry, teaching, medicine and science. The towns themselves were capable of supporting the national community and national men of power without being engulfed by them. They were also coherent units, amenable to description and analysis and hence capable of literature.

In the 20th century the last of these communities have died or are dying. There were two important signs of morbidity. The first was the transformation of a charitable moral environment, which respected sexuality, into a repressive code of injunctions; the second was the replacement of the ethic of the covenant with the praise of the rugged individualist. The major cause of death, Smith argues, was the spread of urban influence. "Towns, whatever their origins," he writes, "grew more and more alike, not because of any logic inherent in the towns themselves, but because they came increasingly under the influence of urban culture and urban values."

The victims may have been more willing than Smith admits. He distinguishes between communities which were colonized by a single group or covenanted in a formal manner and those which grew out of bits and pieces of people—"cumulated," he calls it—because of unique economic opportunities available at a particular location. The two types of towns were essentially different, he argues, in their social organizations and their value systems. His own evidence suggests, however, that this may not be the case. He notes that covenanted towns were endemically unsuccessful in their business enterprises. At the point that they succeeded, they bit the urban dust. The other side of the same coin, which Smith does not explore, is the emergence of coherent "covenanted" communities in the unsuccessful remnants of once flourishing "cumulated" regions. Formerly prosperous coal towns in Appalachia illustrate this regression.

If differential success in the market place distinguishes the communities, then perhaps we need a more sympathetic image of the urban seducer. Americans, from very early in their history, have apparently valued both individual achievement and the pleasures of community. They have gambled on the main chance and, when necessary, have been willing to sacrifice community for cash. Quite literally, the towns reached out for the city, rather than the other way around.

This alternative hypothesis does not really detract from the main thrust of Smith's work. It's very likely, just as he says, that growing up in a stable small town is not quite the same as growing up in a city. A nation of cities is different from a nation of small towns. Cities which are manned by families old in urban ways are different from those flooded by new small-town recruits.

It is not at all clear, however, just what these differences are. Is Smith's characterization of urban society—deeply felt but not documented—correct? If we are truly becoming more bored, sterile and impersonal, what can we do about it?

The question of truth and the problem of action are separable. Correct or not, Page Smith is doing something about his view of urban civilization. After eleven years at UCLA he has moved up to Santa Cruz as provost of Cowell College in the university complex there. The Santa Cruz colleges are designed to be intellectual and social units which will provide an intimacy and interdisciplinary dialogue that critics charge is notably lacking at Berkeley. There is a strong resemblance between Smith's ideal town and the new colleges amidst the redwoods.

Santa Cruz is too young to know whether there are any costs in its design. What qualities that even Smith values will be lost or prove impossible? If Smith's criticism of the city is wholly correct, it is hard to imagine any costs in Santa Cruz's plan of organization. But the criticism is suspect. It smacks heavily of damning America for being dominated by the shallow values of the mass media—and then calling in witness only the mass media themselves. Smith talks freely of the impersonal city and ignores the impressive literature on the continuing importance of interpersonal relations in shaping the communities in which even city men live. He asserts that over the last several decades urban Americans have tended to talk less frequently and less intensely with men who differ from themselves in ethnic origin, occupation, income, religion or social perspective. He presents no evidence and would be hard pressed to prove the assertion. My sense of the matter is that its opposite would be a great deal easier to prove. Somehow the research in this sophisticated book never really touches or tests the core of Smith's own perspective upon American history and his emotional response to American culture.

ARCHITECTURE / ERVIN GALANTAY

Mr. Galantay is an associate professor in architecture at Columbia University and practices as a consultant in urban design.

Historians of urban design show increasing interest in the formative role of the enlightened client on architecture and planning. The client with the vision to initiate ideas has at times left a more personal imprint on urban design than have the architects in his employ. In contemporary urban planning the single client has largely been replaced by the corporate or bureaucratic client, and the vision or whim of the individual has yielded to market analysis and the balanced compromise. Planners of New Towns in Europe, South America, Asia, have the state as their client, but in this country sizable New Towns still rise at the initiative of individuals pursuing profitable investment and—in some cases—following their personal vision of the commonweal.

In a previous article I examined Reston, Va., a New Town which has the personality of Robert E. Simon stamped over its design and rightly carries the initials of its developer in its name. Simon's planners, Whittlesey & Conkin, gave Reston an identity reflecting his determination to provide the good life in a perceptual environment of high quality.

Another rare kind of client, one who promotes an enlightened social philosophy, is James Rouse of Baltimore, widely known as banker, owner of shopping centers, champion of urban renewal and developer of the New Town, Columbia, Md. Mr. Rouse sees the city as the bearer of civilization and measures its worth on whether or not it contributes "to the growth development of mankind." Being dissatisfied in this respect with the performance of existing cities, Rouse set out to build his own, a "truly rational" city providing "the most viable soil for the growth of people," where they can live the full life as Rouse envisages it.

Listening to Rouse, one may surmise that social planning became his obsession—a sort of practical religion—yet he also pursues successful investment by shrewd business methods best exemplified in the strategy of planning his New Town. Unlike Simon, who bought an estate at bargain price and then decided to use it for a New Town, Rouse's organization —Community Research and Development, Inc. (CRD)—first determined the size of the future community and then made a systematic search for the best site. It was found in rural Howard County, Md., halfway between Washington and Baltimore, where large contiguous parcels could still be assembled for less than $1,500 per acre. Next, Rouse negotiated a $20 million loan with the Connecticut General Life Insurance Company. It was a pioneering financial arrangement whereby repayment was deferred until the start of actual construction, thus assuring time for careful planning.

For his New Town staff, Rouse raided the National Capital Planning Commission and secured for CRD both William Finley, author of the "Year 2000 Plan," and Morton Hoppenfeld, his chief planner. The new CRD staff met regularly for six months with a work group of fourteen leading social scientists; collectively, they fathered the organization pattern of Columbia. Meanwhile, working in secrecy through dummy corporations, Rouse assembled 15,600 acres of land and in October, 1963, dumfounded the Howard County commissioners with the announcement that he controlled 10 per cent of the county's area. The commissioners—committed to preserve the rural character of the county—now became the targets of Rouse's two-pronged attack of evangelistic zeal and economic argument. After one year of siege, Howard County was won over to the cause and granted Rouse special zoning for Columbia.

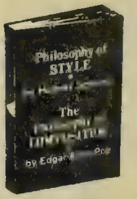
Planned for a population of 110,000 by 1980, the New Town will generate 27,000 jobs, and it is expected that at least half of the job holders will live in Columbia. Rouse envisions a community with a diversified population and intends to provide housing for everyone employed in his town, from the $10,000 unit of the janitor to the 10-acre estate of the top executive. In contrast to Reston, with its villages focused on various forms of recreation, Columbia's concept is based on education. Neighborhoods of 300 to 500 families cluster around a nursery and elementary school. Five or more neighborhoods form a "village" focused on a high-school complex. Each village will also have a 2-acre green or plaza, shops and offices, a village hall, branch library, young people's club, an amphitheatre and 3 acres of land reserved for churches. Nine to ten villages will be served by a town center, with a community college and various civic and cultural buildings, in addition to a large shopping center.

Rouse hopes that this logical organization will endow each resident with a sense of belonging to the community, similar to the attachment of country folk to their villages and small towns. Critics like Berkeley's Christopher Alexander find however that the pattern suggests a hierarchy of closed social groups "based on associational ties of different strength" which are absent in modern urban society. Although Rouse speaks of a laboratory city, of an "urban test tube" where such ideas as "opportunity structures" can be examined, the social planning concept of Columbia is not boldly experimental but just a compendium of many things good and desirable. This lack of boldness may not be Rouse's fault: in meetings with his academic advisers it was generally Rouse who advanced brilliant and adventurous ideas while his consultants were more cautious. Still, the proposed pattern is clearly superior to that of the unstructured suburb or "non-community," to borrow a word from Rouse, who also claims that Columbia "may not be perfect but will be better."

To what extent will Rouse's lofty ideals and the logic of the social planning concept be matched by the physical pattern? What will be the impact of Columbia's visual environment on residents and visitors? In answering these questions one's ideas must be based on the plans and models of CRD, since ground has been broken at Columbia only recently. The edges of the New Town are defined by state and interstate highways, with Route 29, the "Columbia Pike," bisecting the town and providing access from four cloverleaf interchanges. By following the mainstream of traffic a visitor will easily discover the town center as the hub of regional shopping. The 1,800-foot-long shopping mall will be far bigger than the town alone could support. This vast shopping area will be surrounded by parking and girdled by a distributor loop for the traffic. A larger loop will embrace the commercial core, as well as the community college, a cultural campus and the town plaza of Columbia, separated from Route 29 by an artificial lake. In theory, the regional shoppers are needed to support Columbia's cultural facilities, but in physical appearance the cultural and civic areas are mere appendages to the shopping center, and the buildings of the town plaza reflected in their lake appear as a sublimated form of advertising aimed to attract traffic from the Columbia Pike. The center's movement pattern favors the visiting shoppers, and residents driving to their plaza will have to weave through the out-of-town traffic. To minimize this inconvenience, a minibus system will be operated for residents who comprise the important "captive market."

In contrast to the bustling town center will be the quaintness of the residential areas. A visitor proceeding through gently rolling hills will pass tree-shaded low-rise settlements with slightly increased densities around the village centers. Houses of all kinds will be provided by various builders. Confronted with a quasi-amorphous, vaguely repetitive pattern, the visitor may not immediately realize that he has arrived at the New Town unless he is struck by the presence of carefully designed small-scale elements: lampposts, signs, benches. He will find a street pattern of loops, clusters and cul-de-sacs borrowed from that thirty-year-old bag of tricks of the garden city planner and may experience the same difficulty in locating a friend's house as in any fanciful curvilinear subdivision. He will vainly seek guidance by architectural coherence or an overall town structure like the "sinews" proposed for Reston, but he may take comfort from the well-studied system of direction signs.

Planner Morton Hoppenfeld explains this casual residential pattern as having allowed "the land to impose itself as a discipline on the form of the communty." If so, it is a mild discipline. Powerful topography, a mountain range or a river, can indeed structure the most disjointed agglomeration by providing orientation, a sense of location, of "there-ness." But in the absence of such features it is the task of the urban designer to provide visual guidance by a clear overall per-



FOR WRITERS!

Enrich your style through Herbert Spencer's and Edgar Allan Poe's classic principles that have influenced many of the world's great authors. A help for writers eager to get published. Send $1.00 to

PAGEANT PRESS
101 5th Ave. N.Y. 3 Dept. N

Buy Your Books

through The Nation

Nation readers can avail themselves of our offer to send them any book (except paperbacks), published in the U.S., at the regular retail price post-free. When ordering, please give name and author and publisher, if possible. Remittance must accompany order. Make checks payable to:

THE NATION
Reader's Service Division
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

ceptual pattern. Leaving the creation of a sense of order to the accidents of topography, or to the social planners, amounts to the abdication of a key responsibility by the urban designer. Of course, the vast size of the town and the resulting low densities make it difficult to propose a cohesive pattern. The area is about 24 square miles or nearly ten times as big as the island city of Venice which has a population of 170,000, not counting pigeons, cats and tourists. Columbia also includes many enclaves not controlled by CRD—it is in Rouse's words a great "Swiss cheese"—and the "holes" add to the confusion. But since 3,700 acres will be reserved for recreation, the continuity of these green areas may link Columbia's villages in a comprehensive structure.

To me, Columbia's low density is a most questionable feature: compact spatial configurations like the old-fashioned street act as funnels for traffic and bring about the random, accidental contacts, the unpredictability and surprise of urban life. High densities and complex, overlapping land uses foster the competition, conflict and tension which are the salt and pepper of "urbanity." And since low physical proximity leads to increasing stratification, the looseness and spread of Columbia may counteract the stated goal of socio-economic integration. I cannot see how comfortably spread Columbia will arouse the dynamism essential to a society that aspires to contribute to the "growth development of mankind." In this the physical design is not equal to Rouse's great vision.

Both Reston and Columbia have been hailed as models for the future, yet they may remain isolated prototypes of the New Town, conjured up by individual enterprise. In the vicinity of the metropolitan areas where New Towns are most in demand, it is becoming impossible to find large tracts at prices that would make such ventures financially attractive to private developers. In the future some degree of government participation will be necessary, since New Towns are needed as the best alternative to capricious and wasteful suburban sprawl. Recognizing this, the Kennedy administration actively promoted the New Town idea, and President Johnson recommended on March 2, 1965, a program of "federally insured private loans backed by federal mortgages . . . to finance the acquisition and development of land for entirely new communities. . . ." In the terms of this cautiously worded bill, public bodies would assemble the land and resell developed land to private builders for construction. Unfortunately, Congress rejected this program and government interest has since shifted from New Towns back to the metropolis with the "Demonstration Cities" program.

This change in government emphasis is perhaps connected with the fact that the budding of New Towns has attracted increasingly acerbic criticism from leaders of center-city renewal. Thus Edmund Bacon of Philadelphia has implied that the New Towns may sap the vitality of the central city even more than do the bedroom suburbs, since they will lure those middle-class residents who remained loyal to the core city for the sake of urban amenities which the New Towns now attempt to supply. In CRD news releases one can find support for Bacon's contentions: Baltimore research firms are moving their plants, lock, stock and taxes to Columbia, taking with them the families of engineers, scientists and researchers. George Kostritsky, whose initiative once triggered Baltimore's spectacular Charles Center renewal, is concerned that the New Towns may contribute to racial stratification and compound the troubles of the core city. Rouse's pledge that CRD will be "color blind" in selling houses and apartments at Columbia does not quiet all suspicions. The type of employment offered includes relatively few blue-collar jobs. Negro home seekers in New Towns will be middle class or at least "upwardly socially mobile," and it worries sociologists like Hans Spiegel that their departure may deprive the central ghettos of much-needed leadership. In compensation, Spiegel demands that the New Towns should include 5 per cent hard-core, multiple-problem families in the lowest income bracket. These could be assimilated by a healthy new community and their inclusion would help to redress the balance with the center. But such a move is hardly attractive to the private developer who —no matter how idealistic—seeks profit or at least tries to break even.

None of this proves that we have to choose between center renewal and the development of New Towns; both are needed and should be complementary. A truism worth repeating is the fact that within the next forty years we shall have to duplicate all the housing built since the Pilgrim Fathers landed on Cape Cod. Even with accelerated urban renewal, the center cities will not be able to accommodate this demand. Hence a comprehensive national policy for the development of New Towns is needed. In this perspective, the great initiatives of Simon and of Rouse may have a historic importance beyond the success of Reston and Columbia. By exciting popular interest and building their demonstration New Towns they have helped to make the New Town idea familiar and acceptable to many Americans. With time, this familiarity may secure for the planning of New Towns high priority on the list of national goals toward a Society that may not be Great but will be, as Rouse hopes, "better."

Agit-Prop Pop Opera

JAMES O'CONNOR

Mr. O'Connor is a member of the Economics Department of San Jose State College.

A middle-aged Negro jockeys an old Ford and flat-bed trailer into the parking space on San Francisco's Haight Street. The sad-eyed heads and acid freaks watch the maneuver from the Psychedelic Shop a few yards away. One of the actors slips a coin into the parking meter; another looks both ways—no fuzz in sight. From the inside of the car the signs are moved into the street: "Haight-Ashbury Vietnam Committee," "I'll Follow Him as a Nurse," "We'll Petition McNamara." The sidewalk fills up with the paraphernalia of agit-prop theatre—signs, comic-strip balloons, a first-aid box, tape recorder, speakers, costumes, outrageous military uniforms. Across the street in front of Be-Jay's Baby Shop two tourists stare. The tykes in the second-floor bay window looking directly down on the trailer are bug-eyed. Passers-by are suddenly stopped in their tracks by a loud, raspy tape of the Fugs singing Kill for Peace and Tom Lehrer doing Send the Marines, while the actors frug on the sidewalk and on the trailer. The overture of San Francisco's only pop opera, Romeo and Pagliacci, signals the start of the show's fiftieth performance.

"The Haight-Ashbury Vietnam Committee is one of the most active neighborhood peace groups in the Bay area." Nina Serrano Landau directs the show and trains the agit-prop theatre's cast, which includes political activists (not actors) and two of her own children. She has produced, directed and acted in shows around the Bay area for half a dozen years. She is an innovator. "But the war has dragged on and the committee wanted to get their message across to a wider audience. They wanted their message dramatized. In conventional theatre, the players are in motion and the audience is at rest. The opera reverses this relationship. We have to perform on a trailer or truck. Our audience is in motion and we have to stop them.

We have to arrest their attention in the time it takes to stroll past the trailer. And we have to keep it for the time it takes the police to land on our heads." [Space is extremely limited and so is time, and to block the show things have to be kept very simple and direct.]

Now the opera is going full blast. The characters are identified by signs and it is impossible to lose the thread of the plot. Mom is sad because Romeo the Boy has been drafted. L. B. McNamara resists a plea for his deferment. Pagliacci the Girl decides to become an army nurse and join her lover, Romeo, in Vietnam. Both are killed in battle. The libretto is punchy and stylized. The score of familiar old tunes disarms the audience and puts it in a receptive mood.

The familiar melodies and sentimental plot constitute the solutions to the troupe's fundamental artistic problem. The pedestrian is at first embarrassed, stops. An anti-war street opera is not quite proper; yet he has been sought out by aggressive young people in costume and told to look and listen. The mood is not hostile or threatening; the pedestrian must be disarmed, won over. The melody of Oklahoma (with the words, "Stop the War Machine"), the strong rhythms, the bad jokes, the silly but almost believable tragedy of Romeo and Pagliacci are the tools of the agit-prop opera: today's pop culture dramatized for a simple message —Stop the War.

"God knows what our immediate inspiration is. Medieval theatre for one thing." Miss Landau mentioned particularly the Wisconsin Idea Theatre. The theatre conducted classes in which country people wrote plays about their immediate problems. But there was no theory of people's culture, and the idea died when the slogans were exposed as empty— "Make the boundaries of the university the boundaries of the state," "Recreation is the time to recreate our historic past." This was the Socialist pageant theatre of another age. "The psycho-drama and socio-drama movements of a dozen years ago, too. And the early improvisational techniques employed by SNCC and CORE to prepare nonviolent resisters." How much of the agit-prop opera is mere self-gratification? "I don't know."

During this performance on Haight Street teenie-boppers, heads and blonde demigoddesses carting around heavy knapsacks made an apathetic audience. At first the troupe did not establish contact with the audience. Then a few tourists, a gang of kids, some straight couples drifted up to the trailer. The police were nowhere to be seen and the risk of a ticket for carrying people in a trailer was slight. A second performance was decided by an impromptu conference among the actors. The show started to roll again, and the troupe was more spirited, movements were made with a great deal more assurance. There was no stagy acting or mime as such; the cast mouthed pre-recorded lyrics played over two speakers, jumped around, struck poses, crumpled to the trailer bed during the death scene. It was immediate, expressive, unself-conscious; the cast obviously wanted to share its pleasure. If the material were more complicated, the show would have been embarrassing. But the cast was the material; all else—songs and lyrics—were props. Suddenly the simple truth of this pop opera is apparent; the medium itself contains the real message. The joy itself of sharing a sense of optimism and good humor opposes the war. The climactic chant at the end of the performance—"stop the war machine, stop the war machine, stop the war machine" —is a ritualized expression devoid of ideological content. The troupe is not making a moral statement but rather living a public experience and inviting the onlooker to join.

"In Berkeley a lawyer danced through the streets. In Golden Gate Park the audience joined hands and danced with us. At Hunters Point (a Negro ghetto) the local residents saved us from possible trouble at the hands of an amateur-intellectual black nationalist theatre gang. Kids want to get into the opera. The only thing we really want to do is to get people together, transform them into a cohesive group as an audience for a brief moment, and make them reflect a little. The war is ridiculous, isn't it?"

The street lights came on and the cast began to pack up their equipment. They would park somewhere else and perform again. A few people had been themselves, briefly, and art had been a weapon. The war machine will continue to roll on, and some of the anti-war crowd will insist that only conventional political activity can be effective. Watching her 8-year-old daughter pass out the last of the anti-war leaflets the troupe always distributes after the show, Nina Landau agrees that message theatre has very sharp limitations as a political instrument. The opera itself is anti-war but contains no clear ideological message. The listener is reminded again that the play cannot be very complex, that the musical-pop opera form was chosen because it is adaptable to strong, simple statements. During a performance in Los Angeles at the New Politics conference, many New Left politicos in the crowd did not turn a head. They were too intent on pursuing their ideological disputes over whether to support Brown or no one. The ideological left-wing press has all but ignored the opera. But the underground press—the Los Angeles Free Press and Berkeley Barb —embraces and supports the troupe.

"But isn't that because you do not offer anything to oppose the war except yourselves?" This is a recognized problem. The second opera, Li'l Red, White and Blue, will appear on the streets and in the parks shortly. It is bitter, more concrete, more realistic, more serious. The troupe is becoming dissatisfied with Romeo and Pagliacci. They have performed it too many times and it has served its purpose. In the future there will be less self-gratification, more art and more politics. Nevertheless, it is certain that the medium itself will continue to be the real message. Imitations are springing up on the West Coast; political groups are asking for help to dramatize their cause. Suddenly there is a sense of responsibility.

Just before the troupe packs in and drives off in the car, Nina Landau's daughter is asked by the listener: "Why don't more people stop for the leaflet?"

"Just stupid," she answers.

THEATRE / Robert Pasolli

Mr. Pasolli became a free-lance writer in the theatre after working on Broadway, at Lincoln Center and, on a Ford Foundation grant, at the Tyrone Guthrie Theatre, Minneapolis.

Off-off-Broadway, the theatrical delights of satire, playfulness and scatology seem lately to have all but eclipsed the frankly serious poetic or metaphysical play. To an extent, this is simply a matter of operating from strength; those lighter genres are easier to do well with the limited means of coffeehouses, churches and lofts. Furthermore, such productions are more amenable to the fuller theatricalism characteristic of Off-off-Broadway (compared to, say, Off-Broadway) and hence more challenging to the visionaries who are its best practitioners. I don't for a moment regret the emphasis on play and sport on the stage, but I want to applaud the dark poeticism of two good new plays I saw recently—precisely because they are successful examples of a genre to which Off-off-Broadway and its supporters are increasingly inhospitable.

Theatre Genesis, at St. ~~Marks in~~ the Bouwerie, has just done The Key by a playwright named Kit Jones. For a one-act monologue, the play is uncommonly full-bodied, escaping through vivid theatrical imagery and a reverberant theme the paucity of spirit that is the special curse of monologue. Not that The Key will rival Beckett's monologues; it lacks the demonic insight of Krapp's Last Tape and Happy Days, as well as their implacable, imperious rigor. But Kit Jones's play artfully and in short order presents us with a dense, engrossing drama—one that has the authority of fullness of life.

The semi-surrealist action of The Key is set in a naturalistic framework, which serves to lead us into and out of the hero's private experience. Arriving at his apartment door, William Smith gropes for his key and experiences a moment of panic before he finds it. The emotion triggers his account of the adventure from which he has just returned home; he tells it as much for himself as for us. We learn that he has been a conscientious librarian for fifteen years; that he leads a tight and tidy life; that he doesn't earn much money. We sense that he is a man whose taut psyche is about to snap; indeed, we come to the realization that his adventure is the breaking of the first cord.

Smith has spent the day in frenzied pursuit of a stranger who had snatched his apartment key as he left for work that morning. The chase led him throughout the city—up through tenements, down into the subway, into the library where he works, up through the stacks and down to the basement. The events and encounters of the chase are acted out and occasionally emphasized by a recorded voice-over account, suggesting interior monologue, which reinforces the sense of Smith's groping within the bizarre adventure.

The Best Way
To Get
THE NATION

THE NATION 12-26-66
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Foreign and Canadian Postage
$1 a year extra)

NAME ....
ADDRESS ....
CITY ....
STATE .... ZIP NO. ....

Just how bizarre it really is comes through gradually: Smith is chasing a phantom. He has imagined the theft, mentally embodied the thief and then given actual chase. His phantom eludes him, however, at the moment of confrontation. Smith imagines the thief to have brushed past him, slipping the key into his pocket as he goes. In possession again, Smith can return home.

The flash-back account finished, Smith returns to the landing outside his apartment door to round out the play. From his fumbling for the meaning of his experience and from his carelessness with his hat, which falls down the stairwell as the play ends, I took it that his psychic distintegration had just begun.

The Key is an existential account of a man's descent into hell, with suggestions that it is only the first trip. The playwright makes it clear that Smith has been denied the achievements of life's possibilities: meaningful relationships, money and personal sway, professional position. In Smith's imagination he is now deprived of the one thing he did have—entry to his own private world, his home, his lair. With the loss of identity, which is the loss of self, Smith's disintegration is about to become total.

Jones rigidly delimits his depiction of Smith's experience to the manner in which Smith sees it. As fiction The Key shares the method of Sartre's Nausea and Camus' The Stranger, two reigning documents of existential malaise; to some extent it parallels their achievement in that it makes the particular so vivid that one hears reverberations to the general.

The Key is an imaginative, carefully structured, vividly imagistic play. Its occasional dramatic arbitrariness and its straining of theatrical means in rendering surrealistic adventure seem to me minor limitations. (As directed by the author and performed by Dennis Helfend, the production at Genesis was a creditable job.) I don't know who Kit Jones is, but neither did I know who the now vigorous playwrights Sam Shepard and Leonard Melfi were before Genesis began to produce and encourage their work. Genesis, it is to be remembered, means birth.

Another adventure play was recently presented at the Judson Poet's Theatre. Maryat Lee's The Tightrope Walker is more diffuse than The Key, but also more ambitious. Despite a degree of indefiniteness, it is a work of strange beauties. The tightrope walker is the artist, his roots in heaven, who pays with human isolation for his exhilarating gifts. To care for earthly contacts is to deny his art—"the wings turn into ornaments and eventually drop off," a master tells his apprentice, warning him not to get involved on earth. The play's action recounts the perilous adventure by which a young artist comes to recognize the truth of this advice.

Yoloy, the apprentice walker, yields to the tug to earth that plagues him on the tightrope. He locates the source of the pull—a former high-wire artist named Dell who fell to earth through human involvement—and attempts to take her back aloft. For a time he deals with the situation on earthly terms, fighting rationally and physically against Dell's ties to another earthling. Failing, he withdraws to return without her and this turns the trick. As in the Orpheus and Euridice legend, which the play parallels except for Orpheus' weakness at the last moment, Yoloy's strong example inspires Dell to follow him. Thus his artistic dedication redeems both of them.

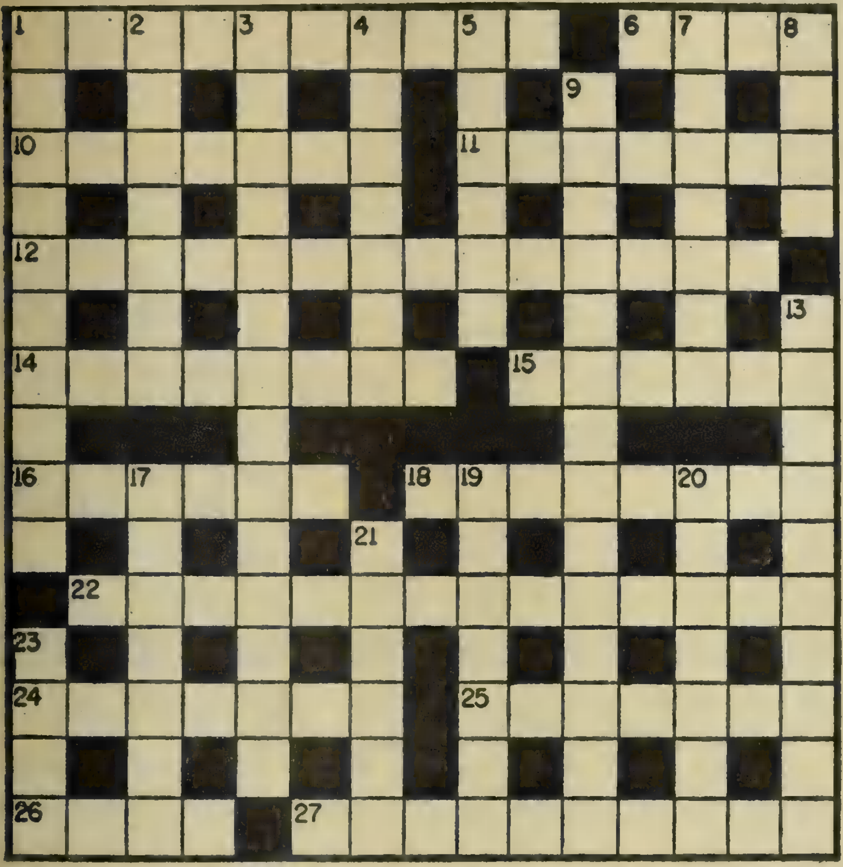
As impressive as is the play's elaborate metaphorical conception, its special beauty is in the high-flown poetry of the language. Miss Lee has written in rhythmic cadences, liberally dosed with images related to flight and freedom. The particularly apposite image of the rope, representative both of the walker's art and the earthling's imprisonment, is ubiquitous.

The Judson production, directed by Foulkes Taylor, was something short of satisfactory; most regrettably it lacked forward drive. But performances by Richard Mason as Yoloy, Lee Worley as Dell and Robert Bonnard as the master walker were good, and Marvin Peisner's portrayal of Dell's earthly nemesis was superb.

The Tightrope Walker represents a successful renewal of the Judson's reputed hospitality to serious, high-flying theatre pieces during the early '60s, when the Poet's Theatre came into being. In recent years this most prominent of Off-off-Broadway groups has become known for a brand of impish, irreverent playfulness that has made it many friends (including me), but which is only one side of the new-theatre coin. Ironically, a production of the familiar sort, offered on the same bill with The Tightrope Walker was a wearisome failure despite the standard ingredients of music by Al Carmines, direction by Larry Kornfeld and performances by several Judson regulars. The doctored-up version of The Love Cure, linking Kornfeld's comments on American moeurs with Molière's satire on medicine, was a piece of hokum with almost no moments of delight and certainly without self-justifying relevance.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1161

FRANK W. LEWIS



ACROSS:

1 As the soldiers left, the French market has to remove something. (7, 3)
6 Young state? (4)
10 How the beer may have been carried by the dog? (7)
11 One might hope it to be a flower with directions for insuring silent spring. (3, 4)
12 Establishment, if you want the truth! (14)
14 Sent up by enough 16? (8)
15 Bum steer a prankster might give? (6)
16 Lunge affected by most of the oxidation—or even oxygen, nowadays. (6)
18 Piccadilly and Oxford? They might put on quite a show there! (8)
22 What might happen when you shoot at the floor? (Notice their holdings!) (8, 6)
24 Nautical command, but the man seems to get a "Nyet!" (5, 2)
25 It might be tacked on a splintered tree, tho! (7)
26 See 7 down
27 Little George stops to see some mathematicians of the country. (10)

DOWN:

1 One might judge that mother gets a general idea of the price! (10)
2 Not really the shape of the star in "Twinkle, Twinkle"! (7)
3 See 7 down
4 True and false—for a comedian! (7)
5 Excessively ornate state, should you read an article on it! (6)
7, 8, 26, 23 and 3 Implying shop-lifters get a little assistance from higher authority. (3, 4, 4, 4, 4, 4, 10)
8 See 7 down
9 If you're planning to change any of your habits, you might look into these. (7, 7)
13 Their output might be suspended in 9. (5, 5)
17 Proving there's a bit of a boy in any old rake, whether it comes to music or food! (7)
19 Match set, perhaps, when one did. (7)
20 The ways of the city? (7)
21 Goes to a certain amount of trouble to provide low-type foil. (6)
23 See 7 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1180

ACROSS: 1 Astonished; 6 Apse; 10 Caravel; 11 and 29 Warming oven; 12 Harridan; 13 Douai; 15 Pedal; 17 Osteopath; 19 Spinnaker; 21 Knife; 23 Adept; 24 In a pinch; 27 Evinced; 28 Oversee; 30 Waitresses. DOWN: 1 and 26 Archness; 2 and 18 Turn and turn about; 3 Never; 4 Salad fork; 5 Edwin; 7 Primula; 8 Englishmen; 9 Braddock; 14 and 24 A Passage to India; 16 Lunatics; 20 Itemize; 22 Incises; 25 Irene.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address requests to Puzzle Dept., The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

"SELECTED POEMS" of George Flynn (Villiers of London $2.00) is "the most exciting American poetry since Ezra Pound."—James Turner. Available in U.S. from the author at 544 — 82 St., Brooklyn 9, N. Y.

THE IDLER. Lively, offbeat liberal monthly. Fun to read. Send $2 for trial year's subscription. IDLER, 413B 6th Street, N.E., Washington, D.C. 20002.

For latest developments in CHINA'S CULTURAL REVOLUTION subscribe now to PEKING REVIEW (in English) airmailed weekly $4. Also China Pictorial, China Reconstructs, and Chinese Literature @ $3 each seamail. Write for our free catalog of 700 imported publications in English from China. CHINA BOOKS & PERIODICALS, 2929 24 St., San Francisco, California 94110.

WHAT, AGAIN?

White mercenaries battling for the Congo's riches? Moise Tshombe bidding for power? Read about the new invasion threat in

TOWARD FREEDOM
343 S. Dearborn St., Chicago 4, Ill.

Congo Issue, 25c; Year's sub, $3

ART

ORIGINALS COST LESS THAN REPRODUCTIONS! Contemporary original signed etchings, lithographs, woodcuts, $3.50. Guarantee. Free brochure. GRAPHIC CIRCLE (NA), 68 Fifth Avenue, N.Y.C. 10011.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

$2.95 each

SAVE YOUR COPIES OF The NATION

- Each file holds a full year's copies.
- Jesse Jones Volume Files for every publication.
- Covered in durable leather like Kivar, title embossed in 16 Kt gold.

Satisfaction guaranteed

Attractive and practical for your home or office

3 for $8.25

ORDER NOW — send check or money order.

MAGAZINE FILE CO.
520 FIFTH AVENUE
NEW YORK 36, N. Y.

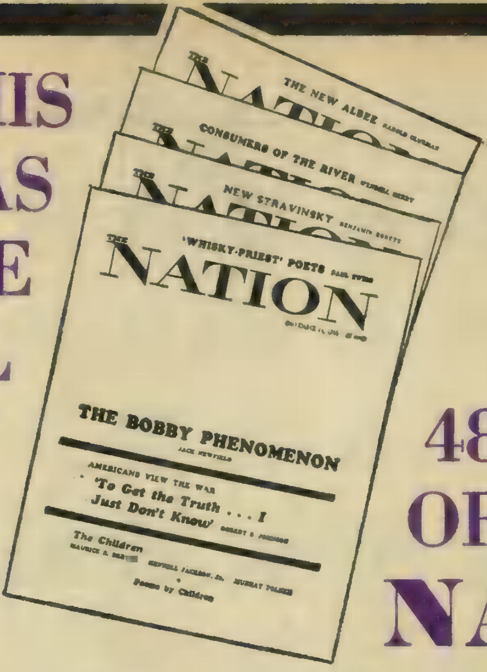
FREE DESCRIPTIVE FOLDER UPON REQUEST

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED
74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum
CLASSIFIED DISPLAY
$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

THIS CHRISTMAS GIVE THE THOUGHTFUL GIFT



48 ISSUES OF THE NATION

PLUS FREE BONUS BOOK UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED by Ralph Nader

Here is the perfect gift for a thinking friend. 48 issues of this country's oldest (1865) weekly journal of dissenting opinion, plus this decade's most controversial book.

UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED is the blistering attack on the auto industry that rocked Detroit, Washington and hundreds of thousands of readers from coast to coast. The American Trial Lawyers Assn. Journal called Mr. Nader's book "Pulitzer prize material." Science Magazine said UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED "is likely to be the Silent Spring of traffic safety." For anyone who spends any time at all in a car, this controversial book is "must" reading. And it's a bonus absolutely free, when you enter a Christmas subscription to The Nation.

- "A ringing indictment of the industry. . . . Strongly recommended. . . . He has done prodigious research in a field mired in anonymity, and has come up with a book that, hopefully, will change Detroit's ways. . . ."

Eliot Fremont-Smith, New York Times

- "A powerful and persuasive case that Detroit has indeed slighted safety considerations in a headlong pursuit of pleasurable styling. . . ."

Wall Street Journal

- "Deeply disturbing. . . . Exhaustive and persuasive. . . . He cites numerous weaknesses in certain Big Three models of recent years, naming names in each instance and quoting from court proceedings."

John Barkham, Saturday Review Syndicate

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER

THE NATION / 333 SIXTH AVENUE / NEW YORK, N. Y. 10014

Please send The Nation as a Gift for one year at the Christmas rate of $10 for the first Gift subscription, and $8 for each additional Gift, to the following friends. I understand they will receive a BONUS of UNSAFE AT ANY SPEED.

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
Sign Gift Card from ....

(For more than two Gift Subscriptions, please use a separate piece of paper.)

Your Own Name ....
Address ....
City .... State .... Zip ....
☐ I enclose payment of $ ....
☐ Bill me
Foreign and Canadian: $1 per year extra

12-26-66